

Per. 17 2°

Review

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

VOLUME LXVIII.

LONDON:
PUBLISHED AT THE OFFICE, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND.

1889.

1639

PRINTED BY
SPOTTISWOODE AND CO., NEW-STREET SQUARE
LONDON

CONTENTS OF VOL. LXVIII.

POLITICS.

ACTING Consul, an, and an Active Magistrate, 129

Addington, Lord, 234

Adventures of Eight Hours, the, 699

Africa, 507

Africa, Portugal and England in, 669

African Problem, the, 667

Agriculture and Technical Instruction, 264

Allbutt's, Dr., Case, 34

American Case, a Leading, 183

American War Songs, 726

Arbiter Apologiarum, 549

Arma Virumve Canemus? 512

Armenia, 700

Armenian Atrocities, 230

Art Congress, the, 487

Art, Science, and "My Lords," 639

Aunt's Cheque, the, 125

Axes to Grind, 130

BACKING and Pulling, 2

Bad Business, a, 515

Baldness, the Pleasures of, 508

Balfour, Mr., at Glasgow and Edinburgh, 641

Balfour, Mr., at Ipswich, 545

Ball, Mr. John, 456

Bank-note, the History of a, 482

Banstead Commons Case, the, 733

Barnardo, Dr., the Goodness of, 62

"Be My Visitor, or I Will ——" 260

Bench, the, and the Bullet, 576

Benzon's, Mr., Horse, 90

Betterments, 730

Bicycles v. Cavalry, 514

Bishop and Boanerges, 482

Book Illustration, Processes in, 671

Boulangism, 96

Bourke v. Davis, 640

Bouverie, Mr., 696

Boycotting and Picketing, 287

Brazilian Revolution, the, 582

British Medical Association, the, 180

Browning, Mr. Robert, 665

Bull Fight, the, in France, 34

CATS, the Conservatism of, 451

Cave Proceras, 149

Chamberlain, Mr., and the "Moderate Gladstonians," 320

Chamberlain, Mr., at Birmingham, 264

Chamberlain's, Mr., Explanation, 423

Chrysanthemum Centenary, the, 514

Church Congress, the, 371

Churchill, Lord Randolph, 401

City of Fears, the, 543

Club, What is a? 510

Coal Dues, the, 10

Coin and Statistics, 700

Collins, Mr. Wilkie, 343

Colston Banquets, the, 549

Coquelin, M., the Times on, 669

County Council, Incompatibles in the, 452

County Council, the, on its Dignity, 178

County Council, the Songs of the, 400

Crete, 91, 147, 179, 399, 510

Crete and Armenia, 208, 450

Cronin Case, the, 701

DEATH, a, and a Wedding, 449

Delagoa Bay and Arbitration, 29

Delagoa Bay Difficulty, the, 2

Derby, Lord, on Evening Schools, 402

Diogenes Harcourt, 396

Divorce Court, the Latest Scandal of the, 729

Dogs and their Commentators, 450

Dogs, Cats, and Muzzles, 31

Dog's Point of View, from the, 4

Duels, Queer, 574

Dufferin, Lord, on India, 485

Durham, the Bishop of, 729

EAST Africa, 259

East and West, 419

East-End Strike, the, 206

Eastern Worries, 345

Education Debate, the, 152

Egypt, 7, 31, 89, 180, 295

Election Lessons, More, 421

Election Prospects, Coming, 319

Elections, 479

Elections and Electioneering, 60

Elections of the Week, the, 396

Elections, the, and the Government, 32

Elections, the Coming, 294

Emin Pasha, the Relief of, 578

England and Germany, 205

Eton, Twaddle about, 368

Exhibition, the End of the, 517

FAIDHERBE, General, 374

Fergusson, Sir James, on Crete, 577

Ferry, M., 486

"First-class Original Information," 295

Fishery Difficulty, the, 610

Fleet Swannery, the, 177

Fleet, the Mobilization of the, 59

France, 7, 548

France and Egypt, 731

Frappez Toujours, 453

French Army Bill, the, 36

French Deputies, the, 673

French Elections, the, 341

French Elections, the Coming, 317

French Pretenders, the, 261

French Second Ballots, the, 395

Friendly Societies, 152

Fusion, More about, 372

GALLOWAY'S, Lord, Case, 422

General, the Case against the, 62

General, the Sentence on the, 176

General's Case, the, 149

General's Rebuff, the, 129

Gentlemen and Players, 32

Gentlemen of Fiction, the, 606

German Visit, the, and the German Press, 148

Germans Abroad, the, 207

Germany and the Porte, 516

Gillies's, Mr., Answer, 582

Gladstone, Mr., at Manchester, 633

Gladstone, Mr., on Progress, 480

Gladstone, Mr., the Greatness of, and the Smallness of England, 290

Gladstone's, Mr., Last, 345

Gladstone's, Mr., Statesmanship, 33

Gladstonians on the Stump, 581

Glasgow, Students at, 608

Goatfell Murder, the, 547

Goschen, Mr., at Blackpool, 487

Grand Committees, the Use of, 179

Greased-Pole-Climbing, 291

Greece and Crete, 478

Guildhall Speeches, the, 541

Guinness's, Sir Edward, Gift, 573

Guns and Ships, 481

HARTINGTON, Lord, at Wolverhampton, 483

Hatton Garden, the Robbery in, 698

Hayti, 233

Hearings in Camera, 674

Herschell, Lord, on Ireland, 420

Hic Jacet Mr. Quilter, 426

Hole and Corner Justice, 550

Holiday Deputation, a, 258

Holy Taffy's Prayer, 676
 Homeric Blunders, 453
 House, the Business of the, 35
 How to be Dethroned, 702
 Human Barrel-Organs, 543

INDIAN Budget, the, 233
 Indian Native States, the Armies of the, 1
 Infectious Diseases Notification Bill, the, 125
 Inspection and Review, 151
 Ireland, 29, 181, 577, 605, 728
 "Ireland Expects —" 208
 Ireland, the State of, 451
 Irish Constabulary Vote, the, 153
 Italy and "Outidanos," 367

JUDICIAL Allantopoles, a, 448
 Jumbies, 634

KENSINGTON Commissioners' Report, the, 182
 Kensington Gardens, 546
 Kurds and Armenians, 318

LABOUCHERE, Mr., among the Scotch, 425
 Ladies in Court, 551
 Latest Novelties, the, 508
 Laurie, the Respite of, 612
 Law, the Byways of the, 478
 Leader, the New, 374
 Leap before you Look, 675
 Leaseholds, London, 575
 Legal Process, an Abuse of, 701
 Leighton's, Sir Frederick, Speech, 673
 Lincoln's, the Bishop of, Case, 95
 Liverpool Jury, the Strange Freak of a, 703
 Liverpool Murder, the, 156
 Lords, Reporting in the, 91
 "Luck of Conybeare," the, 402

MANIFESTO, an Unmanifest, 445
 Mansfield College, 424
 Mare's Nest, the Latest, 236
 Maritime Conference, the, 517
 Maryborough Trials, the, 483
 Maybrick Case, the, 175, 203
 Medical Session, the, 373
 Melbourne, Lord, 601
 Memory and Imagination, 477
 Miners' Conference, the, 609
 Ministers at the Mansion House, 121
 Mogul Company, the, 61
 Molloy, the Wrongs of, 640
 Monetary Congress, the, 294
 More Gold Boxes Wanted, 322
 More Unequality, 263
 Morley, Mr., at Home and Not at Home, 574
 Morley's, Mr., Evasions, 484
 Mother Goose in Paris, 319
 Municipal Politicians, 262
 Murder, the Last, 293
 Museums, Provincial, 672
 Music-Halls, the Censorship of, 446
 Muzzled Meeting, a, 609
 "Mysterious Album," "the," in One Volume, 94

NAPOLEON of Special Correspondents, the, 603
 National Party Again, the, 289
 Naval Manœuvres, Lessons of the, 263

Naval Manœuvres, Sense about the, 343
 Naval Manœuvres, the Last of the, 234
 Navy, Additions to the, 604
 "New" Conservatives, a Lesson to the, 127
 New Style, More, 30

O'BRIEN v. the Marquess of Salisbury, 90
 Ocean Oxen, 399
 Old New World, the, 423
 Open Space, an, —Gone, 127
 Outbreak, an, or an Outrage? 59

PARKES's, Sir Henry, Letter, 516
 Parliamentary Times and Seasons, 511
 Parnell, Mr., and Ireland, 397
 Parnell, Mr., at Nottingham, 703
 Parnellite, Protest, the, 58
 Parties, the Future of, 231
 Peace or War? 57
 Pension List, the, 155
 Philanthropist, the, on the War-Path, 637
 Philosophy in Difficulties, 546
 Physical "Examinations," 296
 Picnic Philosophy, 320
 Plumber, the, 610
 Police Magistrates, More, 402
 Political Difficulty, the New, 512
 Political Situation, the, 92
 Politicians, Young, 122
 Portugal, the Difficulty with, 726
 Portuguese Filibustering, 695
 Portuguese Pretensions, the, 601
 President's Message, the, 636
 Prince of Wales, the, in Egypt, 509
 Prize Blackguardism, 732
 Provident Societies, 95
 Puff! Puff! 544
 Pulpit Christmas Cards, 733

QUEEN, the, in Wales, 232
 Queen, the, v. Bridge, 92
 Quelch and Liberty, 347

RADICALS, the New and the Old, 130
 Randolph's, Lord, Recantation, 292
 Reading Books and Buying Books, 259
 Reichstag, the Opening of the, 448
 Revolution à la Rosebery, 666
 Revolver at Home and Abroad, the, 235
 Right of Search Again, the, 128
 Rings, 342
 Rosebery, Lord, and Mr. Haggis, 518
 Rotterdam Strike, the,—and Others, 368
 Royal Grants Committee, the, 36
 Royal Grants Debate, the, 97
 Royal Grants Debate, the End of the, 124
 Royal Grants, the, 152
 Royal Grants, the Committee on, 9
 Russell, Lord John, 446

ST. PAUL's Reredos Case, the, 698
 Salisbury, Lord, at Nottingham, 604
 Salvation Army Nuisance, the, 33
 Salvationist Nuisance, the, 60
 Sauce for the Gander, 232
 Scathold, 608
 Science Collection, the, 209
 School Board Building, 611
 School Strikes, 398
 Scottish Drolls, 369

Self-Healing, 346
 Sense at Last, 425
 Servian Celebrations, the, 8
 Shah, the, 10
 Smith, Mr., at Glasgow, 518
 Smith, Mr. W. H., 6
 Speeches of the Week, Some, 455, 513
 Speeches, Recent, 370
 Spookical Congress, the, 317
 Squaretoes and Squareface, 607
 Stanley's, Mr., Explanation, 727
 Still More Chatter, 289
 Strand, Improvements in the, 373
 Strike, First-Fruits of the, 315
 Strike Mania, the, 400
 Strike, Some Morals of the, 316
 Strike, the, 229, 257, 542, 580
 Strikes, More, 515
 Stuart's, Mr., Programme for London, 65
 Sultan Inquiry, the, 9
 Summary Jurisdiction, 207
 Sunday Trains, 94
 "Supported by Voluntary Contributions," 123
 "Swear'st Thou, Ungracious Boy?" 421

TECHNICAL Obstruction, 235
 Tennyson's, Lord, Birthday, 154
 Theatrical Children, 37
 Theatricals at Sea, 204
 Things Colonial and Intercolonial, 454
 Third Party, the, 580
 Thompson, the Persecuted, 35
 Tirard's, M., Programme, 579
 Tithes, 670
 Tithes Bill, the, 156, 177
 Tithes, the Recovery of, 64
 Toski, the Battle of, 150
 Toy Caps, 638
 Trade-Union Threats, 725
 Trade-Union Tyranny, 633
 Trades-Unions, 697
 Trades-Unions, the Fight with the, 671
 Transvaal, the Future of the, 344
 Travellers' Tales, 261
 Tupper, Martin Farquhar, 639
 Turkey, the Troubles of, 126
 Twice a Queen, 369

"UNEKAL," 206
 Unilateral Reciprocity, 5
 Unionist Speeches, Two, 63
 University Match, the, 4
 Useless Knowledge, 3

VICE, a New, 344
 Voter, the Modern, 93

WALES and Cornwall, 426
 Wales, Church and Land in, 638
 War, Relics of, 480
 Welsh Clergy, the Sufferings of the, 635
 "What is a Pound?" 293
 Whitechapel Murder, the, 64
 Who Fears to Speak of Ninety-eight? 668
 Wicked Turk, the, 288
 Woman's Plea for the "Gloves," a, 155
 Workers Wrangling, 63
 Write, Learning to, 321

YAKOUTSK, the Affray at, 734

MISCELLANEOUS.

ADVERTISING Politicians and the Post Office, 554
Among the Dust of Empires, 243
Anthropometamorphosis, 426
Apple and Pear Conference, the, 350
Architecture and Art, 522
Argentine Crisis, the, 616
Army, the, and the Way to it, 460
Art Congress, the, at Edinburgh, 492
Artillery Association, the National, 241
Arts and Crafts Exhibition, the, 406

BADAWIN, among the, 97
Bank Dividends, the, 72
Bank Rate, the Rise in the, 241
Barnum's Show, 558
Brazilian Finance, 407
Brazilian Revolution, the Financial Consequences of the, 585
Buda-Pesth, 270
Bull-Bull's Farewell, the, 44
Bull's, Mr., Show, 11
Burlesque, the New, 352
Business Year, the, 739

CAMBRIANS in Brittany, the, 268
Caste, 408
Cats at the Crystal Palace, 464
Cattle Show, the, 679
Cavalry, Modern, 158
Cettinje, 189
Chachians, Among the, 209
Chamberlain, Mr., a French View of, 584
Chorolista, the, 463
Christmas Day, the Third, under the Commonwealth, 740
Church Windows, Modern, 213
Clerical Brotherhood, a, 348
Clerk, George, 134
Comedy, the Decline of, 457
Communard, the Philosophy of a, 184
Concerts, Recent, 15, 73, 494, 524, 557, 587, 649, 680, 708
Cookery, Cosmopolitan, 135
Cotton Corner, the, 377
Cotton Trade, Short Time in the, 271
Court Bureau, the, 521
Crime, the Punishment of, 613
Criminal Romance, 12
Curios, Curious, 265, 296, 323

DARTMOOR Convict Prisons, 583
Davis, Mr. Jefferson, 681
Dead Heart, the, 381
Degraded Artisan, a, 103
Devonshire Association, the, 212
Devon, South and North, 185
Die Meistersinger at Covent Garden, 70
Disease, Free Trade in, 68
Dogs of War, the, 738
Dom Luis I., 465

EDESSA to Aleppo, 403
Egypt, Pictures of, 617
Egyptian Antiquities, Exhibition of, 303
Egyptian Collection, the, at the British Museum, 642
English Church, the, under Henry VIII., 519
Etonian Symposium, an, 382
Exhibitions, 494, 555, 585, 682
Experimental Matinée, the, 269, 299, 325
Exquisite Reason, the, 434

Faerie King, the, 160
Federation Meetings, the Humours of, 643
Flaubert, Gustave, and his Work, 378
Floral Parade, the, 66
Flower's, Professor, Address to the British Association, 302
Founders' Shares, 488

Free Banking Agitation, the, 522
French Revolution, Side Lights of the, 644

GAMBLING, 742
Gentleman, a, and a Tory, 551
Germany, Speculation in, 431
Glorious Privilege, a, 710
Gloucester Festival, the, 272
Gondoliers, the, 678
Governor, an Ill-advised, 245
Great Picnic, the, 71
Grouse-Hawking, 240

HARVEST, the, 214
Harvey, 131
Heraldry, the Natural History of, 37
Holland House, 353
How Not to Trace your own Pedigree, 69
Humanity to the Rescue, 619
Hyacinths and Daffodils, 215

ICELAND, 380
Illustrated Books, Some, 705
India Museum, the, 458
Indian Civil Service Examinations, the, 586
Influenza, 677
Informacōn for Pylgrymes, 188
Institute of Painters in Oil-Colours, the, 523
Insurance Cases, Two, 40
Insuring Life, on, 354
International Statistical Institute, the, 298
Iron Trade, the, 462
Italy, the Financial Crisis in, 300

KEW, 375, 404, 428
King John at the Crystal Palace, 328

LANCASHIRE Plate, the, 351
Last Illusion, a, 329
La Tosca, 648
Leeds Festival, the, 432, 459
Lena, 43
Life Insurance, 645
Little Billee, 164
Llassa and its Scapegoat, 349
London Impressionists, the, 707
London's Face, 297

Macbeth on Saturday Last, 13
Marks's, Mr., Birds, 461
Maxim Gun, the, 615
Melodramas, Two, 327
Military Genius, 99
Money Lenders, London, 100
Money Matters, 380, 409, 434, 464, 493, 525, 557, 588, 618, 647, 682, 710, 742
Moors, Reports from the, 214
Morlios Agonistes, 526
"Music hath Charms —" 405
Musketry Instruction in India, 242

NATIONAL Insurance in Germany, 190
National School of Cookery, 463
Newmarket First October Meeting, 378
Newmarket Second October Meeting, 427
North Uist, 347
Norwegian Road, a New, 460

ONIONS, 352
Opera, the, 43
Orchid Nomenclature, 162
Oriental Languages, the New School of, 187
"O Say not So!" 558
Otello, as Music and Drama, 73
Our Royal Selves, 430

PARIS Exhibition, the, 41
Par Nobile Fratrum, 465
Pastels at the Grosvenor, 429
People's Banks, 102
Philanthropy of Mr. Tupman, the, 266
Pinero, Mr., as a Dramatic Protectionist, 553
Playwright, the Wail of the, 132
Poets as Landscape-Painters, 101
Porpoises, 164
Precious Stones, 676
Prime Minister, the, on Electricity, 520
Professional Tattle, 66
Prohibition in Canada, 188
Public School Bullying, 376
Puzzi, Madame, 211

RACING, 67, 101, 267, 489
Racing at Doncaster, 326
Racing at Goodwood, 159
Racing Season, the Close of the, 614
Railway Dividends, the, 131
Railway Ordinary Stocks, Division of, 160
Ralston, Mr. W. R. S., 157
Recitation, the Art of, 15
Red Hussar, the, 618
Revenue Returns, the, 14
Rogues All! 411
Roussoff's, Mr., Views in Cairo, 13
Royal Oak, the, 353
Royal Society of British Artists, the, 646
Royal Society of Painters in Water-Colours,
the, 706

ST. LEGER, the, 301
Scotland, Crown Patronage in, 379
Secrétan Sale, the, 16
Senoussia, the, 133
Serb, the, 322
Session, the, 236
Shadowed at Last, 683
Siam, 185
Somerset House, Some Humours of, 69
Soudanese and Dervishes, 163
Spanish Finance, 555
Special Correspondent Again, the, 552
Stanley's, Mr., Discoveries, 612
Stock Markets, the, 328
Strike, Lime Light on the, 303
Students' Concerts, Two, 134

Tauromachie in Paris, 456
Theatres, the, 71, 410
Theatrical Touring, the Perils of, 645
Thimm, Franz, the Late, 43
Twelve-Pounder Breech-Loading Gun, the, 488
Two-Year-Old Racing, Some, 408

UNITED States, Senatorial Elections in the, 161

VERDI'S Otello, 39

WARM Beer, 519
Westminster Play, the, 709
Wheat Harvest, the World's, this Year, 190
"When Mrs. Boffin is not Present," 38
Which is Which? 11
Windom's, Mr., Silver Plan, 706
Wrong Again! 273

YEAR, the, 734

ZERMATT, Past and Present, 324
Zoo, Notes from the—Lemurs, 612
Zoo, Notes from the—Lepidosirens, 433
Zoo, Notes from the—the Aye-Aye, 556
Zoo, Notes from the—the Cocos-Nut Crab, 42
Zoo, Notes from the—the European Bison, 704
Zoo, Notes from the—the Gaur, 491

REVIEWS.

- A B C, the, both in Latin and English, 170
 Æschylus, 686
 Agricultural Distress and Trade Depression, 112
 Aitken's Steele, 438
 All Saints', Maidstone, 309
 American Books, Three, 193
 American History, Two Books on, 627
 Amid Devon's Alps, 308
 Analysis, an, 279
 Angler, Songs and Life of an, 191
 Appreciations, 745
 Architecture, Old, in South-West Surrey, 197
 Art in the Modern State, 106
 Art, Two Books on, 143
 Arundel Society's Publications, the, 653
 Atlases, Some, 110
 Attic Theatre, the, 441
 Austen, Jane, 194
 Australia, Useful Native Plants of, 276
 Azores, the, and Madeira, 306
- BARNSTAPLE during the Civil War, 715
 Birds of Oxfordshire, the, 622
 Blameless Ethiopians, the, 336
 Blind, the, 413
 Blue Fairy-Book, the, 467
 Blue Friars, the, 689
 Bonham's Industrial Liberty, 277
 Booksellers, Three Generations of, 84
 Bookworm, the, 689
 Britain, Early, 746
 British Reason in English Rhyme, 650
 Bugge's Northern Mythology, 47
 Burney, Fanny, and her Friends, 619
- CAMBRIDGE, Illustrated Guide to, 597
 Captain's Daughter, the, 141
 Carisbrooke Library, the, 434
 Carlyle, Jane Welsh, Early Letters of, 136
 Catholic Hierarchy, the, 358
 Celebes, North, a Naturalist in, 718
 Celticism, a Myth, 625
 Central Africa, Two Books on, 138
 Century Dictionary, the, 562
 Chambers's Encyclopædia, 535
 Charters, Ancient, 137
 Chess Books, 627
 Chess Instructor, a Modern, 335
 Chinese Language and Porcelain, 748
 Christina, Queen of Sweden, 498
 Christmas Books, 473, 536, 569, 630, 661, 690, 719, 754
 Christmas Cards, 661
 Christmas Cards and Booklets, 598
 Christmas Cards and Diaries, 721
 Church History, Epochs of, 196
 Classic Tales, 223
 Classical Books, 114
 Classical Editions and Schoolbooks, 281
 Classical School-Books, mostly American, 561 Classical Translations, Some, 166
 Clavers, 337
 Cold Steel, 24
 Concord, a Week on the, 195
 Concordance, Yet Another, 363
 Conjuring, a Manual of, 716
 Continental History, 389
 Coolidge's Swiss Guide-Books, 199
 Cottam's, Mr., Charts of the Constellations, 623
 Courthope's Pope, 534
 Credit, the Theory of, 283
 Cromer, Past and Present, 594
- DALHOUSIE, Lord, 304
 Dampier, 172
 Dartmoor, 22
 Devonshire Parishes, 19
 De Wendover, Roger—Vol. III., 168
- Diabetes, 110
 Dictionary of Miniaturists, a, 750
 Divinity, Books on, 81, 221, 385, 533
 Don Quixote, 390
 Dunlop's, Miss, Auent Old Edinburgh, 660
- EASTERN Travel, Two Books of, 278
 Egypt as a Winter Resort, 748
 Egyptian Reading-Book, an, 683
 Electric Light for the Million, 225
 Electric Lighting Acts, the, 687
 Emerson in Concord, 170
 England and South Africa, 657
 Englishmen in the French Revolution, 218
 English-Persian Dictionary, an, 356
 English Poor Law System, the, 310
 Erotidia, 441
- FALLOW and Fodder Crops, 252
 Fans and Fan Leaves, 49
 Farm Live Stock, 169
 Farm, the, and the Dairy, 360
 Farm, the Book of the, 83
 Febvre's, M., Reminiscences, 656
 Fencing, 621
 Fiction, 712
 Fiction, Cheap, 471
 Fifty Years on the Trail, 220
 Fitzgerald, Edward, Life and Literary Remains of, 44
 Folklore Books, Two, 144
 Forestry, a Manual of, 714
 Fox-Terriers, 115
 France, Travels in, 354
 French and English, 46
 French Christmas Books, 753
 French Exhibition, a Guide to the, 440
 French Literature, 27, 55, 85, 117, 145, 173, 201, 226, 255, 284, 313, 338, 365, 392, 417, 443, 474, 538, 569, 599, 631, 662, 691, 721, 754
 French Literature—Emile Augier, 504
- GAIMAR, Geoffrey—Vol. II., 112
 Gentleman Usher, V.C., a, 439
 Geological Record, the, 591
 German Books, Some, 116
 German Fog, a, 362
 German Literature, 225, 359
 Gozzi, Carlo, 500
 Graphics, 529
 Greek Anthology, the, 273
 Gretton's, Mr., Recollections, 77
 Guide-Books, Some More, 253
- HANSE Towns, the, 329
 Haydn's Dictionary of Dates, 468
 Hazlitt, William, 250
 Hearts of Oak, 311
 Henry VII., 48
 Himalayas, Sporting in the, and a Genial Traveller, 501 Historical Handbook, an, 170
 Historic Oddities, 528
 Histories, Three School, 624
 Homer, the Real, 437
 Houses, Memorable London, 335
 Human Tragedy, the, 628
 Hunting-Field, Our Friends in the, 108
- INDIA, Southern, Life and Sport in, 659
 Indian National Congress, Report of the, 382
 Ireland, Books on, 78
 Italian Literature, 414
- JOURNAL of the Marine Biological Association, 743
- KIPLING's, Mr., Stories, 165
- LADY Travellers, Hints to, 310
 La Mer Territoriale, 495
 Laurentius Saga, 752
 Law Books, 249
 Law Books and Editions, New, 140
 Law Books, Two, 172
 Lawyer, an Adventurous, 386
 Le Baker, Geoffrey, 113
 L'Esposizione Italiana, 53
 Lexicon, a New, 361
 Library, How to Catalogue a, 504
 Literary and Clerical Life, Reminiscences of a, 468
 Literary Influence in British History, 312
 Literature and Ethics, Essays in, 391
 Log-Book, a, and Book of Recollections, 747
 Login, Sir John, and Dhuleep Sing, 531
 Lowell, Mr., on Izaak Walton, 472
 Lyall's, Sir Alfred, Verse, 749
- MAITLAND's Dark Ages, 388
 Malleson's, Colonel, Lord Wellesley, 104
 Marine Aquaria, 364
 Mathematical Books, 20
 Media, 26
 Mediæval France, 307
 Medical Books, 85, 364, 470, 655
 Medicine, the Practice of, 566
 Monk, 275
 Music and Musicians, Dictionary of, 52
 Music, New, 116, 200, 226, 363, 568, 598, 629, 751
- NATAL, the Annals of, 593
 National Biography, Dictionary of—Vol. XIX., 109
 National Inheritance, 415
 Natural Religion, 54
 New Books and Reprints, 27, 55, 86, 118, 145, 173, 201, 227, 255, 284, 313, 339, 366, 392, 418, 443, 475, 505, 538, 570, 599, 631, 662, 692, 722, 755
 New England, 413
 Newman, Mr. Francis, 566
 Nonsensical Books, 388
 Norfolk Wherry, a Voyage in a, 416
 Novels, 21, 45, 47, 75, 105, 137, 192, 217, 246, 274, 330, 333, 337, 355, 383, 412, 435, 528, 560, 590, 620, 651, 684
 Novels and Stories, 18, 167, 744
- ORANGE Street Chapel, 25
 Our Viceregal Life in India, 559
 Outsides of Books, Books on the, 417
 Ox, the Diseases and Disorders of the, 139
 Oxford and Cambridge, 654
 Oxford Scholarships, 332
- PALLAS's Sand-Grouse in Scotland, 252
 Papers from Pump-Handle Court, 225
 Parrots, 53
 Pathology, a Text-Book of, 384
 Patmore's Principle in Art, 79
 Philosophical Literature, Recent, 23
 Phœnicia, the History and Art of, 591
 Physical Text-Books, 308
 Pig-Sticking, Missionary Enterprise, and the South Pacific, 50
 Plantation Negro, the, as a Freeman, 216
 Plants, the Diseases of, 625

Poems, Two Books of, 711
Poet, a Revived, 245
Poor Sisters of Nazareth, the, 690
Popular Songs of France, 527
Presbyterianism, English, 51
Prints, New, 473, 504

RAILWAYS, Two Books about, 111
Reichenbachia, 219
Remington's Annual, 629
Reminiscences and Memories, 564
Revolution, a Century of, 411
Richard, Henry, M.P., 497
Robbery under Arms, 51
Robertson, T. W., 685
Rogers's, Professor Thorold, Lectures on Economic History, 247
Roots of the Mountains, the, 688
Rosslyn's, Lord, Poems, 719
Roulette, 717
Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, the, 74
Russia in Central Asia, 561
Rutland MSS., the, 223

SAGAS, the, of the Norse Kings, 76
Savonarola, Twenty-Nine Sermons of, 307
Scotland in 1298, 171
Scotland, Outdoor Sports in, 198

Scottish Art Review, the, 197
Sea, Life-Saving Appliances at, 470
Sèvres Porcelain, 85
Shakspeare's Funeral, 17
Shelley, Mary Wollstonecraft, 565
Shipbuilding, 652
Siemens, Sir William, the Scientific Papers of, 280
Sims Reeves, Mr., 200
Single Volumes, 26
Sioot, 251
Sligo, 194
Songs of the West, 501
Songs, Six New, 253
Sothorn, Edward Askew, 567
South Africa, Battles and Adventures in, 689
Spinal Cord, the, 626
Sport and Ornithology, Notes on, 750
Stageland, 469
Stories, 107, 305, 496
Swiss Confederation and Constitution, the, 442

THEATRICAL Life in France, 596
Three Hundred Years of a Family Living, 282
Three Men in a Boat, 387
Timber and Some of its Diseases, 331
Torrington, Lord, 164
Townships and Counties, 389
Traill's Strafford, 529
Travels Abroad, Recollections of, 530

Treasury of Sacred Song, the, 563
Treasury Papers, Calendar of, 1720-1728, 254
Treatment, the Year-Book of, 338

VERSE, Recent, 142
Vignoles, C. B., 357
Viking Age, the, 502
Village Propaganda, a, 334
Vittoria Colonna, 504

WALPOLE, 589
Walpole's, Horace, Letters, 597
Warwickshire Parishes, 338
Watson's Gustavus Vasa, 658
Watts's Dictionary of Chemistry, 499
Way's Iliad, 253
Wellington, Letters of the Duke of, to Miss J., 713
Wellington, Words on, 249
Whist, 687
Whitechapel Poet, a, 655
Wilson's, Professor J. Cook, Explanation, 595
Wines in English Cellars, 251
Winning of the West, the, 466
Woodland, Moor, and Stream, 536
World's Great Explorers, the, 503
Writers, Two Great, 653

THE
SATURDAY REVIEW
OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,758, Vol. 68.

July 6, 1889.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

THE ARMIES OF THE INDIAN NATIVE STATES.

WHEN Sir LEPEL GRIFFIN was making characteristically downright remarks in reference to certain of the Indian native rulers the other day, he was most careful to explain that they applied to exceptions only; and also to guard against the charge of being supposed to share the belief that all or most Indian native rulers are simply burning to rush into the arms of an invader. It has, in fact, been matter of public knowledge for the last two years that many, if not most, of these rulers are anxious to take a regular part in the scheme of Imperial defence, and that some have made definite offers in that sense. It is also known, though not so generally, that very considerable thought has been spent by the Indian authorities on the best way of utilizing these offers in general, and in particular of combining them with or turning them into a scheme for the utilization of the actual military force of the Native States. This force is universally known—universally, that is, among all who know anything about the subject—to be for the most part, as a military force, in anything but a satisfactory condition. There is, speaking generally, no uniformity in the armies of the various States; they are, with rare exceptions, very imperfectly equipped, and more imperfectly disciplined; the quality of the men composing them varies from as good as can be desired to nearly or quite worthless; transport arrangements and the like are often non-existent; the officers are very rarely competent. Further, the numbers of these troops are seldom adjusted with any sufficient accuracy to the needs of the country. Most often they are much too numerous for any profitable employment, and even when badly paid (as they often are) they form an unnecessarily heavy burden on the producing portion of the community. Their existence interferes with the existence of a proper police and civil service, yet they themselves are the worst substitutes in the world for policemen and civilians. In short, these native armies have long been acknowledged to answer pretty exactly to the poet's description, "Mouths without hands, maintained at vast expense, In peace a charge, in war a weak defence."

Although, however, this was, we say, generally acknowledged, English statesmen, and still more English soldiers, were for a long time pretty well content to have it so. During the first half of the century the memory of times when these armies had been actually dangerous was fresh, and was renewed from time to time, till the Sikh wars broke the last formidable native power. Then the Mutiny put, in a different but even more alarming form, the risks of too effective native forces (for mere numbers mattered little) before the English mind. And so it became a kind of tradition, not, indeed, to interfere with them, because that would have been needlessly to offend the princes, but at the same time to make no attempt to utilize them for defence, much more for offence; and rather to acquiesce in their gradual collapse into the state of an armed rabble, suitable enough for the purpose of throwing an air of Oriental magnificence round the prince when he made journey or held festival, but for nothing more. The occasional reflections of fidgety Englishmen or kind foreigners on the danger of retaining these masses of armed men inside our dominions did not trouble such statesmen and soldiers much; for they knew how little real strength was represented by such forces. But they were, for the most part, pretty much at one with their critics that the masses, if transformed into real troops, might be a danger; and they had no fancy to encounter it even if they had seen, which for the most part they did not see, any reason for the encounter, or anything to be gained by risking it.

The offers of the native princes above referred to, however, though they did not, strictly speaking, cause a change of sentiment, came opportunely to strengthen and popularize it. It is, indeed, believed that there is still a certain want of unanimity on the subject at home if not in India; but the most far-seeing and experienced authorities are mostly at one. The immense strides which the only possible enemy of India has made in the last ten or twelve years, the fact that an enterprise which at the beginning of that period was almost physically impossible is now a matter not of physical possibility but of mere political expediency, has had, as has been often explained here, one great advantage amid its many evils, the advantage of forcing the Indian authorities to set to steadily at the problem of the defence of India. And it is not surprising that the question has been very seriously mooted of late whether even acquiescence in, much more whether distinct furtherance of, the policy of keeping the armies of the native States as far as possible useless mobs, is a wise policy. It is excessively improbable that any, save a very few, would—it is certain that the majority, even in the event of war breaking out on the frontier, would not—adopt a hostile attitude towards the English Government, at least until some great disaster had been experienced by England. It is also certain that no very large number of troops would be required to watch the doubtful ones. But it would certainly be necessary to establish some such watch at a time when every man would be wanted for the kind of offensive defence which could alone give a good account (and it might give a very good account indeed) of the invader. Moreover, it is never entirely possible to prevent, even in the most apparently obsolete and undisciplined force, the secret formation of a more efficient engine during time of peace; while the alternative of general disarmament would be a huge addition to the task of England in the event of danger, and an impossibly unpopular measure before that event. There is always a certain danger in the existence of hundreds of thousands of armed and partly disciplined men, not actively friendly, and somewhat openly distrusted, in the interior of a country. On the other hand, there is the possibility not merely of neutralizing this great force for evil purposes, but of positively utilizing it for good. There is, as has been said, much excellent material in it, if there is also some that is nearly or quite useless, and there is also an excellent disposition on the part of at least many of its chiefs. But in order to derive benefit from these native forces a mere arrangement of contingents is by no means the only thing necessary. It has, we believe, been suggested that such contingents—which would be, of course, much smaller in numbers than the present nominal forces of each State—should be completely equipped, should be carefully picked as to age and physique, should be drawn from good fighting races only, and should be, if not directly officered by Englishmen, at any rate under the inspection and command of English officers attached to each force and chosen most carefully as personæ græte to the native princes in each case. Such forces would be, man for man, far more expensive to the native States than their present useless and unwieldy levies; but the reduction of numbers would, at any rate in part, compensate for the burden; and in each case part, if not the whole, of the disbanded force would find employment as gendarmérie, police, and so forth. It should not, it is argued, be very difficult to make an arrangement which would at once prevent the native princes from being mere paymasters of English sepoys and supply England with a valuable second line, at least, of defence for the country against foreign foes and an equally valuable school of officers skilled in dealing under peculiar conditions with natives. For it is an essential of the scheme that the troops thus reformed should be not an army of occupation but a genuine local force fit to co-operate in the national defence. Of course, any such scheme is, and must be, matter of considerable debate. It must be made in the first place palatable to the loyal native States, it must be made not burdensome to them. And there are some minor objections which might occur, such, for instance, as the danger of the local British officers in time succumbing to that singular colour-blindness, so to speak, of confidence, which proved so fatal in the Mutiny. But all this is matter for detailed discussion. What is certain is that there seems nothing impossible in such a scheme, and that, if it could be got into operation, it might be of immense service. As it happens, there is a remarkable opportunity of trying it at this moment in a single instance—the instance of Cashmere, which, as our readers know, is now governed through a Council in consequence of the misgovernment of the MAHARAJAH. The experiment of reducing the numbers and improving the efficiency of the army in this important frontier State is one which might prove highly beneficial both to itself and to England, and which would in any case be decidedly less heroic than Sir LEPEL GRIFFIN'S project of “planting” it with English colonists.

BACKING AND PULLING.

THE award of the arbitrators in the case of CHETWYND v. DURHAM bears a curious and striking resemblance to the verdict of the jury in the case of WOOD v. COX. There it was found that the particular charge against WOOD of having pulled Success at Alexandra Park had not been proved, but that WOOD'S general character as a dishonest jockey was such as to deprive him of the right to substantial damages. The Stewards of the Jockey Club have given Sir GEORGE CHETWYND exactly what a special jury gave WOOD—that is to say, the sum of one farthing. They find that the definite accusations made by Lord DURHAM in his now famous speech at the Gimcrack Club a year and a half ago against Sir GEORGE CHETWYND have not been proved, and that Lord DURHAM'S words bore the libellous meaning imputed to them by the plaintiff, but repudiated by the defendant. They also find, however, that Lord DURHAM was justified by the facts when he wrote, “I also accuse Sir GEORGE CHETWYND of having ‘connived at serious malpractices which are contrary to the ‘rules of racing,’ and they leave each party to pay his own costs. Considering that Sir GEORGE CHETWYND makes racing the business of his life, and that the sum he claimed was twenty thousand pounds, it would be difficult, so far as he is concerned, to exaggerate the significance of the award. Lord DURHAM, though in the heat of his moral indignation he may have gone beyond the limits of what he could prove, is more than sufficiently punished for his carelessness by the heavy expenses he will have to pay. For there can be no doubt that he has done much by his outspoken fearlessness to purify the morals of the turf, and if, as is so often said, racing be a national pastime, the reform of racing must be a national benefit. He therefore deserves the vote of thanks which the Duke of WESTMINSTER proposes to move at the Jockey Club. The enormous number of people who bet upon the performances of horses without any knowledge of the horse, or any acquaintance with the class of men under whose guidance he performs, ought to be the wiser for the evidence of WOOD, SHERRARD, and Sir GEORGE CHETWYND himself. There is a passage in CHARLES KINGSLEY'S letter to the young men of Chester, which is extremely applicable to this subject, and to this case:—“‘But they know what ‘the horse has done already.’ Yes; but not what the ‘horse might have done. They do not know—no one can ‘who is not in the secrets of the turf—what the horse’s ‘engagements really are; whether he has not been kept ‘back in view of those engagements; whether he will not ‘be kept back again; whether he has not been used ‘to make play for another horse; and—in one word—‘whether he is meant to win.’ WOOD’S license has been suspended since the result of his action against the Licensed Victuallers’ Gazette, and it would be invidious to suggest the identity of his accomplices. But, if Lord DURHAM has done nothing else, he has at least shown that it is as difficult in 1889 as it was in 1872 for ordinary persons to know whether a horse is meant to win.

The public now know, or at all events have no excuse for not knowing, that the whole machinery of a race may be from beginning to end an elaborate fraud. The best horse may be deliberately prevented from winning. The jockey, and not his master, may be the real owner, and the master may be too much in the hands of the jockey to exercise any control over him. Everything done in the open may be a blind, and everything which counts may be done behind the scenes. It was admitted by Sir GEORGE CHETWYND in cross-examination that he made more by betting than many successful men make by the exercise of their several professions; and, if a man has to rely upon what ought to be luck, the consequences are usually something very like those disclosed in the history of SHERRARD'S stables. No one can say that the tribunal which decided between Lord DURHAM and Sir GEORGE CHETWYND was an incompetent one. When Lord DURHAM'S charges were brought before the Jockey Club, we urged that the Jockey Club was the most suitable body to investigate them. It was decided that Sir GEORGE CHETWYND should bring an action, and that the action should be referred. The result has been that the three Stewards of the Jockey Club have dealt with the matter, assisted by eminent counsel, and under the sanction of an oath. Mr. LOWTHER, Lord MARCH, and Prince SOLTYKOFF are far better able to understand the effect of the evidence than a judge and jury would be. The proceedings were wonderfully real. Mr. LOWTHER'S judicial solemnity, even after the arbitrators had been directed by the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE to descend from the Bench, excited the admiration of all beholders. Prince SOLTYKOFF, like Mr. Justice DAY, maintained unbroken silence; while Lord MARCH, taking the part of Mr. Justice SMITH, interpolated occasional remarks. Sir CHARLES RUSSELL and Sir HENRY JAMES reversed, in an amusing manner, their respective lines of argument before the Special Commission. Sir HENRY maintained that Lord DURHAM was not morally entitled to rely upon evidence which was not before him when he made his speech; and Sir CHARLES contended that Sir GEORGE CHETWYND was responsible for the misconduct of others if he ought to have known of it and yet abstained from making inquiry. The question now is whether the Jockey Club will allow things to remain as they are. Several names besides Sir GEORGE CHETWYND'S were mentioned in Lord DURHAM'S “particulars,” most of them in connexion with SHERRARD'S stables. They may have been unfairly introduced. But, unless all belief in the honesty of the racing world is to disappear, some further investigation ought to be made. A good deal more “in and out “running” has been proved to occur than the Arbitrators have dealt with in their award.

THE DELAGOA BAY DIFFICULTY.

IT was difficult last week, even for those who were best acquainted with the actual facts of the case, to speak decidedly on the subject of the seizure of the Delagoa Bay Railway by the Portuguese, because at that time only ex parte statements had been received. That difficulty has now been removed by the elaborate document forwarded by Senhor COSTA RICCI, Financial Agent of the Portuguese Government, to the English newspapers on Tuesday last. Shareholders in this, for the moment, unlucky undertaking could hardly have desired anything more than this official statement of the case which has been furnished to Senhor RICCI by his Government. Naturally this statement takes no notice of the charge of deliberate bad faith and, so to speak, conspiracy with the Transvaal Government with which the Company has retorted, and on which we must wait further information. But practically it confirms all the statements which the spokesmen of the Company have made, and more particularly the most damning charge of all—the charge that, after the Company had been left in ignorance of the frontier to which they were expected to construct the line, a new frontier was suddenly sprung upon them at the beginning of the rainy season, and it was to this that they were ordered to build, under pain of rescission of contract and of confiscation. Senhor FREDERICO RESSANO GARCIA, Minister and Secretary of State for Marine and Colonies, would not appear to be aware of that fundamental rule of controversy which ordains that you should, above all things, beware of arguments capable of retorsion. He mentions among the crimes of the Company that part of its line actually completed was destroyed “by the rains of January “of this year.” January of this year happens, as Senhor Dom FREDERICO RESSANO GARCIA may have forgotten, to be just the middle or thereabouts of the time during which his Government imposed upon the luckless Company the task, not only of maintaining its own line, but of constructing a new one up in the hills among the rains of January, and in places where (we quote Senhor GARCIA once more) three "rocks" had to be cut through in four hundred mètres, "earthworks" (embankments) had to be made, scrub cut, and so forth. Moreover, the elaborate rehearsal of former extensions or alterations of the conditions of the contract which Senhor GARCIA also makes, has the same unlucky faculty of cutting the ground beneath his own feet. If Portugal granted these extensions and alterations, it was presumably because she thought them deserved, and this makes the alteration of tactics all the more remarkable.

As was to be expected, some persons, and those not merely advocates of England, have come forward to put the dots on the i's in a manner not at all surprising to the well-informed. It has for a long time been no secret that other motives certainly, and yet others probably, mingled with that ardent and laudable desire to "afford Lourenço" "Marques all the elements of progress and advancement" to which Senhor FREDERICO RESSANO GARCIA makes such touching reference. The scheme of a Transvaal and Delagoa Bay Railway originally came from the Transvaal side, and it is sufficiently notorious that since the disastrous events which gave the Boers reason to think that they could hector Great Britain at pleasure, there has been a very strong hankering among them after the management of the railway, or at least after the wresting of it from English hands. The African fever, which has seized on Germany, has come to complicate the matter; the disgust of Portugal at the notion of regions in the interior which she never has ruled, and her claim to which has never been admitted, passing under the British flag has complicated it still further. The confident assertion that the "high-handed and unjust" action of Portugal is preliminary only to the handing over of the confiscated line to a new Company, in which Germany will find the money and from which the Boers expect to reap political advantages, may or may not be a statement of facts—it is, at any rate, a very sufficient statement of possibilities. Except by such a theory (which is no new one), or by the other theory that Portugal is getting her powder ready with a view to asserting her African dominion, the recent conduct of her officials is nearly unintelligible. Lourenço Marques, like most Portuguese settlements, is unlikely to be in an absolutely desperate state of hunger for "elements of progress and advancement." Moreover, it is noteworthy that foreign critics, especially that section of the German press which is unfriendly to England, take with a delightful frankness the view that the action of the Lisbon Government was political, and not commercial or economic.

These things being so, it is natural that the spokesmen of the Foreign Office in the English Parliament should be somewhat guarded in their references to the subject. The despatch of gunboats, however, the declaration by the PRIME MINISTER in words already quoted that the conduct of Portugal is "high-handed" and even "unjust," are tolerably decided expressions of opinion from the mealy mouth of modern diplomacy. We confess that we do not like the suggested reference to arbitration. It was never merry with England since this absurd method of settling disputes was resorted to—absurd, because in international matters an impartial arbitrator is simply not to be found. Arbitration, moreover, could only take the very narrow ground of deciding whether Portugal was or was not technically justified in setting the Delagoa Bay Company the same sort of tasks that VENUS imposed on PSYCHE; and this is the very least part of the matter. It might suit the shareholders well enough to be bought out or compensated just as, if no arrangement were come to, it might suit some people and most vehemently disturb others to take the strong step recommended by some of retaliating by refusing Portugal a quotation for her securities on the Stock Exchange. But these are merely matters of private importance. The matter of public importance is that Portugal, whether in conspiracy with others or not, has for some time past taken up an attitude of distinct obstruction and hostility to Great Britain in Africa. We do not know how arbitration would remove that hostility, or could remove it; and we confess that we shall think it a great pity if this Delagoa Bay matter be not taken as an occasion—it is a most just and legitimate one—to finish with this kind of thing. Considering our present relations with Germany on the East African coast, it is excessively unlikely that Prince BISMARCK will give any serious support to such schemes as those which have been mooted; and it would be rather fortunate than otherwise if an opportunity were to occur, and to be taken, of showing the Boers of the Transvaal that they had better not presume too much on the advantages which chance, bad management on the spot, and cowardice in high places at home gave them some years ago. As for Portugal, her impenitence may be exhorted on the general question with real benefit to herself. No intelligent Portuguese can think that his country is likely, in the long run, to derive much benefit from association with the Transvaal Boers, or that Germans with a fine appetite for colonies are persons to be cordially encouraged in the neighbourhood of Portuguese possessions. Neither the credit of Portugal nor her power of managing her dependencies is in such a state of flourishing that it can afford to despise the support to be given by a solid friendship with British South Africa. Lourenço Marques is worth nothing at all to Portugal except as a source of customs dues (a matter which could be easily arranged); and if the disputed territory to the north of the Zambesi were recognized as Portuguese tomorrow, the occasional presence there of a half-caste slave-hunter would, to a certainty, be the only way in which Portugal would exercise her rights. On the other hand, to obtain certain frontiers on which England is bound not to encroach would be a very good thing for Portugal; and it might be possible to sweeten the good thing for her still further. What is most sure is that England has often taken an infinity of trouble, and has lavished blood and money, for objects much less valuable to her than an unhampered right of way from this port to the interior and a clear delimitation of claims north of the Zambesi.

USELESS KNOWLEDGE.

A MAN of gigantic intellect, with a thirst for information, once announced that he had made up his mind every day to open an encyclopædia at random, learn a fact, and store it up everlastingly in his memory. He carried out this plan for one day, with the result that he learnt, and never forgot, something exceedingly surprising about the proportion borne by π to the error in it when you had calculated π to 407 places of decimals. If he were now to revert to his laudable system he could hardly do better than purchase a copy of Everybody's Pocket Cyclopædia (London: SAXON & Co.), and read it straight through, a fact at a time. This remarkable work, which costs no more than sixpence, possesses the almost unprecedented quality of being absolutely guiltless of any method or arrangement whatever. It deserves a few words of notice as an example of the results of disorder.

The first page is adorned with a frontispiece of somewhat sepulchral appearance, showing columns and bits of columns of different orders of architecture. On the second begins an "Alphabetical List of some Historical Events, Handy Facts, and Notable Discoveries." Of these the first four (out of six beginning with A) are the Alexandrian Library, Almighty Dollar, the American Flag, and the Assassination of LINCOLN. But let not the cautious student be taken in by the circumstance that Architectural and Alphabetical both begin with A. The next item is called "A Remarkable Centenarian" (meaning the late M. CHEVREUL, but query, whether there are any centenarians who are not remarkable), and the next "Words in the English Language," wherein it is asserted that in order to read serious writings profitably you must know about 2,000 words. Then come the Area of the British Empire, with statistics in schedules, the usual almanack talk about the QUEEN and Royal Family, and "Landmarks in the Struggle for Religious Liberty," beginning with the Toleration Act of 1689, and not coming down to Mr. BRADLAUGH's Affirmation Act. After Telegraph Statistics and Religious Statistics comes the Language of Flowers. From this we learn that it is not judicious to present to a lady with whom one wishes to stand well a bouquet of mignonette and coloured daisies. Such a posy means, "Your qualities surpass your charms of beauty," which may be complimentary, but is rarely gratifying. A few pages further on is a table saying what chance a woman of any age from fifteen to sixty has of marrying. Cross references to the amount of the lady's income would seem desirable to make this really useful. The "Diagram showing the Comparative Height of the Principal Mountain Peaks of the World" is immediately followed by the familiar tables which tell the meaning of Christian names. It says that MEREDITH is British for the roaring of the sea, NEAL French for somewhat black, and WILLIAM German for defending many. Also EMILY is corrupted from AMELIA, LOIS is the Greek for bitter, and MAY Latin for the month of May. Next to a paragraph on the composition of solders comes a table saying how many mètres a second make so many miles an hour; and towards the end we find a picture of a long black line representing the money spent yearly in the United Kingdom upon intoxicating drinks, a line half as long representing the amount spent on bread, and so on through house-rent, milk, tea, coals, and education, to Christian missions, which is a line so short that it can hardly be seen. Then begins a treatise on different human complaints, and they are arranged alphabetically.

It would seem that this work must have been compiled like Mr. CHARLES READE's famous scrap-books by the author cutting out of newspapers and books of reference anything that happened to strike him. It must be supposed that he stopped either because he died or thought he was going to, or because he had collected as much as could possibly be printed for sixpence. But there is still a simplicity about so much higgledy-piggledy information that is rather pleasing. There is certainly a sort of index; but it occupies only four pages, and contains very few words that any one would think of looking for. The only real use for the volume is to carry it in the pocket and consult it privily when one wants to make an observation betraying out-of-the-way knowledge. This is sometimes useful when conversation flags, and only the experienced know that in such a case the remark does just as well whether it has been found in a book or invented on the spot.

FROM THE DOG'S POINT OF VIEW.

LORD ROSEBURY has been informed by Lord CRANBROOK that the Privy Council, while willing to authorize the issue of regulations for the muzzling of dogs in localities infested by rabies, is unable to lay down any general rule for the whole of the United Kingdom. As we argued last week that legislation would be necessary to make the observance of muzzling universal, we are not surprised at the answer which the Chairman of the County Council received. But the difficulties of the case only increase the responsibility of HER MAJESTY'S Government, who have a most urgent danger to deal with, and are taking no steps to deal with it. If they cannot support Sir HENRY ROSCOE's Bill, let them say so, and let them further proceed to state what preventive or precautionary measures they will adopt. There can be no doubt, as anybody may see for himself by turning to the Report of the London Council's meeting on Tuesday, that rabies has made considerable progress in London since we last wrote. Inasmuch as the disease is usually most prevalent, not in the summer, but in the spring and autumn, this fact is very significant, and shows clearly what we may expect in a few weeks, unless something be done. If Parliament is prorogued without any remedy being applied to so terrible an evil, Ministers will deserve the gravest censure for their neglect. Meanwhile, in accordance with the homely adage that an ounce of fact is worth a pound of theory, we may illustrate the present chaos by an incident which occurred last Saturday evening in one of the best-known residential quarters of London. An unfortunate dog, credibly alleged to have bitten some of its kind, was pursued by several police constables, who beat it unmercifully with their truncheons. The dog showed none of the ordinary symptoms of madness, indeed it was obvious to any observer of dogs that rabies was contra-indicated; and on the intervention of a passer-by, who remonstrated against such needless cruelty, the police at length desisted. But by that time the dog had been nearly killed; and, though it was taken to the nearest police station, it is scarcely likely to have recovered. There is no reason to believe that the policemen were themselves to blame. A doctor, not a veterinary surgeon, who decamped after giving them his card, assured them that the poor beast was mad. Mad or not, a dog which deliberately bites either another dog or a human being ought forthwith to be killed. But it should not be beaten to death. Prussic acid or a pistol is the most appropriate method. Poison, however, is out of the question in the streets, and official pedantry denies firearms to the police.

This story, which is authentic in every detail, points a pretty obvious moral. The muzzle is not only necessary for the protection of man, but also demanded by the interests of the dog. A muzzled dog cannot bite, and even an unarmed policeman would have no excuse for beating a dog which was palpably harmless. When rabies has been stamped out by muzzling, there will be no more panics, because there can be no more hydrophobia. Then a dog, even if he has parted with his owner, will be able to stroll along the streets in peace, no man making him afraid. We appreciate the position of the Privy Council, which is seriously hampered by the simple fact that there is no rabies in Scotland. There is, for the matter of that, none in Norway, nor in Sweden, nor in Australia. But it might at any moment be imported, and certainly the exemption of Scotland could not be guaranteed for a week. The interesting and valuable letter from M. PASTEUR which was read at the Mansion House last Monday contains a most emphatic approval of general muzzling. "It is my own profound conviction," says this great man, "that a rigorous observance of simple police regulations would altogether stamp out hydrophobia in a country like the British Isles." Most unworthy and unprincipled attacks have been made upon M. PASTEUR. Independently of his scientific eminence, which itself entitles him to be treated with respect, M. PASTEUR devotes his life to the gratuitous preservation of his fellow-creatures from the most ghastly of all deaths. His English patients number more than two hundred, and out of sixty-four treated since the 1st of January 1888 not one has died or been attacked by hydrophobia. It may be that M. PASTEUR has not yet entirely proved his case, although the figures given by Professor LANKESTER in last Saturday's Times form a very tough and solid piece of affirmative evidence. But to charge M. PASTEUR with selfishness or with cruelty is equally foolish and wicked. The meeting at the Mansion House was a great success, in spite of the howls from the gutter with which it was by anticipation denounced. As Sir JOSEPH LISTER observed, M. PASTEUR, in his letter to Sir HENRY ROSCOE, advocates the use of means which, by destroying rabies, and with it hydrophobia, would make the continued existence of the PASTEUR Institute superfluous. This is not the conduct of an ambitious and unscrupulous self-seeker. M. PASTEUR is the dog's best friend, and he advocates the muzzle. As we have shown, the present state of things is not only perilous to human life, but also inconvenient and inimical to the most faithful companions of mankind.

THE UNIVERSITY MATCH.

IN the match at Lord's, Oxford was deservedly and even discreditably beaten. No excuse could possibly be made for an eleven outmastered at all points, except perhaps in the field. They had raised no strong expectations, having been consistently defeated everywhere by everybody except by M.C.C. in London. In that match they conducted themselves so as to raise a feeble hope, which, we think, was too optimistic. M.C.C. made a long score, yet who that saw Mr. O'BRIEN's innings doubted that he might have doubled the score himself? He might not always have hit four fours in an over, as he did off Mr. JARDINE, but he need not have gone out. After getting forty in about fifteen minutes, he merely "larked" with the bowling. He could have played it till now if he had cared, but, as he jumped in and bombarded the Pavilion, he gave chances and was caught at last. This discounted the comparative success of Oxford.

Yet they were not a bad team all through. Mr. WATSON is a delightful bat, strong and spirited. Mr. PHILIPSON is an excellent wicket-keeper, and when he reversed the timid poking system of his comrades, and hit Mr. Woods about, he hit very well. Mr. BASSETT is a plucky bat, and would make a very respectable change bowler. Mr. THESIGER, prevented from playing by a cause universally regretted, is a good bat and a fine field. It were superfluous to praise Lord GEORGE SCOTT; Mr. RASHLEIGH has long been admired; Mr. FORSTER is a persevering bowler. But nerves seemed to be the bane of Mr. JARDINE. A young player, from a land of slow wickets, he tried to play Mr. Woods back. Mr. Moss was expected to be a more useful bowler than Mr. FOWLER. This was probably a mistake of judgment. Mr. DAUGLISH was played because Mr. PHILIPSON's hands were overworked, and he might be needed to keep wicket. He was not needed at the wicket, nor of any service with the bat. Cambridge, on the other side, had nearly as good bats as Lord GEORGE SCOTT in Mr. MORDAUNT, Mr. FOLEY, and Mr. CRAWLEY. Mr. MORDAUNT, also, bowled very well, while Mr. Woods had entirely recovered his art. Mr. DE LITTLE and Mr. FORD were, at least, better bowlers than anybody on the Oxford side. The Cambridge tail was manifestly not much better than that of Oxford—we doubt if the batting was really better—but the difference in bowling made the match a hollow, tame, and dismal affair. From the first ball Cambridge were the winners. Mr. Woods caught and bowled a man with his earliest delivery, and Oxford practically lost heart. Mr. Woods did not bowl his best in the first innings; in the second, even, Mr. PHILIPSON hit him all about with fearless energy. But, except for Lord GEORGE SCOTT in the first innings, and for some signs of defence by Mr. RASHLEIGH and Mr. WATSON, the Cambridge bowling was all unresisted attack. Full pitches were not driven, long hops were left in inglorious security. The bowlers were permitted to do exactly what they liked. Oxford has often died away thus, but never on so good a wicket and in such exhilarating weather.

As for the Cambridge batting, Mr. MORDAUNT'S was excellent; not showy, nor slow; he merely treated the bowling as the bowling deserved to be treated. Never have we seen bowling in such a knot, nor so many changes. Mr. CRAWLEY seemed set for a century, but got out by an accident, a ball trickling from his foot and upsetting his bails. The weakness of the last batsmen (considering the bowling) was, perhaps, at least equal to that of any Oxford winner of spectacles. There were scarce any points of interest to remark on, no very exciting catches, nor even a repetition of last year's misses at point. Oxford, perhaps, had the best of the fielding, and Lord GEORGE SCOTT, with the wicket-keepers, Mr. M'GREGOR and Mr. PHILIPSON, deserved most praise. Neither is exactly an ALFRED LYTTLETON, but either might well officiate for the Gentlemen. Perhaps, by reason of his batting, Mr. PHILIPSON has rather the preference, or so it seems to indolent reviewers.

UNILATERAL RECIPROCITY.

FEW incidents in what is called the Irish "agrarian struggle"—though we do not call it a sartorial struggle when a man refuses to pay his tailor's bill—are absolutely unrelieved by some touch or other of native absurdity; and it is often difficult to say whether the unquestionable gravity of some of them does or does not overcome the temptation to laughter which in their more humorous aspect they afford. This difficulty is particularly felt with respect to the quarrel between landlord and tenants on the PONSONBY estate. Mr. O'BRIEN'S insolent and truculent attempt to coerce (for that is what it amounts to) certain farmers in Tipperary to refuse payment of rent to their landlord, in order to coerce him into withdrawing his assistance from another landlord whom it is being attempted to despoil in Kerry, is a serious matter, and the Government have done well to treat it as such, with all promptitude, by the arrest of Mr. O'BRIEN. But though overt acts of this kind are rightly treated in this way, and though an Executive cannot afford to tolerate a dangerous agitation merely because it almost amounts, on the intellectual side, to an Irish bull in practice, it is permissible, when the law is in course of being vindicated, to divert oneself with the exquisitely comical perversity of the position which the agitators have taken up. Archbishop CROKE'S letter to Canon CAHILL, though a document of a thoroughly discreditable and mischievous kind, is one which it is impossible to consider in that aspect alone. It is, of course, most disquieting to think that an Irish prelate of high standing, and in that capacity the director of the consciences of large multitudes of men, should show so absolute a destitution of the most rudimentary principles of commercial morality—to put the matter no higher—as is displayed in this letter. Yet it is impossible to read the "remarkable" epistle, as a Gladstonian chronicler calls it, more accurately than he supposes, without a smile. After denouncing Mr. SMITH-BARRY'S intervention "in a landlord-and-tenant dispute that does not concern him," this delightful Archbishop goes on to "express his belief that the "tenants"—that is, Mr. SMITH-BARRY'S Tipperary tenants—"are justified in becoming members of any open and constitutional confederacy forming nothing more or less than "a mutual defence association, the object of which would "be to make common cause with each other in all agrarian "emergencies, so that the acknowledged grievance of a tenant "on an estate belonging to any one of the confederate landlords should be regarded and dealt with as a personal "grievance by each and every one of the confederate tenants

"as well." Anything more fascinating to a lover of humorous paradox than the assumption that the suggested reprisals of the tenant would be justified by the previous action of the landlords it would be difficult to imagine. The Archbishop apparently regards the tenants on any one estate as a sort of "corporation sole," or rather he seems to attribute this character to the tenants plus their parish priest, plus Mr. O'BRIEN or Mr. DILLON, plus the Treasurer of the National League Fund, and a few other similar allies, up to Mr. GLADSTONE himself, and to hold that all these parties taken together constitute in the eye of the law, and in contemplation of moral equity, only one person; so that a contest between them and the landlord on the question of paying rent is a fair "man-to-man" fight which nobody, or, at least, no landlord, ought to interfere with. A few of the landlord's friends and sympathizers come to his assistance, and the worthy Dr. CROKE immediately emits a shriek of horror and indignation. "What!" he exclaims, in effect. "Four, "five, six, a round dozen or more of landlords combining to "crush a solitary adversary consisting only of a few score of "tenants, their parish priest, and all the agitators and "stump-orators that can be got hold of in England and "Ireland! It is monstrous! There is only one thing for "it, my children, and even that I suggest with reluctance. "You must meet confederacy with confederacy; you must "combine in self-defence."

There is no reason to suppose that the Archbishop has even a glimmering of the absurdity of this. Probably he has so much accustomed himself to look upon the individual Irish landlord as a person tailable et taxable à merci et à miséricorde, in respect of his rent, that the notion of his combining with his neighbours to protect themselves from unlimited exactions positively scandalizes Dr. CROKE. No doubt he really has got to regard, not the individual tenant, but the whole body of the tenantry, as the unit corresponding to the landlord on the other side of the contract. Agitators, among whom we may include the Archbishop himself, have so continually dinned into the ears of the tenants that their interests are one, that he doubtless believes by this time that there is of necessity some legitimate and original community of interest between them; whereas of course that community of interest presupposes, instead of precedes, the common design in aid of which it is pleaded—the conspiracy, that is to say, to withhold from the landlord a portion of the rent. So amusingly blind to the analogies of things has the Archbishop become, that he has not the faintest perception of the damaging parallel which is irresistibly suggested by his complaint of Mr. SMITH-BARRY'S "intervention in "a landlord-and-tenant dispute that does not immediately "concern him." What would become of the occupation of Mr. O'BRIEN if nobody intervened in a landlord-and-tenant dispute that did not immediately concern him? Nay, what would become of Mr. O'BRIEN'S success in his business of campaigner if nobody else was guilty of such intervention but himself? Why, the Plan of Campaign is based upon the wholesale intervention of a certain number of persons in a dispute which does not immediately concern them. For instance, if PAT is able and willing to pay his rent, it is no immediate concern of his, and still less of Mr. O'BRIEN, that TIM can't or won't. Yet Mr. O'BRIEN not only interferes in the dispute between TIM and his landlord, but he also—and the success of the Plan of Campaign depends upon his so doing—cajoles or coerces PAT into interfering in TIM'S dispute with his landlord, by refusing to pay rent himself. And now we have this archiepiscopal supporter of Mr. O'BRIEN'S exclaiming against Mr. SMITH-BARRY'S intervention in "a landlord-and-tenant dispute "that does not immediately concern him." He asserts the right of the tenants to retaliate upon retaliation, while he denounces the retaliation upon which they are to retaliate as an unprovoked and gratuitous act of hostility. The unilateral form of reciprocity has always had a singular attraction for the Irish mind; but we doubt whether this national taste has ever been more amusingly exemplified than in Archbishop CROKE'S letter to Canon CAHILL.

The incident, however, would have been incomplete without the final touch added to it by the deputation which has waited on Mr. SMITH-BARRY with a "memorial" from the tenants on his Tipperary estate, in which they express the "alarm and indignation" with which they have heard that their landlord "is placing himself at the head of a "landlord confederacy for the purpose of clearing the "PONSONBY estate of its tenantry." There do not appear to have been many actual tenants of Mr. SMITH-BARRY'S on the deputation; but there was a fine show of sympathetic local notabilities who doubtless know the mind of Mr. SMITH-BARRY's tenants much better than they know it themselves. Besides the Rev. Canon CAHILL himself and another priest, there were the Chairman of the Tipperary Town Commissioners and the ditto of the Clonakilty Town Commissioners, and the Chairman of the Board of Guardians—all the gentlemen, in fact, to whom an Irish Local Government Bill would hand over the control of the district—together, we suppose, with the power of dipping their hands as freely as might seem good to them into the pockets of the local landlords. They got, however—to use a familiar, but in this connexion appropriate, expression—“very little change” out of Mr. SMITH-BARRY. That oppressor of the poor who can pay and won't is, unfortunately for his interviewers, a man not at all easy to bully. He began his reply by informing the deputation that he “did not for one moment acknowledge that they had the slightest right to demand an explanation of him,” and he added the very pertinent remark that, “if he were to assent to such a claim, he must equally be bound by the instructions of his English tenantry in his dealings with those in Ireland, and they might very well insist that, having paid their own rents in full, the Irish tenants should be made to do the same.” The sum of his answer was that he did not intend to be intimidated into abandoning his position with respect to the PONSONBY estates, and that if his own tenants were ill-judged enough to allow the Plan of Campaign to be started against himself they would have themselves to thank for the consequences. The oppressive bilaterality of the reciprocity which Mr. SMITH-BARRY appears to claim in the matter of landlord-and-tenant combinations seems to have taken the deputation's breath away. They asked whether further evictions on the PONSONBY estate would take place with Mr. SMITH-BARRY's sanction, and on being assured that they would, the canon, and the priest, and the Town Commissioners retired apparently in a bewildered amazement at the high-handed brutality of Irish landlords who have conceived the idea of “hitting back again.”

MR. W. H. SMITH.

WHEN the present Session of Parliament was about to begin, there was a report that at the end of it Mr. W. H. SMITH would probably resign the leadership of the House of Commons, and seek rest and repair in the less fuliginous atmosphere of the Upper House. The end is very near now; a great dinner is given to Mr. SMITH by his constituents; he makes a speech thereat reviewing the whole period of his political career; and he says not a word about resigning the leadership of the House of Commons. Indeed, he ends his speech with the expression of a hope that he may be allowed to devote himself to the service of the Westminster electorate for years to come. So we must interpret the concluding sentences of a speech which, if it is destitute of “epigram,” if there is not a smart, or even an alliterative saying in it, has the merit of good sense well rooted in a sincere, homely, and wholesome nature.

We are to suppose, then, that if six months ago failing health whispered counsels of retirement from the more arduous duties of his situation, Mr. SMITH is now encouraged to go on with them to the end of this Parliament, at any rate. Further than that we need not look; and it must be regarded as a public good, and a great good too, if he is able and willing to continue in his present position till after the hustlings and shufflings of the next General Election. Not that Mr. SMITH would have been lost to the service of the country, if (as we believe, he really feared might be the case, a little while since) sheer weariness had compelled him to lay down the leadership in a legislative bear-garden. If at the present time he is the best man for the post that his colleagues could select, it is not because his highest qualities are employed there. In more than one department of State he has shown that he has no superior, probably no equal, as an administrator. To govern one of the great departments, that is what he is best fitted for as an officer of State, and when his retirement from the House of Commons was talked of, there was some satisfaction in the thought that a serious loss would not be without its compensations, probably. Between work and worry there is a well-known difference, and he may yet rejoice in the one who is quite worn out with the other. It must be allowed, however, that for the better part of this Session the Radical-Irish torment in the House of Commons has much abated. Possibly they were mollified by the beauties of the spring; possibly they were melted by the heats of the summer; but, whatever the explanation—and, of course, there may be others—it is a fact that, from the beginning of February to the beginning of July, both the Irish and the English members of Opposition have been decent and orderly beyond all recent custom. No matter for a little outbreak here and there; as a whole, and in the general, the ferocious libertinage of the Opposition has dropped into a languor which we may count upon continuing through the dog-days, and so to the end of one quiet Session at least. It is this, perhaps, which has restored Mr. SMITH's hopes of ability to fight on for a while, if he truly did begin to doubt that it was giving way. So much of comparative rest he has gained at any rate—he as well as Mr. BALFOUR and the rest of the badgered; and, even if the relative tranquillity of the year be no more than an interlude, it is not only a blessed thing in itself, but it will probably confirm the leader of the House of Commons in abandoning all idea of quitting his post as long as the present Parliament lasts.

It is certainly of great importance that he should remain there. In ordinary times, and with another sort of Opposition to confront, he might well be spared to go to the Admiralty, which is just the place where such a man is wanted more now than ever. But what at other times and under other circumstances would appear as defects in a House of Commons leader are amongst Mr. SMITH's most valuable qualities in that capacity to-day. He is no debater; of that he is perfectly well aware, without being at all upset by the knowledge of it; and so he is constitutionally preserved from entering upon sallies and excursions which the most skilful debater in existence would avoid—if he could resist the temptation. Restore to the House of Commons the readiest and deadliest master of tongue-fence that it has ever known, infuse him with a full measure of prudence, endow him with perfect self-control, and in dealing with the Gladstonian Opposition, as leader of the House, he would choose to play the part that Mr. SMITH plays, automatically, so to speak. And even then he would be at a disadvantage (practically) as compared with Lord Salisbury's lieutenant in the House of Commons. The irritation of conscious power contemptuously silent—the well-controlled debater we have been supposing—could not avoid inflicting that upon the coarsely sensitive minds of which four-fifths of the Opposition are composed. Their sufferings under it, even when most exquisite, would distress nobody but themselves, of course; but their poignancy would not conduce to restraint of temper. No mere exercise of calculated patience would equal, in effect, that which is purely natural in Mr. SMITH. No affectation of forbearance would tell upon the self-exasperated crew who are usually opposed to him as do the quiet ways of a man who is dead to provocation and unarmed for repartee. And we are not talking theory when we say this. It is known to every one who frequents the House of Commons that Mr. SMITH is invaluable to the Government in his present position for precisely these reasons. Many members of the Opposition acknowledge it openly, and all are more or less consciously aware of it, though some (of course) deride. Even the younger members of the Conservative party in the House, who a little while since were all for getting “RANDOLPH” back into the leadership with rapier and rosette, even they acknowledge it; perceiving that, though there may be less sport under Mr. SMITH's régime, there is much more prudence (or what answers to it) and much more safety. Besides, though there have been many changes for the worse in political life of late, one most important thing remains unaffected or affected very little, and that is respect for what is called “character.” Mere cleverness was never more admired. In our time and generation, at any rate, cleverness without character was never more freely admitted to competition for the honours of place and power; but still character tells with all its old force, and is felt to be the necessary foundation of trust. There are some politicians, indeed, of whom it seems to be thought that they are clever enough to do without it; they are coming to their end. There are others who evidently believe the same thing of themselves. They are comparatively young men, and will probably live to be disappointed. The present state of things will not last for ever, and even as it is, character receives its due share of homage wherever it is clearly apparent. The respect in which

Mr. SMITH is held depends upon it almost entirely. There is no brilliancy in him; but there is no trickery. He could not be eloquent for the life of him; but neither for the life of him could he be dishonest. Sharp he is not; shrewd he is, though quite without subtlety. His opinions may be limited; but he does not know how to invent new ones, which cleverness often does and character never. In short, he is a plain, sound, trustworthy man of business in a Parliament which can boast very few members of that sort, and where his presence is all the more valuable accordingly. It is good hearing, therefore, that he proposes to remain where, for the best of reasons, both particular and general, he is so extremely useful; and he is likely to be more so, if we may judge from certain passages in his speech at St. James's Hall on Wednesday evening—those passages in which he spoke of England's place in the world, and the part she can play, and ought to play, in these uncertain times.

EGYPT.

IT is not surprising to hear that the French Government is not altogether pleased with itself in the matter of its own refusal to consent to the conversion of the Egyptian Preference debt; and it is not likely that the news of Colonel WODEHOUSE's last stout fight with the Dervishes will greatly reconcile it. The French journalist of the usual kind—the kind which thinks it “spiritual,” after running away from the forts of Alexandria, to talk about “Tel-el-Guinée”—has, of course, his explanation quite ready. Pitt-et-Cobourg, revived in the persons of Baring-et-Vincent, send for the Dervishes, bargain with so many of them to come and be killed for so many guineas on a telegram being sent, and there you have it. The fidelity of these noble sons of the desert in fulfilling their share of the bargain with the accursed and perfidious children of Albion may seem surprising to any one not a Frenchman; the Frenchman knows that the Arab, like himself, is honourable or nothing, and that when he is paid to be killed he comes and is killed uncomplainingly. But though this sort of thing is really half believed by the Parisian gutter-journalist, and is more than half believed by that kind of client of his who gets up at meetings of the Suez Canal Company and asks totidem verbis whether the dot of Mademoiselle his daughter is to be sacrificed to the greed of Albion for blood and money, there must be French politicians who are proof against it, and who are a little uneasy at the figure which France has cut, not merely by the accusation of Englishmen, but by the admission of public opinion in other countries which are not particularly friendly towards England.

There is nothing in the very least surprising in the renewed disturbances which have been so smartly checked, for the moment, though there may still be serious work to be done. They were as certain to recur as the precise moment of their recurrence was uncertain. The demand that England shall fix the time of evacuation ignores facts which are practically as certain as the swelling of the Nile, and are due to no very different causes. Egypt proper can never be free from such things, as her sovereigns in almost all recorded ages have found, unless the regions of Ethiopia are subjugated, at any rate for a considerable distance. If France were to say to us, “It was your fault that this ‘necessary boulevard of Egyptian defence was given up, and you must cause it to be restored,” she would be in effect, if not in appearance, making a far more reasonable demand than she advances at present. It was our fault; there is, unfortunately, no doubt of that, and, if France should, for instance, propose that Mr. GLADSTONE, the Minister responsible for it, should be sent, bound hand and foot, to the MAHDI, it would require all our ingenuity to argue against that demand. But to demand that we shall fix a time for evacuating Egypt while this open wound remains means one of two things—either that Egypt is to be pitilessly exposed to Dervish raids (for she has neither funds to check them on the great scale nor even to defend herself unaided and unguided on the small), or else that France shall take England's place—a proposal which neither treaty nor common sense requires us to entertain. We have already done much for Egypt. We have put her in a state to execute that advantageous conversion of her debt which France refuses to sanction; we have greatly reformed her internal institutions; we have, in spite of obstacles, made some progress in altering that system of exploitation by foreigners of which France is the chief champion, and (it is necessary to add) by which France profits most. We have, as this last bit of fighting shows, taught Egyptians once more to show under English officers a bold front to their foes. But we have, most certainly, not yet taught the Khedive to go alone, and with the good leave of France we have not the slightest intention of surrendering our position as tutors to somebody else.

FRANCE.

THE approach of the inevitable general election is producing its natural effect in French politics. The Ministry is becoming more nervous, the Republican majority more excitable, and the Opposition of all shades more provocative. It must be allowed that all three are in a position admirably calculated to put a strain on the nerves of Frenchmen. They are doing their different bits of work in the presence of a force which they cannot control. It is not merely a question of in or out for the combatants. The very existence of the Republic is at stake. As for the Oppositions, the prospect before them is either prolonged subjection to a form of administration which they hate, or a chance of revenge. Which of the two the mysterious ruler called Universal Suffrage will give them no man can tell. That there is a very profound, very quiet, and obstinate discontent in the country is beyond question; but whether it is strong enough to repeat the Paris election all over France is doubtful. Where so much is on the hazard it is unreasonable to expect that the interested persons, particularly when they happen to be Frenchmen, should keep cool. Their nerves are inevitably further excited by the nature of the means used to influence the electorate. The dispute is not about principles, but about characters. On either side the effort is not so much to show that the enemy is governing or would govern France badly, as to prove that he is a rogue or a fool or a combination of both. The Ministry are endeavouring by exceptional legal proceedings, or by vigorous use of the police, to shut the mouths of its critics. The Opposition retorts by charges of corruption, having been very naturally convinced by the successive elections of General BOULANGER that the most effectual of all ways of influencing the voters is to persuade them that the Parliamentary Republicans are bribe-takers and speculators. To say of such a conflict that it has degenerated into a tug between brute force and slander would be to compliment it. It never was anything else from the beginning, and its real character is only becoming a little more obvious than it was. The Chamber makes a pretence of discussing the Budget in a half-hearted way. On the Ministerial side there is no wish to call attention too loudly to the extravagance of the Republican administration just before the election. The Opposition is ready enough to drag out Republican sins in financial matters, but neither does it want to delay too effectually the voting of those grants in aid which a moribund Chamber commonly passes in order to get the constituencies into good humour. The real business of the Chamber is to fight out personal quarrels. From the Opposition side there comes a long series of charges of bribe-taking, or at least tripotage—answered by the majority either by counter-charges or by votes of censure and expulsions. The two make between them probably the most disgraceful spectacle ever presented by a Parliamentary institution outside of South America.

Of the two performers in these bouts of cudgel play, the Opposition seems to us to be the most likely to win in the long run. It has an immense advantage, no doubt, and is most effectually helped by its enemies; but that does not alter the fact that it has a very fair chance of attaining the definite object it has set before itself. The aim of the Opposition is to discredit Republican Parliamentary government, and it can work to this end not only by bespattering the other side, but by means of its own misbehaviour. To be sure the game would be a dangerous one to play against a strong party united on questions of principle and led by statesmen. But that is not the stamp of party the Opposition has in front of it in the French Chamber. What ought to live in history as the great “canaille scene” shows what elements the Chamber is composed of. In the course of a discussion set going by M. LAGUERRE, on the outrage to Parliamentary institutions implied in the infliction of a fine on himself for alleged insult to the police at Angoulême, it occurred to a M. LEJEUNE to bawl something about “canaille.” Whether the honourable deputy meant to assert, as the short-hand writers declare, that all Republicans are canaille, or only (as he himself explained after the battle) that, if so-and-so is true, then some Republicans are canaille, does not seem to be quite clear. In either case, if the word canaille is applicable to persons who cannot behave with the smallest self-respect or sense of decency, then the Chamber proceeded to prove the accuracy of M. LEJEUNE's language. Honourable Republican Deputies charged with manifest designs upon his nose. Other honourable deputies rushed to his defence. They kicked, tore hair, screamed. The ushers vainly strove to separate them. The pallid PRESIDENT stood with the rules of the House in one hand, and wildly swung his bell in the other. M. ANDRIEUX retired to a high seat and "ironically" deposited a loaded revolver on the desk. The whole scene must have borne a lively resemblance to those casual encounters of prowling and ownerless cats occasionally to be seen in suburban back gardens. To complete the scene M. LEJEUNE made an abject apology when order was restored. If (which is, perhaps, doubtful) there is any sense of the ridiculous left among Frenchmen, this incident must serve to discredit the Chamber still further. It is obvious, however, that the Opposition finds its account in them, for a few days later there was another which ended in the expulsion of M. DE CASSAGNAC. This time the pretext was the discovery that one of the Ministers has the misfortune to be burdened with a brother-in-law who has been mixed up in some discreditable business about the infringement of a patent. Of course the effort of the Opposition was to implicate the Minister himself. It was not wholly successful, but it was proved that one more Republican politician has been, at least indirectly, connected with tripotage. The discovery will serve to increase the weight of the charge against the whole party. It is, no doubt, the belief—the very well-grounded belief—of the Opposition that the constituencies will not discriminate, and that when the election comes on they will vote, not so much for General BOULANGER or the Right, as against the politicians who have been in office for the last few years. A more disgraceful species of Parliamentary warfare cannot well be imagined. We cannot say that it is wholly unfamiliar here. Our Irish friends have given us a taste of it; but with us at least it has not yet become the sole method of warfare in politics. In France at present it is, and nothing could well promise worse for the result of the approaching elections. Out of such an ignoble scramble nothing good can possibly come. The Republican majority have little or no excuse for complaint themselves. Many of them took an active share in attacks of precisely the same character on M. GRÉVY and his son-in-law. They did not, or would not, see that what was done then would be imitated later on, and that the discredit thrown on their old favourite would necessarily have to be shared by the Parliamentary Republicans as a body. They are now, thanks to the persistent activity of Boulangists and Conservatives, learning the lesson. Their own mismanagement helps their enemies. Instead of leaving charges of this kind to be dealt with by the Courts, the majority of the deputies can be turned aside from any business to hours of talk over one charge after another, fertile in scenes, and ending in ridiculous motions consigning the calumniators to public contempt. A more absurd formula has not been used since the tipsy Frenchman cried to the little boys who were jeering him:—"Vous êtes des injustes; j'en appelle à la postérité." Public contempt is not at the beck and call of the majority, and goes far beyond the limits assigned it, as the deputies have been copiously reminded.

How utterly unscrupulous many of the combatants in French politics are at this moment may be seen from the history of MM. JACQUES MEYER, IVAN DE WOESTYNE, and ARTHUR MEYER. The first of these three is an unfortunate speculator, at present much under a cloud, and lately a refugee at Brussels. The second is a Parisian journalist, not unknown to fame of a kind, and the third a Boulangist journalist, also of some name. If M. JACQUES MEYER did not amuse his leisure in exile by concocting cock-and-bull stories for the amusement of his mother, the other two must have come to him while waiting in prison till his extradition was granted with one of the most impudent and the silliest of schemes. They asked him to run the rather serious risk of accusing several Republican leaders of corruption, and offered as a consideration to obtain a pardon for him, when in the course of the next eight months Boulangism is triumphant. If M. JACQUES MEYER is familiar with English history, he must have been reminded by this offer of a famous incident in the life of the Earl of PETERBOROUGH. With or without historic example to guide him, M. JACQUES MEYER declined to play cat to the monkey of his namesake and that enterprising journalist M. IVAN DE WOESTYNE. He made a note of what had passed at great length, and sent it to his mother. The police obtained possession of it, and it has been duly read in the Chamber—somewhat, but not much, to the confusion of the Boulangists. That party is in the happy position of possessing a record which allows it to do much as it pleases without further discrediting itself. This consideration we commend to those who think for the fiftieth time or so that General BOULANGER is at last done for. The existence of such a party and the probability that it will win are the very sufficient condemnation of the Third Republic. After a trial of some years it has established such a character that the accusations even of such persons as these are taken against it.

THE SERVIAN CELEBRATIONS.

THE festivities or fasts, whichever they are to be called (for the anniversary of the battle of Kossovo, when terrible things happened to the renowned "crown of Dushan," is not exactly an occasion of rejoicing), appear to be passing off as satisfactorily as very dangerous things can. King ALEXANDER has been anointed at Zitcha, where it appears that the Turks, just as if they had been Puritans of the seventeenth or Reformers of the sixteenth century, "scratched out the eyes of the kings and saints." We shall, by the way, be very much surprised if somebody does not make an atrocity of this. But the unbeliever, in his horrid task, missed Saint ALEXANDER, probably under the impression that he was the coppersmith, and had something to do with the Janissary soup-kettles. This is considered a good omen for the boy successor of King MILAN, and his chances of the whole crown of Dushan are considered to be improving. M. PERSIANI, the Russian Minister, stood by, but as, about the same time, or not long before, M. PERSIANI's countrymen, or at least the subjects of the sovereign who employs him, had been sending telegrams to Prince NICHOLAS OF MONTENEGRO describing him as "the darling of the whole Slav world," it would appear that the crown of Dushan (which translated into plain English means the result of robbing Austria and Turkey of their lawful possessions) may have more aspirants than one. No harm, however, has come, so far, of the proceedings; the somewhat notorious Metropolitan MICHAEL appears not merely to have anointed his sovereign, but to have used decently loyal language respecting him, and M. JOVAN RISTICH, the principal statesman of Serbia, and the chief of the three Regents, who was unable to attend, sent a remarkably sensible letter. All this is as it should be, but it cannot be denied that the honours accorded to the Russian Minister marred the fair meeting. He was the only foreign Minister present, for the simple reason, it is said, that no foreign Minister whatever was invited, and that other Ministers did not apparently care, like M. PERSIANI, to invite themselves. But it is fair to add that he seems to have been none the less, but only the more, welcome.

M. RISTICH, even by those who do not like his policy, has generally been regarded as a clever man, and his letter certainly shows cleverness. Some expressions in it might even be thought to convey a plaintive protest against the conduct of his friend, M. PERSIANI. M. RISTICH says that the OBEENOVICH dynasty is firmly established on the throne; that he finds the Regency uncommonly difficult; that he is in much doubt as to the effect of the new constitution; that, if the law is not applied rigorously (this, we fear, is "coercion"), the "sands of reaction may engulf the ship of State"; that he hopes, when the time of King ALEXANDER's majority comes, to hand the country over to him in a satisfactory condition; and that meanwhile "peace will be the dominating principle of our dealings at home and with our neighbours." Now, if M. RISTICH can succeed in carrying out this programme, or even the last clause of it only, nobody (at least nobody who has the good of Serbia and of Europe at heart as contradistinguished from the desire to endow Serbia with crowns of Dushan) will have any fault to find with him. A policy of peace with her neighbours will certainly prevent Serbia from coveting her neighbours' goods; while the only one of those neighbours who is of real importance is quite certain to reciprocate it.

A policy of peace at home will give no handle to the darling of the Slavs at Cetinje, and none to that other darling of the Slavs who was so good as to send M. PERSIANI where M. PERSIANI was not invited. But at the same time this policy of peace is by no means the policy which will commend itself to M. PERSIANI and M. PERSIANI's master; for it will leave them no game to play in Servia or rather with her. The CZAR, who is believed to be an honest person enough, probably has no very distinct idea what this game is; but every Servian peasant who cheered M. PERSIANI ought to be informed of it. It is the game expressed in a story which is found in most nations, periods, and languages, though we are not prepared, without consulting the folklorists, to say what is the Servian form—the story of the Monkey, the Chestnuts, and the Cat. The part which M. PERSIANI is anxious that Servia should play in it is a remarkable one, for it is that of chestnuts and cat united.

THE SULTAN INQUIRY.

THE report of the Court of Inquiry on the loss of H.M.S. Sultan is as unsatisfactory a document as it well could be. We do not mean that the Court has not found as it should have found according to the evidence. Still less do we imply that it has been unduly favourable to the officers whose conduct after the stranding was part of the subject of their inquiry. No doubt the members of the Court were justified in deciding that the Admiral in the Mediterranean and his officers did their best to save the Sultan from total loss. They acted according to their judgment, and showed neither negligence nor incompetence in their efforts to accomplish a very difficult piece of work under varying circumstances. If they did not succeed, it was because success was impossible. On a point of this sort the opinion of a court of seamen is, and must be, the best of all possible authorities. Admiral COMMERELL and his colleagues knew what they were talking about, and had their very sufficient reasons for declining to decide that, if measures were taken of which they could not at first sight approve, it was because the officers on the spot found them necessary or the only measures which could be taken. The court-martial on Captain RICE and the Court of Inquiry may be taken to have decided between them that, if HER MAJESTY'S Navy has been deprived of a very fine ship by stranding in waters which we should have thought were as familiar as their gloves to HER MAJESTY'S officers, and if the ship could not be got off, no serious blame rests on anybody in the service. It is not the result we should have expected them to arrive at, but we do not propose to go behind the competent tribunals.

Allowing, however, that the officers came out nearly or wholly blameless, it is still very disagreeable to hear of the condition which made the floating off of the ship impossible. The Sultan has become a total wreck, because, in plain language, her watertight compartments turned out on trial to be as good as useless, and, what is worse, it cannot be discovered, on inquiry, why they were useless. We do not know that this is any matter of amazement—watertight compartments have so often turned out on trial to be, if not useless, at least far less useful than they theoretically ought to be. They make all the difference between sinking in three hours or sinking in ten minutes—and that is, indeed, considerable, but they do very generally fail to keep ships afloat. The awkward thing, however, is that the water-tight compartments of HER MAJESTY'S do generally prove to be less efficient than those of merchant vessels, and that the compartments of the Sultan were inferior to those of other war-ships which have been rammed or have run on rocks. It is not to be denied that water poured into the Sultan in enormous quantities, with great rapidity, and from more places than one. If the compartments had been what they were represented to be this could not have happened. They were, therefore, not efficient, but why they failed the Court cannot discover. Whether they were not properly closed, or were too weak, or, worst of all, whether the ship was not so constructed that a side road was provided by which the water could, so to speak, turn the flank of the compartments—are questions which the Court of Inquiry asks. The Court itself proposes that there should be another inquiry, by constructors this time. We may, therefore, take these two things as proved—first, that the system of construction which was relied on to keep war-ships afloat has proved insufficient; and, secondly, that naval officers are not yet familiar with the qualities and powers of the ships in which they will have to fight. We are not sure that if the choice had been given us we would not rather have heard that the Sultan had been run on shore by careless navigation and had been left there through want of judgment. The remedy for the blundering of individual officers is much easier to apply than the remedy for a universal inefficiency of the tools which they must employ.

THE COMMITTEE ON ROYAL GRANTS.

WE cannot affect to regret the delay of the Government in bringing forward the promised proposal for the appointment of a Parliamentary Committee to inquire into the question of Royal Grants. The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY apologized for it the other night, and we have no doubt that it was unintentional. But, all the same, it was fortunate. For it was the means of bringing about a neater and more effective exposure of Radical pretences than we ever remember to have met with. When Mr. SMITH first announced his intention of asking the House to take into consideration the Royal messages with respect to the provision which Parliament was to be asked to make for Prince EDWARD and the Princess LOUISE of WALES, Mr. LABOUCHERE gave notice that he should oppose the motion on the ground that the promise to appoint a Committee of Inquiry into these grants had not been fulfilled. Last Thursday night the promise in question was fulfilled, and Mr. LABOUCHERE and his party still opposed the motion. Of course there were various excuses, of a more or less flimsy character, alleged for this persistence in opposition. The terms of the reference were not satisfactory. The senior member for Northampton did not know what "provision" meant, and he did not know what "members of the Royal family meant"; while the junior member for Northampton complained that the Committee were not authorized to inquire into the Royal expenditure of the funds appropriated to the Crown by the Civil List, and moved an amendment, which was defeated by a majority of 188, in favour of investing the Committee with powers to that effect. And, of course, too, we were treated to the old immoral denial of the clear and inexorable fact that the dealings of the Crown with the Civil List are absolutely unexaminable by Parliament except by the commission of a distinct breach of faith. The Radicals who insist, with such vehement arrogance, that there is no "compact" between the Sovereign and Parliament insuring to the former a fixed appropriation of the Civil List throughout the entire reign may be invited to ask themselves seriously what their opinion on such a point is worth? What, if they will be so good as to tell us, is their precise notion of a "compact"? The only clue to their views with which they have supplied us is not altogether reassuring. What a compact means to them when the two parties to it are an Irish landlord and his tenants is an agreement of which the latter is to appropriate the benefit in the event of its turning out favourably to him, but which in the contrary event he is morally entitled to repudiate. And really this seems to be very much their notion with regard to this matter of the Civil List. They hold—probably without any foundation; but that does not affect the case—that the Sovereign has got the best of the bargain by which at the commencement of each reign the Crown Lands are ceded to the nation in exchange for the Royal income settled by the Civil List; and that alone is sufficient to convince these supporters of the Plan of Campaign that no "compact" can ever have existed at all. We wonder what they would have said if the case had been reversed, and if HER MAJESTY, instead of providently keeping her expenditure within her income, had had to come to Parliament for an addition to the Civil List. Probably we should have heard something about the "compact" from our Radicals then.

Even Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT had to confess that the amendment was beyond his power to support, and that the arrangements of the Civil List could not be reopened until the occurrence of a demise of the Crown. In the meantime there can be no doubt that, apart from these pledges, the Government have acted wisely in appointing a Committee to inquire into the whole question of Royal Grants. The system upon which the Parliamentary provisions for members of the Royal Family are applied for and obtained is unbusinesslike and haphazard to the last degree. It works in a manner calculated to offer the highest possible premium on such eloquence as that of Mr. SAMUEL STOREY, who has, perhaps, calculated what proportion of the burden of an annual expenditure of over eighty millions falls, in the shape of the Civil List and the supplementary provisions for members of the Royal House, upon "families on the verge of starvation," and to enable men like Mr. PICTON to terrify the Times. It is unlikely, perhaps, that any action on the report of the Committee, whatever it may be, will enable us to get rid of the STOREYS and the PICTONS altogether. The latter will, no doubt, find some means for reminding us that he carries the people of Leicester in his pocket, and that the nation is itself in the pocket of the people of Leicester; while the former will equally of course secure some opportunity of sneering at Court officials and their duties, and proclaiming the just pride with which he regards his own majestic manhood. But they will make these demonstrations with considerably less effect, even upon the vulgarest ignorance in the country, than they do at present.

THE COAL DUES.

THE real character of the fine zeal shown for the abolition of the Coal Dues levied in London was excellently displayed by the Opposition on Wednesday. The hybrid Committee appointed by the House to examine the claim of the Corporation to compensation for the loss of the dues recommended that a rate of fourpence should be levied for a year. The object for which the tax is to be levied is perfectly well known. It is to secure the payment of the money lent on the security of the dues for the purpose of making the Holborn Viaduct. That this was an improvement of immense value and convenience nobody denies. All London has profited by it, and ought, therefore, to help to pay for it. The tax of fourpence is a very light one and will hardly be felt. It is not proposed, even by Mr. FIRTH, to leave the creditors unpaid. Yet because the whole obligation to pay them is not thrown on the City—because the Corporation is not to be put to the choice of either suffering confiscation or coming hat in hand to the County Council—a pertinacious handful of members, who dignified themselves with the title of representatives of London, contrived to keep the House from arriving at the inevitable conclusion till they had prated to their heart's content.

It is superfluous to say that neither Mr. FIRTH, nor Mr. LAWSON, nor Mr. PICKERSGILL, nor Mr. ROWLANDS even attempted to oppose the clauses on grounds of policy or public advantage. Their one stock argument was that some consideration was being shown for the Corporation, that they hate the Corporation, and would like to see it made to smart. Under the influence of this noble feeling, they made a great parade of zeal for the poor in the usual way; but the character of their parade was perfectly transparent. Mr. PICKERSGILL threatened the "member for Barnard Castle" with the vengeance of the miners of Durham and Yorkshire because he was going to vote for a tax on coal which these same miners will not be asked to pay. The other members of the minority who endeavoured to obstruct the Bill hammered away at the proposition that the Corporation had no rights, and showed a firm belief that this was argument enough. That the Holborn Viaduct must be paid for, that if the funds are not found in this way they must be got out of the rates, that the Coal Dues have been shown by experience to be a very light impost, were truths which they never took the trouble to notice. And yet they are obvious. If the agitation against the Coal Dues had not been carefully fostered by wire-pulling and nursed by pedantry, it never would have been heard of. Unless it had suited a little knot of persons to use them as a stump, the vast majority of Londoners would never have heard of them or known that they paid them. They will hear, however, of the rates, and be carefully instructed in the obligation to pay them. The purely obstructive nature of the opposition was shown by the fact that it was made after the House had decided by an overwhelming majority to sit till it had finished the Committee stage of the Bill. Mr. FIRTH and his friends must have known that Parliament was not likely to reject the recommendation of its own Committee, and if they insisted on repeating what they had said five hundred times before, it can only have been with the intention of delaying a decision which they must have known to be inevitable. Fortunately the delay could not be long. The House having to choose between finishing the Committee stage of the Bill early, and sacrificing its evening off for the joy of listening to Messrs. FIRTH, LAWSON, and ROWLANDS, did not hesitate long. The decision at which it arrived was the right one. The tax of fourpence will be continued for a year, and Parliament has again recorded its decision not to confiscate the property of the Corporation. It has also recognized that the Corporation has behaved in this matter with great liberality. Before the year is out, Londoners, unless there is a very considerable change in the interval, will have learnt more fully than they have done already the difference between the so-called greedy Corporation and that enlightened body the County Council. If they have not taken, and are not prepared to take, the necessary steps in consequence, they will deserve to have this County Council to rule over them, and will not improbably attain their deserts.

THE SHAH.

IT is equally easy to exaggerate and to make too little of the SHAH's visit to us, and to overdo and underdo our reception of the SHAH himself. Too much of the criticism which is to be heard in either sense upon these points is too plainly the product of strictly personal influences. He who has spent an idle morning in watching one of the pageants of the last few days from a comfortable position feels disposed to think that, in our entertainment of our visitor, we are not exceeding the bounds of that stately hospitality which becomes a great nation. He, on the other hand, whose hansom has been stopped or diverted from its direct route by one of the processions, and who has missed his train in consequence, begins seriously to ask himself whether, after all, NASR-ED-DIN is very much better than a "barbarian," and whether the King of Kings is not being made absurdly too much of. The Londoner who has neither been amused nor incommoded by the SHAH's entertainment is difficult to find; while as for the dweller in the country he is likely to be either envious or contemptuous of the doings in London, according as he moralizes from necessity or from choice. Perhaps the philosopher we are in search of might, if found and interrogated on the subject, make award that the thing has, on the whole, and considering the fact that the SHAH is not our visitor for the first time, been just the least little bit overdone. Still the fault is one on the right side, and cannot possibly have any but a temporary—even one might almost say a momentary effect.

The circumstance that this is the SHAH's second visit to us, and that it is paid after so considerable an interval of time, adds much to its private, if not to its public, interest. Travelling, especially with the state with which Oriental potentates travel, must be a greater bore to them than most other things in life, which is, no doubt, saying a good deal; so that His Imperial Majesty's desire to renew his impressions of Europe, and especially of England, is flattering to us. Yet a desire so successfully repressed, as far as our own country at any rate is concerned, for sixteen years is a phenomenon provocative of some curiosity, and its manifestation certainly tends to suggest that the visit is not one of pure pleasure, and this again opens the door to the whole of that piquant but quite unprofitable controversy which is centred in the personality and policy of our guest. Is he a sort of Oriental PETER the Great, studying European institutions with the view of Europeanizing his own country? Or is he an ambitious ruler paying court for private purposes of haute politique to the Empress of INDIA and her Ministers? Or, lastly, is he only an earthen pipkin who has no desire to swim with the brass pots, but still less likes the idea—which seems to him to be coming more and more within the range of practical politics—of being crushed between them? Or, lastly, are his motives in visiting us a combination of those appropriate to each of the three suggested characters? Possibly they are; but, if so, we can hardly be wrong in attributing the least influence to the first among them and the greatest to the last. The SHAH is, no doubt, a very good specimen of an enlightened Eastern potentate, as such potentates go; and, properly handled by European advisers, as he has only lately been by any representatives of this country, he can no doubt be induced to do a good deal for the common advantage of his people and our own. But the leisurely manner in which he has proceeded—making all allowance for the obstruction and inertia of his officials—with the work of internal reform is fatal to the theory put forward at one time by some of his more enthusiastic admirers that he is a JOSEPH II. of Persia. In so far as public motives and not the desire for amusement have prompted his visit to us, they are probably much more closely connected with his position as a weak Asiatic ruler between two powerful European-Asiatic Empires.

MR. BULL'S SHOW.

IN the first week of July an amateur of modest means finds the glory of the orchids departed for the year. His shelves are never without bloom, if he have used a very little common sense in stocking them, but the grand burst of spring is over. A few Odontogloss belated are still unfurling, and many still show a handsome front; but from day to day verdure encroaches on the sight, as a judicious gardener cuts down the fading wreaths. It is otherwise in a large collection. Belated flowers are so numerous there that they prolong the display for weeks, aided by those other genera and species which properly come into bloom at this season. Mr. Bull's orchids were never more superb than now as a mere sight, while for those who regard them with an understanding eye the variety has greater interest than the mass exhibited a month ago. The mass, indeed, is undiminished. Not a gap appears in the astonishing parade of bright colour and strange forms which assuredly has no equal in the world. For Mr. Bull keeps the idea—of a public orchid exhibition—to himself at present. There are a few growers up and down who might challenge him—two, possibly three; but as yet they make no sign. Words could not describe the spectacle to those who have not seen it. We shall only touch a point of interest here and there.

A species very curious—handsome enough, too—is Odont. Williamsi. It belongs to the class which we regard as keys, that should open many secrets of the orchid world if used aright, and will, too, probably in good time. This plant is so like Odont. grande, the common favourite, that one would be puzzled to define the difference in language—excepting that O. Williamsi is smaller than the average. It is gamboge yellow, mottled with red-brown, and it has all the stark, spread-eagle attitude which, to our taste, makes O. grande vulgar. Most people, even of the experienced, confuse the two at a glance. Further on stands Odont. Schleiperianum, smaller still, but essentially the same both in flower and bulb and growth; so is a striking “variety” near by, though at a little distance it seems to be all bright yellow, the brown suppressed. Now, these three varieties—two of which rank as species—are separated from the common type, O. grande, by nearly ten degrees of latitude and ten degrees of longitude, nor—we might almost make an affidavit—do any intermediate forms exist in the space between; and those degrees are sub-tropical, by so much more significant than an equal distance in our zone. Instances of the same class, and vastly more surprising, also, are found in many genera of orchid. They contain a clue to the variation of species which will be unravelled one day. Here is the exquisite little Oncidium nubigenum, long supposed to be the most determined climber of all mountaineering epiphytes and assuredly the loveliest. Fourteen thousand feet, indeed, is a creditable performance for a member of the Alpine Club; but this tender mite thinks nothing of it. One could not find a stronger example of the grand rule that orchids are the most contented, the most long-suffering of all created things. We bring this little beauty, “born of the clouds,” from her mountain top in New Grenada and we set her beside the muddy Thames—or anywhere else. Pleasantly and gratefully she accepts the change, spreading her dusky petals and fine snowy lip, with the daintiest mauve square thereon, as freely as in the Alpine solitude. A species we do not often see is Odont. cristatellum, yellow stained with green, barred and spotted with light brown. The column is white, and a snow-white beard falls over the labellum, strong hairs of gold-brown forming a moustache above it. The number of Oncidium macranthum flowering on these crowded shelves bears evidence to the strength of Mr. Bull's collection. There are no fewer than twenty big pots, with something like three hundred and fifty blooms; moreover, they will show you a house full of them “coming on.” Nature forestalled the dreams of æsthetic colourists when she designed Oncidium macranthum. Thus, and not otherwise, would the thoughtful of them arrange a “harmony” in gold and bronze; but Nature, with characteristic indifference to the fancies of mankind, hid her chef-d'œuvre in the wilds of Ecuador. Among the twenty plants are no fewer than three varieties, each an improvement, in one point or another, on the type—which might have been supposed impossible. O. mac. hastiferum, in truth, is an improvement all round; the gold more burnished, the wings of the lip clearer and of a darker purple. O. mac. aurosum is not worthy of this extreme compliment; but a person unacquainted with the usual form might well declare its stainless gold incomparable. The third variety, without name, is distinguished by the number and boldness of its pleatings. These are mere “sports,” since all come from the same district, so far as we know. An astonishing example of “sport” is Odont. Pescatorei, one of the last which Professor Reichenbach described. “Stupendous” it is, indeed, in the Latin sense, to one familiar with the species, and exquisitely lovely for all—a snow-white flower, with the blotches and dots usual transformed into a dense margin of tiny purple scratches round the lip. Nothing in the least like it has ever been found before, and this is a very small plant. An Odontoglossum quite new, still awaiting the nomenclator, is remarkable for a white fringe, like the most ethereal of lace, surrounding its brown lip.

The summer-flowering Cattleyas make a display now, while C. Mossiæ has still many lingering blooms. Grandest and rarest is C. Sanderiana, of course—an immense pink flower, with such a crimson lip, so bold yet so delicate of form and hue, as no Cattleya can rival to our mind. Among the legends of orchidology there are few so striking as that which attaches to C. Sanderiana; it can be only outlined here. One of Mr. Sander's collectors went out in search of Odont. crispum to Bogota, found this plant “at rest,” and gathered a number, in a conscientious, matter-of-fact way. He delivered them, one might put it, as per invoice, and failed to grasp his employer's sudden amazement. Mr. Sander perceived at a glance that it must be something supreme, and sent back his collector, Mr. Mau, by next mail. In due time a shipment arrived; it will be understood that civilized man had not yet seen the flower. But Mr. Brymer, M.P.—famous for all time among orchidaceans as the introducer of Dendrobium Brymerianum—had bought one of the first lot. It came into bloom at this critical moment, and he good-naturedly lent the plant as a sample. The day when Messrs. Stevens offered the importation is still marked in the calendar. They fixed a screen of baize across their auction-room, and set Mr. Brymer's plant on high for worship—with more success than Nebuchadnezzar, for no man protested. C. Sanderiana is still very rare, as such a marvel should be. Here is Epidendrum prismatocarpum, a magnificent and impressive species—more often discussed than seen. It has noble spikes; long, and thickly clothed with flower. Petals and sepals are white, the latter thickly spotted with black, upon which the delicate pale-mauve lip, sharply-pointed, has an effect almost startling. Prismatocarpum is a very happy name. Odont. Harryanum, on the other hand, is most unfortunate in its title. The public is not interested in those circumstances which give it significance for a few, and if there be any flower which demands an expressive name it is this, in our judgment. O. Harryanum always reminds us—in such an odd association of ideas as every one has experienced—of a thunder-storm. The contrast of its intense brown blotches with the azure throat and the broad, snowy lip, affect us somehow with admiring oppression. Very absurd; but on est fait comme ça, as Nana excused herself. To call this most striking flower “Harryanum” is bitterly grotesque. Odont. cordatum is not a favourite generally, but those who have it will be encouraged by a sight of Mr. Bull's specimen; grown to that size and age, its somewhat commonplace colouring gains importance. A rare variety is O. cordatum Kienastianum, brighter in tone, sharper in its acute angles, and generally “cleaner” in appearance. A species new last year, and most welcome, is Oncidium cornigerum longi-racemosum, from Brazil. It has scores and scores of pale-green blossoms, most daintily spotted with red, packed with charming neatness upon a foot-long spike. There are no less than eleven main branches, all subdivided, within this space. Cryptochyllus sanguineus, from Assam, will never be worth one penny in the market, but savants contemplate it with singular interest; its spike of dull-red bells is very like a worthless Lachenalia, as different from an orchid as well could be. Those who visited the Temple Show are not likely to forget the sensation caused by Sir Trevor Lawrence's Bulbophyllum. One much more satisfactory as a flower, and not less curious as a plant à mécanique, is B. Lobbii. Its clear, clean, orange-creamy hue is delightful to behold. The lip, so delicately balanced, quivers at every breath, but here you are allowed to put it through all its amazing performance. If the slender stem be bent back, as by a fly alighting on the column, that quivering cap turns and hangs imminent; another tiny shake, as though the fly approached the nectary, and it falls plump, head over heels, like a shot, imprisoning the insect. If we wished to excite a thoughtful child's interest in botany—not regardless of the sense of beauty either—we would make an investment in Bulbophyllum Lobbii. There are other curiosities, and other plants that suggest remark, at every turn. Masdevallia peristeria is excellently represented—a charming and a striking species, of a nameless green, closely dotted with purple inside, outlined at the edges and the “tails” with a paler hue. Over the mauve lip sits a little green-white dove. There is no object in nature prettier than Ornithocephalus grandiflorus, with dense blossoms, white and green, strangely like a bird whose wings are half-folded downwards, and deliciously scented. But our space is full.

WHICH IS WHICH?

[Being a Passage from the History of England in the Nineteenth Century, by Foo-chow. Peking. A.D. 2500.]

... WE come now to the vexed question of the Special Commission. And in order that our readers may fully understand our view upon this matter, we must give a short summary of the facts. It appears, then, that towards the latter end of the ninth decade of the century of which we write, W-lt-r (subsequently created Earl of D-rh-m) made a speech in which he accused P-rn-ll, or, as he is sometimes called, Ch-tw-nd, and other persons of instigating to assassination and conniving at outrage. The speech as it has come down to us is couched in highly metaphorical language. Read without the light that recent research has thrown upon it, it appears to deal with some scandal connected with the well-known English Sport of Horse Racing. It is now, however, universally admitted to have been a political utterance of the deepest import. In it the speaker charged a particular party, or, as he calls it, "stable," with outrages and serious malpractices in connexion with Ireland—designated in allusion to her national colour as the "Turf." The speech seems to have excited some interest which was very greatly intensified by the republication of the charges and allegations in a much more direct form in W-lt-r's newspaper—the T-m-s. After they had been discussed for some time in public, the matter was brought before the Parliament or Jockey Club. The leader of the accused "stable" was urged to resort to the Courts of law for redress, but seems to have delayed, or been reluctant to do so. He appears to have allowed one of his followers, variously called "W--d" (doubtless, a party nickname) or O'D-nn-ll, to bring an action for libel first, but this is not quite free from doubt. At any rate, a Commission of three persons was at last appointed by the Jockey Club to investigate the charges. According to the universal practice in such matters, two trials took place, the advocates changing sides, to ensure fair play. Thus, we find R-ss-ll in the first trial defending P-rn-ll, while the Attorney-General and J-m-s accuse him. In the second trial R-ss-ll was for the plaintiffs, while J-m-s (the Attorney-General being doubtless otherwise engaged) appeared for the defence. The two trials seem to have been of very different length, but at last they both came to an end. The result is a matter of such importance and of such far-reaching consequences that we shall reserve it for a separate chapter. Suffice it to say that the form which the decision took in no way throws doubt upon the version of the facts which we have given.

That this version is correct admits, we think, of no manner of doubt. A recent writer, whose usually accurate judgment has perhaps on this occasion been warped by a desire for originality, has suggested that there were two wholly distinct and separate charges, made by two wholly different persons in connexion with wholly different subjects. The suggestion has been supported with all Mr. A.'s customary ingenuity, and he is entitled to all the assistance he can get from the fact that his view was that generally held before the recent advances in intellectual progress and the employment of more scientific methods of historical inquiry. For ourselves, we can only say that, in our opinion, Mr. A.'s theory does not bear a minute's investigation. In order to support it, he has to maintain that W-lt-r never became Lord D-rh-m, that "Ch-tw-nd" and P-rn-ll were different persons, that there were two R-ss-lls and more than one J-m-s. But, even if he could devise plausible reasons for these audacious suggestions, he is only at the beginning of his difficulties. Is it probable, we ask in the name of common sense, that at the same time and in the same country there should have been set up two tribunals, each consisting of three persons, each appointed after some considerable delay, each to deal with allegations of a very serious nature made by a person in an influential position against the character of the leader of a well-known and opposing faction? Is it probable that in each case the judges should have behaved in a precisely similar manner, that in each case one of the judges should have been absolutely silent, another should have taken a considerable part, the President should have in each case employed the same words and manner in the discharge of his duties? Nor is that all, or nearly all. Let Mr. A. examine the grounds of the accusations made in each of what he regards as two cases. He will find that there is a resemblance between them that will startle even him. In each instance the case set up in support of the accusation was that the associates of the accused were men of atrocious character; that they had been guilty of the grossest offences and malpractices; that they gloried in their contempt for the laws by which they were supposed to be governed. In each case it was alleged that the defendant was a man of great personal ability and immense knowledge of the questions with which he was so largely concerned, and that it was therefore scarcely possible that he could have unknowingly accepted the assistance and friendship of such scoundrels. More than this, it was one of the greatest points in the attack on P-rn-ll that, if he disliked the proceedings of some of his allies, it was strange, so the Attorney-General said, that he commonly profited by those proceedings. Mr. A. will find that the same accusation, in almost the same words, is made against Ch-tw-nd—only, of course, by Sir Ch-rl-s R-ss-ll.

We will not weary our readers further in this matter than to point out that, even in the fragments of the evidence that have been preserved, the two trials are strikingly alike; as, for instance, in the fact that, in both trials the plaintiffs relied very much on the banking account of the accused. In short, the only real ground for Mr. A.'s fanciful theory is the dissimilarity of the names in the two trials. For those conversant with the recklessness and frequency with which honours were at that time distributed in England, there is nothing remarkable in a Sm-th having become Earl M-rch, or in a D-y being created Prince S-lt-k-ff. Nor is there anything strange in J-m-s H-nn-n having, perhaps in obedience to the whim of a wealthy relation, changed his name into that of J-m-s L-wth-r. What is strange, and what is remarkable is that a man of such weight and authority as Mr. A. should have lent his position to support what is doubtless in origin the crude and unwarrantable hypothesis of some self-confident schoolboy.

CRIMINAL ROMANCE.

IT cannot be maintained that the criminal romance is elevating in its tendencies. There is much mental and minute introspection, but not in the manner of Wordsworth or Browning; and, although the author may be all the better for a Shakspearian knowledge of human nature, it is his business to study man in his shadier aspects. Even the criminal masterpieces of the immortal Balzac—to say nothing of the cleverest novels of Gaboriau and Boigobey—leave behind them a mingled flavour of the slums, the Morgue, the gaol, and the galleys. Yet in one sense the best criminal romance belongs to the highest order of fiction. It demands infinite care and intense conscientiousness. Robinson Crusoe-like ingenuity and readiness of resource must be brought to the aid of a somewhat perverted or morbid imagination. To win its author celebrity, or even credit, the finished work should be a marvel of constructive skill, with an exquisite adjustment of the details of each part and an all-pervading sense of proportion. Foresight should forestall destructive criticism, and forethought should anticipate all plausible objections. The complicated machinery, working smoothly on converging lines, should move steadily and swiftly towards the central point or dénouement. We have indicated the qualifications of the ideal sensational novelist; and Gaboriau, and even Boigobey, have not fallen far short of them. Gaboriau's chief fault, as it appears to us, is extending his novels to unnecessary length by introducing irritating retrospects and indulging in supplementary digressions. Take, for example, The Honour of the Name. While Lecocq is puzzling out a lukewarm scent with the ardour of a hot-blooded, but half-baffled, sleuthhound, we are carried back to an exposition of ancient history, when the lands of the nobles were being confiscated for the democracy and France was in the throes of a social convulsion. Gaboriau showed what he could do when he cared to avoid the fault in his admirable Petit Vieux des Batignolles, where the tours de force of detective strategy should have failed had the genius of the far-seeing criminal had fair play. Boigobey is in most respects the inferior of his master; but he far surpasses him in almost inexhaustible fertility, and he steers clear of those snares of provoking digressions. Considering that we are surprised and uneasy about his health if we do not have a novel from him every quarter—at this moment he has been mute for an unprecedentedly long interval—it is wonderful how very seldom he repeats himself; though, no doubt, he is partial to such strong situations as three rivals starting on a similar quest, and finding themselves seated together in the coupé of a diligence. In spite of his fertility, there is invariably freshness in his books, whether he draws his inspiration from the romance of historical conspiracy, or seeks it in the comparatively vulgar crime of his contemporaries. In such books as the Crime de l'Opéra he puzzles and excites us up to the concluding chapters; and the best rule we can give his readers for solving his enigmas is always to lay the burden of the guilt on the person least likely to be suspected.

From this tedious preliminary sermon it will be seen that we believe success in Criminal Romance to be only attainable by the specially gifted. But that does not appear to be the popular notion. We can understand that the ordinary sensational novelists may have been tempted to follow feux follets, not only by the fame and the gains of the great fathers of the French school, but by the extraordinary sale of such English imitations as some of the best of Mr. Arrowsmith's of Bristol "shilling shockers." But, after all, before a novice breaks out in novel-writing, it is only wise to weigh and estimate his special powers. Over-vaulting ambition is apt to overreach itself, and it is always more prudent to test one's strength over the well-beaten track before striking out a career of adventure. The sentimental and domestic novel is reasonably safe. Dances, dinners, and lawn-tennis parties are within the scope of every one's daily observation, and the commonplace Strephon, with his smiles and sighs, is more easily conceived and idealized than a Count Fosco or a Bill Sikes. We are persuaded that Mr. Arkwright, who has published a Criminal Romance, could write a fair average novel, and we are far from saying that The Queen Anne's Gate Mystery (White & Co.) is devoid of interest. We make no complaint of "the mystery," which is cleverly enough devised, but we object to the process of clearing it up. In the first place, we may apply the normal criticism to the novel—that it would have gained exceedingly by some severe compression. The attention is gratuitously distracted by a variety of subsidiary episodes, and superstition is made to play a commanding part in a manner that jars on our regard for the realistic. The threads of the tale are perpetually getting entangled, and the author is reduced to the necessity of cutting his own intricate knots. Then the mystery is finally unravelled by sentiment and impulse rather than by reason and shrewd deduction. We may say that Mr. Arkwright seems to have a supreme contempt for the professional detective. It is true that when the narrator retains the services of Mr. Sleuthson he gives us reason to expect marvellous feats of astuteness. First impressions are necessarily unfavourable.

Like MM. Tabaret and Lecocq, Sleuthson had an insignificant appearance and an hesitating manner. However, "I soon discovered a preponderance of sagacity and a wealth of resource which encouraged as much as they surprised me." But, having paid what he appears to consider an indispensable tribute to the conventionalities of criminal fiction, the author shoves Mr. Sleuthson unceremoniously aside. As a matter of fact, the detective, though he bustles about to earn his pay, does next to nothing towards the solution of the mystery. The London lawyer, who is retained to conduct the defence of the suspected man, is even more incapable. The veritable deus ex machina is the Lady Geraldine, the beautiful and impassioned young wife of the gentleman who tells the tale. With her feminine impulsiveness she jumps at once to the conclusion that the man who is charged with the murder of his wife cannot possibly be guilty. In that intensity of conviction, founded in the face of crushing presumptive evidence upon her pity and her warm sympathies, of course we agree with her. We are assured, in the first place, that such a story can have but a single end; and, in the next place, Harry Collingwood is a fine manly fellow and the last person in the world under any provocation to mix a seasoning of strychnine in his wife's sleeping draught. If driven beyond the limit of endurance, he was much more likely, as his friend observed, to have tamed his shrew by knocking her on the head. But the successful search for exculpatory evidence is almost entirely due to Lady Geraldine's inspiration. Her intuition is unfailing and infallible, and it turns to excellent account the dreams and visions of her over-excited husband. All's well that ends well, and the life and good name of an innocent man were at stake; but her enthusiasm betrays her into questionable actions, and her courage shrinks from no responsibilities. She confesses a sick woman when the doctors have declared that any excitement may probably be fatal. The servant girl she has taken for detective purposes as her personal maid is prompted to what seems very like an abuse of confidence, and abstracts a packet which has been stitched in the dress of the helpless patient she is nursing. Lady Geraldine's best excuse is, that she is running a race against time—that her protégé has been tried and condemned, and that the day of execution is fixed. But, if we condone her proceedings in consideration of her temptations, the novel must be pronounced faulty from the artistic point of view. For, to be consistent, the action should have kept pace with the pressing exigencies of the exculpatory inquiry; in place of which we are carried away on somewhat wearisome wanderings in Wales, and have to listen to the long story and the love affairs of a girl whose superstitions, which are elaborately explained and accounted for, unfortunately mixed her up with the mystery.

We do not think that Mr. Arkwright's talent tends towards Scotland Yard, or Secret Inquiry Offices, or the pensionnaires of Portland. Nevertheless we believe, as we have said, that he could write a picturesque and agreeable novel. Some of his characters are very cleverly delineated; the hero, Harry Collingwood, with his faults and his sterling qualities, is true to his nature throughout, and the impulsive and warmhearted Lady Geraldine is a charming and lovable woman. Many of the incidental rural sketches are delightful, and the foul air of crowded assize courts and coroners' inquests is freshened by the cool breath of the balmy breezes from the woodlands of Herefordshire and the Welsh hills. We fancy Mr. Arkwright has more of the Richard Jefferies than of the Boisgobey or Wilkie Collins in him, and we should recommend him when he tries authorship again to lay his scenes in those rural districts with which he is familiar, and to draw his sensations from the field-sports which he loves.

MACBETH ON SATURDAY LAST.

LAST Saturday, the closing night of the Lyceum Macbeth season, was set apart, as Mr. Irving called it, as the annual "testimonial to Miss Terry"—a happy phrase which seemed to gratify all to whom it was addressed, many of whom had witnessed that day's performance of Lady Macbeth on various occasions during the one hundred and fifty times that the play has been consecutively produced. The theatre was filled in every corner with an alert and sympathetic audience. The performance had lost nothing of its freshness and vigour since we first saw it; but, on the contrary, the two principal players threw in new touches of genius, which suggested that in their hands oft repetition does not lead to dulness, but to an increase of freedom, force, and vitality. On this occasion, for example, the personal presence of Lady Macbeth amplified the poet's thought, and gave illumination to his intent in the most marked and vivid manner, giving that precise action to the word which is needed to bring out its fuller meaning. At other times we have had to express our admiration for Miss Terry's delivery of her lines, which could not have been better, which seemed to be all-sufficing for the achievement of a perfect impress and apprehension of the text; but on Saturday last we not only had the excellent words expressed with excellence, but they were given now with a grace and now with a fire that presented, rather than represented, one of the most difficult characters that poet ever conceived or artist ever portrayed. In the sleep-walking scene—of which some busy critics appear to have missed the meaning—the words "here's the smell of blood still" moved the spectators' hearts to quicker throbbing as they gazed on the whilom passionate woman, who once loved one who "loved only for his own ends," now bereft of such strength as her love once gave her, left the prey of remorse and the victim of despair—a sight so moving and so informing that it is not too much to say the whole house trembled with excitement as it realized the vision.

Equally noteworthy was the manner in which Mr. Irving brought the guilty thane in subjection to his wife's thrifty love. Here was seen the real Macbeth, with his all-powerful imagination and his powerless conscience; that precise kind of ineffectual, fruitless conscience which makes cowards of all who possess it, and certainly made a coward of Macbeth, and wrought the conviction that for him at least,

Life's but a walking shadow, a poor player
That struts and frets his hour upon the stage
And then is heard no more: it is a tale
Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury
Signifying nothing.

This is the confession of a conscience-stricken creature, who of pure moral weakness debased a character once famed for its courage, in whose mind now, as the tidings are borne in upon him of his wife's death, springs up the thought that "all our yesterdays have lighted fools," such as he, "the way to dusty death," a confession obviously wrung from a mind imbued with the futility of murder as a means of advancement.

It has been insisted upon with what cannot be otherwise regarded than as a thoughtless—not to say unjust—iteration, that the elaborate, and certainly admirable, manner in which the play is mounted overweighs the play. This was not the case last Saturday; the scenery was an excellent subsidiary, and nothing more, and played neither more nor less than the same part as did the picturesque dresses of the actors.

Here we are drawn aside to notice certain words which perhaps represent the feelings of that madding crowd whose support their author would seek. He says, indeed:—

Mr. Irving is one who has climbed to honours without money or influence, and now holds the first place on the English stage by right of conquest.

But he gracefully adds:—

Genius has not lifted him up—for genius is best described as "a something"; and, though one does occasionally feel the something about Mr. Irving, he himself never gets hold of it.

Surely the critic might for once have forgotten himself; but it is not given to all of us to do this. He goes on:—

Mr. Irving fails as Macbeth because he is still Mr. Irving; he succeeds as Matthias for the same reason. In melodrama all his eccentricities of movement, voice, and gesture are an attraction; mannerisms, so long as they are strange, helping to individualize a character that is unnatural in conception. . . . But this sorry Macbeth is a grotesque coward who rushes about his house quaking, his wife after him as if to deprive him of his latch-key. This is a Macbeth that could not have terrified his grandmother. Miss Terry's Lady Macbeth is equally un-Shakespearean, though for quite different reasons.

All that need be said of this sound and fury is that it is of a sort of "nothing" one might expect from one who believes, on his own showing, that Sydney Smith and Charles Lamb were one and the same person. And so we leave him.

It was pleasant to be told by Mr. Irving that his season had been in every way satisfactory; and that Macbeth is to be resumed after the representation of The Dead Heart. This announcement had been anticipated; because it is obvious that not one or two visits to such a play as Macbeth suffice to make us acquainted with all that the chief players are capable of putting into it, or even the most attentive listeners are equal to carrying away; but that many visits are needed to give a complete grasp of what cannot be called otherwise than a unique work of formative art.

MR. ROUSSOFF'S VIEWS IN CAIRO.

ALTHOUGH the destructions and "restorations" of the last few years have transformed some of the most charming scenes in the City of Victory, there is still a great deal that is picturesque, especially to the eye of an unaccustomed visitor. If you have been much in the East without having visited Cairo, it comes upon you as a surprise. After a time, no doubt, you get used to the brilliant light, the dark shade, the gorgeous colours, the architectural beauty and the half ruinous, wholly picturesque, aspect of many of the older streets. True, after your first impressions are over, you may have time to think of the unwholesomeness of some of these nooks and corners, and to recognize the pungency of some of the odours you encounter. But Cairo remains the most beautiful of Oriental cities, and the one city in Egypt which contains buildings of first-rate importance. Mr. Roussoff, in the twenty water-colour pictures exhibited at the Gallery of the Fine Art Society, has evidently endeavoured, and in some cases very successfully, to grasp the essential features of the place, especially those which appeal most impressively to the artistic faculty. Some of the drawings are very highly finished, others are slighter. No. 18 and No. 19 are evidently careful studies for No. 14, which unites the best qualities of both. They all three represent, what is often seen in the native quarters of Cairo, a street decorated—or at least hung—with gaudy flags in celebration of a wedding or some such family festivity. No. 12 is a careful study of a narrow lane of old houses with the carved wooden lattices now so rapidly disappearing in favour of Venetian blinds. The figures in this and in No. 3 are particularly good. The last apparently represents the entrance to the mosque of Ibrahim Agha; but the names in the brief Catalogue are misleading and useless. No. 9 appears to represent a corner in the beautiful but ruinous "House of the Mufti," so well known and dear to artists. The figures—a woman arranging bunches of roses, and a little child—are particularly pleasing; but Mr. Roussoff complains, in a prefatory note, of the great difficulty he experienced in obtaining native models. No. 5 is a fine view of the famous Darb al Vizier, and No. 7 shows the street by the Tunis Bazaar, already well known by Lewis's numerous sketches. No. 20 is entitled "The Hour of Prayer," and shows the interior of a mosque, with a man in an attitude of prayer; but surely his prayer-carpet is not in the right place. One of the most charming of the sketches is a noontide view looking across the old burial-ground south of the city, towards the Nile and the Pyramids. Mr. Roussoff has very well caught in this drawing a look which must be very familiar to all Egyptian travellers—the obliteration of colour by the strength of the mid-day light. It is a peculiar effect, never, of course, seen here, and Mr. Roussoff has not failed to grasp it. This view exemplifies one of his complaints in the prefatory note already mentioned. "The dust," he says, "is a plague, the intensity of which is seldom met with in Europe; not only does it blind one and destroy the purity of one's palette, but it often ruins a drawing." His other enemy was the wind, which in Northern Egypt is often very high in winter. On the whole, however, we cannot but congratulate Mr. Roussoff on the way in which he has caught the colour and tone of the older quarters of Cairo.

THE REVENUE RETURNS.

THE Revenue Returns for the first quarter of the financial year are satisfactory. They show an increase over the corresponding quarter of last year of a little over 86,000*l.* This is not a very large increase, it may be thought; but when it is borne in mind that the Chancellor of the Exchequer estimated for the whole year a falling off of over 2½ millions, it will be seen that any increase at all, however slight, in the first three months is an extremely favourable circumstance. It proves that, as we observed at the time, the Estimates were exceedingly cautious, and they give ground to believe that the results of the year will be far better than the Chancellor of the Exchequer ventured to anticipate. Of course it is too soon yet to forecast the results of the year, for much may happen between now and the end of March to disappoint the best-laid calculations. But, assuming that there is no outbreak of war and no financial disaster, there are reasonable grounds for expecting that future quarters will not be less satisfactory than that just ended. And if we turn now to the separate items of receipt, our hopes will certainly not be lessened. Taking first the more unfavourable items, we find a decrease of not less than 320,000*l.* in Property and Income-tax. This is somewhat more than twice the falling off anticipated in the Budget for the whole year; but it is to be recollected that the Income-tax collected in the first quarter largely consists of arrears standing over from the preceding year. Now in the first quarter of last year the arrears were collected at the rate of sevenpence in the pound, whereas now the arrears have been collected at the rate of sixpence in the pound. A diminution of a penny in the pound accounts, then, for a very large part of the falling off. It is probable, too, that the arrears standing over from the past year were smaller than usual, since it will be remembered that the whole of the receipts were surprisingly good for the past twelve months. The next largest falling off is in Customs, in which it amounts to as much as 94,000*l.* It will be in the recollection of our readers that, in his Budget speech, Mr. Goschen dwelt at considerable length upon the falling off that has continued for several years in the yield of the indirect taxes. The greatest decrease, no doubt, has been in spirituous liquors. But Mr. Goschen pointed out that in the non-intoxicating articles also there has been a falling off. The yield from coffee does not grow, and the productiveness of the tea and tobacco duties is also disappointing. In the latter two cases it would seem that the disappointment is not due to lesser purchasing power on the part of the people, but rather to the use of stronger kinds of tea and tobacco; so that a smaller quantity now goes as far as a considerably larger quantity formerly. It would seem to follow, then, that the falling off in the yield of customable articles is still going on; but, as we shall proceed to point out immediately, there are reasons to make us hesitate from coming too absolutely to this conclusion. In short, there are reasons to suggest that the present decline in the Customs revenue is due to accidental and temporary causes.

Although the readjustment of the Beer-tax was estimated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give an increased revenue of 300,000*l.* for the year, still he looked forward to a falling off in the total Excise revenue of very nearly 2½ millions for the whole twelve months. As a matter of fact, however, it has yielded for the quarter just ended 15,000*l.* more than in the corresponding quarter of last year. So far, therefore, the Chancellor of the Exchequer's pessimist anticipation has been happily falsified, and there is a slight increase in place of the very large decrease to which he looked forward. It is hardly possible that the increase in the Beer-tax can have proved so much more productive than he ventured to anticipate. The more likely explanation is that the falling off in the yield of the indirect taxes which Mr. Goschen expected to continue has been checked by the augmented spending power of the working classes due to the more ample employment and higher wages now prevailing. If this be so, then it would seem to follow, as we observed above, that the decline in the Customs revenue during the past three months is due to some purely accidental and temporary causes, and that, consequently, for the remainder of the year there will be a recovery and not a continued falling off. Again, while Mr. Goschen expected to get from the new Estate Duty of 1 per cent. upon estates of 10,000*l.* and upwards about 800,000*l.* per annum, he yet estimated an increase in stamps of no more than 310,000*l.* In other words, he thought that the old stamps duties had been accidentally swelled last year, and that in them there would be a falling off of nearly half a million. But so far there is an increase in stamps of 200,000*l.* This is just a quarter of what Mr. Goschen expected to get from the new Estate Duty. And it would appear, therefore, probable that the old duties have not been less productive than in the corresponding quarter of last year. It is true, no doubt, that speculation on the Stock Exchange has been less active since Easter than it had been for months previously, but still there has been a good deal of business going on, the registration of new Companies has been on a vast scale, and the improvement in trade is marked and general. There seem, therefore, good grounds for concluding that the old duties have been nearly, if not quite, as productive as they were twelve months ago, and that the new duty has yielded nearly as much as was expected. The Land-tax shows an increase of 15,000*l.*, interest on purchase money of Suez Canal shares over 13,000*l.*, and the miscellaneous revenue nearly 162,000*l.* These three items, however, afford no indication as to the future, and of course tell us nothing as to the condition of the country. It is extremely satisfactory, however, to find an increase of as much as 60,000*l.* in the Post Office, and 45,000*l.* in the Telegraph Service—making 105,000*l.* in the two. The increase in the Post Office is slightly under a quarter of the estimated increase for the whole year; and that in the Telegraph Service is slightly over. Taking the two together, the increase estimated for the year in the Budget was 400,000*l.*, and the actual increase for the quarter is, as we have just seen, 105,000*l.* It is to be recollected that the purchase of the submarine cables by the Governments of England, France, and Belgium, would probably add something to the telegraphic receipts quite irrespective of any improvement in the condition of the country. But still the handsome augmentation that has taken place is further proof, if any were needed, of the greater prosperity of the people at present.

We are not warranted in inferring as to the future from the results of a single three months. But we may venture to say, all the same, that the conditions are such as seem to justify us in expecting that the remainder of the year will be at least as satisfactory as the first quarter. The Budget Estimates were framed so cautiously that, unless some disaster happened, it was almost certain that they must be exceeded. For fully three years now trade has been improving, and it is better at present than it has been for a very long time past. Therefore, the average profits on which Income-tax is assessed must be higher this year than they were last year. If so, the Income-tax receipts proper of the year will be larger. In other words, future quarters will show increases over the corresponding periods of last year. Further, as trade is good, speculation likely to be active, and the number of new loans and Companies brought out considerable, stamps will tend to be more productive. Lastly, wages have been rising for more than a year, and they are still going up. The working classes being well employed and at higher wages, though happily they do not drink as much now as they did formerly, will yet consume more customable and excisable articles. Assuming, therefore, that peace is preserved, and that no accident causes a serious check to trade, we have reasonable grounds for anticipating favourable results for the remainder of the year. If so, Mr. Goschen will again have a large surplus to dispose of, which will permit him either to remit a tax, or while remitting taxation to continue those fiscal alterations which he has been introducing in his past Budgets. For the past two years his surpluses averaged 2½ millions. And as about 5 millions per annum is provided for redemption of debt out of taxation, the total Sinking Fund purchases for the two years amounted to about 15 millions, or at the rate of 7½ millions a year. Whether the surplus of the current year will be as large it would be rash as yet to predict. But it seems reasonable to anticipate that there will be a handsome surplus, and that consequently the redemption of debt this year will again be very considerable. In the meantime, since we have touched upon the question of redemption, we may add that since the 1st of April the redemption of funded debt has somewhat exceeded 6 millions. But against this sum 6 millions in Treasury bills and Exchequer bonds have been created. The redemption, therefore, is on account of the conversion; and it shows that holders of Consols who refused to convert last year have not offered for conversion more than was tendered on the 14th of May.

RECENT CONCERTS.

IT is but a few weeks since the Philharmonic Society produced a new Symphony by Dr. Hubert Parry, a work modestly described by its composer as "a little one," but which nevertheless achieved a remarkable success, and now we have again to record the production of a similar work from the pen of the same composer. Dr. Parry's Third Symphony, which was produced last month, was written some time ago; his "No. 4," which was performed for the first time at the Richter Concert last Monday, is one of his most recent compositions. The work was commissioned by Herr Richter after the Birmingham Festival of last year, but, though it was not actually written until the spring of the present year, every bar of it shows that the influences which produced Judith were still strong upon the composer when he conceived the Symphony. Throughout the work there is the same healthy vigour and freshness of spirit which were so noticeable a feature in the Oratorio, and there is also—particularly in the delightful third movement, an Allegretto scherzoso—the same happy reproduction of the old-world forms and graceful dance-rhythms of another age, just as in the great tenor air in Judith the composer showed that the set aria form, as used by Scarlatti and Handel, was still capable of producing its old effect. The Symphony consists of the usual four movements; the first and last are both styled Allegro energico; the second consists of a short Intermezzo, leading to an expressive and stately Lento espressivo, and the third is an Allegretto scherzoso, which, though not so called, practically is a Scherzo and Trio. The work is planned and executed on broader lines than its predecessor, and is, therefore, hardly likely to be so generally popular, but it is one which will always be heard by musicians with unalloyed pleasure, owing to its happy combination of scholarship and melody. It was received with every symptom of approval by an enthusiastic audience, which called the composer on the platform after the third movement and twice at the end of the work. Besides Dr. Parry's Symphony, the programme of Monday's concert contained another novelty in the shape of the first movement of a recently discovered Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra by Beethoven. This work was found at Prague, and attention was drawn to it by an article from the pen of Dr. Guido Adler, which appeared in the Vierteljahrsschrift für Musikwissenschaft, in which the learned author came to the conclusion that the Allegro was a genuine, but early, work of Beethoven, written (probably between the years 1788 and 1793) when he was strongly under the influence of Mozart. As to the latter there can be no doubt; it is apparent not only in the thematic material, but also in the whole treatment and style, both of the orchestration and the part for the solo instrument. The work may be by Beethoven, but it is of no more value as music than if it were by Neefe or some other of the contemporaries of his youth, and it was certainly not worth the trouble of producing in London, except as a curiosity. The solo part was played correctly but coldly by Mme. Stepanoff, but it is unfair to judge of her capabilities after only hearing her in so weak a composition. Fortunately for lovers of Beethoven, the same concert included one of his greatest and most enjoyable works, the Eighth Symphony, which it is all the more pleasant to hear owing to its being less often performed than it deserves. The remaining number of the programme was the closing scene from Wagner's Götterdämmerung, in which the part of Brunhilde was taken by Fräulein Fillunger. Of this performance it is impossible to speak with any pleasure. The orchestra was overpoweringly loud and coarse, and the vocalist—who did not seem at all too well acquainted with her part—was overpowered by the accompaniments and deficient in the fire which characterized her singing of the last scene from Die Walküre at a previous concert this season. Herr Richter knows better than any one how Wagner's music should be performed, and he cannot have been blind to the defects of this performance. If the general public is so uncritical that it applauds good and bad alike, some consideration for the few who are the steadiest supporters of these concerts should prevent such rough-and-ready performances from taking place.

The minor concerts of the past ten days have been as numerous as ever, but even more than usually miscellaneous in character. On the evening of the 26th a concert was given at Prince's Hall the proceeds of which were announced "to be devoted to the spreading of Theosophical Literature." The performances were eminently cosmopolitan, possibly in order that the different countries from which the performers came might claim a share in the benefits conferred by Theosophy and the spread of its literature. The most novel features in the entertainment were the whistling of Colonels Cleather and Stuart and the Indian songs contributed by a Mr. Banerjee, one of which rejoiced in the pleasing title of "Juboco, Juboti, Jago." Probably there was much esoteric meaning in the performances, and they should have been judged from a Theosophical point of view; from any other they were by no means remarkable.

On Saturday afternoon Herr Max Heinrich gave the first of two morning concerts at Prince's Hall, assisted by Miss Lena Little and Herren Schönberger and Hess. The latter gave an extremely good performance of Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata, and Miss Little sang songs by Schumann, Grieg, and Bizet, besides taking part with Herr Heinrich in the two charming duets by Mr. A. G. Thomas, which were introduced by the same singers in the spring. The concert-giver sang four songs by Hugo Brückler, a young Dresden composer of extraordinary promise, who died at the early age of twenty-six some years ago. The songs selected by Herr Heinrich last Saturday are from the composer's "Op. 2," a set of the "Lieder des jungen Werner," from Scheffel's popular Trompeter von Säckingen. They are characterized by wonderful vigour and much originality, and are admirably suited to Herr Heinrich's declamatory style. On the same afternoon as Herr Heinrich's Recital, that excellent artist, Mlle. Gabrielle Vaillant, in conjunction with Miss Adela Vernon, gave a matinée musicale at Portman Rooms. Mlle. Vaillant played Leclair's Sonata, "Le Tombeau," and a Minuet and Reel by Gade, besides leading Beethoven's String Quartet, Op. 18, No. 6. Miss Vernon sang a graceful song, "Si vous n'avez rien à me dire," by Mr. H. Festing Jones, and (in response to an encore) another by the same composer. The rest of the programme consisted of songs and concerted pieces in which Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Bernard Lane, and Herr Ragnar Grevillius took part. The latter gentleman is a newcomer from Sweden, possessing a fine baritone voice. He sang the scena from Tannhäuser, "O du mein holder Abendstern," and songs by Nessler and Schumann, with some dramatic vigour. On Monday afternoon Mons. Tivadar Nachéz and Herr Arthur Friedheim, the latter of whom was announced as "the celebrated Russian Pianist," gave a Violin and Pianoforte Recital at Prince's Hall. Both artists took part in the Kreutzer Sonata, but the performance was unsatisfactory. M. Nachéz, good as he is in certain styles, is not at home in classical music which demands great interpretative power, and Herr Friedheim is equally incapable of doing justice to Beethoven. The pianist's principal solo was Liszt's hideous Sonata in B minor. To play such a work by heart is alone a tour de force, and on this occasion it was rendered still harder to perform, owing to the noise made by a piano-organ in the adjacent street. But Herr Friedheim stuck to his work manfully, and brought it to a successful and welcome conclusion. He is evidently an able and brilliant player; but a tendency to indulge in mere noise should be restrained, as it is a great blot upon what would otherwise be more than ordinarily good performances. Fräulein Hermine Spies gave a second Vocal Recital to an enthusiastic, if not very large, audience at St. James's Hall on Tuesday afternoon. Her selection of songs was more than usually interesting, as it comprised two by Schubert ("Wer sich der Einsamkeit" and "Der Einsame") which are among the neglected treasures of the prolific composer, a long selection from Schumann's Dichterliebe, a pretty Serenade by Max Bruch, three of Brahms's best songs, Franz's "Vöglein, wohin so schnell," and Massenet's "Ouvre tes yeux." Pianoforte solos were also contributed by Miss Agnes Zimmermann, who introduced a graceful Mazurka of her own composition, besides playing a pianoforte arrangement of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E minor for Organ, an Allegro by Scarlatti, and Liszt's Transcription of one of Paganini's Caprices. The accompaniments were played in a somewhat unsympathetic manner by Herr Frantzen. Fräulein Spies was most successful in the Schumann selection and in the songs by Brahms; but her singing of Massenet's song showed that, in a different school, her intelligence is so great that she can achieve success. Miss von Brunn, a Russian soprano, gave a concert at Messrs. Collard's on Wednesday afternoon, assisted by Miss Curran, Miss Dora Bright, Herr Oscar Niemann, and Herr H. Wessely. Miss von Brunn has a bright and pleasant voice, and has evidently been excellently taught. Her singing of songs by Meyer-Helmund, Hildach, and Henschel had considerable charm, and her delivery of an air from Handel's Rodelinda was also good, though Brahms's "Meine Liebe ist grün" demands more dramatic power than she is possessed of. Miss Dora Bright gave a vigorous performance of Liszt's Second Rhapsodie Hongroise, but she is apt to forget that noise and tone are not synonymous. The rest of the concert does not call for remark. On the same afternoon another new pianist gave a recital at Steinway Hall. Herr Johannes Schubert—who comes from Dresden—played Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 57; two compositions of his own; St. Saëns's Transcription of the Ballet Music from Alceste; a Prelude, Study, Nocturne, and Ballade by Chopin; and Schumann's "Carnaval." Herr Schubert is a conscientious and correct performer, but his style is painfully hard and unsympathetic. Of his two compositions, the first, a Set of Variations on an original Theme, is well written and scholarly, but the second, a Romanze, shows the influence of Schumann to a marked degree.

THE ART OF RECITATION.

MR. CLIFFORD HARRISON'S first article in the current number of Murray's Magazine, on the subject of "Recitation as an Art," contains much that is excellent and, moreover, thoroughly practical. Hitherto this important branch of histrionic art has been unhappily confounded with that of acting, from which it is, or ought to be, as Mr. Harrison very properly asserts, considered "quite distinct." "Any art that claims the dignity to be so called," he aptly says, "must be able to show that it has a separate existence, an entity apart from the parent art. It must not be an appendage." This is so true of recitation that the remark deserves to attract and rivet the attention of those who propose to study it either as a profession or merely as an accomplishment, for the mistake of confounding it with acting is possibly the principal reason why we have so few really good "readers" or reciters. The "reader," as he used to be called, has a good deal more to contend against than the actor. He is crippled from the start by his costume, his absence of "make-up," and, above all, by the fact that his gestures, even when rendering the most dramatic speeches, must be more or less conventional. He may be as dramatic, vocally, as he pleases, but he must never be theatrical either in action or facial expression. To acquire the power of interesting an audience without the aids of costume or gesture is one of the most difficult imaginable, and hence the fact that the majority of "readers" and "reciters" are constantly in danger of being either monotonous or ridiculous. Confounding the art of recitation with that of acting, they make no particular study of it as an individual art, hence their frequent failures to produce the effect they wish. Mr. Harrison is perfectly right when he advises reciters to keep as quiet as possible, but there is really nothing so difficult as to stand still for any length of time on a platform whilst reciting possibly something which, by the very nature of its subject, almost compels one to move about and gesticulate.

As a people the English are not devoid of dramatic talent, but are so essentially self-conscious that when they attempt to give expression to their emotions they usually allow themselves either to be carried away by their feelings to the verge of exaggeration and hence expose themselves to the easily-provoked sarcasm and laughter of their fellows, or else fall into the opposite extreme and their recitation "comes tardy off." As a rule we are athletically graceful, the result doubtless of physical training, but this is a grace best seen in the field or on the river; and in the drawing-room the average English man or woman, when compared with people of the Latin races, is awkward and repressed. Notwithstanding this, however, there is possibly no other nation which possesses so many folks eager to do something to amuse others, and the amateur "reciter" has of late become one of our greatest social evils. Those rather dreary functions "At Homes" are the happy hunting-grounds of this species of prig, and it is almost impossible to escape hearing the fearful announcement made by the hostess that "Mr. or Miss So-and-so will now be so kind as to recite for us," and the popular reciter, as Mr. Harrison pithily observes, gleefully steps forward to "go mad in a corner and give a death scene in an easy chair in a way that adds a new terror to society and a new danger to domestic furniture." To these amateurs we earnestly recommend a serious and attentive perusal of Mr. Clifford Harrison's article.

At the same time there are points in it with which we do not quite agree. The earlier pages are devoted to a rather poetical account of the value of rhythm, which contains, indeed, much that is excellent; but we cannot fully endorse the assertion that elocution in England "floats about somewhat homelessly on the outskirts of education." It is quite true that in our schools and universities this most important item of education to a Parliamentary people is much more neglected than it is in America for instance, where what our Transatlantic cousins are pleased to call "oratory" is studied with much assiduity and with the satisfactory result that at the Washington Capitol you will frequently hear speeches by "distinguished statesmen and senators" which are not only models of eloquence, but which are delivered with an evident knowledge of elocution and a grace of diction, wholly unknown, unfortunately, at Westminster. But we possess many admirable works on elocution which deserve to be considered authoritative, although written in the last half of the eighteenth century, or in the earlier years of the present, when public readings were exceedingly popular in a country in which people were still so greatly prejudiced against the stage. The erudite works of John Thelwall might be reprinted with advantage, notably some of his published letters, which are full of interesting and valuable hints as to the proper management of the voice. In 1810 Richard Roe published a work on The Elements of English Metre, which every elocutionist ought to read; and then we have that capital book by B. H. Smart—the last edition of which appeared in 1828—the Theory of Elocution, which should be the vade mecum of every actor and reciter. Notwithstanding its rather obsolete form of expression and quaint affectation, it is an almost infallible guide, based on the Italian and French schools, with much original matter thrown in by the author, who had evidently studied his subject profoundly.

The reciter, like the actor, and even more so, has to learn how to manage his voice, how to render it mellow and powerful, how to modulate it, and, above all, how and when to take breath without interrupting a sentence. In point of fact, he ought to know something of singing according to the old Italian method. Then he should, as Mr. Smart observes, "know how to pronounce faultlessly, but without pedantry, our language, and show in his reading, above all of Shakspeare and our classics, a scholarly and sincere understanding of the true significance of the authors."

With regard to gesture, we agree with Mr. Harrison that the less the reciter or reader moves about the better; but, although he tells an amusing story of how he once heard M. Delaunay recite in a drawing-room, and how that eminent actor gradually moved in the excitement of his story halfway across the room, we cannot forbear observing that, contrary to received opinion in this country, exaggeration of gesture and movement is much more frequent with us than with either French or Italian actors and reciters. Being, as we have elsewhere said, essentially self-conscious, the great art of "repose," so perfectly understood and taught at the Théâtre Français, is very little practised even by our best actors. Gustavo Modena, probably the most perfect tragic actor Italy has produced, and certainly one of the greatest of reciters, usually read or recited, seated in an arm-chair, and scarcely, if ever, even raised his hand or arm. Everything was done by the voice, and by the earnest and convincing expression of the face and eyes. Nothing can be imagined more wonderful than Modena's reading of certain scenes from Alfieri's Saul. Every part was individualised, and although the famous curse upon the recalcitrant priests was pronounced with entrancing power, Signor Modena never lifted his hands from the elbows of his chair, but merely slightly rose and leaned forward, whilst his thundering voice seemed to peal through the theatre with an earnest power so appalling that its effect can never be forgotten by those who heard him, nor can the final terrific but suppressed "A morte, assai lenta," with which the vindictive old King orders the insubordinate priests to be put to a slow and lingering death. Mme. Ristori, too, is very economical of gesture when reading, not acting; and some years ago, when she read the fine passages in the Inferno which describe the unhappy loves of Paolo and Francesca, although the impression she produced was extraordinary, only once did she lift her hand, at the words in which the poet tells us that the effect of the pathetic story was such upon him that he fell exhausted by it, like a dead body. We might, in conclusion, make a few remarks on the proper selection of subjects for recitation, but possibly Mr. Harrison will deal with this important matter in his next paper. At any rate, we hope he will do so, and that he will, moreover, also say something concerning the length of the pieces "reciters" should choose for the exhibition of their talents. People seem to have scarcely an idea of the value of time in recitation, or to understand that what seems to them when reading it over to themselves to be quite a short piece, when read to a general audience is apt to prove a perfect nuisance, on account of its apparently inordinate length.

Qual corpo morto in terra caddi,

THE SECRÉTAN SALE.

IT may fairly be said that no art-sale of our time has approached in interest the dispersion of the Secrétan pictures which took place in Paris last Monday and Tuesday. The circumstances under which this collection had been formed were the reverse of romantic. M. Secrétan rose on the wave of the success of the Copper Syndicate, and, when that wave collapsed, he fell with it. Meanwhile, during the brief period of his prosperity, and taking advantage of excellent professional advice, he bought rapidly and boldly. His taste lay in certain restricted channels; he had a special passion for the great Romanticist painters of the last generation, and for Meissonier. He liked Dutch masters, and surrounded himself with masterpieces from Amsterdam and the Hague. With these exceptions his pictures were few and of no special interest; but his Millets and his Meissoniers, his Rousseaus and his Troyons, were worth a king's ransom. As these are now at the height of fashion in France and America, it was to be expected that connoisseurs would contemplate the dispersion of so many admirable examples of the school with emotion. But nothing had prepared us for the passionate zeal of the collectors, nor for the almost delirious excitement which attended this unique and extraordinary sale.

From the telegrams in the English papers it is not to be gathered that the lots were not sold on the first day in the order in which they stood in the Catalogue. But, as a matter of fact, the fashionable crowd which collected in the handsome galleries of the Rue de la Rochefoucauld were not immediately brought face to face with the superb Bonington, "La Plage," which heads the list. There was even a little disappointment at first at the moderate prices fetched by some drawings of Delacroix, of Eugène Lami, and of Meissonier. But the moral temperature soon rose; and when a highly-finished sepia study by the last-named master, "Les Joueurs d'échecs," fetched nearly 1,000*l.*, Tout Paris felt that it was not doomed to be disappointed. Millet's pastels, "Paysan faisant boire deux Vaches" and "La Bergère," each passed the price of 1,000*l.*, and the preliminary canter of the sale closed by the amazing figure of 28,500 francs being given for a water-colour drawing by Decamps, "Jésus parmi les Docteurs," which had been valued at half that sum. The fine madness which rightly should affect a bidder's brain was now evidently at work; and, after the sale of some Fromentins and a Géricault, the numbers were taken in the order of the Catalogue.

M. Secrétan possessed four exquisite examples of Corot. Of these the "Biblis," representing the body of the nymph lying in shadow at the head of a luminous woodland glade, has the special interest of being Corot's last finished picture. It fetched 84,000 francs; more beautiful, perhaps, and much larger, "Le Matin," a maiden intercepting three flushed amorini as they glide up the air of a woodland path at daybreak, sold for 56,000. These prices are high, perhaps; they are certainly not excessive. But Decamps and Delacroix reached figures which no one had for a moment anticipated. The "Frondeurs" of the former, a slim young negro slinging a stone at an owl, went up to 92,000 francs; and his "Singes Experts," which belongs to a class of humour no longer in fashion, rose to the unexampled price, for such a picture, of 70,000. Isabey reached heights of value which he had never known before, and his stately "Mariage dans l'Eglise de Delft," painted in 1847, was knocked down after an eager competition for the enormous sum of 75,000 francs. But the excitement rose still higher when the auctioneer began to deal with the Meissoniers, of which M. Secrétan had possessed himself of so many that a glut of the market in this particular article was seriously apprehended. They did well; but not, we think, so extraordinarily well as some of our contemporaries seem to think. The great "Cuirassiers" of 1878 passed, it is true, into the possession of the Duc d'Aumale in exchange for no less than 190,000 francs; but some of the famous single figures of thirty years ago, the Smokers in Rose-colour and Readers in Red or in White, fetched high, but not exceptionally high, figures. There was a murmur of emotion, however, when the tiny "Vin du Curé" and the still more minute "Récit du Siège de Berg-op-Zoom," which last might really be mistaken for a round counter in the game of lots, were knocked down respectively for 90,000 and for 20,000 francs. The one surprise of the sale, on the other side, was the failure of the great Fortuny, the "Fantasia Arabe," to attract the least attention. For some reason or another, nobody wanted this picture, and it was sold at a very great loss.

It is said, however, that three-quarters of the audience which thronged the gallery of the Rue de la Rochefoucauld had manifestly come to witness the fate of the most famous of all M. Secrétan's pictures, the "Angelus" of Millet. Until this was brought forward all the persons had been seated; but, when the men carried it to the desk, the whole audience rose and remained standing. The story of the bidding for this great work will always be one of the most curious in the incidental art-history of our time. The quotation began, it may be said, at 300,000 francs, and there then set in a serious rivalry between two American bidders, the representatives of the Corcoran Gallery and of the American Artistic Association, and M. Antonin Proust, on behalf of the Louvre. As the bidding leaped up, and as each fresh hundred thousand francs was reached, applause broke out, and the company, pale with excitement, pressed closer and closer around the auctioneer. How at the sum of 502,000 francs the "Angelus" was knocked down to M. Proust, how the men tossed their hats up to the ceiling and ladies sobbed with pleasure, how the calm Yankee stepped in "with his cold music" and explained that he had made a higher bid, how M. Proust nearly fainted and was fanned by enthusiastic ladies; how the duel began again, until M. Proust had reached the figure of 553,000 francs; how a silence ensued, in which Tout Paris heard the beating of its own heart; how the hammer fell at last, and the "Angelus" was the property of France in perpetuity; all this is now a part of history, and far from being the least amusing of its pages. The excitement was so enormous that the vast prices fetched directly afterwards by the Rousseaus and the Troyons hardly affected public feeling. But one feature of the sale will not, in the long run, escape the critics. In the general turmoil it was hardly noticed that one of the most beautiful of modern pictures, the "Remise de Chevreuils," the masterpiece of Courbet, was secured for the Louvre. The four roe-deer will stand there for ever, with their lovely startled mien, by the limpid stream that gushes from their grey limestone cliffs.

The second day's sale, that of the Old Masters in M. Secrétan's collection, was not quite so interesting. A very fine Vandyck, the portrait of "Anne Cavendish, Lady Rich," fetched nearly 3,000*l*. A rather conventional Greuze, "La Prière," the usual peach-blossom little girl, with her hands clasped, went up to 17,600 francs. Among the ancient pictures were three superb examples of Frans Hals, the portrait of the smiling and moustachioed founder of Batavia, "Van de Broecke," which sold for 110,000 francs; and two small oval portraits of Scriverius and his wife, in the painter's most exquisite manner, examples which, we are inclined to think, must have been among the finest gems in M. Secrétan's casket. These last went at the very moderate figure of 90,000 francs. The Americans, who had been rather unlucky among the modern pictures, enjoyed better luck with the Old Masters. They carried off the "Intérieur Hollandais" of Pieter de Hooghe, but they had to pay 11,000*l*. for it; it is a lovely specimen of the master, but not finer than that in the National Gallery, for which an infinitely smaller sum was paid a few years ago. Two admirable Vandermeers—and this is a master we can speak less philosophically about in connexion with our Gallery—were the "Billet-Doux," which went for 62,000 francs, and the "Dame et Servante," sold for 75,000. A famous Rubens, the "David and Abigail," goes to New York in return for no less than 120,000 francs.

The pictures are now dispersed; but they have left behind them, for the delectation of connoisseurs, a precious memento in the shape of the splendid illustrated Catalogue (Catalogue of the Celebrated Collection of Paintings by Modern and Old Masters formed by M.E. Secrétan. Paris: Boussod, Valadon, & Co.) just published in two superb folio volumes. This is really the auctioneer's catalogue of the sale in an apotheosis, and contains, we are sorry to say, neither preface nor index, nor even a list of plates. But this does not prevent it from being a delightful possession. It is illustrated by an absolute profusion of full-page Goupilgravures made from the original pictures, and it forms a gallery in itself. The Meissoniers, in particular, of which no less than eighteen are reproduced, lend themselves extremely well to this process. We obtain by its means the curious focussed look in which M. Meissonier so peculiarly excels. The little circle of "Le Récit," given the size of nature, recalls every touch of the painter's brush, and we miss nothing but the colour. Almost more extraordinary is "Le Liseur Blanc," which might really at first sight be taken for a finished sepia sketch from the master's own hand. The reproductions of such mannered colourists as Théodore Rousseau and Troyon, of course, are less completely satisfactory, because we miss the splendid richness and harmony of tones. Yet such a print as the "Pâturage Normand" in this volume is a charming thing to possess. The wonderful "Angelus," with its simple and touching figures bathed in the living atmosphere that floods that incomparable canvas, will be gazed at in this volume by many who will wonder why the sum of 20,000*l*. should have been paid for it, far more money, by the way, than the laborious painter saved after all the industry of a lifetime. Another Millet, the water-colour of the "Paysan," poor, starved scarecrow that he is, is reproduced in the most extraordinary way by this Goupil process, which is undoubtedly able to give the texture of a drawing better than of an oil-painting. Yet, as an example of what can be done in this latter kind, nothing can be more successful than the blue print of Fromentin's "Chasse au Faucon." The two volumes will be "a joy for ever" to amateurs and students of modern French art.

REVIEWS.

SHAKSPEARE'S FUNERAL.*

THE exceedingly silly people who object to the reprinting of periodical papers in toto will have their criticism ready made against Sir Edward Hamley (as, be it noted in passing, they would have had against the Spectator, the Rambler, the Essays of Elia, Hazlitt's books almost without exception, and the works of Wilson, De Quincey, Macaulay, and Sainte-Beuve): the not much less silly people who say that such papers may not be reprinted unless they have some common end or aim will find this volume dreadfully desultory. A third party, who perhaps are not silly, and who certainly are ready to welcome a good book whenever they find it, and whatever its genesis may be, will discover in the book a very agreeable pot-pourri, not pourri at all in one sense, and will be glad that it contains work evidently of very different dates and intentions. Sir Edward has, indeed, not complied (it can hardly be a reproach to him since he probably did not know it) with a little punctilio of ours which we think not "an antic, Merely pedantic." When reviews and magazine articles of different dates are reprinted, we think that the date and provenance of each should be noted in the contents or elsewhere. It cannot do the writer any harm, and it may do the reader some good. Meanwhile, by the exercise of our natural toy of intelligence we discern that these papers must have been spread over at least thirty years, and perhaps a longer time as far as their origin goes. The subjects are agreeably mixed and the execution is agreeably even.

The longest and most ambitious paper, "Shakspeare's Funeral," is of a perilous kind—of a kind from which no adventurer has perhaps extracted himself absolutely triumphant, but in which certainly few have done better than Sir Edward. Drayton and young Raleigh (the victim of the luckless Guiana expedition) visit Stratford in order to see Shakspeare (a part of the scenario which shows that General Hamley justly neglects the ridiculous gossip about Drayton having taken part in a tavern orgie—Drayton, whose objections to taverns are among the few things personally known of him—which sent Shakspeare to his grave). They find him dead; and the humour of it, as the Corporal would say, is the introduction of various inhabitants or neighbours of the town on the Avon, who have obviously served as originals for the greatest portrait-gallery of this or any other probable world. All this part is well done; and young Raleigh, if not invariably Elizabethan, is also natural. To find fault—and what worse compliment can a critic pay than not finding fault?—we are not so well satisfied with Drayton. Sir Edward has made him, as he was, a gentleman, a true lover of Shakspeare, and a man of the world; but he has infused a touch of "talking book" in him which we do not find even in the voluminous author of the Polyolbion and the Barons' Wars, still less in him of Nymphidia and the sonnets to Idea and the immortal "Agincourt." But there it is—the whole secret of the charm of the Elizabethans is to be found in the jealousy which their lovers entertain of each other.

In "Mr. Dusky's Opinions on Art" we go back a good many years—over thirty, in fact—and find an excellent specimen of the "Blackwood article" of old time—let us say rather of middle time—such as the great originals themselves (Wilson and Lockhart had not been dead a lustrum) would not have disdained. It is a little unfair to Mr. Ruskin, of course—a downright étreintement of this kind has the privilege of being unfair. But the parody of the ingenious topsyturfications by which the "Graduate of Oxford" used to find reason for his fancies is very clever, very diverting, and quite harmless on any just scale of estimating literary harm. We must really quote some of it:—

* Shakspeare's Funeral; and other Papers. By Sir Edward Hamley. London and Edinburgh: Blackwood. 1889.

A similar purity of thought distinguishes the "Susannah and the Elders," by the same artist, and quite marks a new epoch in art. The Elders, grave men of most reverend appearance, approach the beautiful woman in her bath, evidently for the purpose of studying the flowing outline of her form and the delicate articulations of her joints (the ankles are especially well drawn). Lovers of exalted art, they come, with words of courteous greeting on their lips, to study in leisure and privacy the combinations of lines and gradations of flesh-colour with which Nature in her most perfect efforts delights to exercise the reasoning powers of man; while the matron, "clothed on in chastity," calmly awaits their coming. The "Satyrs and Nymphs Dancing," by the same hand, is equally removed from the gross impurity which the subject would have derived from the licentious Poussin, and the hideous immorality of a modern quadrille. "Potiphar's Wife" is another illustrious instance of the power of Mr. D. Corum to give new life to old subjects. The wife of the great Egyptian noble holds in her hand a roll of papyrus covered with specimens of early Egyptian art, to which she seeks to direct Joseph's attention (by the by, the style of these drawings, especially the man in profile with two eyes, belongs to the time of the later Pharaohs, and not to the pre-Mosaic period); but without success, for the youth, in whose countenance the struggle between curiosity and bashfulness is exhibited in a very remarkable manner, turns resolutely away from his kind instructress. Altogether the treatment of the whole of these works reminds me strongly of the manner of Fra Puritano.

If this be not good parody, the devil is in it.

Still better, because there is no injustice at all, and because of the writer's expert knowledge, is the succeeding review of the third volume of Les Misérables. The remarks on the general attitude of Frenchmen, and of M. Thiers in particular, towards Waterloo are capital; and, if there be admirers of Hugo who have humour (we can answer for some, and perhaps there are more), they certainly will not object to the fun made of the weakest points of the poet's manner when he did not write in poetry. When he did there is no more to be said. "Je dis que c'est absurde, et je dis qu'on doit l'adorer" is all one can say there. But in prose it is absurd and does not demand adoration. Sir Edward's descriptions of the attitude of the master on the field of Waterloo, of his goodness in admitting that the English troops behaved admirably, of his touches (hors ligne) of masterly description, of his absolute absurdity as a critic of tactics, of the gooseberry bushes at Hougomont, of the immortal hollow road, of the martyrdom of the first boxer of England by a little French drummer, and of all the other inconceivabilities of that memorable example of genius sibi permissus, without humour or common sense to guide it, are as good as they can be. The thing is not too long, it is not too sarcastic, it is grave and polite, it is gay and destructive. "Dear sir, ask us again!" as Mr. Thackeray said to his host, is the remark wherewith one closes a paper which any critic might be or have been glad to write, and which is specially remarkable for its avoidance of what was its most likely danger. Sir Edward shows his military knowledge just enough to enforce his literary skill, and no more; the average military writer would have bored us with it till we said, "At any rate, Victor Hugo is a man of genius, and you—are not."

With the following paper, "False Coin in Poetry," we get into more dubious matter. Some persons have regretted the disuse of the old "slashing" critique; but the fault of the slashing critique could hardly be better shown than in this example, which is certainly by an eminent hand. Sir Edward's second sentence runs thus:—"The illusion created by the great novels of Scott, which we maintain to be the best ever written [Hear! hear!], brightened to the eyes of faithful readers the dreary pages of St. Roman's Well, The Monastery, Peperil, and Kenilworth." The dreary pages wherein appear Meg Dods and Captain McTurk, Sir Piercie Shafton and Abbot Boniface, Wayland Smith and Mike Lam-bourne? There is something weird, something wanting here; and it strikes the keynote of much of the paper. We are inclined to think that most critics who are past masters of the art will agree with us that a deliberate tissue of fault-finding usually leads even the best craftsman to extravagance. Certainly this piece of Sir Edward's will give plenty of comment for such a text. To say of the last line of Wordsworth's famous "Bridge" sonnet,

And all that mighty heart is lying still, that "it would imply that part only of a heart might be still or in motion" is mere hypercriticism. "All," whether in strictness or not, is in effect merely an intensive, emphasizing the size, the "mightiness" of the heart, and the completeness of the stillness, and it is only by seeking knots in a reed that Sir Edward's criticism can be made out. His strictures on "Laodamia" we pass, for we have always thought it a greatly-overrated poem, and most of the other Wordsworthian blots are blots undoubted. But, little disposed as we are to overrate Byron, there is no doubt that the general verdict on "Roll on," for all the facility with which it may be picked to pieces, is a pretty just verdict. "The dismal old ballads which some people think they admire," is another sentence which may be put away with the first we have quoted. When a man is tempted to write like that he should always (Sir Edward will excuse us) repeat say, thirty times over, the following words, "Lycidas—the rhymes harsh and the numbers unpleasing"—ask himself if he be more sure of his case and faculty than Johnson, and then if he be wise, cohorresce and evade.

"The Slaughters in the Soudan" is an excellent article of its kind, with every line of which we agree; but its subject is perhaps a little too contentious to suit the rest of the volume. In the longer papers on "The Life of Lord Lytton" and "The Life of George Eliot" Sir Edward has, we think, done very well a peculiarly difficult task, the survey of the life and work of writers whom he personally knew, and with whom he was connected in literary work, in a manner destitute alike of "log-rolling" and of malice. "Mr. Fechter's Othello" is interesting, and so in a different way is "Mr. Hayward and his Letters," though we should not have been sorry if Sir Edward had been less Fontenelle-like in his attitude towards a vastly overrated writer and a not very amiable person. But the article in which we take the greatest pleasure after that on Les Misérables, is the article on "The Pictures of Richard Doyle"—those odd, unclassified, delightful féeries which used to puzzle some beholders and afford endless joy to others in the little room of the Grosvenor Gallery in its earliest days. No paper in the book, not even that already coupled with it, shows the author's faculty of grave irony, this time imbued with a wholly friendly spirit, so well as this. Sir Edward makes himself the historian, the librettist, so to speak, of Doyle's phantasmagoria, in the most obliging and sympathetic way, a way which would surely have delighted the artist. We rejoice as we read his Napieresque descriptions of the battles of the elves with the crows, of their cavalcades—large fairies on large flitter mice—with bats for chargers—of that charming picture (very fresh in our own minds, though it is years since we have seen it) of the maids of honour of Queen Titania combing the beards of solemn goats on impossible hill sides, of Doyle's studies of dragons. Here, again, we must quote a passage:—

One of the most curious and unexpected facts of dragon-life which our artist has brought to light is that respecting the young brood. Having supposed them to be rare animals, we were surprised to find them existing in flocks, hatched apparently from eggs, and used as a kind of farm-stock. Several representations show us witches driving young dragons to market. Who the purchasers can be of these strange articles of commerce we cannot divine—perhaps they are bought up by dealers who, after breaking them to harness or saddle, sell them to rich fairies. In one case the sorceress, young and not ungraceful, and clad in diaphanous drapery, is descending a mountain-side in misty moonlight; in another, an old witch, of the kind that Macbeth knew of, is driving with outstretched broom her singular poultry along the shore of a lake, on the margin of which stands a ruined monastery. In all cases the character of the flock is much the same: though quite newly hatched—for they are no bigger than turkeys—there is plenty of latent truculence to be developed with maturity; they show the fire of the race glowing in eye and nostril, and are extremely troublesome to drive.

And with this we take leave of a very pleasant book showing a remarkable variety of interest as well as of accomplishment.

NOVELS AND STORIES.*

CLEOPATRA will prove for readers of She to be like revisiting past scenes of delight; not that Mr. Rider Haggard is a vain repeater of old achievements, but because the romantic elements that pervade the wild and wondrous tale of Kôr are scarcely less potent and impressive in the new romance. We are disposed rather to set Cleopatra above its predecessor, seeing that the theme is of far greater magnitude and complexity. Then, too, though we disclaim a parallel, the method and machinery are not dissimilar. In Cleopatra certain papyrus rolls replace the sherd writing of the older story; the transcriber of these is the narrator of the story in which he plays a dramatic part, and he, like the more modern adventurer, falls at times into prolixity and superfine conceits, and what is commonly called fine writing. Cleopatra shows freshness and daring in design. It is told, moreover, with skill and power striking enough to add to Mr. Haggard's reputation as a story-teller. In She the writer drew wholly on his remarkable resources in invention and fancy, and his only less remarkable gift of imagination. In Cleopatra he had to face, in portraying the career and times of the "enchanted queen," the old examples of poets and historians, not to mention the tradition of the elders, and possibly the fear of Egyptologists. We must admit at once that these considerations do not appear to have restrained the audacity and freedom of Mr. Haggard's treatment of an immortal theme. In depicting her whose person "beggared all description," Mr. Haggard has certainly not faltered, and in his rich and imposing portraiture he touches a higher distinction than any painstaking fidelity to external verities may yield. He is mindful of the "infinite variety" of Cleopatra, mindful, as an old writer has it, not merely of the incomparable beauty that charmed the senses of all men, but of the wit, the subtlety, the wisdom of the "Serpent of old Nile," that led their souls captive. Not ignoring altogether the popular conception of Shakspeare's "gipsy," Mr. Haggard is rightly not enslaved by it. His Cleopatra is both portent and prodigy. She is baleful as beautiful to Harmachis and the rest of the Egyptian conspirators who in the story plot the overthrow of the daughter of the Ptolemies.

* Cleopatra. By H. Rider Haggard. London: Longmans & Co. 1889.

The Wrong Box. By Robert Louis Stevenson and Lloyd Osbourne. London: Longmans & Co. 1889.

Margaret Maliphant. By Mrs. Comyns Carr. 3 vols. London: Blackwood & Co. 1889.

My Spanish Sailor. By Marshall Saunders. London: Ward & Downey. 1889.

Captain Kangaroo. By J. Evelyn. London: Remington & Co. 1889.

The Statuarts; or, Who Were to Blame? By Frances Marie Norton, the only sister of Charles J. Guiteau. London: George Redway. 1889.

But she is also a very woman, as Mr. Haggard, by some fine and effective touches, adroitly indicates. This is especially notable in the very impressive scene of the night visit to the tomb of Menkau-ra, when Cleopatra lays sacrilegious hands on the treasures which were pre-devoted by the great Pharaoh to the service of the country in the hour of imminent peril. She is moved by fear, not reverence—a superstitious fear—not dread even of the terrible curse read by Harmachis which shall overwhelm the profane. At the very moment she is about to forego the opportunity she is tempted by the precious jewels. “And yet,” she urges, “what said the writing of the Divine Menkau-ra?—it was emeralds, was it not? And emeralds are now so rare and hard to come by. Ever did I love emeralds, and I can never find them without a flaw.” And so she falls with her dupe, Harmachis, into the snare; and the curse comes upon her at Actium, and her ruin is accomplished at the hands of her injured lover, Harmachis, priest of Isis, consecrated and crowned Pharaoh, who is enslaved by her arts, after being solemnly dedicated to the great enterprise of ridding the land of the Grecian yoke. The betrayal of the plot to Cleopatra by Charmion, the jealous lover of Harmachis, leads to a thrilling and passionate scene. Cleopatra allures the wavering instrument of the gods, gives him a drugged cup to drink, possesses herself of the dagger of Harmachis, and threatens him with the death designed for herself. This dramatic incident is powerfully presented. Henceforth, till the penitent priest is inspired by vengeance, Harmachis is but the slave and deluded tool of Cleopatra. But he is ever a subtle presence in her life, and Antony himself plays but a secondary part in her fortunes. It is through this central idea of the baffled victim of enchantment taking up afresh the functions of Nemesis that the interest of this original and stirring romance is sustained to the end. Here and there in the narrative we confess there is some force in Mr. Haggard's generous admonishment to the reader who may be inclined to rebel against the weight of “illustrative matter” and is advised to “skip.” But it is not so much the “illustrative matter,” which is good of the kind, that we object to as a certain indiscreet profusion that is inartistic. Like Byron, Mr. Haggard seems to think “description is my forte,” and, unlike Byron, his confidence carries him beyond the point where there is nothing so good as silence or a few asterisks. There are scenes of magic and mystery where we ought to feel

Das Unbeschreibliche
Hier ist es gethan.

Yet Mr. Haggard will not have it so, for sheer distrust of our imaginative powers. This matter apart, Cleopatra is a great acquisition to the lovers of romance in these dry discoloured days. The illustrations are unequal. Some of the woodcuts are good, and the “initial” cuts at the heads of chapters are excellent. But the “process” plates are poor and fail to do the designs justice.

“New lamps for old” is the ancient street cry that hails the reader of The Wrong Box, and perhaps we would not exchange the old inimitable story for this new variation of the Arabian Nights' story of the hunchback and the inconvenient corpse. Happily, no one is called upon to make the interchange. The Wrong Box is an extravaganza of the first water. It is supercharged with the frolicsome spirit and delicate humour that conjointly may be best described as “very gay, very foolish indeed.” To reduce its devious maze of plottings and counter-plottings, of haphazard involutions, and bewildering “sports” of growth—which spring on you with dazzling spontaneity—is an utterly impossible task. We should like to catch the heedless person—he would not wait long for the catching—who would solemnly undertake to tell the tale that Messrs. R. L. Stevenson and Lloyd Osbourne have concocted. There is literally no end to it, though the book itself, like all things mortal, has an end. But the bone of contention has no final resting-place. It disappears we know not where—last heard of in a grand piano; and there is no earthly reason why it should not play a part in a thousand-and-one volumes. Herein does Mr. Stevenson show himself to be the artist he is known to be. The story turns on the desperate endeavours of two cousins to outwit one another in the matter of a tontine; the two sole survivors in which speculation are carefully guarded by these rivals in affection. One of these is a man whom “the superficial might have deemed a miser;” “he called the servants in the morning, he served out the stores with his own hand, he took soundings of the sherry, he numbered the remainder biscuits; painful scenes took place over the weekly bills, and the cook was frequently impeached.” This person is much too anxious and much too cunning. While he is travelling with his valuable uncle, one of the tontiners, a railway accident occurs, and he mistakingly identifies the body of a victim as that of his relative. After much cogitation, he packs the body in a barrel directed to his own address, with the notion of concealing from his cousin and others the supposed death of his uncle; but a wag of a passenger exchanges the direction labels of the contents of the railway van, and unmitigated tribulations ensue. What Mr. Stevenson is capable of in the way of ingenuity and humour with such a leit-motiv is only too suggestive to the imagination. What Messrs. Stevenson and Osbourne have perpetrated in this diverting book will decidedly fulfil the largest expectations of their readers. To say more were futile.

Mrs. Comyns Carr has produced in Margaret Maliphant a novel of the kind that grows rarer with the present predominance of the merely sensational or the merely naturalistic form of fiction.

It treats of the passions of love and jealousy, as manifested in the somewhat restricted social circle of a rural district, with admirable truth, delicacy, and restraint. The character of the impulsive and foolishly frank heroine is an excellent study, free entirely from exaggeration or false accent. Skill and insight are, indeed, shown in portraying all the women, and some of the men, who figure in the story. In depicting the play and flow of emotions, the novelist exhibits uncommon artistic control, which is notably shown in the moving scene between the two sisters (iii. ch. 36), when Margaret, stung with jealousy, upbraids and deceives her sister Joyce, and wellnigh wrecks her happiness. This is very finely imagined. It is a just tribute to Mrs. Comyns Carr's art to note how our sympathy with the wrong-headed Margaret is quite unaffected by the errors and mischief-making that she occasions. The rustics are capably drawn, and not given over to dialect, for which grace we are deeply grateful. The old farm servants, Deb and Reuben, privileged in speech, are delightfully fresh and invigorating, saying their good things in the true spirit of bucolic simplicity. We cannot part from Mrs. Carr's clever story without commending the judicious and truthful touches of local colour. The descriptions of the east Sussex country between sea and downs charm by their sincerity. They are never over-laboured, and are alive with atmosphere and colour.

A young lady of seventeen, who, for all her wilful ways, captivates us at once by her vivacity and evident charms, relates the curious experience of her budding life in My Spanish Sailor. The recital is very pretty reading, and is very piquantly told. The Spanish sailor is her husband. They are secretly married as a countercheck to the bride's undesirable and, it is feared, prosecuting and persecuting father. They have to keep up the farce on board the ship commanded by the Spanish sailor, she passing as a maiden in his charge to be delivered to her friends in port, and he as a much more elderly and responsible caretaker. He becomes a trifle jealous, though he feigns indifference, at her innocent proceedings, which look like flirtings with passengers, and makes him “say swear” a good deal. She resents the proprietary right he inherited when her dying mother placed her, a tender babe, in his care. In the end, the meeting with her father, whom she takes to be mad—and the circumstances justify the suspicion—and the real bravery and constant devotion of the Spanish sailor are victorious over the wayward girl.

Captain Kangaroo is a boy's book, and somewhat boyish in addition. Nor can we say that this “story of Australian life” illustrates with any success the round of life in Victoria or New South Wales. The hero is a bushranger of sad antecedents. As a hot-tempered and ill-treated boy he brings his fortunes to a crisis, dealing death to an exasperating uncle by knocking him down with his own crutch. By this exploit he finds himself in the colonies, where he comes across certain English friends settled there, whose lives he is led to protect from his bushranging gang. There is some pretty good fighting, and in the end—a fair end, though tame—the “Captain” dies penitent.

The Stalwarts is one of the most extraordinary books ever published under the guise of fiction. The title-page prepares the reader for a good deal that is sensational; yet the story altogether surpasses expectations, and sufficiently explains the publication of an American novel in England without the customary imprint of a printer's name. In the body of what purports to be fiction, and appears to be a sort of family history—very singular history, too, and told with an intense and burning art by no means the least notable quality of the book—we have introduced a circumstantial account of the assassination of President Garfield, the trial of the assassin, and then—under the label of “fiction”—a very suggestive recital of what “might have happened,” in which certain prominent politicians, some of whom are yet in the land, play desperate parts and come—one, at least, of them—to a very bad end. These persons are all interested in putting a stop to the President's proposed investigations into certain corrupt practices and jobbery. They make the fanatical assassin their tool, and all are painted in the most transparent disguises. They, in fact, are members of the section of Republicans known as “The Stalwarts,” and in the story are implicated in a conspiracy which leads to the crime. The assassin figures as their scapegoat and their instrument. That he was insane few persons probably entertain the slightest doubt; and if this could be said to be the sole object of Mme. Norton's book there is nothing to say against a novel with a purpose so natural, in the circumstances, and so convincingly justified by the evidence of the trial itself.

DEVONSHIRE PARISHES.—VOL. II.*

IN this volume Mr. Worthy has given us the rest of his account of certain parishes in the Archdeaconry of Totnes, and his work, as a whole, forms a respectable addition to the number of our local histories. He has carefully described the architecture of the parish churches, and taken note of their ancient ornaments and monuments. Records of this kind are often a means of ensuring the preservation of valuable objects. By setting forth what a church ought to contain they enable those who have a love and reverence for antiquity to keep a salutary watch over the doings of glaziers, carpenters, and plasterers, and their employers. A quantity of rich glass belonging to Marlton Church was, Mr. Worthy tells us, given some years ago to a glazier on condition that he at once "cleared it out of the way of the ringers"; for it was then lying in a heap in the belfry, which seems to have been made a receptacle for rubbish. It was happily purchased by the rector of Little Hempston, who has inserted the larger portion of it in his church. At Hennock the parish church, which was rebuilt in the fifteenth century, has lately been undergoing restoration, and we are told that during the process of the work "quantities of ancient stained glass were removed from the north aisle, chiefly in a fragmentary state, consisting of portions of figures of bishops and priests in full robes, the birth of our Saviour, and the adoration of the Magi." We hope that Mr. Worthy's accusation, for which no doubt he has sufficient authority, will be followed by a strict inquiry into the circumstances of this disgraceful act, and that all concerned in it will be worried and distressed by all lawful means until the glass is restored to its proper place. Hennock seems to be an unlucky place, for we are further informed that a "very ancient chapel" in one of its hamlets has been "enlarged and converted into a Wesleyan meeting-house," and that not long ago the ancient village cross was "removed." We have a full account of the remarkably fine rood-screen and parcloses in Wolborough Church, with a list of the figures upon them. One is of a certain Sir John Shorne, who was rector of North Marston, in Buckinghamshire, towards the close of the thirteenth century. He was reckoned a saint, and his aid was sought in cases of ague. The story goes that he imprisoned the Devil in a boot, and he is therefore represented as holding a boot in his hand. Mr. Worthy has devoted considerable space to tracing the descents of manors, and to the genealogies of the families which held them, giving short histories of, among others, the Bassets as lords of North Bovey, the Cliffords of Kingsteinton, the Reynells of Wolborough, and the Wadhams of Lustleigh. He makes a few slips in matters of general knowledge, and has not taken the advice which we offered him when reviewing his earlier volume as to the need of exercising more care in revising for press. He may have found Geoffrey of Coutances described as the "Lieutenant-General of the Army at the Battle of Hastings" in some old genealogical work; but the description is not the less absurd. That Rosamond Clifford—"Fair Rosamond"—was the mother of William Longsword is by no means so certain as he thinks; he ought to have known that there are some grounds for doubting the story. Nor should a genealogist have let pass such a misprint as that which turns the first husband of the celebrated Duchess of Kingston into Captain Harvey. To be exact, Hervey was not a captain at the date of his marriage. Owing, no doubt, to another misprint, the year of the Duchess's death is wrongly stated, and she is said, oddly enough, to have been a Maid of Honour to the Prince [sic] of Wales. We cannot understand what Mr. Worthy means by saying that she made efforts to prove her first marriage; she persistently denied it. We should not have complained if he had avoided the subject altogether; but, as he chose to enter upon it, he should have got it up accurately.

* Devonshire Parishes; or, the Antiquities, Heraldry, and Family History of Twenty-eight Parishes in the Archdeaconry of Totnes. By Charles Worthy, Esq., late H.M. 82nd Regiment. 2 vols. Vol. II. Exeter: Pollard & Co. London: George Redway. 1889.

MATHEMATICAL BOOKS.*

THE Syndics of the Cambridge University Press have now published in a handsome quarto volume of 590 pages a hundred of Professor Cayley's papers in chronological order. They were originally printed between the years 1841 and 1853 in

* The Collected Mathematical Papers of Arthur Cayley, Sc.D., F.R.S., Sadlerian Professor, &c. Vol. I. Cambridge: at the University Press. 1889.

Elements of Plane Analytic Geometry. By J. D. Runkle, Professor in Massachusetts Institute, Boston. Boston: Ginn & Co.

Lectures on the Ikosahedron. By Felix Klein, Professor of Mathematics, Göttingen. Translated by G. G. Morrice, M.A. London: Trübner & Co.

Descriptive Geometry. By Linus Faunce, Assistant-Professor, Massachusetts Institute, Boston. Boston: Ginn & Co.

A College Algebra. By G. A. Wentworth, Professor, Phillips Exeter Academy. Boston: Ginn & Co.

A Treatise on Hydrodynamics. By A. B. Basset, M.A. Vol. I. Cambridge: Deighton & Co.

The Construction of the Wonderful Canon of Logarithms by John Napier, Baron of Merchiston. Translated by W. Rae Macdonald, F.F.A. Edinburgh: William Blackwood & Sons. 1889.

A History of the Study of Mathematics at Cambridge. By W. W. Rouse Ball, Fellow of Trin. Coll., Cambridge. Cambridge: at the University Press. 1889.

Mathematical Tracts. By F. W. Newman, M.R.A.S. Part I. Cambridge: Macmillan & Bowes.

A First Euclid. By Rev. H. Daman, M.A. London: Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 1889.

Treatise on Elementary Algebra. By Saradaranjan Ray, M.A., Professor, Dacca College, Calcutta. Vol. I. Calcutta: Lahiri.

Practical Geometry; to which is added a Section on Orthographic Projection. By John Carrol. London: Burns & Oates.

A Text-book of Practical Logarithms and Trigonometry. By J. H. Palmer. London: Macmillan & Co.

Key to Mr. J. B. Lock's Elementary Trigonometry. By Henry Carr, B.A. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

the Cambridge Mathematical Journal, the Philosophical Magazine, the Journal des Mathématiques (Lionville), the Journal für die reine und angewandte Mathematik (Crelle), and a few other periodicals. That they are full of matter which is of great importance to the advanced mathematical reader need scarcely be said, though there is also much of interest to ordinary students.

When classified under the two heads Geometry and Analysis, some of the leading subjects discussed are (1) under the former, geometrical involution, reciprocity, developables, transmutations of curves, geometry of n dimensions, Pascal's theorem, skew cubics, diametral planes, wave surface, cubic and quadric curves, cubic and quadric surfaces; and (2) under the latter, determinants, elliptic functions, quaternions, octaves, Sturmian functions, Legendre's co-efficients, and others.

Professor Runkle's Plane Analytic Geometry is one of the best specimens in scholastic bookwork from the American States which has recently come under our notice. There is no table of contents, or other index, which seems a strange omission on the part of a writer who is so orderly in his disposition and treatment of the subject-matter, but otherwise very few faults can be found with this text-book. The elementary parts are fully discussed and illustrated, so that the circle is not taken up till p. 137, and the definition of a conic only occurs when the middle of the book is reached. After a clearly-written chapter on the general equation of the second degree and another on the properties of conics which are derived from it, the work is summed up by an account of systems of curves fulfilling certain conditions. Throughout there is abundance of material for practice and examination; the type and paper are good, and the diagrams are boldly, clearly, and accurately executed.

In Professor Klein's work on the "Ikosahedron" and equations of the fifth degree we discover a contribution "towards supplying the pressing need of text-books upon the higher branches of mathematic," recently alluded to by Dr. Glaisher in his address as President of the London Mathematical Society. This is probably the first systematic exposition of a theory which recent writers pronounce to be of primary importance in several departments of modern analysis. In his preface the learned author speaks of treating in a similar manner the subject of "elliptic modular functions," and thus "introduce many to realms of modern mathematics rich in far-stretching vistas." In the latter half of his work, Professor Klein discusses fully the solution of equations of the fifth degree, by treating the theory which Brioschi, Hermite, and Kronecker had enounced, on the basis established by his first part. The subject is essentially difficult, and requires throughout considerable mathematical skill, even to pursue the line of argument—the author himself admitting in his preface that he "expects in his reader a certain ripeness of mathematical judgment." Mr. Morrice appears to have faithfully and successfully rendered the German text, including many technical terms of special difficulty.

Two other books from Boston, U.S.A., have reached us, besides that on co-ordinate geometry already alluded to. The first is a work on projection, though the author appears to avoid the use of that term, and bears proof of considerable practical skill in the art. The notation adopted throughout is ingenious, and must be of use to many in studying the illustrative diagrams. The author's directions are generally clear and explicit, though in certain cases the reader will perhaps wish the reason had been shortly put. The scope of the work includes the development of solids and double curved surfaces of revolution. A school text-book for algebra from the same publishers is a carefully prepared and comprehensive manual for junior classes. The examples are numerous and well selected, but no answers are given. In some of the latter chapters, such as those on "complex numbers," determinants, and some other parts, there is a certain freshness of treatment not devoid of interest. The proof given of the Binomial Theorem is a reversion to an older form of treatment which scarcely recommends itself; and the chapter headed "Derivatives" should, partly at least, be relegated to a future one on the meaning of differential coefficient.

The difficult subject of hydrodynamics, in relation to the motion of liquids, appears to be adequately treated and fully illustrated in Mr. Basset's volume. The first volume deals with the mathematical theory of frictionless liquids, including the motion of solid bodies in a liquid. The author has consulted all of the British and foreign mathematical periodicals and transactions of learned Societies for investigations and results bearing on the subject, and, besides condensing them into a form suitable for scientific study, has enriched his treatise by a large collection of examples.

One of the books before us might be termed by a mathematician a livre de luxe. It is a translation on beautiful paper of the Mirifici Logarithmorum Canonis Constructio, with the head- and tail-pieces in exact facsimile, and the form of the work generally is a reproduction of the original edition, which was published in 1619. That edition was edited by Robert Napier, son of the mathematician, and is remarkable from containing some notes by Napier's friend Briggs, who to some extent shares the merit of inventing logarithms by his construction of the decimal system for their general application. He, moreover, devoted his life to perfecting the great invention, fully justifying the remark of Robert Napier that "now, as the Inventor has been called away, the burden of the whole business would appear to rest on the shoulders of the most learned Briggs." Mr. Macdonald has bestowed great care on his translation, and accompanied the work by some good notes, historical and mathematical. His introduction embodies a well-written sketch of Napier's life; but we find no reference to the fact that the inventor of logarithms was not a peer, and should not be styled Baron Napier. Being proprietor of the "barony" of Merchiston, near Edinburgh, he was locally called "Baron," which is quite a different thing. At the same time (according to Professor Blackburn) he claimed to represent the elder branch of the Earls of Lennox. Mr. Macdonald refers to Hutton in one passage; but in noticing Napier's merits he might have quoted a passage from Hutton's Tracts, confirmed by other writers, to the effect that Napier was probably the first who applied the infinitesimal principle in an arithmetical form, and reached the idea of calculating gradual change by substituting small discontinuous changes. Napier, in fact, anticipated to some extent that conception of the generation of magnitudes on which Newton's doctrine of fluxions is based. Napier, moreover, speaks of the velocities of the increments of logarithms, just as Newton does of his fluxions. Napier clearly established the fact that all numbers may be terms of a geometric progression, and thus anticipated the principle of the infinitesimal calculus. The bibliographer will be thankful to Mr. Macdonald for the complete and carefully-finished catalogue of Napier's works which forms the concluding part of this interesting volume.

A small but interesting work on the development of mathematical studies at Cambridge has just been printed at the University Press. The first half is mainly an enumeration of the more eminent mathematicians from the introduction of the Arabic science into Europe, down to our own days, with short notes of their work or interesting points in their history. The next three chapters set forth the different methods of instruction at Cambridge, and the successive tests of proficiency in the mathematical subjects taught. The concluding chapter gives a good general sketch of the constitution, organization, and social condition of the University, from the schools established about the year 1200, or a little earlier, according to Mr. Ball, till 1858, when a well-defined period was closed by the formation of a new constitution. The introductory chapter gives some interesting notes of the curriculum and organization of studies in a mediæval University. Amidst the antiquarian and historical lore presentably set forth there are passages of amusement—as, for example, the tracing of the famous word "tripos" through seven distinct meanings, till from a "thing of wood" it came to signify a system of examination.

Professor Newman has published five tracts of some interest to advanced mathematical students, though we do not discover much that is original or that calls for comment. There are two tables, one of the successive powers of the reciprocals of the natural numbers, which should be useful in integrating and otherwise.

Amongst minor text-books we have the first twenty propositions of Euclid I. clearly and very explicitly set forth. The most novel feature in the text is the interpolation of exercises in the use of arguments. To each proposition is appended an abridged proof, which may be useful in a second or third reading. We think the diagrams poor compared with those of many recent works. India sends us a School Algebra, which promises to be useful in class-teaching, both from the large number of exercises on elementary work and the explanation of algebraical artifices. For the "Science and Art" course we have the tenth edition of a useful text-book for teaching the construction of plane figures and scales. This edition contains some lessons on Graphic Arithmetic. For the use of logarithms, especially in solving plane triangles and measuring heights and distances, beginners have a trustworthy guide in Mr. Palmer. His neatly prepared book must come into favour with many who are preparing for the position of gunner in the Royal Navy and similar appointments, or who wish to acquire a thorough and practical knowledge of the application of logarithms. From Lagos we have solutions of the questions given in Mr. Lock's Elementary Trigonometry. They are generally set forth in sufficient detail, especially in the elementary chapters, to be of signal service to students reading up the subject without the help of a teacher.

NOVELS.*

"THIN, but not too thin," was the highest praise Mr. Wodehouse could bestow upon his gruel; and it is the criticism that involuntarily occurs to the reader of Mr. Sturgis's latest novel. The Comedy of a Country House resembles its predecessors in most of its essentials. Like them it is emphatically a book to be read in a hammock, on a hot day. The style is easy and pleasant; the characters (as a rule) are careless, lazy, and good-natured; and there is no plot to speak of to make undue demands upon the brain. On the other hand, it must be said that the dramatis personæ in the Comedy of a Country House are types rather than people. Lord Lorrilaire, the hero—it is difficult to believe in the reality of a person with such a name—represents the best kind of young modern peer; cultivated and agreeable, without being a prig or a milksop. He has a way of "finishing his sentences with a laugh," which is rather provoking; but then there is a want of coherence and consecutiveness about this young man altogether of which the habit may be an indication. Mrs. Chauncey, Mrs. Dormer, and Lady Jane Lock tell each other home truths in a polite manner which nobody seems to resent; while the comic element in the story is provided by an amusing, but wholly impossible, journalist, aided by a young scion of the aristocracy whose life is chiefly devoted to bowing himself up and down (for sanitary purposes), repeating the magic words "Ninety-nine." The heroine is a handsome but impassive young lady thrown into Lord Lorrilaire's society by her match-making mother, Lady Jane, whose designs are seen through and checked by one Dora Rutherford, a young married woman and Lord Lorrilaire's oldest friend. Dora Rutherford has more reality about her than any other person in the book. She is essentially a modern figure, and would have been an anachronism thirty years ago, with her staunch, unsentimental, comrade-like attachment to her old play-fellow, and her unconventional way of interfering in his affairs for his own good. Instead of turning the cold shoulder to her, even the ladies of the country house ought to have been grateful for her impromptu visit, while to the reader she has all the effect of water in a well-cultivated but rather monotonous landscape.

Clement Ker is by far the most exciting of the volumes lying before us, but it is not very easy to make out what it is all about. The scene is laid in the most desolate part of the South of Scotland, where the writer, unlike less fortunate travellers, seems to have found the high rounded hills a mass of heather. Still, the general character and feeling of the country is exceedingly well described, and the large straggling house forms a fitting setting for the strange moody baronet, Clement Ker, whose peculiarities are afterwards explained by his practice of opium-eating. There are dark allusions to ghosts scattered up and down the book; but, except that the storyteller, Geoffrey Ker, twice catches hold (supernaturally) of what he thought was the rough head of an animal, everything remains dans le vague, as the French say. There is a certain amount of meanness about this. We can all of us hint at a figure so horrible that it scares the life out of all who behold it; but we want to know what it is like and why it is there. This George Fleming never tells us, nor what is the reason that, if the half-mad scoundrel, Sir Clement, and the faithful old butler Bright both fall dead of fright on seeing The Thing, Dick Ker should not have been in the least affected by it. The book would have been improved by a little pruning of the superfluous characters, Lord and Lady Milton and Gilbert Ashleigh and his sister, a wearisome development of the last few years when girls obtain a success in society by saying and doing things for which their grandmothers would have been cut. These, however, are but slight blemishes. The real fault is that, in the effort to enhance the sense of mystery, the writer has produced an impression of confusion which takes away something from the real power of the book.

Lady Car exhibits Mrs. Oliphant in one of the best phases of what may be called her later manner. The observation is accurate and close, and the rendering natural; but there is a tendency to repeat the same incident, and to insist on the same effect. There is not a word in Lady Car that strikes the reader as being either untrue or overstrained. The gradual disillusionment of the poor woman about her devoted and charming husband, and the hardly less pathetic want of illusion about her coarse and brutal son, are pictures from the life, but somehow something more is wanted to form a story. The realization of the facts concerning Beaufort's character, that he was simply a cultivated indolent man, entirely destitute even of the ambition, still less of the power, to make himself a name, is a matter so gradual and so undramatic that it is hardly a subject for the groundwork of a novel. Of course, the picturesque element lies in the implied contrast between Lady Car's first husband and her second, and, later, between this second husband, Beaufort, and his stepson, Tom Torrance. One of the best touches in the book is the involuntary belief the wretched little Tom has in the calm and dilettante "Beau," whose superior refinement makes him sometimes ashamed of himself. Again, the feeling of Lady Car's disappointment of having missed, she hardly knows what, is very delicately depicted; but it would have had more effect as an episode in a story than as the story itself. It is always a mistake in art to be "long," in spite of the dictum of the poet; and it is a snare into which Mrs. Oliphant is often apt to fall.

France is the natural home of the detective novel, and it seems dépaycé elsewhere. The Romance of an Alter Ego is a strange mixture of mesmerism and a farce; there is too little variety, and the reader never identifies himself with the story as he does with the immortal works of Gaboriau and Montépin. The interest of the story lies in the sudden claim made by a lady standing on the step of a New York omnibus on a fellow-passenger as her husband. This is dramatic, and promises well; but it would have been far more to the purpose if the tale had been told in the third person, and the reader had been left in doubt whether

* Comedy of a Country House. By Julian Sturgis. 2 vols. London: John Murray. 1889.

Clement Ker. By George Fleming. Bristol: Arrowsmith. 1889.

Lady Car. By Mrs. Oliphant. London: Longmans & Co. 1889.

Romance of an Alter Ego. By Lloyd Bryce. London and New York: Brentano. 1889.

The Last Coup. By Hawley Smart. London: White. 1889.

The Serpent Tempted Her. By Sagui Smith. London: Drane; Chicago and New York: Belford, Clark, & Co. 1889.

Summer Legends. By Rudolph Baumbach. Translated by Helen B. Dole. London: Scott. 1889.

Aaron Simoni was really Edna Dalzelle's wedded husband or not. As it is, we know from the first that he is nothing of the sort, and that the culprit is really his twin brother, who is supposed to be dead; but the incidents which lead to the dénouement are rather clumsy and ill managed, and have no air of probability about them. A perfectly endless number of dreams are related, and too large a space given to mesmeric exhibitions and mediums, Miss Dalzelle being what is called one of the "brightest sensitives" of New York city. Finally, however, the army of mesmerizers is defeated, and Miss Dalzelle's real husband, the Twin Brother, returns from a South American prison, only to hand over the "bright sensitive" to his brother—this being apparently rendered possible by some occult American marriage law. The style of the whole book is awkward and deals in metaphors, and the sentences sometimes remind one of Mr. Wilkie Collins at his most unfortunate moments.

Major Hawley Smart's Last Coup is not as successful as most of his earlier ones. There is an amount of languor about his story that is not usual with him, and argues that he is writing rather for the sake of writing than because he has something to say. His heroine occupies a rather dubious position in society, being the niece of a Jewish bill-discounter; but little accidents of this sort never interfere with the prospects of Major Hawley Smart's young ladies. The love-story is rarely the main object of Major Hawley Smart's tales, and the reader must be content to find solace in the racing and hunting descriptions.

There is a considerable amount of power shown in the little book with the melodramatic title of The Serpent Tempted Her, though it must be confessed that the hero and narrator is more given to fainting-fits than can be at all convenient in a factory overseer. Of course, as is common in these dark tales, a little sense on the part of the heroine would have averted the catastrophe, and the world would have been deprived of another shilling novel. But, as she chose to treat the man who had been brought up as her brother and was on the point of becoming her husband with as little confidence as if he was the most absolute stranger, both story and tragedy are rendered possible. The "her" alluded to in the title was not the heroine Nellie Raymond, but one Mary Perry, who is sighing for the same young man, and by elaborate scheming finally secures his valuable hand. The story, in spite of some imperfections, will keep the reader's attention from Paddington as far as Swindon, or possibly in some cases as far as Bath.

Miss Dole has translated Herr Baumbach's Summer Legends very gracefully and prettily, but the tales themselves are too slight to be worth taking much trouble about. They are likewise not quite either one thing or the other—neither supernatural enough nor real enough to please right-minded children, who like their fairy tales without any proper names and without any allegories. "The Disappointed Dwarf" and "The Ass's Spring" are perhaps the best of the stories, as being the freest from these defects.

DARTMOOR.*

DARTMOOR literature is growing apace. The scene of several novels lies there, it is the playground of local archaeologists, the poet's eye, with a fine frenzy rolling, has scanned it, painters in colours have illustrated it, and, more than all, word-painters have decorated it; but severe science has hardly set her foot on it. The author of this edition of Dartmoor comes under the head of the word-painter, and is a follower in that regard of many another, sketching a little in colours also, reproduced in plates. It would appear on the face of it that, a stranger to the land, he has set to work to walk over Dartmoor for the purpose of writing this book, inspired with an enthusiastic admiration for his subject. He has read nearly all that has been written about it, and quotes a goodly number of authorities. He has then taken his walks with great diligence, and has minutely examined everything that attracted his attention. He explores the quarters of the moor marked out by the Duchy of Cornwall, the lord of the quondam forest and its purlieus, and takes them—north, east, south, and west—in an orderly and methodical manner, each quarter requiring some days' walk. The book affords good evidence that the author read first, walked afterwards, verifying his reading as he went, and that his knowledge of Dartmoor, good though it be, is by no means the intimate knowledge of a native born and bred. We shall presently point out some mistakes that no one who knew the moor well could have made.

Mr. Page has, at all events, produced a good guide to Dartmoor; and a tourist with a mind to face a few hard days' walk over a wild and interesting tract of land could not do better than study it, though to follow his footsteps would be a zigzag sort of affair.

The great attractions to Mr. Page seem to be the antiquities, as he and his forerunners are pleased to call them; and the great bulk of the book is occupied by examining, giving measurements, explaining, speculating on, and expounding these witnesses of the fact that man has been and gone where they yet remain. He has a due love for the tors, speaks well of the rivers, and admires the scenery, both near and distant; but from the authors whose books he has read his mind is filled to the brim with the stories that bear witness to the hand of man. Although sufficiently credulous, he does not dogmatize on Druids and the like, but quotes, instead, the various opinions of others, from which he invites selection according to the fancy or common sense, as the case may be, of his readers. At p. 246 he writes:—"Nevertheless, so rapidly does age creep over these structures, that it [a house not long abandoned] looks a couple of hundred years old at least, a warning to those rather reckless antiquaries who would give every ruin upon Dartmoor an age dating from the Conquest at least." A very laudable caution to the citizen who, breathing the inspiring air of Dartmoor, is disposed to think every cloud very like a whale.

It is easy enough to talk of prehistoric man, Celts, Britons, Romans, Saxons, and what not. But to realize in imagination anything like the actual state of life of these men is not within our powers. A great part of Dartmoor is now as it has been for geological ages; man has hardly touched it, and nature is imperceptibly slow in making her changes. But the country around Dartmoor has been transformed from wild woodlands and wastes to inclosed and cultivated corn-fields and pastures. Some of the woods have happily been left; they have their uses; but there are signs that Devonshire must once have been a densely-wooded country, with rich bits of pasture in and out. From one of the loftiest tors to look down on the inclosed lands, the fences and fields appearing like patchwork, the houses, single or in groups, like ugly blocks, the churches feeble imitations of the tors, and to fancy what the beauty of the country might have been if let alone, is to sigh after some of the joys lost by civilization. Devonshire is a bank country, and it is probable that these unsightly inclosures are not more than a few hundreds of years old. The inclosures on parts of Dartmoor itself—a sore subject to the commoners—are not so much as one hundred years old. In treating of Dartmoor it is good to take these matters into consideration, and to throw overboard as much as one can of modern notions.

Mr. Page begins his book with a quotation describing Dartmoor as "a spot almost unknown, untrod," and at p. 31 writes, "Well within living memory such a thing as a wheeled conveyance was unknown upon Dartmoor"—the monstrous errors of a stranger. But soon after he writes of it as having been well populated in early times. Considering what the population of England is now, it is difficult to guess what he may mean by well populated as a relative term. The explanation of these contradictions is to be sought in the remains of the tin-streaming operations, and in the many hut circles in favourable situations all over the moor. Mr. Page is not well informed on the latest authorities respecting the trade in tin and the situation of Ictis, and takes up the westernmost notions of a direct trade by sea between the Phœnicians, including the Jews, and the Cornish. In those very early days tin may be supposed to have held something of the same position in relation to other things as gold does now. And if one likens the Phœnicians of that day to the English of this, and the West of England then to South Africa now, it is not difficult to surmise that explorers discovered tin, sent experts to teach the mode of streaming and smelting into portable ingots, and carried it off on the backs of ponies. Horses were small in those days. The most likely route was by land eastwards over beaten tracks, then from Ictis within sight of Gaul across the Channel, and through Gaul to the known waters of the Mediterranean. The Phœnicians and the Jews may well have been confused in later years by us Northerners, the Eastern cast of countenance and colour being so very different from our own. As there is no tin on Dartmoor now, except a small quantity at the bottom of mines that do not pay to work, it is a puzzle to conjecture how there could ever have been such large quantities on the surface as to occupy a population of tin-streamers, with a stannary court, for the number of centuries required to satisfy the antiquarians of to-day. There is no evidence on Dartmoor of the quantity having been anything like what would be necessary for such speculative ideas, but if the value of tin then were comparable to that of gold now, this alone would account for a great deal of the tin traditions. The hut circles on Dartmoor, in groups which Mr. Page and others call villages—at all events they were not townships or vills—may be any age or all ages. For centuries they were probably the temporary abode of men who wanted to stay on Dartmoor for any purpose, such as tents are to this day. And the number can be easily explained by their having been used at different times, by different people, for different purposes. They are always in a convenient situation for temporary dwellings. At the present time precisely similar huts can be found in use in Scotland, as the following quotation from The Cattle, Sheep, and Pigs of Great Britain will show. Treating of the Highlands it says:—"The grazings were usually held in common by a number of tenants, and a 'shealing,' therefore, formed a small hamlet of huts, chiefly built of turf on a stone foundation, with an earthen floor, and with beds of heather"—an exact description of such huts as the hut circles would indicate. The larger circles near the huts are more likely to have been used for sheepfolds than for anything else. The supposed large population of Dartmoor and the mysteries of the stone circles or villages may thus be disposed of. Tanners may have used them at one time, hunters at another, farmers at another, refugees in times of danger at another, and Mr. Page gives a use for those to be seen near Merivale Bridge, as a retreat from the plague when it visited Tavistock in 1625. He says it is known to the moor-folk as the plague market, and that these folk probably took their goods for sale there instead of to the town about five miles "in along."

* The Exploration of Dartmoor and its Antiquities. With Maps and Illustrations. By John Ll. W. Page. London: Seeley & Co.

There are other remains on Dartmoor on which Mr. Page spends a deal of his time and thoughts, not so readily explained. The rock basins have been degraded long ago as the mere work of nature, as Mr. Page allows. There are tombs belonging to various ages, cairns, cromlechs, and kistvaens. As Dartmoor is, and always has been, a natural fastness, a conjecture may be permitted that defeated tribes time after time took refuge there, and buried their honoured dead with the tribal rites. The stone avenues offer more difficulty; the remarkable one on the hill above Merivale Bridge is very much exaggerated as a curiosity in the plate (p. 132). One explanation of these rows of stone is, that two tribes or vils fought out a dispute on this spot selected for the purpose, and the victors recorded their triumph by placing upright stones in double file in line opposite one another, the numbers possibly corresponding to those engaged. This would not be a "great battle" (p. 135), but a mere fight to settle disputed boundaries or the like. Mr. Page has a great deal to say respecting sacred circles, and so forth, mentioning the Druids in a commendable tone of scepticism. The sacred part of the business must be the purest speculation, and as such it must be left. Among his authorities Mrs. Bray is a prominent figure. Mrs. Bray was a romance writer, and was of a very romantic turn of mind; moreover, she lived in an age before criticism began to knock the Druids about. She was far more imaginative than critical or scientific, she had the exalted views that Dartmoor air engenders in visitors, and she must be allowed her flights of fancy and her Druids, as a true believer, whilst the common sceptic may look on and wonder.

The grand question concerning names is to be found in this book as a matter of course, and an appendix is devoted to that barren subject. Whatever the original names may have been, modern spelling cannot give the right pronunciation of any by-gone tongue, and it is well to take things as we find them and be thankful. There are Yes Tor, Fur Tor, Rolls Tor, and Pu or Pew Tor. There are Cocks Tor, Mist Tor, and Wain Tor. Romantic persons can never be contented with anything simple; therefore, Mist Tor, certainly remarkable for always being the first to be crowned with mist if there is any moisture going, which is pretty often, must needs be spelt Mis Tor and be derived from "Misor, Goddess of the Moon." Mr. Page gives his authority, but expresses no opinion. Modern givers of names have called the rock basins on the top of Mist Tor "Mist Tor Pans." If Mr. Page had referred to the ordnance map he would have found that Mist Tor Pans is a part of the moor to the north of Mist Tor, taking its name as Preston Pans, Panston Pans (Sheffield) have taken theirs. Mr. Page calls Hessary Tor Hisworthy, a palpable error. Old documents have it Ysfother. He calls Wain Tor "Little Mis Tor," tacking about from the most ancient to the most modern variations, and passes it by, one proof that he was but a casual visitor. It is, in fact, a curious collection of rectangular blocks of granite, evidently the work of nature. It took its name, Wain Tor, from its similarity on the distant horizon to a waggon. On coming to Bare Down one would think it an appropriate name for a bit of moor, as bare as bare can be; but Mr. Page calls it Bair Down, following Mrs. Bray, who says it is Beird-dun, or the Hill of Bards. Then there is Wistman's Wood. It is no more than Wished-man's Wood. A person wished evil by a witch, was in a bad way, and so the word wished has become a universal Devonshire term for anything wretched or contemptible. Mr. Page calls the upper part of the river Plym the Cad, a mistake of Carrington's, who thought that Cadover Bridge must be a bridge over the Cad, ignorant of the fact that the farm close by was Cadworthy, and the river most assuredly the far-famed Plym. Crazy-well Pool he calls Classenwell. This pool was supposed to be bottomless, therefore crazy—Devonshire for mad. Classenwell is a modern, quasi-refined corruption. These are but a few examples of the thorny paths trod by those who exercise their minds on Dartmoor names, as they now hear them spoken by Dartmoor folk.

That Mr. Page does not know Dartmoor as a native knows it is betrayed in sundry places. Walking from Tavistock—a "pleasant two miles"—"we cross the stream which furnishes part of the water-supply of Plymouth," near Pu Tor—a surprising mistake to fall into respecting a small stream taken from the Walkham. Again, in walking from Prince Town to Crazy-well Pool, he mistakes the Devonport leat, taken from the Dart, for the Plymouth leat, "designed by that most versatile of sailors, Sir Francis Drake"—which, in fact, is taken from the river Mew, two miles below. He says also that the fine statue of Drake in Tavistock, by Boehm, was erected by public subscription, whereas it was placed there at the sole cost of the Duke of Bedford. He seems to like railways on Dartmoor, and says of the red granite on Trowlsworthy Tor it is a pity it "should be so little worked." A lover of Dartmoor would hardly like to see the tors "worked" into piers and bridges.

There are many symptoms of a stranger's hand in this book, though a diligent and painstaking hand it seems to be. The plates are good drawings, though not strikingly like the spots from which they are taken. With all its faults, inaccuracies, and stilted language, the book is no bad guide. But it is certainly not a faithful and trustworthy authority on Dartmoor.

RECENT PHILOSOPHICAL LITERATURE.*

WHAT the students of Kant owe to Dr. Mahaffy it is scarcely possible to over-estimate. Long before Oxford or Scotland or America had begun those works—now so many—which have tried to make the philosopher of Königsberg familiar to the English reader, the Dublin Professor had produced a treatise which went a long way to clear the road. In the preface to the new edition of Kant's Critical Philosophy for English Readers he says, in vindication of the length of his analysis and criticism, that "Kant's book, if worth reading at all, is worth reading and knowing accurately." Although the remark might be made with regard to almost all philosophical works, it is specially applicable here. The real knowledge of Kant cannot be gained in weeks or months—nor in a year. It is impossible to "cram" the Critique; and it is this very fact which would make us urge that, even with Dr. Mahaffy's book at hand, the student of philosophy should first of all be familiar with the detail of the original. Two preliminary remarks must be made as to this edition. It is unfortunate that in the preface we should have such variations as "Kritik," "Critique," and "Critical," while in the body of the work we have such an absurdity as "Critick." In the second place, it is a pity that the notes on the greater part of the work should be written by Dr. Mahaffy, a professed disciple, while those on the Dialectic are the work of Mr. Bernard, a Hegelian, and, so far as can be seen, a follower of Professor Caird. This is a great objection, because, if Mr. Bernard's standpoint had been adhered to throughout, there would have been a great difference in the work—especially in the discussion on the Categories. Even in this reference, however, Dr. Mahaffy unconsciously suggests another and a higher point of view than Kant reached, or cared to reach. But the main point to be noticed is his determined opposition to any reduction of the number of the Kantian Categories. Such reduction has been attempted by various philosophers; and Dr. Mahaffy makes the differences among these an argument for holding fast to the original plan. Yet he does not satisfactorily answer the main objection upon which these attempts are founded—that Kant found his Categories ready made in formal logic, and merely gave them a new significance as "functions of unity in judgment." So far Mansel's criticism is perfectly justified. In much the same way the majority of the Neo-Kantians dismiss the category of Modality, and look for their favourite "process" in the other three. They urge, with some force, that Kant did not consider the possibility of deducing one category from another, or the whole from the very nature of self-consciousness; and they say that Kant himself suggested by his "thesis, antithesis, and synthesis" a sufficient principle of derivation. But Dr. Mahaffy will not (p. 101) take "any interest in the subtleties of modern philosophy on the subject." While his exposition of the deduction of the categories and the schematizing power of the imagination is very fair and exact, he fails to see that there is an inherent dualism in Kant, to which he always clung, while he was nevertheless from time to time suggesting a method of overcoming it. His own phrase about the understanding "legislating for" nature is one instance out of many wherein he gave his bolder followers an intimation of the direction in which they afterwards worked. The difficulties of the two egos—the transcendental and that of the inner sense—of sensation as a something "given" and yet "associable," of the categories as giving the forms for sensation, and yet so far and so distinctly separate from it as to require the artificial connexion of the schemata, the suggestion of a something behind the senses which they represent—all these come up in the course of Kant's intricate discussion. Here Dr. Mahaffy is better as a guide to his author's meaning than as a critic or a remover of stumbling-blocks. This is the more to be regretted, since upon which view we take of the difficulties here depends our attitude towards the Dialectic. It is not hard to see what would have been Mr. Bernard's criticism. He says (p. 360) that Kant's "πρῶτον ψεύδος" in the complete isolation of the Sensibility and the Understanding prevented him from rising to the conception of an intuitive understanding on the one hand, and on the other from reckoning seriously with the capacity of pure thought to supply us with knowledge which must be as true as anything we can attain." This shows quite plainly what Dr. Mahaffy's coadjutor would have said had he been dealing with the questions we have noticed. The reference to the "intuitive understanding" is a favourite one with all Hegelians. They find such an understanding when they develop the matter out of the categories, and these from self-consciousness. It can readily be understood that Dr. Mahaffy could not accept such criticism as indicating his standpoint. While it may be taken as an explanation of Kant, it is one which explains away everything that is distinctly Kantian. Between Dr. Mahaffy on the Refutation of Idealism and Bernard on the first part of the Dialectic, there is not so much difference as might have been expected. The work of the former is particularly good, not merely in explaining the difference between the two editions of the Critique, but also in clearing away many of the misunderstandings which have risen around the ever obnoxious "thing in itself." To some extent Kant himself is responsible for these misunderstandings, for besides being somewhat obscure in his language, he makes an advance (Mahaffy, p. 215) from the position held in the first to that taken up in the second edition. In the former he merely makes the internal sense fully as phenomenal as the external. To use Dr. Mahaffy's words, "our external experience is as immediate, and therefore as certain, as our internal experience. He [Kant] also shows that neither can give us any information concerning things per se." In the second edition, looking about for what shall correspond to Substance, he tells us that "the quantity of the world is never changed," and comes to that "Principle of Permanence" which practically made space prior to time in its apprehension. "We can prove against Descartes that internal evidence, which he thought so certain, is only possible by presupposing external experience, which he thought uncertain." Dr. Mahaffy does not notice that there is in this an apparent contradiction. If Kant here holds that space is prior to time in its apprehension, how are we to reconcile that with the fact that, in his discussion of the schematism of the categories, he begins with their projection into the form of time, and thus reaches space? But, were we to enter into all the details of Kantian criticism, we should require to write a treatise. It is to the credit of Dr. Mahaffy and his fellow-labourer that they have been as sparing as they have been judicious in their explanation and notes. The student of Kant must, however, be careful to bear in mind, when reading this book, that the first part is principally expository, excellently fitted to tell what Kant did and did not say, while the second is tinged with the colours of a later metaphysic.

* Kant's Critical Philosophy for English Readers. By John P. Mahaffy, D.D., Fellow and Tutor of Trinity College, Dublin, Professor of Ancient History in the University of Dublin, and John H. Bernard, B.D., Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, Archbishop King's Lecturer in Divinity in the University of Dublin. A new and completed edition. Vol. I. The Kritik of the Pure Reason Explained and Defended. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

Social Progress. An Essay. By Daniel Greenleaf Thompson. London: Longmans & Co. 1889.

Psychology. By John Dewey, Ph.D., Assistant-Professor of Philosophy in Michigan University. London: Trübner & Co. 1889.

Altruism we have always with us, and it is tiresome to repeat criticisms upon that doctrine in its most familiar English form, as represented by Mr. Herbert Spencer. In Social Progress, by Mr. Daniel Greenleaf Thompson, we find the latest word of adherence to that philosopher. The first part of his work consists of a general statement of principles, and is well and clearly written. It is not, however, properly systematic, for, starting from a purely individualistic basis, it is mainly occupied with departing from it. The author will have none of Rousseau's Social Contract as something that happened; yet he holds that all authority is based upon an "implied contract" between individuals. Is not this beginning somehow at the wrong end? Where are we to get our isolated individuals? If it be not entirely true that (as Dr. Westcott says somewhere) "the family and not the individual is the unit of mankind," that statement is a much better one than any which commences with the individual in the abstract. Mr. D. G. Thompson does begin in the latter way, and proceeds to the position that "men live in society because they have a natural appetite for the amicable presence of their fellows." Here, of course, is the well-known difficulty about "natural," of which his studies in Rousseau should have reminded him. The case against him it is easy to put. Either we start from the abstract individual, in which case the foregoing statement is false; or we do not so start, in which case the fundamental principle of the book is destroyed. There are numberless other instances of contradiction and illogicality in the book, but as they generally go to prove that the author is superior to his avowed principles, it is unnecessary to enumerate them. Only two further points may be noticed in Part I. of this book. The first is peculiar. Only the other day we had one of the à priori writers on ethics, in a work called Moral Progress, suggesting that the doctrine of personal immortality was untrue. In the present work we come upon a disciple of Herbert Spencer going back to the old doctrine of reward or compensation to the individual:—"If we believe that our efforts to make such morality universal in human society will tend to secure our happiness hereafter, while a contrary course will have the opposite tendency, even though we suffer for what we do, the hope of future reward will be compensation for present ills." The other sentence in Part I. is really deserving of attention, as enabling us to see ourselves as others see us:—"The English, even, fail to understand that their sentiment of loyalty to a sovereign and an aristocracy, beautiful as it may sometimes appear, makes them for ever to grind ruthlessly the face of the poor." Mr. D. Greenleaf Thompson is quite right. We do fail to see it. With regard to Part II. of his book it is unnecessary to go into detail. The author is a tolerable example of many writers of the laissez faire school; while, being a lawyer, he is not ignorant of its defects. There are in the second as well as in the first part of his volume many sensible remarks; but the general result is unsatisfactory. It is amusing to find (pp. 132, 133) an elaborate defence of the very personal element in American journalism and then to turn back and read (p. 127) about "that singular caddishness which runs all through British society, pervading even the world of letters." Immediately after this comes the tremendous outburst:—"What a lamentable state of morals and manners is witnessed when Mr. Gladstone becomes ostracized from Tory households, to which he was formerly a welcome guest, and when party lines determine generally social hospitalities!" Poor Mr. Greenleaf Thompson! We fear that some of his favourite Yankee journals have taken the liberty of hoaxing him. One thing we can say in his favour, that he is perfectly definite in his statements about the results at which he has arrived. If, however, we look at his book from the philosophical point of view, it is inconsistent and unsystematic. If we consider it more generally, it would be worthy of higher commendation were it cleansed of prejudice and loosely-formed opinions. As a lawyer, Mr. Thompson should see the force of the first objection; as an earnest man with a good purpose, he should try to get rid of the second.

The second edition of Dr. Dewey's Psychology contains a few alterations; but in all essential respects it is identical with the first. His aim has been to produce a good text-book for class-work, and it is only fair to say that he has done this. Of course his work is by no means perfect; but we do not know one that, for the purpose, could be preferred to it. In some cases—as, for example, in his discussion upon "Intuition"—there are some remarks to which exception might be taken. The separation of the world-intuition and the self-intuition, and the progress from the former to the latter, raise questions which, he must know, have occasioned considerable discussion. He is, however, quite right in the general attitude which he takes up. Psychology is a science; but it is not as other sciences, for in it the examiner and the examined are one. He is also right when he shows how impossible it is to study the science without some philosophic principle. Whether the metaphysic which underlies his psychology be justifiable is another question. If there were any fault to be found with his book, it would be in the facts that he introduces a mass of material, some of which might be dispensed with, and that his references to other works are often too numerous and minute. These references are for the benefit of the student, and they should not be of such a kind as even to suggest vanity on the part of the author. However, he has the example of many German and Dutch writers to countenance him in this respect.

COLD STEEL.*

TWO chief problems must nowadays always confront the sanguine "lover of a blade" when he first contemplates giving his associates in the noble pursuit of swordsmanship the benefit, in a literary form, of his experience, his own special lore, and his deductions. He has first to persuade himself that there is really still something new to be said on a subject the broad principles of which have long been placed beyond the scope of controversy, whilst its practice depends ultimately on individual characteristics. In the second place, he must devise a title possessed of some sort of individuality.

In adding yet another to the eight hundred odd treatises on the regulated use of the sword, whether art, science, or "à-la-mode accomplishment," known to the bibliographer, Captain Hutton has succeeded under both these heads of difficulty. He has selected a title and a line of argument well in accordance with that very perceptible mood of the present day—the reaction against the artificial subtlety and conventionality of modern "fencing-room" method, and the tendency to look on the masters of the past, not merely as quaint old fellows, but as men who understood the art of fence in its practical meaning. It may be asserted that the production of anything entirely new under the guise of a treatise on fencing is an absolute impossibility. There is, it is true, a very regular supply of such literature—an average, we believe, of four new works yearly in various languages—but the demand for this supply is due, in the first place, to a somewhat limited issue, and in the second to the desire, natural to the devotees of certain celebrated schools, to see in luxurious type and arrayed in scientific order the much-practised lessons of a favourite master. The only real field of investigation, however, left to the swordsman is the historical, which may produce works of curious interest both to the fencer and to the antiquary. In such a matter the forgotten is as good as the new—sometimes, indeed, much better. This, it may be asserted, is Captain Hutton's firm belief. There is undoubtedly, in Cold Steel, quite enough information, new in that particular aspect, to justify the appearance of another book of fence.

The author is entitled to speak with authority. He is well known as a swordsman of the "practical" order and experienced in the management of military schools, as the compiler of several sound booklets on sword and bayonet practice—the matter of which has at last been partly embodied in the new regulation bayonet exercise—and as the possessor of the finest collection of works on the "Art Dimicatory" in England. He is further well acquainted, not only with the "differences" of foreign schools, but also with the uncompromising practicality of Eastern swordsmanship.

It is easy to perceive that the author is deeply read in those ancient treatises, English and foreign, which delight book collectors, but which the everyday modern fencer looks upon casually as mere amusing curiosities. The very title under which his contribution to that favourite literature is offered, proclaims, almost unwittingly, long familiar consorting with those he reverently calls the "Great Masters." It is couched in rich and round lapidary style, flowingly filling a goodly title-page, and at once recalls to the mind visions of ancient Paradoxes of Defence and Disquisitions on the Grandeur of the Sword:—"Cold Steel: a practical treatise on the sabre; based on the old English Backsword Play of the eighteenth century, combined with the method of the modern Italian school; also on various other weapons of the present day, including the short sword-bayonet and the constable's truncheon; illustrated with numerous figures and also with reproductions of engravings from masters of bygone years."

* Cold Steel. By Alfred Hutton, late Captain King's Dragoon Guards—London: Clowes.

Heraldic plates, dedicatory and other epistles on cognate matters are neglected nowadays, although such comfortable padding seems still to be often resorted to for the dignifying of similar works abroad; but Cold Steel is adorned, as the best precedents required, with the necessary engraved frontispiece, showing the master in his working attire. Here the author is represented in a black cord fencing suit, surrounded by the tools of his most congenial pursuit—ancient books and swords. In his hand is a favourite specimen of the swept hilted rapier, one, it may be interesting to note, well known to the fraternity of "Kernoozers." Of the fifty-five full-page engravings which illustrate Captain Hutton's comprehensive views on the sabre, the duelling-sword, the "Bastone"—as a type of two-hand weapons—the sword-bayonet, either hastate or pugio-wise, and the policeman's truncheon, more than half show in both the adversaries a Corsican-brother-like presentment of the author himself. Excellent as they are in their correctness of attitude, they would give the reader in many cases, more especially in the display of high-octave and horizontal-quarte, an impression of truculence which happily the frontispiece is there to remove. The remainder consist of reductions of ancient engravings, rare and otherwise interesting. Among these appear, reproduced for the first time, four of the plates devised and engraved by Scotin for the "Backsword" album of the notorious ex-gladiator, Captain Millar, published in 1738, one of the scarcest books of fence, and at the same time the only one extant illustrative of our swordsmen's prize-fighting. Fourteen others are facsimiles of Marozzo's "seizures" in corps-à-corps fighting, taken from the rarer and more artistic first edition of 1536; two more are taken from the best works of the seventeenth century.

These plates alone, entailing as they do a disquisition on topics now very generally ignored, even by decidedly keen amateurs, would suffice to make of Cold Steel an attractive work. But the writer justifies throughout the claim of his title, and must be said to have produced a book very unlike the periodical treatises devoted to conventional fencing, whether that of the German schläger, of the Italian sword, or of the French foil. His method of treatment is likewise original. For everything which is not of his own selection among recognized modern schools—a selection guided by the sole consideration of practicality—we have chapter and verse referring us to some sturdy old swordsman or other, one who thought his art more concerned with the overcoming of an enemy at sharps than with the courteous play of the fencing-floor. As a result, there is in his admonitions a characteristically contemptuous tone when adverting to that numerous class of would-be swordsmen, who show themselves so valorously eager to close, so fiercely regardless with blunts and in pads of a menacing point or a sweeping edge. This misconception of the purpose of practice in the school is no new thing. Two hundred years ago good old Sir William Hope, of Balcomie, a keen dilettante of fence, who, like the present writer, could speak with the authority of wide experience, had his wrath excited by precisely similar solecisms. Those plausible persons whose experience is not only limited to "blunts," but who fail to realize the significance of a hit, he grandly classifies as "Ignorants," reserving the equally quaint title of "Artist" to those who, whether their experience is limited or not to school practice, never lose the proper sense of point and edge:—

He [the Ignorant] very well considering that he can receive no Prejudice by being hitt by a blunt Fleuret. Rusheth and Rambleth still forewards [let him receive never so many Thrusts], until he either hitteth the Artist with one of his Rambling Thrusts, or other wayes cometh so Closs that the Artist must enclose with him. . . . Wherefore, if I were to play with an "Ignorant" for a wager I would play with Fleurets having a quarter of an inch of point beyond the button, and then, in God's name, let him Ramble his Belly full.

Grumbles of this kind, more or less vigorously expressed, occur in many of the "old masters' works. In the case of foil-fencing, a more or less successful attempt has been made to combat the natural tendency to recklessness in presence of a comfortable button by strict conventions regulating the "artistic" value of hits. Foil-fencing, indeed, is nothing if not conventional, and must be looked upon as the grammar of swordsmanship. But in the case of stick or sabre-play, which requires wider and more powerful action, the self-control necessary to avert unseemly scrambles is more difficult to cultivate in the schools. This, however, is not sufficient excuse for the preposterous scrimmage which in so many instances still passes for sword-play. Captain Hutton seems, almost unconsciously, infected by the uncompromising style of his favourite eighteenth-century authorities. Talking of the ubiquitous class of indomitable players, who fearlessly rush a counter, who gaily "pocket" their hits if they can at the same time "plant" their own, "Such behaviour," he remarks severely, "amounts in itself to something very like horse-play, and, if persisted in, calls for treatment of exceptional character. Lonnergan, as I have before remarked, prescribes, as a remedy for a gentleman of this class, the darting of the pommel in his face. But I think his discomfiture may be attained in a more merciful manner by 'commanding' at one and the same time both his person and his sword in the manner advocated by Liancour (1686)."

Foil-play—the diagram of swordsmanship, as it has been called—could not be considered in a book like Cold Steel. But the author assumes that the swordsman is duly impressed with the immense advantage derivable from its serious practice, and applies its principles to the management of every hand-to-hand weapon. He does so, indeed, to an extent which may perhaps seem exaggerated. No doubt, sixteen distinct parries and guards in sword-play constitute a very perfect system, which should meet every conceivable attack. But we might question whether the professedly practical purpose of the book would not have been better furthered by a somewhat less exhaustive sequence. On the other hand, the chapter devoted to duelling sword-play is unduly curtailed. This, as far as we know, is the very first time the subject has been treated in English; the "hit-where-you-can" fence is undoubtedly gaining favour in the best fencing-rooms, and a longer discussion on what is now recognized as a distinct system would no doubt have been welcome.

The chapters dealing with the sabre as opposed to the bayonet or the rapier, with the great stick (Italicè "bastone"), with the ancient dagger-play, and with that cognate but ultra-modern implement the truncheon, are specially interesting to those devotees of fencing schools who like variety in their battles.

The book is closed by an appendix devoted to a proposal for a system of "rules" to be followed in an assault or in a match or contest for prizes. It is one the perusal of which might be strenuously recommended to the arbiters who preside yearly at Islington over swordsmen's competitions; the dissatisfaction of the performers at the erratic manner in which "hits" are awarded is only equalled by the astonishment of those among the spectators who understand something of what is going on. It is an undoubted fact that many of the best swordsmen in the service have given up competing at Islington in disgust at the utter incompetence of some of the judges.

ORANGE STREET CHAPEL.*

THERE is a classical corner on the south side of Leicester Square where a narrow entrance leads us into St. Martin's Street. A dingy house on the left bears a tablet to remind the passer-by that Sir Isaac Newton lived there. It does not add that a few years ago an enterprising American bought and took away Sir Isaac's observatory from off the roof. From 1710 to 1727 Newton and his beautiful but, it is to be feared, naughty niece, so much praised and abused by Swift in his Journal to Stella, lived in this house, then surrounded by the fields called after Leicester House, and bordered by Hedge Lane and St. Martin's Lane, both still perfectly open, although building had commenced in Soho. After Newton's time the house was inhabited by Dr. Burney, who wrote the History of Music, and his more celebrated daughter, who, as Fanny Burney, is remembered as the author of Evelina, written in "a little play-room up two pair of stairs," and as Mme. D'Arblay earned a second reputation as a diarist. Mr. Free remarks that in the very year that Evelina was the fashionable novel of society Augustus Montague Toplady died and was buried in Tottenham Court Chapel, "under the gallery opposite the pulpit." The writer of that magnificent hymn, "Rock of Ages," he was minister of the French chapel in St. Martin's Street, and was only thirty-eight at the time of his death. We may remember that, besides the Burneys and Toplady, the semi-rural charms of Leicester Fields drew together Sir Joshua Reynolds, Dr. Johnson, Windham, Burke, Goldsmith, John Newton, and Thomas Scott, the son of a Lincolnshire farmer, and author of a famous Commentary still in vogue. The divines in this list were mainly attracted to St. Martin's Street by the chapel, and Mr. Free has done well to give us this interesting history. "There are," he says, "two great periods in the history of Orange Street Chapel, each consisting of about a century." Here, at the outset, we must disagree with Mr. Free. There are three very well marked periods, and only a determination not to see the sharpness of the boundary-line could have enabled him to overlook the difference in the chapel before and after 1787. During the past century it has been neither more nor less than a Congregationalist meeting-house, and Mr. Free's long, and indeed eloquent, exhortations to religious toleration only amount to this—that he would have the Established Church more willing to acknowledge what is good in Dissent. He evidently does not recognize the insuperable difficulties, nor does he see that, when he praises Eyre for putting a Nonconformist at the head of Hackney College, he praises him for an act of disloyalty, almost of treachery, to his own Church. "John Eyre," he tells us, "was a clergyman of the Church of England, and the fact that he chose a Dissenting minister for the first tutor of his new institution is more convincing than many arguments could be of the real unity that existed in his time between Christians of various denominations." We cannot agree with this view. On the contrary, it seems to us that Eyre, with Toplady, Newton, Scott, and others, not to mention Whitefield and Wesley—all of whom lived and died English Churchmen—deserve, in spite of the good they unquestionably did, to have this flaw clearly pointed out. For the sake of keeping alive certain views, some of them, no doubt, liberal enough, but the majority narrow beyond conception, they were willing to allow, nay, to assist, those who "sat under" them to leave the Church that they themselves clung to. The history, then, of Orange Street Chapel seems to divide itself into the French period, when the Huguenot refugees who abounded in the neighbourhood built it and opened it for the service of the Church of England, as performed in French; the Anglican period, when the ministrations were carried on by Toplady, Illingworth, Cecil, and others whom the Church will not easily forget, mistaken and narrow-minded though they were; and, finally, into the years from 1787 to the present day, when Congregationalist preachers have taken the place of clergymen.

* Lux Benigna; being the History of Orange Street Chapel. By Richard W. Free. London: Whittingham.

Mr. Free has much that is of interest to tell us of the French period. He has taken great pains to hunt up the old registers, and has also gathered a large mass of anecdote as to the more celebrated of the Huguenot preachers, and as to the manners and customs of the congregation. He carefully describes a service at which the great James Saurin—who, by the way, was never incumbent here—preached the sermon. He had been brought over from France, on the Revocation, enclosed in a barrel. Mr. Free describes him as reading the prayers, the people standing, their hats hung in every conceivable place. Presently a youthful minister ascends the pulpit stairs and delivers an impressive prayer. That over, every man puts on his hat and sits down. The preacher also wears a three-cornered hat, and "his face is perfectly oval, and stands out of his great wig like a picture out of a frame."

Mr. Free does not write as if he had enjoyed many opportunities of studying the higher graces of literary composition, but he improves as he goes on. It thus comes to pass that the first part of the book, the most interesting, is in places almost unreadable; while the latter part, where he introduces the plea for toleration to which we have referred, is, though too much like a sermon, written so as to run fluently. Mr. Free is very fond of a phrase which, as he uses it, seems to be simple nonsense, though he probably imagines he is quoting a text of Holy Writ:—"And he who runs may read the tempering effects of time"; or, as in another place, "that all who ran might read what great things their human god had done for the French." On the whole, we may thank Mr. Free for this little volume on an interesting building, and may congratulate him on having brought out fully the historical as well as the religious associations which are connected with Orange Street Chapel.

MEDIA.*

UNLIKE the other contributions to Mr. Fisher Unwin's series, this volume is concerned not so much with the "Story" of any one particular people as with the relations between several of the nations of the old world. It traces the main outlines of the history of the Eranians from their earliest records contained in their sacred books to the moment when Darius determined to overwhelm Hellas with his armies, and, in showing how this conquering race took to itself the inheritance of older nations, it brings out with admirable distinctness the connecting links between the histories of the great Powers of Western Asia. Mme. Ragozin, whose "Stories" of Chaldaea and Assyria are among the best volumes of this unequal series, exhibits here as elsewhere a thorough acquaintance with the growth and present condition of learning with regard to the ancient monarchies of the East, and expounds in an attractive manner the results attained by the most eminent scholars. Now and then she is somewhat wordy, and she certainly devotes a disproportionate amount of space to her examination of the Zend-Avesta. Still, though it takes up too many pages of her book, her estimate of the work of Zoroaster—we must decline to reject the well-known form of the name in favour of Zarathushtra—is interesting and well considered. He is represented as fixing and expressing in its highest degree the tendency already existing among the Eranians to apply a system of spiritual and allegorical interpretation to the primeval Aryan myths. The apostle of the purest and loftiest conception of the Dualism of Nature, he enabled his people to grasp a doctrine after which they were already feeling. While he was on a higher level than his disciples, they "had in themselves the seed of the thoughts which he expounded to them." After his time there began a process of adaptation; the new religion was fitted on to old forms and prejudices, and changes were effected, the character of which is amply illustrated by a comparison between the Yasna-liturgy and the earlier Gâthas. Later developments of Mazdeism departed still further from the sublime simplicity of Zoroaster's teaching, which among the northern Eranians, and especially among the Medes, became overlaid with a mass of ceremonial observances. From the doctrine of the purity of the elements arose the custom of exposing the dead in Dakhmas or Towers of Silence, about which Mme. Ragozin gives some curious particulars. Several traces of Turanian influence are noted in the religion which grew out of the Gâthic revelation, and among them the excessive reverence shown to fire. After a short chapter on the closing years of the kingdom of Judah, Mme. Ragozin speaks of the conflict between the Lydian and Median monarchies, and the triple alliance formed between Media, Babylon, and Lydia, after the battle of the Eclipse. A remarkably interesting chapter is devoted to a description of the city of Babylon and its inhabitants, and good use is made of the comments of Professor Delitzsch and M. Lenormant on the recently discovered records of the Banking-house of Égibi or Jacob, to which, through several centuries, the whole financial business of the Court was entrusted. There is little which can be said for certain about the Medes, and after a good summary of what is known, or may fairly be assumed, with reference to the Magi, we pass on to Persian history. The volume ends with a pleasantly written and critical narrative of the reigns of Cyrus and Cambyses, and of the reign of Darius down to his attempt to conquer the Greeks. This part of Mme. Ragozin's book of course overlaps the volume on Persia already published in the same series.

SINGLE VOLUMES.*

"YRLA" tells a story which proves that there are still writers willing to spend pains, time, and calculation, dates, historical facts and the best of their emotions upon a work—rightly so called—of fiction. Three Friends must have taken long to write. It opens with a scene in which the taller and fairer exchanges reminiscences with the darker and shorter, and "he who was addressed as Henry" replies in a manner calculated to elicit the Christian and family names of his intimate companion. After we have thus made acquaintance, we are surprised to find ourselves taking something like a real interest in the fortunes of the two young Prussian soldiers, who confess to one another, with the greatest propriety of polysyllables, that they are in love with the self-same Cecilia. How they start with the best altruistic intentions; how they declare themselves together—"Cilla, dearest, I love you—we both love you," is what the spokesman says, none of the three young people having any sense of humour—how the machinations of a fiendish uncle and the fortunes of war favour the betrayal of the taller by the shorter friend; how a very well-constructed intrigue follows, and how the events of the time (the first years of the century) are carefully complicated with the love-interest; all this a majority of readers will consent to be told without weariness, so refreshing is the absence of psychology, so hearty the villany, so surpassing the female beauty. The villain is Juan. "Shut up!" retorted Juan fiercely," but he apparently repents of the colloquialism. "Come nearer; we will confer." He also says, "How I would like to wring that lawyer's head from off his body! How I would see with exultation all the Rothecks quivering in torments which my mind alone conceives; how all my senses would be ravished could I tear out my nephew's craven heart! My hands steeped in his blood, my eyes gloating over his agony, my ears resounding with his frenzied shrieks—oh, what a satisfaction!" After one of these life-like expressions of human passion, which are frequent, the author remarks, with unparalleled naïveté:—"It was a scene powerful in the extreme." It was certainly meant to be. And when Juan, in prison, is converted by the exhortations of the chaplain, we feel that no ending less satisfactory would have been in place. The story reads curiously like a translation. If it is such, the mind that conceived its tempestuous incidents is not responsible for the grammar of this:—"Richard turned his large eyes on his uncle like he had once before"; or this:—"Richard had laid with his back to the notary"; and again:—"Suppose I lay in wait for this individual."

Anstruther's wife, Ella, is at first a maiden who reads the Idylls of the King—the author misquotes Maud, by the way—with a constancy not easily reconciled with the comparative brevity of that famous series, even when completed. Her girlishness, of figure, of handwriting, of demeanour throughout, is insisted upon with the determination which we find so formidable in female authors of a certain class. Repetition is a dreary trick in the conversation of many women, especially women whose vivacity of manner makes the dull habit the more unwelcome; and women who write effusive books put ready-made little adjectives into them with a reiteration that spares not. While Ella's father, the Dean, is engaged upon a treatise on the classics (a "treatise" on "the classics!"), Colonel Anstruther, wearing what the author oddly calls a "pretty morning suit," with checks in the design, falls in love with Ella. His discovery in her portfolio of an enlarged copy of his own photograph, executed by her own hand, and described as "one of her best and boldest efforts," reveals the fact that she, too, has lost her heart; and without ceasing for a moment to be girlish, Ella becomes Anstruther's wife. Anstruther furnishes for her a house according to the last word of æsthetic art, which apparently includes an indefinite number of "Birket Fosters"; but things turn to misfortune. Ella allows her husband to suspect her, under circumstances that entirely absolve him from the charge of undue jealousy, and, with the pigheadedness characteristic of the ready-made heroine, breaks

* Three Friends. By Yrla. London: Digby & Long.

Anstruther's Wife. By Josephine Michell. London: Roper & Drowley.

In the Spring-time. By Alice Weber. London: Smith & Innes.

A Babe in Bohemia. By Frank Danby. London: Spencer Blackett.

The Pretty Sister of José. By Frances Hodgson Burnett. London: Spencer Blackett.

* Story of the Nations—Media, Babylonia, and Persia, from the Fall of Nineveh to the Persian War. By Zénaïde A. Ragozin. London: Fisher Unwin. 1889.

her husband's heart and her own in order to keep a promise to her father from which a change in all the conditions of the case had obviously dispensed her. We cannot dismiss Miss Michell's novel, any more than its predecessors, without a word of warning as to grammar. The Dean should not say "I expect he has a great deal to see"; nor should the author say that her heroine "laid back on her pillow"; nor should Ella say "I suppose he will keep on wanting money like he did from poor papa," a nasty little error which her husband repeats—"She has been sleeping for hours like you see her now."

Very much better than Anstruther's Wife is In the Spring-time, although Miss Weber is not quite guiltless of the poor habit of repetition. The leading idea of her story is the familiar one of a little apostolate between young people. A cousin Archie inspires the heroine with a sense of the duty of looking on the bright side of things; and she, in her turn, reforms altogether the affectation and triviality of the girl who is her own successful rival in love. Cousin Archie is not much more than a school-girl's conception of a man; and too much is made of the rather small idea of spring and sunshine, with their easy similitudes. Moreover, in the heroine's first and childish trial we fancy we recognize a gooseberry-tart and a rice-pudding very familiar in literature administered to ourselves in early youth. There is nothing less distinctive and unique than English cookery, it is true; nevertheless, we believe that these particular dishes belong to Holme Lee, and that in one of her pleasant books a little girl's fortitude is overcome by the appearance of the pudding instead of the tart. However this little point might be adjudged, there is plenty in the story that is Miss Weber's own. A sick child and an old cottager are as unlike as possible to persons of their class in the novel "of commerce"; there is sufficient character and humour here to make us wish for a little more of the same kind, and, proportionately, for a little less of wishy-washy sentiment. The book is a wholesome one, not only in intention, which is common enough, but in achievement.

The wholesome rule that "revolting" stories shall not revolt, and that "painful" incidents shall not give pain, but shall stimulate a pleasure which is not to be explicitly confessed, is broken by the writer known as Frank Danby. She gives unquestionable pain and revolts every feeling which a reader's self-love itself would wish to spare. Whether her work is un livre de bonne foy, or not, it is not easy to pronounce confidently. She has an unfortunate acquaintance with vile things and persons, and she finds, almost instinctively, the word that labels their vileness. But to what purpose is it done? Will any "babe" be rescued from the dismal and dirty life which Frank Danby calls Bohemia through the publication of this story of futile sorrow?

Mrs. Hodgson Burnett, in her short story, The Pretty Sister of José, seeks the safe ground of contemporary conventional Spain. Here is the kind of tale that is inevitably told in a modified baby language, remotely suggestive of that which Mrs. Plornish devised for the benefit of Mr. John Baptist. Here we have the pretty girl and the bull-fighter so familiar in the novel of commerce, so ready to the storyteller's hand, and, sooth to say, of such deadly lack of interest to the reader. "Plaza del Toros," by the way, is a bit of local language that occurs too often to be a mere slip of the pen; there is, however, a good deal of "Mother of God!" and other local language in English, so perhaps we should not be too exacting.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

HAD the little book which M. Constant de Tours (1) has edited for M. Quantin reached us a little sooner we should have classed it with guide-books last week; but we are glad to give it a place of greater honour here. It is really a capital little volume, the only objection that we can find to it being that its shape—a long oblong—makes the leaves flop down on the astonished countenance of the unwary one who reads it lying back in an easy chair, if he holds it rather close to his eyes. To which M. Quantin may justly answer that he does not publish with a view to short-sighted fainéants in easy chairs. The guide itself takes the form of a twenty days' walk about Paris; and, though written with an evident intention of sprightliness, is as minute, practical, and exhaustive as the small extent of its letter-press admits. But its main feature consists in the engravings, which are exceedingly numerous, admirably executed, taken (as they boast, and as certain details in the case of at least some of them amply prove) recently d'après nature, and, finally, selected and designed with really remarkable skill. The "Vue synoptique des gares de Paris et des pays qu'elles desservent," which is almost the first of them, gives a fair example of the combination of ingenuity and elegance which marks them (though by the way M. Quantin should have "Darmouth," which by a clerical error shows in this plate, altered to "Weymouth"). The promise of this is well carried out by the rest. No select list of them—there are two hundred in all—that we could give would give a fair idea of them. Notre Dame and the Bal Bullier, the Eiffel Tower and the Sorbonne, the "Cinquième dessous" of the Opera and the Tour Saint-Jacques, Guignol and the venerable apse of Montmartre, jostle each other (or, rather, are arranged side by side in great decency and order) after a very agreeable fashion. The book will be a good companion on a visit to Paris, and by no means a bad substitute for such a visit just now, in the case of those amiable persons who, like Mlle. Philpon, "hate the living people," though they "like the statues."

The late M. Nisard's volume, Ægri Somnia (2), has a melancholy title, but it is not a wholly melancholy book. Some Academic reminiscences going as far back as Royer-Collard, and passing through Claude Bernard to M. Pasteur, contain matter of interest; there is a spirited, but rather too long, answer in verse to the insults, unworthy alike of himself and his subjects, which Hugo in his old age permitted himself towards M. Nisard; there is a rather pleasant paper on "Diligences et Chemins de Fer." But the great majority of the "Pensées et Caractères" with which the book opens are charged with more chagrin than wisdom, while their form, though not bad, is scarcely striking enough to enable it to pass muster before its author's own warning, "Aucune loi ne condamne un honnête homme à écrire des maximes." M. Nisard was too faithful a classicist himself to have objected to the Virgilian quotation which rises in our mind—

Luctus et ultrices posuere cubilia Curæ,
Pallentesque habitant Morbi tristisque Senectus
Et Metus—

as the fittest motto of at least this part of the book, which seems to have been written under the pressure of all these evils. It is, however, a book by no means devoid of interest.

In order to appreciate M. Pellissier's sketch of nineteenth-century literature in France (3), it is necessary to remember that he has set himself to write, as we are told, not a "tableau de la littérature," but a "revue du mouvement littéraire." We are not certain that the distinction is one easily maintainable in a clear and logical way. But M. Pellissier interprets it as giving him a license to speak only of the chiefs of each school while imposing the condition of speaking of all the different schools. There are good things in the volume—the remarks on Mme. de Staël may be mentioned as a specimen—but we are not sure that it is well planned as a whole.

Books on the countries at the back of Senegal, which the French regard as, and which they are rapidly building up into, a "French Soudan," multiply, and, as we have remarked more than once, are worth study. M. Bichet, who seems to have held in the interior a sort of headship of a small station, half civil, half military, gives a very vivid and precise account of native life (4), to which it would seem his countrymen accommodate themselves very readily. One remark of his recalls historical examples, especially those of the Canadian half-breeds. He looks forward to a great support for French rule in the mulattos who are becoming numerous in consequence of the genial French habit (which he himself fully shared) of forming marital, or quasi-marital, connexion with native women. Now, we, on the contrary, are certainly not given to regarding Eurasians as bulwarks of our Indian Empire. In fact, though (or because) no race is more mixed than the English, none seems to stand further crossing of this kind so badly; always supposing that it is not only a case of our nasty arrogance.

M. de Pontmartin's Péchés de vieillesse (5) contains a rather pleasant mixture of papers of very different kinds. We do not pretend to know whether the story which he tells us, that of La véritable auberge des Adrets, is true, but there is no reason why it should not be. Les feux de paille, L'impasse, English spoken, are good tales, and there are some remembrances of Rachel which will not lack readers.

Mrs. Molesworth's notion of a series of letters (6) written by an English girl to her sister under French inspection is not a bad one and is well carried out. There are notes, but not too many. Mr. Croft's grammar (7) is planned as a sort of skeleton to be clothed upon by the teacher with the aid of that fetish of modern education the blackboard.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

IN The Bibles of England (Alexander Gardner) Dr. Andrew Edgar puts forth "a plain account for plain people of the principal versions of the Bible in English," illustrated by comparative readings, and supplying an excellent general survey of the subject. The book is one for which we have long thought there must be a considerable, if not a popular, demand. It may be described as an attempt to do for English readers of the Bible what is done for the Church of England laity in the "Inter-leaved" Prayer Book. There are, we believe, many persons other than collectors of Bibles who possess copies of the older

(2) Ægri Somnia. Par D. Nisard. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(3) Le mouvement littéraire au XIX^{ème} siècle. Par Georges Pellissier. Paris: Hachette.

(4) Cinq ans de Séjour au Soudan français. Par E. Bichet. Paris: Plon.

(5) Péchés de vieillesse. Par A. de Pontmartin. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(6) French Life in Letters. By Mrs. Molesworth. London: Macmillan & Co.

(7) The Pupil's Concise French Grammar. By S. Croft. London: Relie.

(1) Paris et l'exposition de 1889. Paris: Quantin.

sixteenth-century translations. For such Dr. Edgar's volume will be a valuable handbook. To the general reader also it will be found to possess many aspects of interest. The characteristics, the merits or defects of rendering, the circumstances in which the various versions were executed, peculiarities of style and diversities of translation, are among the chief matters dealt with. The writer's comparative method is precisely what is required to instruct and interest most readers. The versions discussed comprise Wyclif's, Tyndale's Testament, with its revision, Coverdale's, with the second or "Great Bible," Matthew's, Taverner's, the Geneva renderings, the so-called Bishops' Bible, the Douay, and the Authorized and Revised Versions, somewhat oddly styled by Dr. Edgar the National and Inter-National Bibles. In addition to these eminent examples, others more curious than valuable are described; private enterprises such as Sir John Cheke's fragment of the New Testament and the New Testament version of the Rev. William Thomson, of Ochiltree (1816), towards which Carlyle subscribed the sum of one pound four. Dr. Edgar's specimens of the industrious Thomson's work by no means mitigate Carlyle's criticism of his "style of writing and thinking," which he declared was as "dull and sluggish as the clay itself."

Those admirers of the short story as it appeared in Rowland Grey's Lindenblumen may be sincerely advised to read a fresh instalment by the same writer—Jacob's Letter; and other Stories (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.)—in which the author's charms of style and of sentiment give distinction to the simplest sketch. Delicate workmanship is the attribute common to all these graceful stories. The unconscious influence of children is illustrated with rare sympathy and admirable art in "King Philip"; indeed, we know of no treatment of this attractive yet difficult theme so successful, from the artistic point of view, as this exquisite little story, though many readers may prefer the spring-like fancy that irradiates "Saint Catherine's Tresses" and "Prince Boris."

It cannot be said in these days, when the slackening of the moral fibre of the community is perceptible in every direction, that "A Graduate of Oxford"—who decidedly is not another Mr. Ruskin—gratifies a crying want by his essay Irresponsibility and its Recognition (Trübner & Co.) The shirking, or denial, of responsibility is already fast becoming, in "advanced" circles, the mark of the emancipated. Neither the arguments nor the remedial proposals of "A Graduate" possess educational virtue or value. The latter would not lessen the evils he discusses, which, indeed, often spring, in a large measure, from a criminal and cowardly shifting of responsibility to "society" or the laws of the land.

Mr. John Cameron Grant's New Verse in Old Vesture (E. W. Allen), with an introduction by Mr. Gleeson White, is a remarkable collection of specimens of metrical forms derived from foreign poetic sources. In addition to capital examples of the ballade, villanelle, rondeau, and other forms now more or less acclimatized, it contains three or four variations of the "gloze," and a chant royal "double." This last exercise is a tremendous achievement, and will, doubtless, urge many manipulators of verse on the path of destruction. The Mask of Death; and other Poems (Chicago: Belford, Clarke, & Co.) contains pleasing, if not striking, evidence that Mr. Charles Lotin Hildreth is a singer gifted with fancy and fluency, if not the shaping spirit of imagination. Bertram, the Prince (Philadelphia: printed for the Author), is an idyl of romantic flavour, and mildly Tennysonian. The blank verse of the anonymous poet is smooth, yet faint, too faint, in its modulations to yield the variety and energy the measure requires. The "story," however, is pretty, and fairly well handled. The critic drops his weapons in the presence of a lady to whom "rhyme has been easy and natural from seven years of age," as the confession runs in the preface to Leisure Moments, by Elizabeth A. Needham (James Blackwood). Here is obviously a case of poeta nascitur, as the author delicately hints; and as fresh volumes are promised till the case is proved we spare the bud and await the expanded flower.

The Quick or the Dead? receives the honours of parody—and full-blown they are—in Mr. De Leon's merry and wicked skit, The Rock or the Rye, of which we have the twenty-fifth edition issued by that strange American institution the "Gossip Publishing Company" of Mobile.

Mr. C. F. Holder's All About Pasadena (Boston: Lee & Shepard. London: Trübner) is an illustrated handbook of the most seductive kind. The fame of Los Angeles county, California, is already wafted abroad; and of this delightful region Pasadena is the gem—a paradise for the jaded, a health-resort of impeccable climate and infinite attractions.

The Girl's Own Outdoor Book (Religious Tract Society), edited by Charles Peters, is an excellent compendium of open-air games and exercises, as good in its way as the companion volume of indoor amusements issued at Christmas.

Mr. J. F. Ingram's Land of Gold, Diamonds, and Ivory (Whittingham & Co.) is an excellent handbook for men of all sorts and conditions who go down to the sea in the ships of the Union Steamship Company, whether it be to mine or delve, to explore or settle on the soil of South Africa.

When Christmas Cards did last abound there were true Britons who asked why so many of these pretty devices, so many of the equally popular pretty illustrated books of the season, were printed in Germany. Is it all for cheapness these things are done? Here is The Artistic Language of Flowers (Routledge), printed in Leipzig, of which it can only be said that if they cannot print floral designs in Germany less flauntingwise and coarsely than these, the sooner our publishers return to native labour the better.

We have received Vol. X. of The Transactions of the Cumberland and Westmoreland Antiquarian and Archaeological Society, edited by the President, the Worshipful Chancellor Ferguson, M.A. (Kendal: Wilson); The History of Morham, the birth-place of John Knox, by David Loudon (Haddington: Sinclair); Vital Statistics, by Arthur Newsholme, M.D. (Swan Sonnenschein); Anglicized Colloquial Burmese, by Lieut. F. A. L. Davidson (Allen & Co.); Meditations, from the French of Adolph Gratry (Griffith, Farran, & Co.); a second edition of Mr. W. A. Barlow's Normal Phonography (Philadelphia: Lippincott); Index to Physiological Diagrams, drawn by George Davies (W. & A. K. Johnston); and Popular Poets of the Period, edited by F. A. H. Eyles, Nos. 9 and 10 (Griffith, Farran, & Co.)

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

ADVERTISEMENTS intended for the SATURDAY REVIEW should be addressed to the MANAGER of the ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT, at the OFFICE, 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON.

The publication of the SATURDAY REVIEW takes place on Saturday Mornings, in time for the early trains, and copies may be obtained in the Country, through any Newsagent, on the day of publication.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE FATHER DAMIEN MEMORIAL FUND.

President of the Committee.
H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES.

Committee.

The Archbishop of Canterbury.	Sir Alfred Lyall, K.C.B.
The Duke of Norfolk, K.G.	Sir A. Borthwick, M.P.
The Duke of Westminster, K.G.	Sir R. Temple, G.C.S.I., M.P.
The Marquis of Hartington.	Sir George Stokes, Bart., M.P.
The Marquis of Dufferin and Ava, G.C.S.I.	Sir Joseph Fayrer, K.C.S.I.
The Earl of Derby, K.G.	Sir William Jenner, Bart., K.C.B.
The Earl of Carnarvon.	Sir James Paget, Bart.
The Earl of Rosebery.	Sir W. Guyer Hunter, K.C.M.G., M.P.
Lord Randolph S. Churchill, M.P.	Sir W. MacCormac.
Baron Ferdinand Rothschild, M.P.	Sir Charles U. Aitchison, K.C.S.I.
The Bishop of London.	R. Thorne Thorne, M.D.
Dr. Vaughan, Bishop of Salford.	Principal Fairbairn.
The Hon. G. Curzon, M.P.	Jonathan Hutchinson, Esq.
The Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P.	Rev. Hugh Chapman.
The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor.	W. S. Lilly, Esq.
The Right Hon. John Morley, M.P.	E. Lawson, Esq.
General Sir J. Lintorn Simmons, G.C.B.	E. Clifford, Esq.
Cardinal Manning.	Frank Harris, Esq.
Col. Sir Edwd. Bradford, K.C.S.I.

Executive Committee.

The Duke of Norfolk, K.G.	Sir James Paget, Bart.
The Bishop of London.	Sir W. Guyer Hunter, K.C.M.G., M.P.
Cardinal Manning.	Jonathan Hutchinson, Esq.
Baron F. Rothschild, M.P.	E. Clifford, Esq.
The Hon. G. Curzon, M.P.	Frank Harris, Esq. (Hon. Secretary).
Sir Joseph Fayrer, K.C.S.I.

Hon. Treasurers.

Sir Algernon Borthwick, Bart., M.P., 139 Piccadilly, W.
Edward Lawson, Esq., 39 Grosvenor Square, W.

Bankers.

Messrs. Coutts, Strand.
Sir Samuel Scott & Co., Cavendish Square, W.
London and Westminster Bank, Lothbury.

The death of Father Damien, completing the noble sacrifice of himself for his brother men, has suggested the thought that the sympathy of the United Kingdom ought to find expression in a substantial memorial of his work.

It is proposed therefore—

1. That a sum of not less than £500 be appropriated to a memorial to be erected to Father Damien in some public place at Kalawao, and that estimates and designs for a statue, in stone, marble, or bronze, be invited from Mr. Gilbert.

2. (a) That a Fund be formed, the interest of which shall be devoted to the medical treatment and care of indigent British lepers in the United Kingdom.

(b) And that a sum of money be set apart and placed under the control of trustees for the endowment of two Studentships, one student to make the United Kingdom and the remainder of Europe his field of investigation, and the other to go abroad and study the disease in China, the Colonies, and elsewhere. The Studentships to be held for a period of three years, to be renewed by the Trustees if thought desirable.

3. That a Commission be appointed, for not less than one year, consisting of three members, one to be named by the Royal College of Physicians, one by the Royal College of Surgeons, and one by the General Committee of "The Father Damien Memorial Fund," to go out to India for the purpose of investigating the disease of leprosy there, and that the Indian Auxiliary Committee be requested to add two members to this Commission.

The Committee invite public Subscriptions for the above-mentioned objects, while wishing especially to draw the attention of the public to the fact that a large sum of money is needed in order to properly treat the 200,000 lepers in India who are now in many districts without ordinary medical care. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, speaking on this subject at Marlborough House on the 17th inst., said:—"The heroic life and death of Father Damien (de Veuster) has not only roused the sympathy of the United Kingdom, but it has gone deeper; it has brought home to us that the circumstances of our vast Indian and Colonial Empire oblige us, in a measure at least, to follow his example, and this not for foreigners and strangers, but for our own fellow-subjects. India, with its 200,000 lepers, and our Colonies, with their unnumbered but increasing victims to a loathsome, deadly disease, that has hitherto baffled medical skill, have a far stronger claim on our aid than the poor natives of the Hawaiian Islands could ever have had on the young Belgian priest who has given his life for them. It must be remembered also that whilst leprosy has been and is steadily increasing, probably in India, and certainly in our Colonies, it has steadily decreased since 1867 in Norway, where the disease has prevailed for many years to a grave extent, and this decrease is attributed by specialists to the Government measures for isolation which have been there put in force. These measures include compulsory segregation, and have been adopted at a cost of £20,000 a year, although the leper population of Norway now under treatment numbers barely 700 souls."

Donations already received.

H.R.H. the Prince of Wales.....	£105 0 0	General Sir J. Lintorn Simmons	£100 0 0
The Archbishop of Canterbury.....	100 0 0	E. Clifford, Esq.	100 0 0
Cardinal Manning.....	50 0 0	Sir Wm. Guyer Hunter, Bart., M.P.	75 0 0
The Duke of Norfolk.....	500 0 0	Frank Harris, Esq.	52 10 0
The Duke of Westminster.....	500 0 0	The Lord Mayor	50 0 0
Baron Ferdinand Rothschild, M.P.	210 0 0	Sir William Jenner, Bart.	30 0 0
The Earl of Derby, K.G.	200 0 0	Jonathan Hutchinson, Esq.	30 0 0
Sir Algernon Borthwick, Bart., M.P.	165 0 0	Dr. Robson Rose	30 0 0
Edward Lawson, Esq.	105 0 0	Sir James Paget, Bart.	21 0 0
		Dr. R. Thorne Thorne	10 10 0

Donations and Subscriptions forwarded on account of "The Father Damien Fund" to the above-mentioned Treasurers or Bankers, or to the Hon. Secretary of "The Father Damien Fund," Marlborough House, St. James's, will be acknowledged in the public Press.

For CONTENTS see page 30*

A NEW INVENTION.

CHANGES COLOUR AND DEVELOPS OZONE IN WATER.

Patent Rights protected throughout the World.

Salt Regal

SUPPLIES

A REFRESHING, APPETISING, EFFERVESCENT DRINK !

SALT REGAL is a high-class Antiseptic Salt, possessing Hygienic properties hitherto unknown to science. A grateful, cooling cup, developing Ozone (the principle of life). Will cleanse the mouth, clear the throat, sweeten the breath, and maintain a natural condition of the system. Corrects all the impurities arising from errors of diet—eating or drinking. SALT REGAL has the special property of purifying the water in which it is mixed.

SALT REGAL prevents and relieves Flatulence, Nausea, Giddiness, Heartburn, Palpitation, Acidity, Feverishness, Irritation of the Skin, Weariness, Lassitude, General Debility, Diarrhœa, Dysentery. It is a powerful antidote against Blood Poisoning, Typhoid, Cholera, Malaria, and Diphtheria.

SALT REGAL, when regularly used, is a certain guarantee of Health. One draught per week will maintain health, while a daily draught will restore health to the debilitated. SALT REGAL revives and never depresses. Every Traveller or Voyager should carry a bottle of Salt Regal. It relieves the torture of Sea-Sickness.

SALT REGAL should be used daily in every family. Invaluable in the Nursery. A boon to Ladies. Maintains a clear, healthy condition of the skin, and by purifying the system removes all humours from the body, and destroys the sources of bad complexions.

TESTIMONIAL from Dr. PAUL, Fellow of the Institute of Chemistry, and of the Chemical Society.

"20 Victoria Street, Westminster, London, S.W."

"GENTLEMEN,—As the result of careful analysis of 'Salt Regal,' I certify that it is in every respect a well-made preparation. It forms a pleasantly palatable effervescent drink, possessing the useful refrigerant and mild laxative properties appertaining to the alkaline salts of vegetable acids, while the ozonic character of the salt, and the development of a delicate rose colour while dissolving, are novel features of this preparation, which give an agreeable freshness and attractive appearance. The general character of 'Salt Regal' renders it admirably adapted for domestic use, and especially so in-tropical climates.

"B. H. PAUL, F.I.C., F.C.S., Analyst."

(Extract from A. Norman Tate's Report.)

"Institute of Chemical Technology, Liverpool."

"There is an element in this compound not found in other compounded effervescent Salines that I have examined, and this is not only a novelty, but will, I have no doubt, add much to the efficiency of 'Salt Regal.'"

"The ingredients used are free from impurities and injurious substances, and the result of their admixture is a very satisfactory preparation."

"A. N. TATE, F.I.C., F.C.S., Analyst."

"University of Aberdeen."

"I find it to be a very carefully prepared Saline. Its special feature is that it contains a small proportion of a very useful antiseptic, the value of which in such a preparation must be very great. Its use in warm climates will be found to be most valuable, both on account of its gentle aperient qualities, and of its antiseptic property."

"H. T. JONES, F.I.C., Asst. Professor of Chemistry."

SALT REGAL is sold in Bottles (hermetically sealed), price 2s. 9d. It cannot be imitated and stands alone. Be careful to observe Salt Regal is a delicate white powder, but it turns the water to a beautiful Rose Pink; unless it does this it is not genuine, and its sale should be at once reported to the Secretary of the Salt Regal Co. All London and Provincial Wholesale Houses regularly stock it.

SALT REGAL WORKS, LONDON and LIVERPOOL.

If Salt Regal is not procurable from the nearest Chemist, a Postal Order for 2s. 9d. addressed to the Manager, Salt Regal Works, Liverpool, will bring a Bottle by return of Post.

OF

Price 6d.

SCHWEITZER'S COCOATINA.

GUARANTEED PURE SOLUBLE COCOA.

This Old-established Article retains its position as "the finest Cocoa in the market." It is unequalled in purity and flavour, bears the strictest Chemical test, and keeps in all climates.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS AND ECONOMICAL.

VAN
HOUTEN'S
COCOA.

PURE—SOLUBLE.
BEST & GOES FARTHEST.
EASILY DIGESTED.
MADE INSTANTLY.

"Once used, always used—its PURITY is beyond question."

Health.

"It is admirable—flavour perfect—and so PURE."

British Medical Journal.

C. J. VAN HOUTEN & ZOON,
WEESP, HOLLAND.

FRY'S

J. WYBRANTS OLPHERTS, M.D., says: "I find it the most agreeable beverage of the kind I have ever tasted, delicious both in flavour and odour."

PURE CONCENTRATED

E. BUCKNILL, M.D., says: "Your Pure
Concentrated Cocoa is so extremely nice that
I have ordered it for family use."

COCOA.

THE PERFECTION
OF SCOTCH WHISKEY.

The LANCET says:

"DOUGLAS & MASON'S Whiskey is excellent in every respect, smooth in taste and delicate in flavour, the advantage of skilful blending."

Cash Price 40/ per dozen. Carriage paid to any Railway Station in England on two dozen and upwards.

DOUGLAS & MASON, EDINBURGH.

ESTABLISHED 1839.

First produced and designated CORN FLOUR
by BROWN & POLSON in 1856.

BROWN & POLSON'S
CORN FLOUR

Was in the Field some time before any other was anywhere heard of, and no other has now an Equal
Claim to the Public Confidence.

THE DIAMOND MARK.

To secure the best Hungarian Aperient Water,
DEMAND THE DIAMOND MARK,

And insist upon receiving the Hungarian Aperient Water sold by the
APOLLINARIS COMPANY, LIMITED, LONDON.
Of all Druggists and Mineral Water Dealers.

AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

Dr. PAGET,
SURGEON-DENTIST,
445 STRAND, W.C.
(Facing Charing Cross Station.)

ARTIFICIAL TEETH,

without plates. Perfect imitations of the natural teeth. Artistic, painless, and perfect. Most moderate fees. Consultations free daily.

Illustrated pamphlet post free.

BRAIN FOG, SHATTERED NERVES,
Sleeplessness, Nervous Exhaustion, Rheumatism, Gout, Torpid Liver, Nervous
Dyspepsia, &c. yield like magic to the healing influence of mild continuous currents of Electricity, generated, without any shock or discomfort whatever, by wearing

HARNESS' ELECTROPATHIC BATTERY BELT.

This world-famed guaranteed genuine Electric appliance has cured thousands of sufferers, and should be worn by all in search of HEALTH, STRENGTH, and VITAL ENERGY.
Write for descriptive pamphlet, containing copies of hundreds of unsolicited testimonials, or call, if possible, and personally consult Mr. C. B. HARNESS, Consulting Medical Electrician
(President of the British Association of Medical Electricians), 32 Oxford Street, London,
W. (corner of Rathbone Place). Advice free, personally or by letter.

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

GUARDIAN FIRE and LIFE OFFICE.

HEAD OFFICE—11 LOMBARD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

LAW COURTS BRANCH—21 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Established 1821. Subscribed Capital, £2,000,000.

Directors.

Chairman—JOHN B. MARTIN, Esq.

Deputy-Chairman—HENRY JOHN NORMAN, Esq.

Right Hon. Lord Addington.
Henry Bonham-Carter, Esq.
Wm. Hill Dawson, Esq.
Charles F. Devas, Esq.
Granville F. R. Farquhar.
Alban G. H. Gibbs, Esq.
James Goodson, Esq.
John J. Hamilton, Esq.
Thomson Hankey, Esq.

Richard M. Harvey, Esq.
John Hunter, Esq.
George Lake, Esq.
Rt. Hon. G. J. Shaw Lefevre, M.P.
Beaumont W. Lubbock, Esq.
David Powell, Esq.
Augustus Prevost, Esq.
John G. Talbot, Esq., M.P.
Henry Vigne, Esq.

Actuary and Secretary—T. G. C. BROWNE.

Manager of Fire Department—A. J. RELTON.

Share Capital at present paid up and invested £1,000,000

Total Funds upwards of £4,179,000

Total Annual Income over £850,000

N.B.—Fire Policies which expire at Midsummer should be renewed at the Head Office, or with the Agents, on or before July 9.

PROVIDENT LIFE OFFICE,
50 REGENT STREET, W., and 14 CORNHILL, E.C., LONDON.
Founded 1806.

Existing Assurances	..	..	..	..	..	£7,470,866
Invested Funds	..	..	..	..	..	£2,539,609
Annual Income	..	..	..	..	..	£322,963
Claims and Surrenders paid	..	..	..	..	..	£8,697,671
Bonuses declared	..	..	..	..	..	£2,971,852

Prospectuses and full information to be obtained at the Head Office, or of any of the Agents.

CHARLES STEVENS,

Actuary and Secretary.

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH LAW
LIFE ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION (Established 1839).

12 Waterloo Place, London. 120 Princes Street, Edinburgh.

Whole Life Bonuses never less than £1 10s. per cent. per annum.

Annuities. Loans. Liberal Conditions.

ARTHUR JACKSON, General Manager

FRANCIS E. COLENSO, F.I.A., Actuary

12 Waterloo Place,
London.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY,
Established 1836.

LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE.

INCOME and FUNDS (1888).

Fire Premiums £615,000

Life Premiums 203,000

Interest 149,000

Accumulated Funds £3,581,000

PHENIX FIRE OFFICE.
LOMBARD STREET, E.C., and CHARING CROSS, S.W.—Established 1782.

Moderate Rates. Absolute Security.

Liberal Loss Settlements. Prompt payment of Claims.

LONDON MERCANTILE INSURANCES AT REDUCED RATES.

W. C. MACDONALD } Joint Secretaries.
F. B. MACDONALD }

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.
Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 22 PALL MALL, S.W.

Subscribed Capital, £1,200,000. Paid-up, £300,000. Total Invested Funds, over £1,600,000.

E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

LOAN and LIFE INSURANCE AGENCY.
£100 to £2,000 at Five per Cent., on Insurance Policies, Reversions, &c.—Apply by letter to SECRETARY, Clergy Insurance Agency, 17 Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

N.B.—Unqualified references are given of this bona fide Agency if desired.

THE BANK of SOUTH AUSTRALIA, Limited.
ESTABLISHED 1841.

PRINCIPAL BRANCHES, ADELAIDE and MELBOURNE.

CAPITAL, £800,000. RESERVE FUND, £100,000. RESERVE LIABILITY, £800,000.

LETTERS OF CREDIT and BILLS on demand are issued on the Bank's Branches and Agents throughout the Australian Colonies. Telegraphic transfers made. Bills negotiated and sent for collection. DEPOSITS received for fixed periods, at rates which can be ascertained on application.
31 Lombard Street, E.C. JAMES ANDERSON, General Manager.

THE FEDERAL BANK OF AUSTRALIA,
Limited.

JOINT BANKERS TO THE GOVERNMENT OF VICTORIA.

HEAD OFFICE—MELBOURNE, VICTORIA.

Branches in Victoria, New South Wales, and South Australia.

Authorised Capital, £2,000,000. Subscribed, £800,000.

PAID-UP CAPITAL, £400,000. RESERVE FUND, £90,000.

LONDON BRANCH, 18 KING WILLIAM STREET, E.C.

London Board of Directors.

Sir HENRY BARKLY, G.C.M.G., K.C.B.

Lieut.-General Sir ANDREW CLARKE, R.E., G.C.M.G., &c.

Hon. HOWARD SPENSLEY.

Banking business of every description connected with the Australian Colonies transacted.

FIXED DEPOSITS of £50 and upwards received for periods from SIX MONTHS to FIVE YEARS, and the highest rates of interest allowed.

18 King William Street, E.C.

JOHN H. BUTT, Manager.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.

THREE per CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables; the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA.

This pure Solution is the best remedy
for Acidity of the Stomach, Heartburn,
Headache, Gout, and Indigestion.

DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA.

The safest and most gentle Aperient
for delicate constitutions, Ladies,
Children, and Infants.

180 Bond Street, London; and all Chemists.

BOOKS, &c.

Fcp. 8vo. price 1s. post-free.

THE SCHOOLMASTER'S CALENDAR: Handbook of Examinations and Open Scholarships for 1889. Third Year of Issue.
London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, 4 York Street, Covent Garden.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

JULY. 2s. 6d.

PLAIN SPEAKING ON THE IRISH UNION. By the Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE, M.P.
 THE EIGHT HOURS QUESTION. By HAROLD COX.
 THE FORTH BRIDGE (with Illustrations). By Sir JOHN FOWLER and BENJAMIN BAKER.
 THE FIRST-NIGHT JUDGMENT OF PLAYS. By HENRY A. JONES.
 SPORT IN NEPAUL. By Lady EVA WYNDHAM QUIN.
 THE LAST ILLNESS OF LORD BEACONSFIELD. By Dr. KIDD.
 THE THÉÂTRE FRANÇAIS AND ITS SOCIÉTAIRES. (Concluded.) By Mlle. BLAZE DE BURY.
 THE APPEAL AGAINST FEMALE SUFFRAGE: A REPLY.
 1. By Mrs. FAWCETT.
 2. By Mrs. ASHTON DILKE.
 GIORDANO BRUNO AND NEW ITALY. By KARL BLIND.
 HEALTH-SEEKING IN TENERIFE AND MADEIRA. By Sir MORELL MACKENZIE.
 MR. DANDELOW: A STORY HALF TOLD. By the Rev. Dr. JESSOPP.
 THE PERSIA OF THE SHAH. By J. D. REES.

LONDON: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

JULY. Price 2s. 6d.

THE THREATENED ABDICATION OF MAN. By Mrs. LYNN LINTON.
 DR. JOHNSON ON MODERN POETRY. By WILLIAM WATSON.
 VACCINATION IN THE "ENCYCLOPEDIA BRITANNICA."—A REPLY. By C. OREIGHTON, M.D.
 THE CHURCH'S GYMNASIUM. By AUSTEN PEMBER.
 POOR LAW INFIRMARIES AND THEIR NEEDS. By LOUISA TWINING.
 GEORGE SAND AT AN ENGLISH SCHOOL. By J. G. ALGER.
 THE PRESENT FEELING OF THE WORKING CLASSES. By G. ROME HALL.
 WILLIAM GIFFORD. By CYRIL A. WATERS.
 SOME PARLIAMENTARY INCIDENTS. By C. W. RADCLIFFE COOKE, M.P.
 POLITICS AT HOME AND ABROAD.
 CORRESPONDENCE.

London: W. H. ALLEN & Co., 12 Waterloo Place.

JOURNAL of MENTAL SCIENCE, JULY 1889.

Edited by D. HACK TUKE, M.D., and GEORGE H. SAVAGE, M.D. Price 3s. 6d.

CONTENTS:

ADDRESS IN PSYCHOLOGICAL MEDICINE. By F. N. MANNING, M.D.
 ON THE CURE OF THE MORPHIA AND ALCOHOLIC HABIT. By W. S. PLAYFAIR, M.D.
 NOTES OF TEN YEARS' EXPERIENCE IN THE USE OF THE TURKISH BATH IN THE TREATMENT OF MENTAL ILL-HEALTH. By ROBERT BAKER, M.D.
 NOTES ON THE USE OF SULPHONAL. By W. R. WATSON, L.R.C.P.
 PENSIONS. LUNACY BILL. ASYLUM ATTENDANTS.
 DR. YELLOWLEES ON NON-RESTRAINT.

London: J. & A. CHURCHILL, New Burlington Street, W.

KNOWLEDGE.—An Illustrated Magazine of Science, simply worded, exactly described, price Sixpence.

The JULY Number contains Articles on HOW LONG DOES A FLASH OF LIGHTNING LAST, by A. C. RANYARD—TIGER BEETLES, by E. A. BUTLER—PHOSPHATES AS FERTILISERS, by D. A. LOUIS—OUR MICROSCOPIC FOES, by A. W. WILLIAMS—EARTH-WORMS, by E. MANSEL SYMPSON—CHESS AND WHIST COLUMNS—STAR-BORN METEORS, by the late RICHARD A. PROCTOR, and other Articles of interest.

London: WM. H. ALLEN & Co., 13 Waterloo Place. And of all Booksellers.

THOUGHTS for ENTHUSIASTS at BAYREUTH. By the Honourable Mrs. BURRELL.

PART I. A Literary and Historical Guide to Bayreuth, tracing the Connection of the Hohenzollern Family with the Principality, containing the Tradition of their "White Lady" and Facsimiles of Old Prints, notably the original Plan of L'Ermitage, mentioned by the Margravine of Bayreuth in her celebrated Memoirs (II. 257), but never hitherto published with them. Imperial 8vo. vellum, only 100 copies, choicely printed in old style by C. Whittingham, on the best handmade Van Gelder Paper, each copy numbered, with numerous Facsimiles of Prints, &c. Price 21s. net.

PICKERING & CHATTO, 65 Haymarket, London, S.W.

Just published, Second Edition, 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.

LABOUR AND LIFE OF THE PEOPLE
Volume I.: EAST LONDON.

Edited by CHARLES BOOTH. With a large Coloured Map. Contributors: CHARLES BOOTH, BEATRICE POTTER, DAVID F. SCHLOSS, ERNEST AVES, STEPHEN N. FOX, JESSE ARGYLE, CLARA E. COLLET, H. LLEWELLYN SMITH.

CONTENTS:—1. The Classes. 2. The Trades (Docks, Tailoring, Bootmaking, Furniture, Tobacco, Silk, Women's Work). 3. Special Subjects (Sweating, Influx of Population, Jewish Community).

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London; and 20 South Frederick Street, Edinburgh.

STAMMERERS and STUTTERERS should read a book by a gentleman who cured himself after suffering nearly forty years.

Post free for 13 stamps, from
 Mr. B. BEASLEY, Sherwood, Willesden Lane, Brondesbury, London; or Green Bank House, Hull Green (near Birmingham).

BOOKS.—A PENNY WEEKLY JOURNAL. Published every Thursday. Best medium for the Purchase and Sale of Second-hand Books. Weekly Prize Competitions.

88 Chancery Lane, W.C.

Now ready, demy 8vo. cloth extra, gilt top, 25 full-page Illustrations, by the Author, 18s.

PIGSTICKING, or HOGHUNTING: a Complete Account for Sportsmen, and others. By Captain R. S. S. BADEN-POWELL, 13th Hussars; Assist. Milit. Sec., South Africa, Author of "Reconnaissance and Scouting," "Cavalry Instruction," &c. &c.

HARRISON & SONS, 59 Pall Mall, Booksellers to the Queen and H.R.H. the Prince of Wales.

H. SOTHERAN & CO.

BOOKSELLERS, BOOKBINDERS, AND PUBLISHERS.

GENERAL AGENTS FOR PRIVATE BOOKBUYERS & PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS IN AMERICA, INDIA, THE COLONIES, AND FOREIGN PARTS.

A MONTHLY CATALOGUE of SECOND-HAND BOOKS, published over forty years; Specimen No. gratis and post-free.

Telegraphic Address: BOOKMEN, LONDON. Established 1816.

136 STRAND, W.C. AND 36 PICCADILLY, W.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly
 London. All the New and Standard Books. Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c.
 Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates per annum, paid in advance:

Any part of the United Kingdom	£1 8 2
India and China	1 12 6
Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America	1 10 6

STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

Full information on this subject may be found in the Publications of the MARRIAGE LAW DEFENCE UNION.

A List of PAMPHLETS (1d. each and upwards) will be sent free on application to the Secretary, G. J. MURRAY, Esq., 1 King Street, Westminster, S.W.

CHAPMAN & HALL'S NEW BOOKS.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW

For JULY.

Edited by FRANK HARRIS.

PHILIP MASSINGER. By ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE.
 SWISS NEUTRALITY.
 IBSEN AND ENGLISH CRITICISM. By WILLIAM ARCHER.
 IN THE BALKANS WITH PRINCE FERDINAND. By J. D. BOURCHIER.
 EDWARD FITZGERALD. By EDMUND GOSSE.
 HOW THE SHAH TRAVELS IN PERSIA. By J. THEODORE BENT.
 GOETHE AND THE FRENCH REVOLUTION. By Professor E. DOWDEN.
 NORDANSKÄR. By Sir HENRY POTTINGER, Bart.
 THE ETHICS OF PUNISHMENT. By W. S. LILLY.
 WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE: A REPLY.
 FATHER DAMIEN AND LEPROSY IN INDIA. By EDWARD CLIFFORD.
 LEPROSY AND ITS CAUSES. By PHINEAS S. ABRAHAM, M.D.

A CENTURY OF REVOLUTION.

By W. S. LILLY,

Author of "Ancient Religion and Modern Thought."

Demy 8vo.

[This day.]

REMINISCENCES OF A REGICIDE.

Edited from the Original MSS. of Sergent Marceau, Member of the Convention, and Administrator of Police in the French Revolution of 1789.

By M. C. M. SIMPSON,

Author of "The Letters and Recollections of Julius and Mary Mohl."

Demy 8vo. with Illustrations and Portraits, 14s.

[This day.]

LIFE and LETTERS of CHARLOTTE

ELIZABETH, Princess Palatine and Mother of Philippe d'Orléans, Regent of France, 1652-1722. Compiled, translated, and gathered from various Published and Unpublished Sources. Demy 8vo. with Portraits, 10s. 6d.

[This day.]

EGYPT UNDER ISMAIL: a Romance of

History. By J. C. McCOAN. With Portrait and Appendix of Official Documents. Crown 8vo.

[Next week.]

THE POLITICAL LIFE of OUR TIME.

By DAVID NICOL. 2 vols. demy 8vo. 24s.

FALLOW and FODDER CROPS. By Professor J. WRIGHTSON, M.R.A.C., F.C.S., &c., Author of "Principles of Agricultural Practice as an Instructional Subject." Crown 8vo. 5s.

[This day.]

LONDON: CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 885. JULY 1889. 2s. 6d.

CONTENTS:

THE PORTRAIT OF MR. W. H. By OSCAR WILDE.
 SCENES FROM A SILENT WORLD. By A PRISON VISITOR.
 NATURAL EMIGRATION. By JOHN MARTINEAU.
 LADY BABY. Chaps. XXIV.-XXVI.
 THE PARTITION OF THE EARTH. From SCHILLER. By Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.
 RECENT CONVERSATIONS IN A STUDIO. By W. W. STORY.
 ISFAHAN TO BUSHIRE. Roads and Resources of Southern Persia. By Colonel MARK S. BELL, V.C., R.E.
 ABOUT THE UMBRELLA MENDER: A STUDY. By BEATRICE HARRADEN, B.A.
 AN ARCADIAN SUMMER. The Impressions of an Impressionist. Conclusion.
 CRITICAL POSITION OF EUROPEANS IN CENTRAL AFRICA.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

Price One Shilling.

TALES FROM "BLACKWOOD."

THIRD SERIES.—No. III.

CONTENTS: A FRENCH SPECULATION. By the Hon. Lady MARGARET MAJENDIE—RUFUS HICKMAN OF ST. BOTOLPH'S. By Lord WELLWOOD (Hon. H. J. MONCREIFF)—HANS PRELLER: a Legend of the Rhine Falls. By C. L. LEWES—THE PUERTO DE MEDINA. By MAURICE KINGSLEY, F.R.G.S., A.I.C.E.—JACK AND MINORY. By Col. ALFRED HARCOURT.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

WARD & DOWNEY'S NEW NOVELS.

FOUR NEW THREE-VOLUME NOVELS.

A YOUNG GIRL'S LIFE. By B. L. FARJEON.

COMMON CLAY. By Mrs. HERBERT MARTIN.
"It is pleasant to come across such a book. As a mere tale it is extremely interesting..... The novel throughout is rich in material for admiration."—Spectator.AN ISLE OF SURREY. By RICHARD DOWLING.
"It is a genuine pleasure to meet Mr. Dowling at his best..... This is, in many respects, the best work Mr. Dowling has yet written, and it is one of which no living author would need to feel ashamed. He has never hitherto drawn so fine a character as Francis Bramwell. We congratulate him upon his success."—Academy.

AT the MOMENT OF VICTORY. By C. L. PIRKIS.

THREE NEW TWO-VOLUME NOVELS.

PRINCESS SUNSHINE. By Mrs. RIDDELL.

HEATHCOTE. By ELLA MACMAHON.
"The characters are decidedly like human beings, and its tone is high and well sustained. The love story is admirably contrived, and will give pleasure to every one who reads it."—Athenæum.

ROGER FERRON. By Mrs. MACQUOID.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

AUDREY FERRIS. By F. GERARD. 6s.
"There is something inexpressibly touching in this story of Audrey Ferris's happy life and happy death, and it is written in the most delicate manner and the very purest of phraseology. Altogether, although the story is of the simplest, the book itself deserves a prominent place on our library shelves. It is almost a poem, and it is quite deserving of the very highest praise."—Whitehall Review.EIGHT BELLS: a Tale of the Sea and of the Cannibals of New Guinea. By HUME NISBET. Illustrated by the Author. 6s.
"A story of marine adventure as wild and stirring as any from the pen of Mayne Reid or Clark Russell."—Scottish Leader.THE WYVERN MYSTERY. By J. S. LE FANU.
"An eminent example of the originality, the power, and also of the high-mindedness of the author."—World.DESPERATE REMEDIES. By THOMAS HARDY.
"A remarkable story."—Saturday Review.

THE MASTER OF RYLANDS. By LUCY LEEDS. [Just ready.]

On July 15 will be published in 1 vol. crown 8vo. cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

F. M. ALLEN'S NEW HUMOROUS BOOK.

FROM the GREEN BAG. By F. M. ALLEN,
Author of "Through Green Glasses," "The Voyage of the Ark," &c.

WARD & DOWNEY, 12 YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY,
LIMITED,

30 TO 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.;

241 BROMPTON ROAD, SOUTH KENSINGTON, S.W.;

AND 2 KING STREET, CHEAPSIDE, E.C.

FOR THE CIRCULATION OF BOOKS.

SUBSCRIPTION from £1 1s. per annum.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists Gratis.

FOR THE SALE OF BOOKS.

Second-hand Copies of all the best Books of past Seasons,
at greatly Reduced Prices.

Lists with Prices Gratis.

FOR THE BINDING OF BOOKS.

On the Premises by the best Workmen.

List of Bound Books Gratis.

N.B.—All Lists and Prospectuses Gratis and
Postage Free to any Address.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY,

30 TO 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

MESSRS. BELL'S LIST.

Now ready, fcp. 8vo. 5s.

PRINCIPLE in ART, &c. By COVENTRY PATMORE.

Now ready at all Libraries, crown 8vo. 5s.

THE YOUNG QUEEN; and other Stories.
By E. S. VICARS."Considerable skill is displayed in the construction of these stories..... and all are decidedly well written."—Academy."Pleasant reading."—Graphic.

"The writer has considerable constructive skill and a graceful style."

Manchester Examiner.

"Fresh and bright."—Whitehall Review.

THE SHILLING SERIES.

Fcp. 4to. double columns, Illustrated.

MRS. EWING'S MELOHIORE'S DREAM. The Blackbird's Nest—Friedrich's Ballad—A Bit of Green—Monsieur the Viscount's Friend—The Yew Lane Ghosts—A Bad Habit—A Happy Family. With 5 Illustrations by Gordon Browne.

MRS. EWING'S A FLAT IRON for a FARTHING; or, Some Passages in the Life of an Only Son. With 12 Illustrations by Mrs. Allingham.

MRS. EWING'S SIX to SIXTEEN: a Story for Girls. With 10 Illustrations by Mrs. Allingham.

MRS. EWING'S WE and the WORLD: a Book for Boys. With 7 Illustrations by W. L. Jones.

MRS. EWING'S MRS. OVERTHEWAY'S REMEMBRANCES. With 9 Illustrations by Wolf.

MRS. EWING'S JAN of the WINDMILL. With 11 Illustrations by Mrs. Allingham.

MRS. EWING'S A GREAT EMERGENCY. A Very Ill-Tempered Family—Our Field—Madame Liberality. With 4 Illustrations.

MRS. EWING'S BROWNIES. The Land of Lost Toys—Three Christmas Trees—An Idyl of the Wood—Christmas Crackers—Amelia and the Dwarfs—Timothy's Shoes—Benjy in Beastland. With 4 Illustrations by George Cruikshank.

MRS. GATTY'S PARABLES from NATURE. With Illustrations by Burne-Jones, Holman Hunt, Tenniel, Wolf, and others. Two Series. Each 1s.

MISS PROCTER'S LEGENDS and LYRICS. With 18 Illustrations by eminent Artists. Two Series. Each 1s.

MISS SHAW'S HECTOR. A Story for Young People. With 12 Illustrations by W. J. Hennessey.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

TRÜBNER & CO.'S LIST.

NEW BOOKS OF POETRY.

IN MY LADY'S PRAISE; being Poems Old and New, written to the Honour of Fanny, Lady Arnold, and now Collected for her Memory by Sir EDWIN ARNOLD, M.A., K.C.I.E., C.S.I., Author of "The Light of Asia" &c. Imperial 16mo. parchment, 3s. 6d.

Society.—"A noble addition to our store of elegiac poetry."
Observer.—"A graceful and pathetic tribute to the memory of one whose passing away distinguished for a time the light of his heart and home."Figaro.—"Some of them are very beautiful, and others intensely pathetic."
Lloyd's News.—"Sir Edwin Arnold's poetic tribute to his departed wife comes like a fresh and inspiring breeze from the mountain heights, chasing the gloom of those who would have us believe that there is an end of chivalry, and that life is all a failure."

FLOWERS of the NIGHT. A New Volume of Poems. By EMILY PFEIFFER, Author of "Gerard's Monument," "The Rhyme of the Lady of the Rock," "Under the Aspens," "Sonnetts," &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

Sunday Times.—"The hymn in praise of death is an eloquent and musical vindication of that shadow feared of man. There is much true and fine poetry in the volume."

Academy.—"Numerous passages which bear the impress of a spiritual experience and a technical perfection which belongs solely to genius."

Scotsman.—"Mrs. Pfeiffer's many admirers will renew their pleasure in reading this excellent volume. This writer has an original and individual gift of poetry, which while it moulds itself in the form of a strict and impersonal art, is perhaps the greatest charm of her work."

THE DAWN OF DEATH. By LUSCOMBE SEARELLE, F.R.G.S., Composer of "Tone Poems," the Operas "Estrella," "Bobadil," "Isidora," &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 4s. 6d.

Scotsman.—"A series of visions, many of them displaying no mean imaginative power, all of which have an action that celebrates one way or another the triumph of love..... The work is interesting from the freshness of imagination which it displays."

Western Daily Mercury.—"We commend this poem to the thoughtful reader."

INDIA: a Descriptive Poem. Dedicated by kind permission to His Excellency the Right Hon. the Earl of Lytton, G.C.B., G.C.S.I., C.I.E., H. B. Majesty's Ambassador at Paris (late Viceroy and Governor-General of India). By H. B. W. GARRICK, Assistant-Archæologist to the Government of India. Crown 8vo. cloth, 7s. 6d.

Evening Post.—"Each stanza is in itself a picture."
Observer.—"Mr. Garrick has enriched each page with crisp and lucid footnotes which form quite a little encyclopedia of Indian legend, folklore, tradition, and history."

North British Daily Mail.—"A work which is exceptionally instructive and interesting; alike as regards the past and present of India."

DAYS with INDUSTRIALS: Adventures and Experiences among Curious Industries. By ALEXANDER JAPP, LL.D., F.R.S.E., Author of "Industrial Curiosities," "Golden Lives," &c. Crown 8vo. with Illustrations, cloth, 6s.

CONTENTS: Quinine and its Romance—Curiosities of Canary Culture—Rice—Pearls—Amber—Common Salt—Burton Ale and Dublin Stout—Petroleum—Electric Telegraphs—Railway Whistle—Historical Bedsteads—Knives and Forks—Arsenic in Industry—Famous Diamonds—Artificial Diamonds—Postage Stamps.

MORAL ORDER and PROGRESS: an Analysis of Ethical Conceptions. By S. ALEXANDER, Fellow of Lincoln College, Oxford. Being a New Volume of "The English and Foreign Philosophical Library." Post 8vo. cloth, 14s.

ISLAM; or, TRUE CHRISTIANITY. Including a Chapter on Mahomed's Place in the Church. By ERNEST DE BUNSEN. Crown 8vo. cloth, 5s.

LONDON: TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL, E.C.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON'S LIST.

BY H. M. THE SHAH OF PERSIA.
DIARY KEPT DURING his LAST VISIT to EUROPE in 1878. Rendered into English by General SCHINDLER and Baron LOUIS DE NORMAN. 1 vol. demy 8vo. 12s.

Now ready at all Libraries.

"MEMORY'S HARKBACK."
THE RECOLLECTIONS of DR. GRETTON.
1 vol. demy 8vo. 12s.

LYRICS and BALLADS. By MARGARET L.
WOODS, Author of "A Village Tragedy." 1 vol. crown 8vo. 4s.

NAPOLEON at SAINT HELENA. By BARRY E. O'MEARA, Body-Surgeon to the Emperor. A New Edition, with Introduction, Copious Notes, and other Additions, and with several Coloured Plates, Portraits, and Woodcuts. 2 vols. demy 8vo. 30s.

W. P. FRITH'S (R.A.) AUTOBIOGRAPHY and REMINISCENCES. Seventh Edition, 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

SOUPS, SAVOURIES, SWEETS; with a
CHAPTER on BREADS. By A PRACTICAL HOUSEWIFE. 1 vol. crown 8vo.
price 3s. 6d.

NEW WORKS OF FICTION.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "CATERINA."
ROBERT LEMAN'S DAUGHTERS.
By the Author of "Lauterdale" &c.
3 vols. crown 8vo. [On Monday next.]

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FASCINATION" &c.
PAST FORGIVENESS?
By Lady MARGARET MAJENDIE, Author of "Precautions" &c.
2 vols. crown 8vo.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "NELLIE'S MEMORIES."
THE SEARCH FOR
BASIL LYNTHURST.
By ROSA N. CAREY, Author of "Not Like other Girls" &c.
3 vols. crown 8vo.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY AT ALL LIBRARIES.
3 vols. crown 8vo.

MARIE CORELLI'S NEW ROMANCE.
ARDATH.

The Story of a Dead Self.
Wherein are described the Wonder and Terrors of AL-KYRIS, THE LOST CITY MAGNIFICENT.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DUKE'S MARRIAGE."
PRINCE RODERICK.
By JAMES BRINSLEY RICHARDS,
Author of "Seven Years at Eton" &c.
3 vols. crown 8vo.
"The book of the season of eighty-nine is undoubtedly Mr. Richards's 'Prince Roderick,' which opens up a new vein of experience, is closely graphic without being impertinently personal, and maintains its interest from 'cover to cover.'" World.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.
PUBLISHERS IN ORDINARY TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

HURST & BLACKETT'S NEW NOVELS.

A CROOKED PATH. By Mrs. ALEXANDER,
Author of "The Wooing o't," "The Freres," &c. 3 vols.

A POOR GENTLEMAN. By Mrs. OLIPHANT.
Author of "It was a Lover and his Lass," "Agnes," &c. 3 vols.

HILARY ST. JOHN. By Mrs. A. PRICE,
Author of "A Rustic Maid," "A Wilful Young Woman," &c. 2 vols.

WITH EVERYTHING AGAINST HER.
By Colonel CUTHBERT LARKING, Author of "Bandobast and Khabar" &c.
3 vols.

IRIS DACRE. By ALICE MANGOLD DIEHL,
Author of "The Garden of Eden" &c. 2 vols.

DEVERIL'S DIAMOND. By ADELINE SERGEANT
Author of "Jacobi's Wife," "No Saint," &c. 3 vols.

LONDON: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED,
13 GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET.

BLACKIE & SON'S PUBLICATIONS.

NOW READY, VOLS. I. and II.

To be completed in Eight Vols., published quarterly, square 8vo. cloth, 6s. each;
or half-morocco, 8s. 6d. each.

BLACKIE'S MODERN CYCLOPEDIA.

A Handy Book of Reference on all Subjects and for all Readers.

WITH NUMEROUS ENGRAVINGS AND MAPS.

Edited by CHARLES ANNANDALE, M.A., LL.D.
Editor of "Ogilvie's Imperial Dictionary" &c.

"To judge from the two volumes published, 'Blackie's Modern Cyclopædia,' edited by Dr. Charles Annandale, will be found a boon to the general reader. Some handy form of encyclopædia has long been wanted. This is comprehensive, without being bulky. The information is succinctly given, sufficiently copious, and strictly relevant. With these good features must be noted the excellent type and paper, the useful woodcuts and maps, of these neatly-bound octavo volumes." Saturday Review.

Now ready, Vols. I. to VI., to be completed in Eight Volumes, small 4to.
cloth, gilt top, 10s. 6d. each.

THE HENRY IRVING SHAKESPEARE.

Edited by HENRY IRVING and FRANK A. MARSHALL, and Illustrated by Gordon Browne and other Artists.

"It is not a scholar's Shakespeare, or a bibliophile's Shakespeare, or an artist's Shakespeare; it is essentially a Shakespeare for the general reader. Mr. Frank Marshall has done his work conscientiously, ingeniously, and altogether well." Pall Mall Gazette.

TENTH EDITION, THOROUGHLY REVISED.

Medium 8vo. cloth, 18s.

DESCHANEL'S NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.

Translated and Edited by J. D. EVERETT, D.C.L., F.R.S., Professor of Natural Philosophy in Queen's College, Belfast.

Illustrated by 783 Engravings on Wood and 3 Coloured Plates.

Published also in separate Parts, limp cloth, each 4s. 6d.

Part I.—MECHANICS, HYDROSTA- TICS, &c.	Part III.—ELECTRICITY and MAG- NETISM.
Part II.—HEAT.	Part IV.—SOUND and LIGHT.

"Systematically arranged, clearly written, and admirably illustrated, it forms a model work for a class in experimental physics."—Saturday Review.

4 vols. imperial 8vo. cloth, £5; or half-morocco, £6 6s.

THE IMPERIAL DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

A Complete Encyclopædic Lexicon, Literary, Etymological, Scientific, Technological, and Pronouncing.

By JOHN OGILVIE, LL.D.

New Edition, carefully Revised and greatly Augmented.

Edited by CHARLES ANNANDALE, M.A., LL.D.

Illustrated by above 3,000 Engravings on Wood.

"It would be difficult for any one not a specialist to suggest any term of a technical nature which will not be found duly entered and explained here. The definitions, too, are accurate and clear."—Athenæum.

Fcp. 4to. cloth, 10s. 6d.; half-morocco, 15s.

A CONCISE ENGLISH DICTIONARY.

Literary, Scientific, Etymological, and Pronouncing.

Based on the New Edition of Ogilvie's "Imperial Dictionary."

By CHARLES ANNANDALE, M.A., LL.D.

"The 'Concise Dictionary' stands first—and by a long interval—among all the one-volume English dictionaries hitherto published."—Academy.

Imperial 16mo. Roxburgh, 7s. 6d.; half-calf, 10s. 6d.

THE STUDENT'S ENGLISH DICTIONARY.

Etymological, Pronouncing, and Explanatory.

By JOHN OGILVIE, LL.D.

Illustrated by about 300 Engravings on Wood.

"This is the best etymological dictionary we have seen at all within moderate compass."—Spectator.

LONDON: BLACKIE & SON, 49 AND 50 OLD BAILEY.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

NEW BOOK BY H. RIDER HAGGARD.

CLEOPATRA: being an Account of the Fall and Vengeance of Harmachis, the Royal Egyptian, as set forth by his own hand. By H. RIDER HAGGARD. With 29 Full-page Illustrations by M. Greiffenhagen and R. Caton Woodville. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

* Fifty Large-Paper Copies have been printed on Dickinson's Fine Art Paper. Price can be obtained through all Booksellers.

THE WRONG BOX. By ROBERT LOUIS

STEVENSON and LLOYD OSBOURNE. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 5s.

"This is a story in the delightfully crazy manner of the 'New Arabian Nights'—a farcical romance.....To the reader it will yield the rich enjoyment of watching the play of as fine a fancy as ever drew men's thoughts aside from everyday cares."—Scotsman.

JUDGE LYNCH: a Tale of the California

Vineyards. By GEORGE H. JESSOP. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

NATURAL RELIGION. The Gifford Lectures

delivered before the University of Glasgow, in 1888. By F. MAX MÜLLER, K.M., Foreign Member of the French Institute. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

UNSPOKEN SERMONS. By GEORGE MAC-

DONALD, LL.D. Third Series. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

SWISS TRAVEL and SWISS GUIDE-

BOOKS. By W. A. B. COOLIDGE, Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, and Editor of the "Alpine Journal." Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

Now ready, price Sixpence.

The NEW REVIEW. No. II. JULY.

CONTENTS:

- THE SHAH By the Right Hon. LORD CASTLETOWN.
 MATTHEW ARNOLD. Part I. By the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE OF ENGLAND.
 THE EIGHT HOURS' MOVEMENT.. By CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P.
 TALK AND TALKERS OF TO-DAY.
 THE SOUTH AFRICAN PROBLEM.
 I. By LORD EBRINGTON, M.P.
 II. By SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL, M.P.
 THE EIFFEL TOWER By M. EIFFEL.
 GREYFRIARS..... By ST. GEORGE MIVART, F.R.S.
 THREE TYPES OF WOMANHOOD.. By the COUNTESS OF CORK.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.

CLARENDON PRESS BOOKS FOR THE OXFORD LOCAL EXAMINATIONS, 1890.

CÆSAR.—DE BELLO GALlico. BOOKS III.—V. (for Schools). With Notes and Maps. By CHARLES E. MOBERLY, M.A., late Assistant Master at Rugby School. Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

"Stands high among the best classics we have met."—Saturday Review.

XENOPHON.—HELLENICA. BOOKS I. and II. With Introduction and Notes by G. E. UNDERHILL, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Magdalen College, Oxford. Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 3s.

"It is long since we have seen a more thorough piece of work. The notes are clear and to the point."—Academy.

EURIPIDES.—MEDEA. With Introduction and Notes by C. B. HEBERDEN, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Brasenose College, Oxford. Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s.

"Will be found useful. The notes are practical and to the point."—Spectator."All that an edition of this play should be."—Oxford Magazine.

LIVY.—BOOK XXI. With Introduction and Notes by M. T. TATHAM, M.A. Balliol College, Oxford. Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

"A thoroughly good school-book."—Saturday Review."The book contains a vast quantity of good work and we can heartily recommend it."—Journal of Education.

PLATO.—The APOLOGY. Edited, with Notes and Introduction, for the Use of Schools, by ST. GEORGE STOCK, M.A. Pembroke College, Oxford; Editor of "Plato: Meno." Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth limp, 2s. 6d.

"A better edition could not be placed in the hands of the student."—Schoolmaster.

SHAKESPEARE.—HENRY the FIFTH. Edited by W. ALDIS WRIGHT, D.C.L. Extra fcp. 8vo. stiff covers, 2s.

"This edition is simply without a rival. None even comes second to it."—Westminster Review."The notes are a storehouse of information given in a simple and concise fashion."—Athenæum.

A CLASS-BOOK of ELEMENTARY CHEMISTRY. By W. W. FISHER, M.A., Demonstrator of Chemistry in the University of Oxford. Crown 8vo. cloth, 4s. 6d.

"The book is of sterling value."—Nature.

EUCLID REVISED. Containing the Essentials of the Elements of Plane Geometry as given by Euclid in his first Six Books. Edited by R. C. J. NIXON, M.A., Mathematical Master, Royal Academical Institution, Belfast. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

Sold in Parts, as follows:—Book I., 1s. Books I. and II., 1s. 6d. Books I.—IV., 3s. Books V. and VI., 3s.

"We heartily commend the book to the attention of schoolmasters."—Journal of Education.

BOOK-KEEPING. By Sir R. G. C. HAMILTON, K.C.B., and JOHN BAIL, Co-Examiners in Book-keeping for the Society of Arts. New and Enlarged Edition. Limp, 2s.

Ruled Exercise Books adapted to the above may be had, price 2s.

* * * Specially selected by the Commissioners of National Education, Ireland.

FULL CLARENDON PRESS CATALOGUES POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

LONDON: HENRY FROWDE, CLARENDON PRESS
WAREHOUSE, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

THE LIFE of FATHER DAMIEN. By

EDWARD CLIFFORD. With Portrait. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. [Next week.]

A NEW BOOK BY THE RIGHT REV. THE BISHOP OF DURHAM.

ESSAYS on the work entitled "SUPER-NATURAL RELIGION." By the Right Rev. J. B. LIGHTFOOT, D.D., D.C.L., LL.D., Bishop of Durham, &c. Reprinted from the "Contemporary Review." 8vo. 10s. 6d.

EDWARD FITZGERALD.

LETTERS and LITERARY REMAINS of

EDWARD FITZGERALD. Edited by W. ALDIS WRIGHT, M.A., Vice-Master of Trinity College, Cambridge. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

Vol. I. Letters—Vol. II. Euphranor, Six Dramas from Calderon, The Bird Parliament, The Two Generals—Vol. III. Dramas from Calderon, Greek Dramas, Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, &c.

THE OXFORD MOVEMENT.

WILLIAM GEORGE WARD, and the OXFORD MOVEMENT. By WILFRID WARD. With Portrait. 8vo. 14s.

The Cambridge Review says:—"Quite the most fascinating book that has appeared for months and years. This is no figure of speech, but really meant."

BY ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE.

DARWINISM. An Exposition of the Theory of Natural Selection, with some of its applications. By ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, LL.D., F.L.S., &c., Author of "The Malay Archipelago," "The Geographical Distribution of Animals," "Island Life," &c. Crown 8vo. 9s.

BY P. G. HAMERTON.

FRENCH and ENGLISH: a Comparison.

By PHILIP GILBERT HAMERTON, Author of "Etching and Etchers," "Thoughts about Art," "Human Intercourse," &c. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

Among the subjects dealt with by Mr. Hamerton are:—Education, Patriotism, Politics, Religion, Virtues, Custom, Society, Success, Variety.

SECOND EDITION.

THE PARNELL COMMISSION. — The

OPENING SPEECH for the DEFENCE. Delivered by Sir CHARLES RUSSELL, Q.C., M.P. Carefully Revised by the Author. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d.

COMPLETION OF SIR GEORGE GROVE'S "DICTIONARY OF MUSIC."

DICTIONARY of MUSIC and MUSICIANS,

A.D. 1450–1889. By Eminent Writers, English and Foreign. Edited by Sir GEORGE GROVE, D.C.L., Director of the Royal College of Music. With Illustrations and Woodcuts. In 4 vols. 21s. each.

An APPENDIX. Edited by J. A. FULLER MAITLAND, M.A., bringing the Work down to 1889. 8vo. 9s.

* * * This Appendix, which forms part of Vol. IV., completes the Dictionary. But a Full Index to the entire work is in preparation, and will be presently published as a separate volume.

AFTERTHOUGHTS: Poems. By JOSEPH

TRUMAN. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

THE HISTORIES of POLYBIUS. Translated from the Text of HULSCH. By E. S. SHUCKBURGH, M.A., late Fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 24s.

BOOKS FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

MACMILLAN'S THREE SHILLING AND SIXPENNY NOVELS.

ROBBERY UNDER ARMS: a Story of Life and Adventure in the Bush and in the Gold Fields of Australia. By ROLF BOLDREWOOD. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

SCHWARTZ. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

NEIGHBOURS on the GREEN. By Mrs. OLIPHANT. 3s. 6d.

THE WEAKER VESSEL. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY. 3s. 6d.

JOYCE. By Mrs. OLIPHANT. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

CRESSY. By BRET HARTE. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

WESSEX TALES; Strange, Lively, and Commonplace. By THOMAS HARDY, Author of "The Woodlanders" &c. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

A LONDON LIFE. By HENRY JAMES. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

MISS BRETHERTON. By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD, Author of "Robert Elsmere." Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

[Ready July 12.]

Other Volumes to follow.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE,

No. 357, for JULY, price 1s., contains:—

1. MAROONED. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. Chapters 25–27.
2. FATHER DAMIEN. By the Rev. H. D. RAWNSLEY.
3. AUSTRALIAN POLITICS. By B. R. WISE (late Attorney-General for New South Wales).
4. THE NEMESIS OF SENTIMENTALISM.
5. THE HILL-TRIBES OF CHITTAGONG. By C. T. BUCKLAND.
6. THE MADNESS OF FATHER FELIPE. By WILFRANC HUBBARD.
7. PRUDENTIUS. By the Rev. F. ST. J. THACKERAY.
8. OF THE MINISTRY OF THE INTERIOR.
9. PROGRESS AND WAR. By GOLDWIN SMITH.

THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE

For JULY, Profusely Illustrated, price 6d.; by post, 8d., contains:—

1. STUDY OF A HEAD. After E. BURNE JONES, A.R.A. Frontispiece.
2. SANT' ILARIO. By F. MARION CRAWFORD.
3. RECOLLECTIONS of SUAKIM. By WALTER TRUSCOTT.
4. JENNY HARLOWE. By W. CLARK RUSSELL.
5. WHO LIVETH SO MERRY? From Deuterometelia, 1609. Illustrated by Hugh Thomson.
6. THE BETTER MAN. By ARTHUR PATTERSON.
7. ST. ANDREWS MARINE LABORATORY. By E. E. PRINCE, B.A.
8. LOVE'S ORACLE. By S. A. ALEXANDER.
9. ET CÆTERA. By H. D. TRAILL.

MACMILLAN & CO., BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

EDWARD STANFORD'S PUBLICATIONS.

AN ATLAS OF TWELVE MAPS OF INDIA;

Accompanied with Tables and Notes.

By TRELAWNEY SAUNDERS, F.R.G.S., Geographical Assistant at the India Office (retired).

Large folio, half-buckram, £3 3s. net.

These elaborate Maps were prepared to accompany the second Decennial Report on the Material and Moral Progress of India, and are here reprinted with explanatory Memoirs and Tables, by permission of the Government.

Detailed Prospectus on application.

A CENTURY OF CONTINENTAL HISTORY, 1780-1880.

By J. H. ROSE, M.A., formerly Classical Scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge.

Crown 8vo. 420 pp. with 3 Maps, and 5 Plans of Battles in the Text, cloth, 6s.

This work is intended primarily for use in the Upper Forms of Schools, but it is believed that it will also be found a ready and reliable book of reference by the reader of the daily newspaper—by whom such matters as the “Eastern Question,” the “Dual System” of Austria-Hungary, and even the momentous series of events which have brought unity to Germany and Italy, are often but very imperfectly understood.

STELLAR EVOLUTION AND ITS RELATIONS TO GEOLOGICAL TIME.

By JAMES CROLL, LL.D., F.R.S., Author of “Climate and Time,” “Climate and Cosmology,” &c.

Large post 8vo. cloth, 5s.

“All men of science who pay due heed to the ultimate principles to which they are perforce brought in the course of their researches will find this work deserving a thorough scrutiny. Mr. Croll has swept away a cloud which seemed at one time likely to obscure the general significance of evolution.”—Chemical News.

SEAS AND SKIES IN MANY LATITUDES;

Or, Wanderings in Search of Weather.

By the Hon. RALPH ABERCROMBY, F.R.Met.Soc.; Author of “Principles of Forecasting,” “Weather” in the International Scientific Series, &c.

Demy 8vo. with 3 Maps, 9 Photographs, and 33 Woodcuts by Pritchett, Whympier, Cooper, &c., cloth extra, 18s.

“An important contribution to meteorology as well as to travel.....The illustrations are of great interest.”—Times.

“The record of a pioneer.....All that he has to say is worth listening to.”—Scotsman.

“A wonderfully varied narrative, beautifully illustrated.”—Glasgow Herald.

LETTERS ON ARTILLERY.

By Prince KRAFT ZU HOHENLOHE INGELFINGEN. Translated by Major N. L. WALFORD, R.A.

Crown 8vo. with 6 folding Plates, cloth, 7s. 6d.

“Under an assumed controversial form, these ‘Letters’ are distinctly authoritative—as might, indeed, be expected from such a master of the art; and, under the heads of apparently discursive dissertations, they collect all the decisions afforded by hard experience as to the value of current, and in many cases rather conflicting, theories concerning the true part of artillery in war.”—Saturday Review.

STANFORD'S GUIDES AND MAPS FOR TOURISTS.

STANFORD'S TWO-SHILLING SERIES of TOURIST'S GUIDES.

Fcp. 8vo. cloth, with Maps, &c.

The NEW GUIDES now ready are:

REDFORDSHIRE. By A. J. FOSTER, M.A.
WORCESTERSHIRE. By R. N. WORTH, F.G.S.

The NEW EDITIONS now ready are:

CHANNEL ISLANDS. By G. P. BEVAN. Second Edition.
NORFOLK. By WALTER RYE. Fourth Edition.
YORKSHIRE (West Riding). By G. P. BEVAN. Fifth Edition.

The other Volumes published in the Series are:

BERKSHIRE. By E. WALFORD, M.A.
CAMBRIDGE. By A. G. HILL, B.A., F.S.A.
CORNWALL. By W. H. TREGELLAS. Fifth Edition.
DERBYSHIRE. By Rev. J. C. COX. Third Edition.
DEVON, North. By R. N. WORTH, F.G.S. Fourth Edition.
DEVON, South. By R. N. WORTH, F.G.S. Fourth Edition.
The above Guides to North and South Devon in 1 vol. 3s. 6d.
DORSETSHIRE. By R. N. WORTH, F.G.S.
ENGLISH LAKE DISTRICT. By H. I. JENKINSON. Fifth Edition.
ESSEX. By E. WALFORD, M.A.
GLOUCESTERSHIRE. By R. N. WORTH, F.G.S.
HAMPSHIRE. By G. P. BEVAN. Third Edition.
KENT. By G. P. BEVAN. Sixth Edition.
LONDON (Through). By the Rev. W. J. LOFTIE, B.A., F.S.A.
LONDON (Round About). By the Rev. W. J. LOFTIE, B.A. Fifth Edit.
SOMERSETSHIRE. By R. N. WORTH, F.G.S. Third Edition.
SUFFOLK. By Dr. J. E. TAYLOR, F.L.S.
SURREY. By G. P. BEVAN, F.S.S. Third Edition.
SUSSEX. By G. F. CHAMBERS, F.R.A.S. Fourth Edition.
WARWICKSHIRE. By G. P. BEVAN, F.G.S.
WILTSHIRE. By R. N. WORTH, F.G.S.
WYE (The) and its Neighbourhood. By G. P. BEVAN, F.G.S.
YORKSHIRE (North and East Ridings). By G. P. BEVAN. Fourth Edit.

JENKINSON'S PRACTICAL GUIDES.

ENGLISH LAKES. Eighth Edition. With 9 Maps and 3 Panoramic Views.
Fcp. 8vo. cloth, 7s. Smaller Guide, 1s. 6d.

NORTH WALES. Fourth Edition. With 2 Maps. Fcp. 8vo. cloth.

Also, in Five Sections, separately:
Chester; Llandudno; Bettws-y-Coed and Snowdon; Dolgelly and Bala; Aberystwith and Llangollen. With Maps, 1s. 6d. each.

THE ISLE OF MAN. Third Edition. Fcp. 8vo. with Map, cloth, 5s.
CARLISLE, GILSLAND, THE ROMAN WALL, and NEIGHBOURHOOD.

Second Edition. Fcp. 8vo. cloth, with Map, 5s. Smaller Guide, 2s.

THE ISLE OF WIGHT. Third Edition. With Frontispiece and 6 Maps.
Fcp. 8vo. cloth, 5s.

Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged, with Corrections and Additions for 1889.

THE HANDY GUIDE to NORWAY. By THOMAS B. WILLSON, M.A. With Maps and 1 Appendix on the Flora and History of Norway, Fishing Notes, and Photography. Small post 8vo. limp cloth, 5s.

Third Edition, Revised.
THE BATHS and WELLS of EUROPE; with a Sketch of Hydrotherapy, and Hints on Climate, Sea-bathing, and Popular Cures. By JOHN MACPHERSON, M.D. Small post 8vo. cloth, 6s. 6d.

EUROPE.—STANFORD'S PORTABLE MAP of EUROPE. Showing the latest Political Boundaries, the Railways, and Submarine Telegraphs. Scale, 105 miles to an inch; size, 33 inches by 30. Coloured and mounted, in case, for use of Tourists, 10s.

EUROPE.—STANFORD'S LONDON ATLAS MAP of EUROPE. Scale, 140 miles to an inch: size, 26 inches by 22. Mounted, in case, 5s.

CENTRAL EUROPE.—DAVIES'S MAP of CENTRAL EUROPE. Containing all the Railways, with their Stations. The principal Roads, the Rivers, and Chief Mountain Ranges are clearly delineated, whilst the scale upon which the Map is drawn renders it a distinct and useful Guide for Tourists. Scale, 24 miles to an inch; size, 47 inches by 38. Mounted, in case, 16s.

BRITISH ISLES.—DAVIES'S NEW RAILWAY MAP of the BRITISH ISLES and PART of FRANCE. Scale, 22 miles to an inch; size, 31 inches by 33. In case, 9s.

ENGLAND and WALES.—STANFORD'S LONDON ATLAS RAILWAY and STATION MAP of ENGLAND and WALES. Scale, 10 miles to an inch; size, 40 inches by 48. Coloured and mounted, in case, 12s. 6d. The Four Sheets can also be had separately—size of each, 22 inches by 26; coloured and mounted, in case, each 5s. Smaller Maps, 5s. and 3s.

ENGLAND and WALES.—STANFORD'S PORTABLE MAP of ENGLAND and WALES; with the Railways very clearly delineated; the Cities and Towns distinguished according to their Population, &c.; and the Mountains and Hills carefully reduced from the Ordnance Survey. Scale, 15 miles to an inch; size, 32 inches by 28. Coloured and mounted, in case, 7s. 6d.

ENGLAND and WALES.—BARTHOLOMEW'S LARGE MAP of ENGLAND and WALES, on the scale of 4 miles to 1 inch, in 16 sheets. (Index showing divisions of sheets sent post free on application.) Price of each Sheet, separately, folded and coloured, 2s. Mounted on linen, 3s.

LAKES.—STANFORD'S NEW MAP of the ENGLISH LAKE DISTRICT. On the scale of 1 inch to a mile. With all the Roads and Paths, including Bassenthwaite Lake on the North, Newby Bridge on the South, Ravenglass on the West, and Hawes Water on the East. Size, 27 inches by 32. Folded in cover, plain, 2s. 6d.; coloured, 4s. 6d.; mounted, in case, plain, 5s. 6d.; coloured, 7s. 6d.

LONDON.—DAVIES'S NEW MAP of the BRITISH METROPOLIS; including Finchley on the North; Clapham Common on the South; Plaistow on the East; and Acton on the West; Railways and Main Roads. Scale, 3 inches to a mile; size, 36 inches by 25½. Coloured and mounted, in case, 7s. 6d.; or with continuation Southward beyond the Crystal Palace, 11s. Other Maps at 8s., 5s. 6d., 3s. 6d., 1s. 6d., 1s.

LONDON.—MAP of the ENVIRONS of LONDON, including Twenty-five Miles from the Metropolis. Scale, ½ of an inch to a mile; size, 36 inches by 35. The Railways, Main Roads, Bye-Roads, Bridle Paths, are distinguished. Mounted, in case, 10s. Other Maps at 8s., 5s. 6d., 3s., 2s. 6d., 1s. 6d., or 1s.

LONDON: EDWARD STANFORD, 26 & 27 COCKSPUR STREET, CHARING CROSS, S.W.

(TOURISTS' CATALOGUE of MAPS and BOOKS corrected to June 1889 now ready.)

Printed by SPOTTISWOODE & CO., at No. 5 New-street Square, in the Parish of St. Bride, in the City of London, and Published by WILLIAM BOYCE, at the Office, No. 38 Southampton Street, Strand, in the Parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, in the County of Middlesex.—Saturday, July 6, 1889.

THE
SATURDAY REVIEW
OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,759, Vol. 68.

July 13, 1889.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

DELAGOA BAY AND ARBITRATION.

THE debate on the Delagoa Bay question in the House of Lords on Tuesday was satisfactory in more ways than one. The House of Lords is a much better place for the discussion of points affecting foreign policy than the House of Commons, and it is idle to say that Lord CASTLETOWN's connexion with the Company should have precluded him from mentioning the matter. No one would dream of shutting the mouth of a member of the other House in a similar case. It would, of course, have been improper if Lord CASTLETOWN's motion had been carried, and probably no one was better aware of that fact than Lord CASTLETOWN himself; but it was desirable that the whole case of the practically English, though nominally Portuguese, Company should be authoritatively stated in a matter which is much more an international than a private one. There is no need, for the present, to say much more on the particular merits. Lord FITZGERALD hit, with judicial shrewdness, on one of the most awkward points in the action of the Portuguese Government when he pointed out that the elaborate reasons given for that seizure, which the Lisbon authorities carried out at the first possible moment, must have been prepared a long time beforehand, and that, therefore, the Portuguese must have made up their minds to confiscate whether the Company fulfilled terms or not. But there will be plenty of time for further notice of these details, whatever turn matters take.

The point which seems to us for the moment most interesting is the attitude of almost all the speakers concerned to the question of arbitration. Lord CASTLETOWN is the spokesman not of a political but of a commercial body, yet he was firm in pointing out that arbitration ought to have come before not after confiscation. Lord FITZGERALD—a very high authority, who might be professionally disposed always to say cedant arma togæ—says roundly that “he protests against the statement that it is a case “for arbitration.” Lord SALISBURY, in his very careful and measured speech, observed in reference to arbitration a silence which was, in the common phrase, more eloquent than speech. And even Lord DERBY, who represents not merely the mood of mind, but also the school and period of political opinion, most likely to be favourable to this nostrum, put in his plea for it in so cautious and guarded a fashion, that the genius of Arbitration can hardly have been very grateful for his support. It will be something to be thankful for if another of the fallacies which grew up in the piping times of the Manchester School is exploded. “Arbitration” sounds, of course, all that is admirable, reasonable, and Christian; and Lord DERBY's glowing description of “the impartial judgment of some third party who may be relied upon to hear the whole case, and “decide upon the merits,” is most tempting. “But where, “my dear Lord DERBY,” Lord FITZGERALD might have replied, “where is that to be found?” A history of international arbitration by a competent person would be a very agreeable and useful thing, though we are inclined to think that the whole of it might be summed up in a little apologue from one of those capital books of Miss EDGEWORTH's which are voted old-fashioned by too many people. The excellent FRANK had, if we remember rightly, been charged with the division of a cherry-pie (it may not have been cherry, but that does not matter). Being weak in arithmetic, he made one portion more than the number of the party, and the question was, who should have it. “I will give it,” said FRANK, “to good HENRY “who mended my top, or to kind EDWARD who helped me “in my lessons.” They pointed out to FRANK that this was not (in Lord DERBY's fine words) “the impartial judgment “of a third party who hears the whole case and determines

“on the merits.” But there is no one to point this out to an international arbitrator, who (as history so far shows) pretty invariably comes to the conclusion that he will not “give it” to powerful England, who has so much already, to arrogant England, whom he privately dislikes, to purse-proud England, who can so well afford the loss of it.

IRELAND.

IT is not often that we have the pleasure of felicitating Gladstonian members of Parliament on the result of their political visits to Ireland; but we think we may safely allow ourselves the satisfaction of tendering our congratulations—unless they prefer that we should make it condolences—to Mr. SCHWANN and the companions of his who were present the other day at the Drogheda Court House at the trial of Mr. GILL and Mr. Cox. They came over to Ireland “to see fair play,” and as they have seen it they ought to be glad. But somehow we do not think they will be, or if they are, it is quite evident that a good many of their party who have been left at home are not. They, at any rate, do not want “to see fair play”; which perhaps is reasonable enough, since no man can be expected to care for seeing what he probably would not recognize and certainly would not understand. What they did want to see, or at least to hear of, was another conviction of two patriots by “removable” magistrates, another proof that men are punished in Ireland for acts which they may commit in England with complete impunity. But, lo! instead of this, they find two resident magistrates acquitting Mr. GILL and Mr. Cox of the charges against them, on the ground that, after “having given the case the most anxious and careful “consideration, they have come to the conclusion that the “evidence of the principal witness for the Crown, Constable “ROBINSON, was unreliable, and that the evidence of the “other witness for the Crown was, in their opinion, “insufficient to sustain the indictment.” This must be very disappointing to Gladstonians who really want to see fair play; but the ingenuity of their impartiality is already showing itself equal to the occasion. They have at once perceived that the acquittal of Mr. GILL and his companions does not at all prove the fairness of the trial and the uprightness of the tribunal; it simply demonstrates the baselessness of the charges usually preferred against Irish agitators, and the mendacity of the evidence by which they are commonly supported. That two agitators should have escaped conviction only proves the enormity of convicting any agitators at all. That Colonel BOWLBY and Mr. HAMILTON should have acquitted the two defendants establishes, not their own good faith and independence, but merely the iniquity and subservience of their magisterial colleagues. Of course the rejection of ROBINSON's evidence, quite proper as that step may have been, means nothing more than that the magistrates distrusted the accuracy, not the bona fides, of the constable's report; but that is a detail. The Gladstonians will naturally discuss the case as though it were an exposure of police perjury, and will pretend to believe that Mr. GILL and Mr. Cox never used any language on the 11th of June inciting tenants to resist the law, or perhaps that they never made speeches at all. This theory of events, of course, will hardly suit the two patriots themselves, who indeed must feel conscious of being in a rather delicate position. For, if to be convicted of an offence under the Crimes Act is a glory to a Parnellite, it must be a disgrace, or, at the very least, a failure in the quest of honour, to be acquitted; and Mr. GILL, who has made a short speech since his acquittal, is evidently somewhat in doubt as to the proper attitude to assume. He clearly cannot discredit himself by denying that he used unlawful language; yet it is impossible for him to accuse an Irish policeman of perjury, as every good patriot would like to do whenever the chance offers, without repudiating any such utterance. He seems, however, to have dexterously turned the difficulty by declaring that "the presence of distinguished English visitors had acted as a restraint on the removables" who had acquitted the members of Parliament and inflicted heavy sentences on humble men; an explanation by which Mr. GILL is enabled at one and the same time to traduce the magistrates to whose impartiality he owes his escape, and to combine in his own person the honour of guilt with the immunity of innocence.

In Tipperary there is another example of the monstrously oppressive manner in which the law is at present administered in Ireland. We doubt whether there is any other civilized country in which, when the citizen is awaiting his trial for an alleged offence, authority is so barbarously tyrannical as to allow him to go on committing, not only with impunity, but without restraint, the self-same acts that are charged against him as breaches of the law. Mr. O'BRIEN, however, is a living example of the operation of this brutally despotic system. The legal tribunals have been for some time duly seised of the charge under which he at present lies in respect of his alleged attempt to start the Plan of Campaign among Mr. SMITH-BARRY's tenants; yet on Wednesday last Mr. O'BRIEN, though actually on his way to present himself before the Court, thought fit, and was permitted to hold, as indeed he could not be prevented from holding, a meeting in the Town Hall at Tipperary, to which the tenants whom he is urging to combine against their landlords were invited by tickets. At this meeting resolutions of the usual character were passed, and it was announced by Mr. O'BRIEN that "they would be able to place before the Irish people in a few days the lines upon which the new Tenants' Defence League should go; and that he hoped that Mr. PARNELL himself would be in a position to tell them personally." This intimation is interesting; and, as it has since been "officially confirmed," we need not doubt its accuracy. What it apparently means is that Mr. PARNELL has been won over or dragged over to the side of a section of his party from which he has hitherto held aloof. He has never, it will be remembered, taken any active part in the procedure of the Plan of Campaign; and, indeed, in one of the debates on the subject in the House of Commons, he went out of his way to explain that the Plan had been started without his sanction, and that, as a matter of tactics, he did not approve of it. Whether, while still adhering to this opinion, he has found himself forced to get into line with the O'BRIENS and DILLONS of his party, or whether he has changed his mind about the Plan, and is now a willing supporter of it, we know not. But it is fair to recollect that many things have happened since this predatory scheme first came up for discussion in the House of Commons, and Mr. GLADSTONE and others have got over so much of the original shyness of their advocacy, and now defend it so unblushingly, that Mr. PARNELL may well deem it unnecessary to continue to play the prude.

We take it for granted, of course, that the scheme of this new Tenants' Defence League will be either the Plan of Campaign or some modification of it. And now that Mr. PARNELL has definitely decided to put himself at the head of the movement, it becomes interesting to inquire what place in connexion with it is to be occupied by Mr. GLADSTONE and his followers. This, indeed, is much the most interesting question which the incident suggests. The Parnellites are, of course, beginning to beat the big drum violently in honour of the new movement, and are calling all the world to witness that it amounts to a renewal of the struggle between the law and the Land League seven years ago. If that be so, we can afford to regard the outlook with perfect composure. Even Mr. GLADSTONE himself was quite able—in the days when he recognized the means adopted as "rapine" and their end as the disintegration of the Empire—to give a good account of the Land League; and Mr. BALFOUR is not likely to fail in such a business where Mr. GLADSTONE has succeeded. He has, indeed, already shown that he has no intention of sitting with his hands folded while Mr. O'BRIEN and his friends endeavour to extend the Plan of Campaign over the whole of Ireland. The inventor of this notable project is already being called to account for his first attempt to put it into execution, and any one who steps into Mr. O'BRIEN's place should be handled with equal promptitude. Moreover, apart from any proceedings against the agitators, the Plan itself has not been so successful of late as to hold out any very strong encouragement to fresh batches of tenants in parts of Ireland unfamiliar as yet with its blessings to join it. Mr. SMITH-BARRY's tenantry may have been successfully worked upon, though even that is not to be accepted on the word of packed meetings and Parnellite newspapers; but Mr. O'BRIEN may still find some difficulty in persuading contented Tipperary peasants to "go out" simply for the beaux yeux of Kerry farmers haggling with their landlords over the price of their freeholds. On the whole, and in spite of the bawling of the Parnellite press in both countries, we think that Unionists in general may with a tolerably light heart invite this new anti-rent combination to "come on." Its really interesting aspect is to be found, not in its bearing on the Unionists who are about to combat it, but in its relation to the Gladstonians who are being dragged, with their leader, at its heels. Mr. GLADSTONE has done little more hitherto than coquet with the principle of "public plunder" in its casual and sporadic application to selected Irish estates. We have now to see him in the character of an avowed leader of a party of spoliation who have declared war against the rights of property and the obligation of contracts throughout the whole of Ireland.

MORE NEW STYLE.

OF Mr. EDGAR SALTUS, the newest American novelist, it may be said that Parody crouches at his feet like a beaten hound. Parody cannot touch him, unless it be true that none but himself can be his parodist. Indeed, the question rises, Is Mr. SALTUS in earnest with his style, or (as seems more probable) is this only a ramification of the Great American Joke? We much prefer the latter opinion, which will recommend itself to every reader of his funniest book, A Transaction in Hearts (ROUTLEDGE). This work might also be called "A Transaction in Heads," or at least in skulls. We by no means charge Mr. SALTUS with being responsible for the morals of his characters, which are queer; for, whatever he may approve of, he disapproves of them. But does he approve of his own style, or is all this a practical jest? A jest it is, whether modern "stylists" think so or quite the contrary.

We start with a clergyman who bears the sonorous name of GONFALLON, and whose carriage "rolled into a domed and creaking peninsula." He had been a village priest; "during an entire decade he had wasted his fervour on a collection of cattle." In rural obscurity he had known a Countess whose Count had disappeared with her own familiar friend. Later he found the skulls of the familiar friend and of the Count among the Countess's most cherished possessions. She had cut them off; "tooling," as DE QUINCEY says, "with an axe." "Sharp work," as BULBO remarked, on a familiar occasion. But we anticipate. The eyes of the Rev. Mr. GONFALLON, now a fashionable preacher in New York, were of that green black which is noticeable in dysodile coal. The skin of Mrs. GONFALLON, on the other hand, had been eburnean in clarity, and her eyes of iserene; so the pair seemed fitly mated. But she had a sister; and she became an invalid. Now her sister exhaled the clean odour of acorns and of pines; while her features had the surety of an intaglio, and her skin (Mr. SALTUS is great on skins) was the hue of the white rose which has a sulphur heart. Though he was myop, Mr. GONFALLON's dysodile eyes preferred to contemplate the sister with the surety of an intaglio; and this was a very wrong thing in a married clergyman. His wife's hand, in short, no longer communicated that spasm which, in days gone by, had seized him between the shoulder-blades, leaving him during the moment that followed quasi, or "quasily," dumb, as Mr. SALTUS also puts it. He therefore kissed his sister-in-law (here details are freely given), and the young lady murmured, "There; don't hurt a fellow!"

On this lady's bed, as Mr. GONFALLON discovered by personal inspection during her absence, was "a coverlet smooth as an anapest, surmounted by monogrammed pillows." And "What am I doing here?" mused Mr. GONFALLON. What, indeed? From afar came the rumble of the Elevated Railway. In that passionate clime even railways get elevated. So Mr. GONFALLON made love to his sister-in-law downstairs, in a style of pulpit eloquence. "Oh, I say, drop all that!" she interrupted. So he sat palpitant in alternations of elation and remorse. But what there was to be elated about we do not clearly perceive.

Next he read SCHRADER, a German, and found in Assyrio-Accadian myth the fabric of the Pentateuch, which was odd, as, in fact, it is not there. Then he asked Chaos to "take that Nothing back," but no money is returned by Chaos. The sister-in-law had an admirer whom she called a "detestable little cad," and who lent her money when her father had forged a cheque, and finally she married the detestable little cad. That is the story, somewhat confused by two skulls in two boxes, and by the devices of a novelist named ALPHABET JONES, who talked about FLAUBERT, and by a father-in-law who surged like a partition. Nor has Mr. SALTUS himself culled any flower of speech which pleases us more than surging like a partition. And our curiosity has not been more powerfully excited than by some one who was "unimaginable as ABISTEK" (the scholiast suggests "unimaginative as a beefsteak"). Finally, Mrs. GONFALLON surprised her husband making love to her sister, who saved the situation by vowing that she had been declaring her engagement to the detestable little cad, whom she loved, "lots and lots—corner lots." Mr. GONFALLON decided that she was an adder and that he would fang her, but he did not fang her. On the other hand, he "consecrated her nuptials" with the detestable little cad, as the "sacerdos." Here—it is the only fault we have to urge—Mr. SALTUS might have heightened his style by using the word "reredos." At last, when the crouching shadows elongated and lapped the walls, he groped through the darkness to Mrs. GONFALLON. And, for a man with dysodile eyes, a man who diffused electricity, we don't see what he had to complain of, especially as he was also a man of forty. Luckily Mrs. GONFALLON was clairvoyant as a nyctalop, which should have reconciled him to life. O ABISTEK, how unimaginable are all these things!

EGYPT.

THE news from Egypt which was received at the end of last week and the beginning of this was not wholly satisfactory, but it was very instructive. It established, indeed, quite fully the fact that, not only can the defence of the present restricted Egyptian frontier by no means be discontinued, but that the reductions of its scale which have been made of late years in the vain attempt to propitiate implacable critics have been dangerously large. After the very successful brush which Colonel WODEHOUSE had with the so-called Dervishes last week, and the loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners which he inflicted on them, it might reasonably have been thought by a person unacquainted with the facts that the danger was over. Those who were acquainted with the facts certainly did not think so, and knowledge was justified of her children. The Dervishes continued their march northwards, undeterred by their losses, and only keeping away from the river bank so as to escape Colonel WODEHOUSE's steamers and cavalry. This has caused them horrible sufferings in the shape of lack of water; but even thirst has not proved too much for their obstinate fanaticism, and they are desperately making for Assouan. Steamers cannot touch them so long as they keep out of range; and of other forces, especially cavalry, Colonel WODEHOUSE has not nearly enough to attempt heading and driving them back. Therefore there is a considerable commotion in Egypt, reinforcements of troops, both Egyptian and English, being ordered up the long and sweltering journey from Cairo to the Nubian border, and reliefs having to be consequently arranged for the tiny army of occupation from the English stations in the Mediterranean. The "Dervishes" have much the shorter distance to go; but the Anglo-Egyptian troops have the advantage in means of transport. At the same time, the position of the frontier garrisons and columns from Wady Halfa to Assouan is not wholly pleasant, because reinforcements of Dervishes may at any moment appear from the South, and the defending force is but weak for the double purpose of holding the fortified posts and manœuvring against an enemy in the open between them.

Even the dullest and most prejudiced persons have, of course, perceived the half-ghastly, half-ludicrous comment which this running fight to keep an advancing enemy away from water in a July desert makes on the French demand for the evacuation of Egypt. But there seems to be still in some quarters an unconquerable reluctance to recognize the real lesson of the affair. That the humanity of Sir WILFRID LAWSON and Mr. PICTON should indignantly demand the letting loose of the Dervishes on Egypt is, of course, nothing. That is their usual business; and it can hardly be said to be unusual that some madmen should recommend a further retirement. But some less egregious persons, exhibiting an almost pathetic combination of glimmerings of the truth with obstinate Gladstonian determination to love and make something that is not the truth, have suggested that negotiation should get at the Dervishes and find out what they want. No negotiation, alas! is needed to find out what Dervishes in Egypt, what Ghazis in Afghanistan, what the correlatives of both elsewhere, "want." They want to turn infidels and heretics (it is constantly forgotten that to Mahdists anti-Mahdists are heretics) not only out of their country, but out of all countries neighbouring to theirs; they want to plunder districts richer than their own; they want to cut throats; above all, they want to fight, partly for the sake of fighting, but more for gain of one earthly kind and another if they win, and of Paradise if they fall. You cannot do anything with people of that sort by negotiation. You cannot prevent their attacking by fortifications at Wady Halfa or gunboats on the Nile, though you may keep them back. There is absolutely no means of preventing their raids, except by putting as long a stretch of country as possible between them and the rich, settled districts, and by making attack practically impracticable except by way of the easily guarded river. Egypt will never be left at peace till Nubia at least is restored to Egyptian domination. No one speaking honestly, and with knowledge, can gainsay this proposition; nothing can alter the facts upon which it is based.

DOGS, CATS, AND MUZZLES.

WHILE rabies continues to increase, and authority remains dignified but inactive, the anti-muzzler occasionally lifts up his voice. Inasmuch, however, as nothing is done, and Parliament seems likely to do nothing, the anti-muzzler can afford to be comparatively inactive. He is noisy only when practical steps are taken to stamp out a horrible disease. So long as dogs are left free to imbibe and to spread infection, the anti-muzzler is contentedly dumb. We have received, however, a letter from one of the class, with arguments of the usual type, only rather more so than usual. The writer wishes to know what is to become of dogs attacked by others if the muzzle prevents them from practising the noble art of self-defence. Nobody, however, proposes that some dogs should be muzzled and others not, leaving the former to be the prey of the latter. The proposal is that all dogs should be muzzled, small and great alike. There can be no need of defence when there is no possibility of attack. It is suggested by the perversely ingenious objector to whom we refer that, as dogs cannot be muzzled on private premises, they may escape and commit outrages upon their muzzled fellow-creatures outside. In that case their owners would of course be responsible for what would clearly, if Parliament did its duty, be a breach of the law. It is impossible for any human institution to provide against every conceivable contingency. But that is a very poor reason for refusing to take a simple and efficient step which experience, common sense, and scientific opinion equally recommend as a decisive remedy for an acknowledged evil. Our correspondent charges us with having said that neglected and ill-used dogs are exceptionally liable to rabies, while at the same time we maintained that rabies is never spontaneous. There is no inconsistency whatever. As M. PASTEUR himself says, there must have been an original germ of rabies, and there must be an origin of life. Both are at present insoluble mysteries, and may always remain so. Meanwhile, let us deal with what is simple, practical, and intelligible. A dog in a bad condition of health may be especially likely to develop rabies from a bite, just as a half-starved man is especially likely to catch any infectious illness. But neither rabies nor scarlet fever is now spontaneous; and, as for the theory that muzzling develops rabies, it is sheer, unadulterated nonsense.

We enumerated last week, and we need not repeat, the cases of exceptional difficulty under a rule of general muzzling. But these exceptions do not in the least affect the validity of the principle or the necessity of its application. It is true that the disease has not yet spread so much in most other parts of the country as in London. But it is certain to do so if not checked, and even the despised Londoner is worthy of some consideration from the Legislature. As the Government appropriated to itself on Thursday the entire remains of the Session for Supply and Ministerial measures, the prospects of Sir HENRY ROSCOPÉ'S Bill must be regarded as desperate. We can only now hope that the Privy Council, in the exercise of its statutory powers, will include London, at all events, within the infected area, where exceptional measures must be taken by the local authorities. Meanwhile, as every movement has its camp followers, who do it more harm than its enemies, a correspondent of the Standard contributes to the discussion what Mr. CHADBAND called a story of a cock and of a bull. "S. B. B." has "a black tom-cat, which has been brought up with our children, and is most unusually gentle and quiet." A position so superior and so rare entitles "S. B. B." to speak with no ordinary weight. Her household adventures, as told by herself at very considerable length, do not carry their moral on the surface. It seems that when she went into the kitchen one day the cat spat at her. Thus insulted, "S. B. B." hastily retired, ordering that sulphur should be administered to the infuriated animal. After this the cat nearly hurt a child, and quite took refuge under an ice-safe, "from whence we could not dislodge it." In these painful circumstances, "My husband being out, I locked the door leading into the passage where the cat was, and sent for a neighbouring veterinary surgeon." A less consummate tactician would have locked the door leading into some other passage, and sent for a veterinary surgeon from a distance. The surgeon, of course, said "Mad," and "destroyed the creature." But "it proved not to be our cat, after all, for ours returned that night." We can add nothing to the simple and pathetic eloquence of this conclusion. But we may venture to observe that, as rabies in cats is very rare, as they do not when rabid run about the streets biting other cats, and as they cannot be muzzled, they have not much to do with the question of muzzling dogs. One thing at a time. Or if not one, another. If not muzzles, let us try registered collars.

THE ELECTIONS AND THE GOVERNMENT.

WE do not quarrel with those Gladstonians who are inconsolable because of the determination not to contest the vacancy at Dover, made by the death of Major DICKSON. They have not one but three good reasons for dissatisfaction. All of them, except Mr. GLADSTONE himself, who is indeed, contrary to the wont of political leaders, more Gladstonian than the wildest of his followers, know that the return of Mr. BIRRELL in West Fife was anything but a brilliant triumph for them. Dover they see deserted. And, worst of all, at the other end of the kingdom in West Carmarthenshire, they see Mr. WILLIAMS DRUMMOND preparing to fight on the Tory side one of those battles which, however hopeless they may look to-day, not seldom mean victory to-morrow. At Dover itself the facts are particularly annoying to them. There would appear to have been, as there too often is, some little local hocus-pocus about candidates on the Tory side; the majority at the last contested election was by no means a forbidding one, and the accepted Tory candidate is Mr. BALFOUR'S Private Secretary. It is, we repeat, no wonder that they are in a rage. Meanwhile every Tory and every Unionist will be glad to see Mr. WYNDHAM in Parliament, because of the excellent service which he has done in dispelling and exposing the mists of fabrication—"lies" the unpolite them call—which have long been almost the sole Gladstonian instruments of fighting on the Irish question. A very warm interest may also be taken in Mr. WILLIAMS DRUMMOND'S plucky undertaking. There is little or no doubt—if there be any a study of electoral statistics will soon dispel it—that in no one thing, except attention to the register, does the secret of political victory lie so much as in never failing to fight even the most forlorn hope, with the best candidate that can be got, and with as much exertion as though victory were certain if the exertion were made. The pestilent doctrine that a defeat "disheartens," "shows weakness," and the rest, does not deserve to be described even as a counsel of despair; despair is at least often courageous. It is a counsel of cowardice and stupidity, than which there are, in politics at least, no more inexcusable vices.

There are no present indications that the Session will be a very prolonged one, though the comparative calm which has come over Parliamentary affairs may well seem deceitful. Even Mr. O'BRIEN'S new plan, which seems to be one of opposing with combination to do illegal things combination to do legal ones, may have the effect of requiring the presence of the Irish disturbers of Parliament in what they are pleased to call their own country. If the battle at Westminster is left to the new party to which grave statesmanship is contributed by Mr. LABOUCHÈRE, cool-headedness by Mr. PHILIP STANHOPE, political experience and weight by Mr. JACOBY, and wisdom by Mr. STOREY, Ministerialists will not have undivided cause for complaint. Considerable friction has already arisen between these Irreconcilables and their nominal leaders, none of whom is exactly the kind of person who likes to be dictated to. Therefore the prospects of the Government are fair enough, always supposing that they do not commit the crime to which modern Tory Governments are so inexplicably prone, and shut themselves up in "Fort Funk." The new Tenants' Defence League in Ireland and not a few matters in England will give them trying opportunities for their mettle, and the constituencies will pretty certainly observe the result of the trial. With firmness abroad and at home, joined to a minuter care of the local accidents of electioneering than has usually been shown in those recent bye-elections which have brought Gladstonians such jubilation, there is no reason why the present Administration should not carry matters well on for three, if not four, more Sessions, and go to the country in 1893 with a very good chance of coming back again. In which case it need hardly be said that a very considerable proportion of the present Gladstonian party (their coryphæus might be named without difficulty) will adapt one of the prettiest, as well as genteel, of tunes, and be heard singing "Good-bye! Home Rule, Good-bye!"

GENTLEMEN AND PLAYERS.

THE masses had it all their own way. To those who bear the grand old name of Gentleman, the Oval and Lord's presented a sight about as cheerful as the University Match. The Surrey affair was the less distressing. The Gentlemen did get two long scores, and Mr. O'BRIEN and Mr. GRACE, with Mr. W. W. READ, were worthy of their fame. The amateurs' bowling, too, was excellent, and GUNN, BARNES, QUAIFFE, ULYETT, and SHREWSBURY played it to perfection. In the second innings of Players, Mr. WOODS, Mr. NEPEAN, and Mr. DIXON were beaten, indeed, but by no means discredited. Nor was the Players' innings at Lord's, where BARNES covered himself with laurels, so very big that a strong team of Gentlemen need have dreaded it. Many a time would Mr. GRACE, Mr. O'BRIEN, Mr. STEEL, Mr. DIXON, Mr. STODDART, have done all that was needed. But, perhaps, the rain made the wicket play queerly. Certainly the bowlers made every ball "do something," usually something disagreeable and unexpected. Again, BRIGGS and LOHMANN chanced to be at their very best. They are by far the best bowlers in England, we think, and they bowled above themselves. BRIGGS was unchanged throughout, and LOHMANN only gave place for a few overs to SHACKLOCK. But the Gentlemen batted in that pluckless way with which Oxford is apt to entertain us. What was the matter with Mr. GRACE? In the second innings he was nearly out, or gave a dangerous hit, twice or thrice before he fell into the hands of SHERWIN. Mr. O'BRIEN did not seem to be out, from the Pavilion; his leg did not seem in front of the stumps, nor was the ball, apparently, on the wicket. But the umpire knows best, and we would not be guilty of contempt of court, any more than FACEY ROMFORD would have erred from truth, "not if it was ever so." Certainly the Gentlemen of England were not "at home at ease," as was well remarked by a contemporary critic. Mr. STEEL played beautifully; there is a grace, and certainty, and speed about his batting which threw all the rest into the shade. He went in far too late, second innings, but was unluckily bowled for 46. He alone played on his old level of excellence, though he clearly did not enjoy running so much as he did some years ago. Mr. WOODS ran in a wildly eccentric way, but with Mr. PHILIPSON he hit very hard and gave life to a dismal game. If he and Mr. PHILIPSON had been sent in first in the second innings, we might have seen livelier doings, as both men had acquired a good view of the ball and were knocking the bowlers merrily about. But the great men occupied their usual positions to very little purpose, and in a curiously tame, discouraged, niggling sort of way. The unusual excellence of the bowling, a certain difficulty in the ground, and the astonishingly fine fielding may account for this timidity. But it was sad to watch, and it did not affect either Mr. WOODS or Mr. STEEL. Mr. DIXON, too, made some fine hits. On the whole, however, the Players won at every point of the game, and their fielding was a separate ecstasy. Some twenty years ago they were stiff and dull in the field. Now most of them are young, as active as cats, and as sure as Mr. PHILIPSON or SHERWIN at the wickets. The Players could not have performed better; the Gentlemen seemed to surrender out of want of heart.

MR. GLADSTONE'S STATESMANSHIP.

IT is not much of a reproach to any one engaged in the business of statesmanship that he does not read the newspapers. The man who is really fit for that business has no need of studying a dozen news-sheets every day; for he has within himself sufficient means of knowing what currents popular opinion is taking or is likely to take—means sufficient with very little assistance, at any rate; and the supposition is that he can find his own way to the straighter and wiser courses of policy, without such help as the weighing of editorial counsel or the counting of editorial noses. Of Mr. GLADSTONE it has often been said that he would err less if he read the newspapers more; but, though there is some plausibility in the assertion, it does not carry very far. While his vanity might be hurt if his reading were not pretty much confined to the prints that praise him, there is no reason to believe that his judgment would be improved by extending his study to hostile journals; for with him temper and judgment are very much the same things. Besides, his sharpest critics have failed before now in giving him sufficient warning. They do not always perceive in time the misfortunes that wait upon such error as he is capable of, or mark the pace of their approach.

Something of that kind may be observed at the present moment. Unconscious of it himself, never informed of it by his friends, Mr. GLADSTONE could not learn from his most watchful enemies in the press the rate of his decline. That he must fall from the high place he held in general esteem was obvious to many an observer years ago—fifteen at the least; but no one then dreamed that the ruin of his reputation would be completed in his own lifetime. The dread probability was that the "glamour" which his foolish admirers boasted of would mystify the popular mind as long as he remained on earth, sanctify his memory at the hour of his decease, and give to the inferior persons who were his sycophants and courtiers a like place to that which the favourite companions of MAHOMET enjoyed when the prophet was called into his coffin. The prospect was a sad one; and most men of sense would have rejoiced had they foreknown that so it was not to be. Without asking any more about the future, it would have contented them to feel sure that the prophet, being a false prophet, would be found out in his lifetime, and his courtiers and sycophants deprived of the mischievous inheritance they were looking to. What nobody dared to hope for has happened; happened in a measure not only beyond anticipation, but (we believe) beyond the general consciousness. A few deeply interested as well as naturally calculating and observant persons are no doubt aware of it, but we see nowhere at present any public recognition of the rapidity with which Mr. GLADSTONE's reputation is sinking. Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT must see it, Mr. MORLEY must see it, from the look-out which the necessities of their position force them to maintain; but there does not seem to be any general acknowledged sense at present of the difference between Mr. GLADSTONE's place in the world now and only two years ago, or even one. This may be because he has actually done very little to destroy belief in him of late. He has developed himself rather more, but in no very startling or surprising way; and so it is, perhaps, that there is less observation of the steady rapidity with which he is going down.

It may be thought that, with our opinions of him, we unwittingly exaggerate the speed and the depth of his decline; but we are persuaded that whosoever asks himself the question whether, to his own imagination, Mr. GLADSTONE is what he was this time last year, will find an answer in his breast that will justify our expectations of

it. A little later, and it will be generally seen that Mr. GLADSTONE's fate is that of many a popular novelist, many a popular preacher, and for reason good. In politics he has been both popular novelist and popular preacher, never a statesman like PITT or PEEL; and, granting length of years, he always ran the risk of passing out of vogue, even though he did nothing in his later days to dispel the glamour of an earlier time. It was not in nature that Dr. CUMMING should retain much vitality as a prophet after the day when, according to his prediction, the world was to come to an end; neither can it be supposed that a constant succession of failures in political prophecy, together with a long series of blunders in political action, would have left Mr. GLADSTONE in full enjoyment of all the romantic popularity which his own peculiar sermonizings had gained for him. But, as we all know, that has not been the worst of it for him. EDWARD IRVING went mad with the popularity he had gained and wild at the popularity he was losing. So, we permit ourselves to say, it has been with Mr. GLADSTONE; and with similar results, so far as his authority is concerned, though they have not yet come to full growth. But whether we look to his position in the country or in the House of Commons, we may all see that they are coming on fast. Belief in "the greatest Minister of the century," as no one calls him now, however much his goodness may be credited, is fading rapidly. Confidence in him as a fit man to administer the business of an Empire is sinking month by month. The glamour that served him in such stead is thinning away; and that, indeed, means all the rest. This glamour is what the companions of his later day counted on for success in anything he chose to do, any road he chose to take. On that account they thought it safe to follow him, no matter what principles, or how many of them, had to be left behind. But what must they think now, not only from their own sense of a chill in the air that need not be verified by resort to any thermometer, but from such signs as they have witnessed in the House of Commons lately, as well as in certain organs of Advanced Gladstonianism? For some time past, some of Mr. GLADSTONE's followers who are nearer to him than Mr. LABOUCHERE have feared that "the old man" had lost both strength and charm; but they did not expect, perhaps, to see him hustled and hustled by an organized band of irreverent Radicals, eager to pass over him as a thing of the past; neither did they expect to hear Mr. LABOUCHERE hailed as the coming man. This they have now seen, however, and this heard; and, if they are not contented, let them blame themselves. They chose to lend a hand to Mr. GLADSTONE when, in pure vindictiveness at his rejection by the English constituencies, he set about dealing destruction right and left; and now that their common leader is losing his grasp upon affairs, they ought not to be surprised if the more eager and reckless spirits whom he also called to his aid are pushing forward to take the heritage they designed for themselves. However, that is another branch of the matter. The new Radical party in the House of Commons ("Stalwarts" they are called, we observe) may or may not succeed in putting Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT and Mr. MORLEY at the tail of the cart; but what their recent conduct seems to signify is that, meanwhile, they no longer pretend to any superstitious reverence for the aged statesman who was obeyed like a demi-god only the other day: from which we may safely infer what their view is of his position now. They, who have to consider their ways very carefully, believe that it is no longer necessary to creep on in the dwindling shadow of a once great name. And they are probably right.

THE SALVATION ARMY NUISANCE.

POLICE magistrates, despite the prefix, are by no means invariably given to follow the lead of the police; which is perhaps in some things well. But it is all the more satisfactory to see that in two cases heard last Tuesday at Dalston and at Westminster the magistrates decided in a fashion likely to enforce the lesson given by the Chief Commissioner to the brawling blackguards who tried to block the Strand some fortnight ago. In the Dalston case Mr. BROS, after a very long and careful hearing, inflicted a fine on a Salvation drummer for annoyance to tradesmen in the Holloway Road. In this case the chief defence set up—except that of a Salvation-loving confectioner with the poetic name of DRYDEN, who said that the prosecutor was a "spiteful man"—was that contained in a letter from Mr. BRAMWELL BOOTH, which made the very probable, but rather naïf, statement "that the effect of stopping the "playing of bands would be to fail in attracting audiences." In the other case, at Westminster, a person, from what the silly jargon of the "Army" calls the "Training Garrison," was at first refractory to the magistrate's offer of a nominal fine only, if a pledge were given that the nuisance (in this case one of obstruction) should not be repeated. The training garrison person, however, afterwards came down, and gave an unqualified promise to obey the police orders—a proceeding over which we fear there will be wailing and gnashing of teeth in the Salvation camp. In both cases the observations of the magistrates were even more satisfactory than the punishment inflicted, which was, of course, inadequate enough. Mr. Bros, when the usual plea of good intentions was set up, remarked very properly that he had to do, not with intentions, but with acts and their effects; and Mr. SHEIL, with equal propriety, when he was asked if he "could not" dismiss the case because it was that of "a religious body endeavouring to lessen vice and crime by appealing to the masses," replied that "he could if he chose to break the law, but he was not "going to do so."

This reply, unanswerable as it is, is the more satisfactory because the opponents of this, if not the most intolerable, certainly the most disgusting, of modern nuisances need not in the least rely upon it alone. It is sufficient legally, but it can be infinitely strengthened morally. Most people who have some knowledge of human nature know what amount of good the "Army" has done or can do. Those who want a fresh example need only read the accounts of the barbaric tamasha the other day at the Alexandra Palace, when dozens of drums and hundreds of brass instruments re-enacted the accompaniment of the worship of MOLOCH, and when the "hundred Salvation prisoners in "gaol costume"—the same who made such fun at Exeter Hall by parodying the reading of the Psalms—exhibited "riotous enthusiasm." Nothing, indeed, seems to have been wanting but an epileptic or two to revive the full glories of the great revival-camp period, and nothing but a little "cutting with knives" (General BOOTH must be very angry with the Book he is supposed to hold sacred for having made it difficult to add such an undoubted "draw" as this would be to his attractions) to carry remembrance still further back. It may be said, without the slightest fear of contradiction by any one acquainted with human nature and with religion, that this sort of thing can do no good. That is to say, the good that it may do in a very few cases would certainly have been effected by other means and in higher degree in those cases. With a majority of "soldiers" the effect is doubtless, as far as religion goes, purely negative; with the large minority wholly bad, as exciting morbid activity in one direction, which is pretty certain either to relapse into indifference or to take an opposite direction. This is to consider things from the most narrowly religious, or rather ecclesiastical, standpoint; for in religion there is no narrowness at all. To the considerer from any other point of view, to him who notes the hideousness of the spectacle, who sees the way in which the worst vice of the English character—its tendency to sheer vulgarity—is pandered to and excited, who observes the cult of the ugly, the coarse, the profane, the idiotic, which the whole thing nourishes, the Salvation Army must seem nuisance enough if it kept itself strictly to itself in its own dens. But when it forces its loathsome Pagan orgies on the ears and in the way of the public, its shrift cannot be too short or its sentences too long.

THE BULL-FIGHT IN FRANCE.

IT would, in the opinion of some—not persons of the most austere virtue, but still people of average morality—be a pity if the bull-fight were to disappear from Spain. Humanity must disapprove it; but, none the less, it is a piece of picturesque barbarism—a thing the tourist loves. Besides, in Spain it is in its own house. It has always been there, and whatever the preacher may say, it no more brutalizes the Spaniards—a naturally civil and affectionate nation—than the practice of catching fish with a hook and leaving them to die on the bottom of a boat or on a river bank brutalizes the many estimable, nay, even lovable, gentlemen who adhere to it. Let us clear our minds of cant. But the bull-fight at home and the bull-fight abroad are two very different things. The mere fact that it is not natural to any country condemns its introduction to that country. Those who would bring it in act in defiance of the accepted tradition of their own society, which is bad in itself, and, seeing what the nature of the show is, they must be indifferent to inflicting or watching the infliction of pain. Those surroundings and that past, which, if they do not redeem, do at least, to some extent, veil the real character of the show in Spain, cannot be reproduced elsewhere. What can be imported is the torture and slaughter of horses or bulls, and the risk to the lives of men, which, as the well informed know, is always great. Deliberately to import these is, and must be, brutalizing in the last degree.

If any proof of these rather obvious truths is needed, it is supplied by the two French bull-baiting stories of the last ten days. Shows of this kind, in which everything is done except the actual killing of the bull, have been permitted at Paris and Marseilles. A feeble effort was made to preserve some show of humanity, but it was soon swept aside. In Paris the performer, whom the papers call LAGARTIJA the toreador, but whose name is LAGARTIJO, and whose profession is that of torero, grew impatient. He felt as LOHMANN might if he were asked to bowl for Frenchmen with a worsted ball. He determined to show them the real thing. He took a sword and killed the beast—not, as it would seem, very cleverly. The audience, be it noted, were for the most part wild with enthusiasm. At Marseilles, a few days later, a further step in advance was made. There a bull proved cowardly, and was tortured in the bestial fashion used to work him to the fighting pitch in Spanish rings. So little was the audience shocked by this that it howled for a repetition of the Paris incident. One man, inspired by the genius of the spectacle, threw a little boy down from a good height, and it is the one redeeming feature in the conduct of the audience that he was with some difficulty saved from a lynching. The show, in short, ended in an outbreak of brutal bloodthirstiness. Not the least remarkable part of the story is that neither incident seems to have attracted much notice in the press. And yet we think that they are both decidedly ominous of a very bad tendency among the French. It would really seem that within this last generation they have begun to find a pleasure in cruelty for its own sake. They have long tolerated representations of it in painting, on the stage, and in literature. From the nature of things, the stimulus has had to be made continually stronger and stronger till at last the representation seems to be found insipid, and some form of the actual thing is called for. It is with cruelty as with indecency—there is no stopping in the representations of them till a reaction of disgust is created, or there comes an incurable corruption of taste and morals. That they have an actual practical effect is undoubted. No nation is without sin certainly in this matter; and, until the White-chapel murderer has been shown not to be an Englishman, we must be careful in throwing stones; but we doubt whether, if the last fifteen years are taken, all Europe can be shown to have produced so much exceptional crime as France. Of ordinary murders and robberies, such as have occurred, and will occur among all peoples, we do not speak, but of crimes distinguished by an ostentation of cruelty and an insanity of lust. Now it looks as if the mass of the community were becoming callous, as if there were a reappearance on the surface of the brutality which has always underlain their brilliancy, of the tiger in them as opposed to the monkey.

DR. ALLBUTT'S CASE.

THE judgment delivered by the Court of Appeal in the case of Dr. ALLBUTT goes far beyond the facts of the particular dispute between plaintiff and defendants. The charge against Dr. ALLBUTT, which was the publication of a book alleged to be subversive of social morality, never came before the jury at the trial, or before the Lords Justices on appeal. Baron POLLOCK held that the plaintiff had, on his own showing, no cause of action; and this ruling has now been confirmed, after due consideration, by the Court above. Nevertheless, in order to make the matter clear and the result intelligible, it is necessary to give a brief account of what Dr. ALLBUTT did and what happened to Dr. ALLBUTT. Dr. ALLBUTT, then, is a medical practitioner at Leeds, who wrote for sale at a cheap price a volume entitled The Wife's Handbook. About this work and its nature the less said the better. Baron POLLOCK correctly told the jury that they could not inquire into the merits of the controversy, and certainly it is not our business to do so. The General Council of Medical Education, however, took a very strong view of Dr. ALLBUTT's book, and erased his name from the register as a person guilty of infamous conduct. The legal effects of this erasure are rather curious. Reducing Dr. ALLBUTT from the status of a qualified to that of an unqualified practitioner, they leave him capable of practising, render him incapable of suing for his fees, and reimpose upon him the obligation, from which he was previously exempt, of serving upon juries. It seems not a little odd that a doctor whose conduct has, in the opinion of his professional brethren, been infamous may, unlike his more respectable colleagues, determine questions involving the lives, the liberty, or the reputation of his fellow-citizens. But that is a side issue. The Medical Council, having thus disqualified Dr. ALLBUTT in accordance with their statutory powers, published the fact, with the reasons for the course they took, in their official Minutes. These Minutes, when printed, are open to the world, and nobody could deny that in this instance they must have inflicted serious injury upon Dr. ALLBUTT's character. We cannot wonder that, in the circumstances, he should have sought to reopen the question and to obtain redress. Indeed, it is distinctly in his favour that he did so. But Parliament has chosen, as we think wisely, to make the decision of the Medical Council on such points absolutely final, and the real question for the Court of Appeal was whether the Council had a right to declare their grounds for doing what they had an undoubted right to do.

Dr. ALLBUTT did, indeed, ask for a mandamus that his name should be restored to the register, as having been improperly removed from it. But of this application the judges made very short work, holding that there was nothing whatever in it. The defence of privilege was the important point, and as to that the reasoning of Lord Justice LOPES, in which Lord COLERIDGE and Lord Justice LINDLEY concurred, is likely to be often quoted for the broad principles which he lays down. It had to be admitted from the outset that, if the Medical Council were a court of law, no action of libel could be brought. On the other hand, it was a material fact that the circulation of the Minutes was not confined to members of the Council, and, therefore, the privilege arising from common interest in the subject-matter was not available. Under the recent Libel Acts, a fair report of a public meeting convened for a lawful purpose is protected, unless the statements made by the speakers deal with things with which the public have no legitimate concern. But Dr. ALLBUTT's case was determined independently of those Acts, and upon wider conclusions of policy or law. More than a hundred years ago it was said by Mr. Justice LAWRENCE, in a criminal prosecution for libel, that "the general advantage to the country "in having these proceedings made public more than "counterbalances the inconvenience to private persons "whose conduct may be the subject of such proceedings." It would be difficult to express more neatly, or more tersely, the rational basis of this exception to the law of libel. In the present instance, as Lord Justice LOPES ingeniously pointed out, Dr. ALLBUTT might have received more harm than good from the silence which he contends that the Council ought to have observed. For by the Act of 1858, under which he has been disqualified, conviction for felony or misdemeanour is the only way to disqualification besides "infamous conduct in any professional respect." If, therefore, the mere decree of disqualification had become known, as it must have become known, without any reason for it being stated, Dr. ALLBUTT's neighbours and the world at large might have inferred that he had been condemned for some heinous offence by the very tribunal of which he now complains that he is deprived. The public have a right to know why a duly qualified medical practitioner has been ignominiously struck out of the lists.

THE PERSECUTED THOMPSON.

HER MAJESTY'S Ministers, aided by their legal advisers, have still to finally settle what amount of compensation may be due to a young man who had been wandering about the Midland Counties in great destitution, for three months' imprisonment inflicted for an offence which he confessed to but had not committed. For the rest, however, the case of HENRY THOMPSON is now done with, and a curious one it is. A more consistent record of blundering could hardly have been thought out. As far as we can see, the first of the blunderers was the innocent HENRY THOMPSON himself. He need never have told the innkeeper at Derby that he was a deserter from the navy, as he did, according to Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, still less need he have added details as to the friend who accompanied him which fitted so well with the undoubted case of WILLIAM FLOYD. Whether it was accident or design which caused him to tell this romance we really do not care to inquire; but there was enough in it to justify the publican in speaking to a policeman and the policeman in running THOMPSON in. Captain WOODWARD, before whom he was brought, seems to have argued that no human being would be such a fool as to say in confidence that he was a deserter if he was not, or so weak as to confess to the truth when brought before an authority competent to punish him. So he gave no credit to THOMPSON's denial of his first story, and did give him three months. Now that the truth is known, the action of Captain WOODWARD seems hasty; but Mr. A. S. HILL was speaking with plausibility when he said that any member of the House of Commons would have behaved in just the same way, and he might have added that in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand he would have been right.

Unfortunately for Captain WOODWARD this was the thousandth case. THOMPSON is THOMPSON who had left, not H.M.S. Calliope, which is a punishable act, but his own respectable family, a step he had a legal right to take. Therefore they ought to have shown more care on board H.M.S. Duke of Wellington, and ought among other things not to have mistaken the marks of a balloon accident for tattooing. They tattoo in the navy better than that. Yet again, Captain WOODWARD should have known that the Judges in the Queen's Bench are captains in their own ship, and should have been more exact when called upon to appear there. For the rest, he has gained some experience by the ordinary process of paying for it. More should be known about the rest of the story—the charge of larceny, and the appearance of the kind legal friend who showed THOMPSON his chances—before its worth is estimated. As regards the last stage of the history, however, there need be no doubt. The resolution which Mr. BRADLAUGH moved, Mr. BALLANTINE seconded, and Sir HORACE DAVEY endorsed is one of a kind we are now very familiar with. Somebody gets into trouble; there is evidence, or apparent evidence, that he has had hard measure. Immediately thereupon there is a cry to give him a handsome competence, without asking whether he did not help to bring his trouble on himself. Mr. BRADLAUGH and his supporters insisted on what the Crown lawyers know very well—namely, that it is neither law nor sense to take THOMPSON's general conduct into account in deciding whether he ought to have been imprisoned for a certain definite offence. But it may well be considered before we make up our minds what amount of compensation is due to him. After all, boys who run away from their families and wander in the Midland Counties, who tell penny novelettes to publicans, and tell contradictory stories to policemen, are really not objects for profuse sympathy or compensation. The adventures of THOMPSON do not, in our opinion, show that the liberty of the lieges who act with reasonable caution is in any danger from aggressive naval officers. As for the threat uttered in the House that, if the boy is not well paid, he will be spirited up to bring an action for false imprisonment, it is not of good example. If it is acted on, we trust that a British jury will also remember that false imprisonment does not necessarily entitle man or boy to a comfortable subsistence.

THE BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. SMITH'S statement, last Thursday, with reference to the course of public business foreshadows appropriately an unexciting wind-up of a pleasingly uneventful Session. In substance it was to the effect that the Government intend to pass two of the Bills now before the House, in any event, and that as to the others, not more than some half dozen in number, to which they attach importance, they propose to be more or less governed by circumstances. The two selected as imperative are, of course, the Scotch Local Government Bill and the Scotch Universities Bill. These, as the leader of the House said, are already far advanced, having, indeed, got almost clear of their contentious stages altogether, and, were it not for the somewhat copious mass of details remaining to be disposed of, their course would be as expeditious as it should be smooth. Next to them in point of importance come the Bills which have passed through Grand Committee of the House, and which on that account, therefore, it would be naturally a disappointment to the Government to abandon. The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY "entertains" the strongest hope of being able to pass these without making serious demands on the time of the House. We, however, must for our own part content ourselves with hoping for the realization of Mr. SMITH's hopes without insisting too disagreeably on the difference between hope and expectation. The Tithe Rent Charge Bill and the Irish Sunday Closing Bill are two more measures which Ministers are anxious to pass if possible. The one for good reasons of public policy, the other on the less satisfactory ground of pledges given on the point, and of the fact, important perhaps, but on occasion to be disregarded, that it has been considered by a Select Committee of the House. The New Education Code is to be withdrawn, and Elementary Schools are to go on living under the Code of 1888, for which, in our humble judgment, they will be none the worse. The Irish Drainage Bills, with the exception of the one relating to the Bann, are to be withdrawn. The Light Railways Bill is to be proceeded with as a measure which, unlike its companions, was received with general favour by the House.

The programme is not an ambitious one, and Mr. SMITH, no doubt, hopes to be able to complete it in such time as to enable the House to rise at what used to be the normal date of the beginning of the autumnal recess. We trust that he may succeed in his object; but there are little more than three weeks to run; there are still a good many votes to be taken in Supply, including some of those on which the Parnellites are particularly wont to "spread themselves," and there is certain to be contentious debate of some kind and to some extent on the Report of the Royal Grants Committee. Consequently the FIRST LORD of the TREASURY will do well, we think, to chasten his expectations, and to hold himself ready for further lightening of the legislation ship.

THE FRENCH ARMY BILL.

THE French Army Bill has at last become law. Its passage is the end of a long history. For three or four years past (perhaps more) it has been on its way to this final consummation. It has been sent up by the Chamber and delayed in the Senate. Now it is back to whence it did begin. The origin of the Act and its history are eminently characteristic of French politics as they now are. When it was first brought in the Radicals were in flush. They believed that the country was with them much and would be with them more. General BOULANGER was then their pet, and they thought he would be their tool. He, smelling how the wind was then blowing, was strong for the Bill. Its object was to abolish the army organization of M. THIERS, by which the length of service had been fixed at five years as the rule, with one year's service as the exception for conscripts who had passed an examination and had paid fifteen hundred francs. Complete exemption was granted to Seminary pupils on the principle that it was unbecoming to send future priests to a barrack. The new law was to abolish these outrages on equality. It provided that all Frenchmen, with very limited exceptions, must serve for two years. There were to be no exemptions, and notably the future priests were to be swept in. On this point the Radicals were very emphatic, and as usual the moderate men were obedient to them. It was to no purpose that authorities who could not be controverted pointed out that all the men of twenty in any given year could not possibly be called to the colours. The Budget would not permit it, and, therefore, it was better to recognize exemptions on a definite system in order to avoid jobbery and confusion. To equally little purpose did these authorities point out that the abolition of the five years' term of service would make it far harder than it is at present, when it is hard enough, to secure competent non-commissioned officers. The pay offered is not enough to tempt Frenchmen, and if the necessity of staying with the colours is taken away, they will go as soon as they can. Not the least of the evils inflicted on France by the cession of Alsace has been the loss of the district from which the best of their non-commissioned officers were drawn. Of course, the most hopeless of all objections was the Conservatives'. They complained of the indecency of forcing the priests into the barracks. But this was precisely what made the Radicals in love with the Bill, and so it went up to the Senate.

The Senate was sadly puzzled. It would have preferred to have none of the Bill, but was afraid of the Radicals. So it delayed over the measure, and carried it on, as its Standing Orders allow it, from Session to Session. In the meantime a change has occurred in politics. The General has fallen out with the Radicals and taken up with the Conservatives. The election approaches, and something must be done. The Senate was in a fix. If it rejected the Bill, it offended the Radicals; if it passed it bodily, it offended the Conservatives still further. Under these circumstances a third course has been taken. The Bill has been passed, but so amended that conscripts who pass an examination at the end of a year are to be allowed to go home. Doctors and priests are, so the Minister of War promises, to be exclusively employed in the ambulance. In peace, however, they are to be drilled like the rest; and, though they will not be required to fight, must learn how to form fours right and threes about. In this way it is apparently hoped by the Senate that everybody will be satisfied. The Radicals will be pleased to see that the priests are sent to the barracks, and their friends the Conservatives thereby insulted. At the same time the Conservatives will be propitiated by the concession which exempts the priests from actually bearing arms in war. The middle path chosen seems to us exquisitely characteristic of the moderate man. It is admirably adapted to annoy both sides. The Radicals will be angered by the concession granted to the priests, such as it is; and the Conservatives will not be in the least grateful for the half concession which still inflicts an outrage. However it has been passed. The Radicals have taken it as an instalment, and the Conservatives as one more outrage for which they hope to have their equivalent. The question now is whether the General will gain most by the further aggravation of the Conservatives, or lose by the passing of the measure which he once supported. Of the two results the former is the more probable. The Conservatives support the General because they hate the other fellows. They will not support him the less because they have reason to hate them more. As for his Republican supporters, they need not like him the worse because his Bill has been passed in a modified form.

THE ROYAL GRANTS COMMITTEE.

IT was in strict accord with propriety and precedent for Mr. LABOUCHERE's name to be placed on the Royal Grants Committee; but if even there had not been these reasons for adding it, the step would have been a judicious and certainly, from our point of view, a fortunate one. For Mr. LABOUCHERE, having been himself nominated to the Committee, was of course not in a position to criticize its constitution, whereby this duty devolved upon Mr. SAMUEL STOREY, with results which must give unfeigned satisfaction to every one who desires the vulgarer forms of Radicalism to be discredited by association with the most glaring examples of fatuous arrogance and puerile political swagger. Mr. LABOUCHERE, even when he is serious, which, even in these days of his degeneracy, is not always the case, retains always enough of his sense of humour to avoid making himself and his cause ridiculous. Mr. STOREY does not know when he is absurd, much less how absurd he is—he cannot know it, or, in the name of that "manhood" of which he seems so proud, he would hesitate to talk the language of a boy's first speech at his debating club. Such unconsciousness of the figure which he was cutting would have been impossible to either of the members for Northampton; whereas Mr. STOREY went contentedly and complacently on, evidently convinced that he was impressing Sunderland, at any rate, and showing, by his criticisms on the nominations of Sir HUSSEY VIVIAN, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, and Sir ALEXANDER CAMPBELL—persons objected to solely and simply because they did not conform to Mr. STOREY's exclusively private views of eligibility—how fathomless are the abysses of Radical conceit. The Government, we repeat, could have asked no better fortune for their proposal with reference to the Royal Grants than that it should have been made the occasion of five characteristic speeches from Mr. STOREY.

The attitude of Mr. GLADSTONE, too, though every one who knows his peculiarities must have been prepared for it, was naturally calculated to strengthen the Ministerial position. Mr. GLADSTONE supported the FIRST LORD of the TREASURY steadily throughout last Tuesday's debate. He upheld the principle of party distribution on which the Committee had been formed, and he united with them in resistance to Mr. LABOUCHERE'S mauvaise plaisanterie of an amendment to the effect that the Committee should have "power to send for persons, papers, and records." His presence on that body, and the certainty—as we take it to be—that he will vote there with the Ministerial majority, cannot fail to embarrass the Radicals of his party considerably in any attack which they may hereafter make upon the Report. This is so desirable an end to secure, and we feel so sincere a gratitude to Mr. GLADSTONE for assisting us to secure it, that we have not the heart to criticize the motives which bring him on this question of Royal Grants into line with the Government. It is the thing to describe these motives as his "Conservative instincts," and Conservative instincts they shall be for us. We will school ourselves, if possible, to believe that when Mr. GLADSTONE supports a Government of his opponents in dealing with an application for a grant to Royalty he does so in the spirit, not of the courtier, but of the constitutional statesman; and that the traditions and impulses of the ex-Minister, of the three times chief adviser of the Crown, of the old Parliamentary leader who has grown grey in the dignities and responsibilities of office, are at that moment strong within him. We will do our best, we say, to persuade ourselves of this, and, if we succeed, we shall then have nothing further to do than to wonder at and regret that the operation of these guiding and restraining impulses on Mr. GLADSTONE'S mind is so extremely capricious, and that, while these impulses and traditions are strong within him when it is a question of paying respect to the visible symbols of authority in the person of the Sovereign or of the Heir Apparent, yet when the appeal is made to them in a name which ought to stand higher in the estimation of a Liberal statesman than those of King or Princes—in the name, that is to say, of Law and the sanctity of Law—they seem to have altogether vanished.

THEATRICAL CHILDREN.

THE House of Commons has decided by a majority of forty-nine votes that a portion of the London poor shall in future be yet poorer than they are. This is the practical outcome of its activity last Wednesday. It rejected Mr. JENNINGS'S amendment (supported for once with sense as well as wit by Mr. LABOUCHERE) to the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Bill, by which theatres were to be specially authorized to employ children. In doing so it decided that certain sums of money, amounting in the aggregate to a considerable figure, and earned during the very months in which it is hardest to earn wages in the towns, shall no longer be gained. Incidentally it also voted that some hundreds of children shall in future spend the hours which they at present spend under a roof, and in conditions of reasonable warmth and cleanliness, either in the gutter or in their own poor, overcrowded homes. These things, too, have been done in the name of humanity—and, being done, we do not expect to see them undone. Finally, it is to be recorded that the House offers nothing to replace what it takes away. It imposes a clear loss on the poor, always in the name of philanthropy and morals. This is the solid fact, and no haze of words can obscure it.

As for the arguments by which this decision was represented as being for the general good of the community and the particular good of the children, they are of two kinds. First, we are told that the Factory Acts forbid the employment of children, and so they ought not to be employed in theatres. Many speakers who used this "argument" quite acknowledged that theatrical children are well treated. None made any serious attempt to prove that the work has bad effects. There is a certain amount of assertion to that effect; but the evidence is rather on the other side. It will, too, require a good deal to prove that hours in a theatre are not better for children than hours in an overcrowded lodging or the gutter. There is such a thing as dying the death of a fool, that is to say, dying of too much logic (which generally means too little). Then comes the real argument of the majority. It was most candidly stated by Messrs. S. SMITH and WINTERBOTHAM, and is nothing but our old friend the immorality of the theatre. The majority of theatrical children join the ballet, said Mr. WINTERBOTHAM, and "then what becomes of them?" Well, what becomes of them is that they earn scanty wages by hard work—which is a common lot. If they became sewing women, what would become of them? Much the same thing, we imagine—only that their hours would be longer, the work duller, and the earnings smaller. If a certain proportion of them eke out their small pay, and find a resource when out of work, in casual prostitution, as much may be said of sewing women or factory girls. The subject is one which can hardly be discussed frankly in public. We all know the cant that is talked about it, but one hardly likes to discuss it fully. For the rest Mr. WINTERBOTHAM'S argument is just as good against the employment of children over ten. They are every whit as likely to be corrupted. In truth, however, the immorality of the stage is less among the regular population than among those women who come upon the stage at seventeen or eighteen for purposes of display. But there is one simple consideration which ought to make Mr. S. SMITH and Mr. WINTERBOTHAM doubt whether they will really do much good by saving very small children from the exciting influences of the theatre. The poorer the family, the more likely are the women to have recourse to prostitution. Where the sister who is under ten is not allowed to earn the few shillings which make all the difference between starvation and sufficiency, the sister who is over seventeen is the more and not the less likely to take to the streets. Then the child who is no longer confined to the deleterious influences of the theatre has the more leisure to run up and down the streets, whereby she is the more likely to profit by her sister's example, and be trained by the conversation of her sister's friends. Such are the results to which philanthropy and a tender regard for public morals lead us, and they ought to show still more clearly the beauty of holiness as it is exemplified in the unco guid.

THE NATURAL HISTORY OF HERALDRY.

"THAT is not a lion," said a herald, many years ago, on being shown a picture by a famous animal-painter. "That is not a lion; and if, after having been five-and-twenty years at the Herald's College, I do not know a lion when I see one, I should like to know who does." If the author of a certain book on heraldry, some three centuries old, had been interrogated on the subject, he would probably have made a very similar remark, judging from the confidence with which he described the appearances and habits of the birds, beasts, reptiles, and fishes emblazoned in the armorial bearings of which he treated. Ever eager to improve our knowledge of natural history, we lately plunged into his work, and began our studies by searching for the aforesaid lion. With little trouble we found one upon a shield, which is thus described:—"Stokes hys cote. The field is gules, a Lyon Rampante, his queue forked, d'Ermyne. Here the Lyon his tayle is forked. For by y^e taile his boldnesse, and harte is knowne, as the horse is known by his eares. For when the Lyon is wrothe, first he beateth the earthe with his tayle, and afterwarde as the wrathe encreaseth, he smiteth and beateth his owne backe." Next to him we found a "Lyon Couchant" of which we are told something that ought to prove even more useful to lion-hunters than to heralds, as it will enable them to make a lion "couch," instead of springing upon them, whenever they please. All they need do is to take up a puppy, which it will be well to "keep handy" when lion-hunting, and whip it; for "the Lyon dreadeth when he seeth or heareth a whelp beaten; and by none other meanes, waies, or dealinges, he is chastised, corrected, or made to couch." Lions, however, may be frightened by other means, as they "drede noyse, and rushing of wheles, but fire muche more." Many people ignorant of natural history may have been surprised at seeing crests and arms bearing a lion dormant with his eyes open. This only shows that they have not read their Isidore, who "saithe that the Lyon's eies are as though he were awake, when he sleepeth." Then we come to a "Lyon Gardante." "This Lyon here noted, is as it were considering his estate, being founned in his kindenesse. For he is a right kind beast, and knoweth and loveth hym that doth him good." On the other hand, he knoweth still better him that doth him evil, as we find on reading the description accompanying a coat of arms emblazoned with a "Lyon Rampant Vulned." "This Lyon is wounded, and when he is so, he taketh the wonderfully hede, and knoweth him that firste smote him, and reyseth on the smiter, though he be in neuer so greate a multitude." A very noble animal is the Lion Passant! "This Lyon is in the plaine field, accordinge to the highnesse of his stomacke: which is such, that if he happen to come into any Woode, or Couerte, he ronnethe out of the same with swifte course, accomptinge it vile shame, to lurke, or hide him selfe."

We have said enough to show that, even in Elizabethan times, the lion had been dealt with in many forms on coat-armour; it would, therefore, be but natural to expect that he must have been pretty nearly done to death by the time of Queen Victoria. In the early years of Her present Majesty's reign, an armless family applied for a grant of a shield bearing a lion in any shape or attitude which the Kings of Arms might consider most fitting. The following reply (which may edify those who are under the impression that a person may get any arms he likes to ask for at the Herald's College if he will only pay for them) is treasured among the archives of that family:—"Alas, we have already granted him in every conceivable pose, colour, and metal. We have given him at one time two heads, at another two tails; we have cut off his head, his tail, and his paws; we have covered him with decorations varying from collars and crowns to roses on his noble stomach; we have tied him up with chains and ropes; we have stuck all sorts of warlike and domestic implements of torture through him, from the ancient British spear to the modern kitchen skewer; we have put into his paws almost every known article of use or no use; we have placed him on bodies celestial and terrestrial, animal, vegetable, and mineral; in short—" But here we make a protest. For we could have suggested yet another pose for the lion, and one in which, so far as we know, no herald, ancient or modern, has ever placed him—namely, running away at the top of his speed with his tail between his legs; and we appeal to every one who has had any experience of lion-hunting to bear us out in saying that this is the attitude he most commonly assumes when a sportsman goes "up the country" with a rifle in order to obtain his skin.

Our old herald had much to tell us about other animals besides lions. He says that "the Tygre is abeaste wondrefull in strength and most swifte in flighte, as it were an arrowe. . . . He is distingued with diverse speckes." Another speckled animal is the panther, "who is frende to all Beastes save the dragon. This beaste hath on his skinn little rounde spottes, some blacke, and some white, and all fower foted beastes have a likynge to beholde his colours: And therefore where hee is, thither will they resorte, because of y^e swete sauour that cometh from hym, which the Dragon onely can not abyde." We must not omit to add that, although he "bee a ryghte cruell beaste, yet hee ys not unkynde to them that helpe or succurre hym." "Th' elephante" is defined as an animal that "passeth all other fower foted beastes in quantitie of bodie. . . . He is strong enemye to the horse, and is of suche might as he is able to take upp an horse and a man armed upon hym." The camelopard "is powdered with white spottes. . . . hauinge an heade like a Camell, the necke of an horse and feete like a Bugle. This beaste is more worth in sight than in fierceness, and is so mylde and softe, as a sheepe." Not that sheep were altogether despised in armorial bearings, for we find a shield with "A Ramme quarterly parted S. and Ermyne, armed and unguled d'or," to which is attached this comment:—"He is a noble beaste and beste knowne in this Realme. . . . some reporte that of Rammes hornes buried or hidde in the grounde, is broughte forth an Herbe, called Asparagus, in Englishe sperage." Does not the etymologist perceive in "sperage" the origin of the modern word "sparagrass"? An awful and a terrible brute is the "Hien, Hyen, or Hyena." "Thys is a cruell beaste. . . . for. . . . hee cometh to houses by nyghte, and feyneth speache of mankynde, and caleth some man by hys name, and when he hath hym without the dores devoureth hym." We find some details about the Wolf, of which we had hitherto been ignorant. "By kind, he desireth to eat fishe. . . . If it happeneth in any wise that in treadinge upon stones, he maketh any noyse with his feete, then he forthwith chastiseth that fote with hard bytinge. . . . The Wolfe cannot bende his necke backwarde in no moneth of the yeaere, but in Maye onely, when it thundereth. . . . In his tayle he beareth a locke of heare, which exciteth loue." We fully agree with the statement that the dog is "a beaste full ingenious." Coursing men will like to read that the greyhound has a long "snowte," with ears "longe" and "plyante," and old ladies (à propos of a shield bearing a "Catte Gardant") that that domestic animal is "enimie to Myse and Rattes. He is slye and wittie. . . . He maketh a rufull noyse." He does, indeed! Another interesting coat of arms bears "A Bore sauage passant." "Hys ryghte shulder is harde, brode and thicke, which he occupieth as a shielde to defende hym withal, putting that brawne for his chefe armoure against his weapon that pursueth hym." Even horsey men will find something here to interest them. Horses "be ioyfull in the fieldes, and smell battayles, and with the noyse of Trompettes are comforted thereunto," as we once discovered to our cost when a hack "bucked" us off, on passing a brass band. Our herald has a good word to say even for a much humbler animal. The "Hiricion Passante" is a "beaste of witte. . . . Of us English men he is termed an Irchin."

As a connecting link between flesh and fish we will place this coat-of-arms:—"The field is Gules, a Mermaid, or Syren proper, playing on a harpe, d'or. F." "The Mermaid is a Sea beast, woonderfully shapen." We will dispose of fishes rapidly by mentioning a crest of "Twoo Delphins d'Argent, addorsez hariaul." The Dolphin "hath great liking in harmonie. . . . Oftentimes they are sene to leap over Ships. The Delphine is most meke, louing, and gentle." And now we will examine some ornithological arms, beginning with "A Cross engrayled ermyne, betwene four Cockes, counterchanged of the one, and the other, membred and cristed Gules," arms which lead our naturalist to observe that "the Cocke breedeth a Precious Stone called Allectricium. . . . And because of the same stone, the Lyon dreadeth and abhorreth him, especially if the Cocke be white." From four cocks we will pass on to "Three Cranes Argente." It seems that when these birds "sitte on the grounde, for their safegarde, they ordaine watches by course among them selves, that they may reeste the more surely: and those whiche keep the watche, stande upon one fote, holding eche of them a little stone in the other, highe from the earthe, that by fallinge thereof, they maie be awaked, if it happe any of them to fall a sleape." In case the ignorant should be puzzled by the crest of "An Ostriche Regardante," the herald explains that the ostrich is a bird with "a longe necke, a shorte bil and a sharpe, soft feathers, two thighes, and fete with hoofs cloven." Rather than bear such unpleasant arms as "A Vultur," "a foule very ravenous, and a great deuourer of carren," that "moste desireth to feede on man's fleshe," we should select the humbler one of "Three gees arborie d'argent," which reminds our author that "it is read that ther be certain trees in Scotland, which growinge nere y^e bank of a great water, bring forth fruit conglomerate with leaues, and the same falling when it is ripe into the riuer, quickeneth, and is turned into a liue bird, which they call Anserem arboreum, a goose of the tree." Another water-bird used in heraldry is the swan, which is of all "birdes the whitest, of a shyrlie voice, and singeth moste swetely towarde y^e time of his death. . . . He is a gentle and a quyet bird." Evidently the writer had never accidentally backed his boat into a swan's nest! Ornithologists will be interested to read of "an Owsell d'Argente, beaked golde, legged gules," that "she singeth pleasauntly in the summer, in winter she stammereth," and that "whereas in all places shee is blacke, yet in Achaya she is white." And now for the king of birds—"An Eagle Displayed." "Th' Eagle hath principalitie ouer al foules, and is most liberal and free of harte. For the praye that he taketh oneless it be fir hongre, hee eateth it not alone, but setteth it in common to all the foules that followe him. . . . But when the praye that is take is not sufficient for hymselfe, then as a kynge, that taketh head of a comminalitie, hee taketh the birde that is next unto hym, geueth it among th' others, and serueth them therewith." Even more interesting than this account of the boldest and fiercest of birds is that of the meekest and mildest; for it tells us how Noah announced that the flood was subsiding. It seems certain that the patriarch exclaimed, "Behold I see a dove volant, d'Argent, beaked Azure, legged gules, and bearing an olive leaf proper"; for our infallible herald thus describes such a bird, and adds, "By this did Noe know, that the waters were abated upon the earth, when the generall floude was."

Modern men of science may sneer at our old herald if they please; but in that case let them be consistent and design armorial bearings suited to this age of discovery (such as Arms. Gu. Three Atoms, evolved, ppr. Crest. A germ, rampant, vert.) with full details and descriptions of these "wonderfull beastes"; and let them flatter themselves if they will that readers three hundred years hence will not smile at them as much as they themselves may smile at the ideas expressed in the Armorie from which we have been quoting.

"WHEN MRS. BOFFIN IS NOT PRESENT."

ANY reference, even the slightest; any allusion, even the most carefully veiled in the obscurity of a learned or any other language, to the surely not disputable fact that Mr. Gladstone is mortal, calls forth such a tempest of rage from Gladstonians that a polite Unionist abstains from it as much as possible. He adds, like the courtly French preacher, "Presque tous" when he has, in referring to Mr. Gladstone, or even in the remote context of such a reference, occasion to mention this unpleasant but universal (we beg pardon, nearly universal) law of our being. Were it not for this, such an one might be tempted, without thinking harm, to suggest that Gladstonians have even more occasion than Unionists to wish that Mr. Gladstone was mortuus instead of moriturus. True, they would have to give up Home Rule; but, as there is not one of the more important of them except Mr. John Morley, who cares a button for Home Rule, or who would ever have thought, but for Mr. Gladstone, of taking it up, that would not matter. True, they would lose a name to conjure with; but, since the famous occasion when the conjuring failed on a certain Budget, there has been doubt, hesitation, and pain, even among the most faithful, as to the infallibility of the conjuration. And, after all, it is not absolutely delightful to know that the leader of your party every day he lives makes of himself in a greater degree what Sir Hugh Evans (Ah! why does not Wales breed more Sir Hughes now?) agreeably calls a "vlouting-stog." It is regarded, we believe, even in Gladstonian quarters, as doubtful whether Mr. Gladstone has ever made quite such a vlouting-stog of himself as he did at the end of last week in his extraordinary double-barrelled reply to the Cardiff deputation which brought him gold, incense, and freedom. So odd were his proceedings that they really look as if some of the saner members of his party had instructed him how to behave properly, and he had so far complied as to behave properly in one room and improperly in the other. "My friends, I preach on Monday to God's people, and on Tuesday to t-rn-tion

h-lf-re-sinners," said the ingenuous hero of one of the good old stories which are so much better than the new ones. Mr. Gladstone adopts the principle, and even observes the order. Before luncheon, to use his own words, he, by agreement with his host, said "only what could be addressed to British subjects and citizens." We most thoroughly agree with his implication that what he said after luncheon, when "the restrictions were removed" with the cloth, was not suited to British subjects and citizens. Indeed half a brick might seem to a British subject and citizen a more fitting acknowledgment of this part of Mr. Gladstone's remarks than a casket made entirely of 18-carat gold. But the most interesting point of this very interesting occasion was that Mr. Gladstone's casket (indeed, indeed, it is not our fault that this word has in American a double meaning, likely to wound the sensibility aforesaid) was understood to be subscribed for by persons of divers political creeds. Mr. Gladstone had not on this occasion the pleasure which his great leader Mr. Parnell is going to relish shortly of receiving a freedom and a casket which a majority of his future fellow-townsmen would rather give to the devil than to himself, and with maimed rites due to the protest of the real representatives of that majority. As his opportunities of speaking are not exactly few, and as it was not quite three full weeks since he poured a flood of what is called eloquence for some six mortal, or, let us say, six blessed days, on the West Country, almost within sight of Cardiff, it might have been thought that he could hold his tongue for this one occasion. But no.

There was nothing very remarkable in the first oration—the oration addressed to Philip who had not had luncheon—except the surprising admission that Mr. Gladstone has no near personal connexion with Cardiff. That is a real distinction for Cardiff; the town on the Taff is henceforth the Lord Castlereagh of the congress of English towns. The same thing can hardly be said of the reference to the possible duration of Mr. Gladstone's life and labours, which is a return to regulation. But after these usual or unusual items the non-Gladstonians, who had wisely or unwisely joined in conferring on Mr. Gladstone a honour to which, in the case of any statesman of Mr. Gladstone's rank and standing except Mr. Gladstone himself, the stoutest partisan could not think of objecting, had not entirely reason to congratulate themselves on the forbearance which postponed contentious points—such, for instance, as Mr. Gladstone's reference to Welsh patriotism. There is probably not a Welshman who is not patriotic; but there are certainly many Welshmen who, in Mr. Gladstone's sense, are very bad patriots indeed. But, on the whole, the peace was fairly preserved. There could not be anything very contentious (despite a good deal of the innuendo which Mr. Gladstone never has the good taste wholly to exclude) in references to the Corn Laws and Centralization. Of course, when Mr. Gladstone says that he thinks England is in a better position to meet the world in arms than she ever was, one can only shrug shoulders. Unlike some of our opponents, we never assume that a man tells deliberate falsehood unless we can prove it. The present proportion of home-grown to imported food as contrasted with the proportion a hundred years ago, the present state of Continental armies and navies as compared with their state then, the bearings of the enlargement of the franchise on the power of the nation to carry on a partly unfortunate war, the changes of the general conditions of warfare itself—all these things may be, in Mr. Gladstone's opinion, elements of strength which the England of to-day possesses, as compared with the England of Pitt. We cannot say that they are not; we do not say that they are not. All we say is, that if Mr. Gladstone really thinks that they are, he has the pleasure of being almost alone in his opinion among men of ability and information.

But when Mr. Gladstone was unmuzzled, when it was merry in hall after luncheon, when the company had by the oddest chance in the world "signified that they were ready to drink his health," and so "the restriction was removed," as per compact between Mr. Gladstone and his host, then we had what we believe vulgar people call the fun of the fair. Then the floodgates, the good old floodgates, were opened, and we had Ireland and coercion all over again. Mr. Gladstone was particularly happy over the approval of Home Rule sent by the State of Illinois, which, he said with fine Gladstonian humour, "is, I think, an American State." Now we, too, "think" that Chicago is a not unimportant city in this same State of Illinois. If Mr. Gladstone could spare time (but, unluckily, he never can spare time for anything inconvenient) to read what the Chicago papers say about the Cronin murder, it might shake the approbation with which he regards the unanimity of the Governor, officials, senators, and representatives of that State. But what is to be done with a man who says that "Europe through its permanent literature disapproves of England's treatment of Ireland." What is the "permanent literature" of Europe? Dante, Shakspeare, Molière, Goethe, Cervantes, Camoens, and the works of people like them? Perhaps; but we don't remember much about the wickedness of Mr. Balfour in any of them. On the other hand, how does Mr. Gladstone know that M. Rochefort is going to be permanent literature? You can't argue with a man who uses terms in that way.

But you can argue with a man who speaks as Mr. Gladstone spoke about the West Fife election. In that election, as all men know, Mr. Augustine Birrell, the Gladstonian and Separatist candidate, was returned above Mr. Wemyss, a rather nondescript Unionist candidate, by a majority of about eight hundred. The local organs of the party avow with great frankness that this majority, though 'twill serve, does not please them at all, and that it ought to have been much more, and so forth. They are quite right. Mr. Birrell had every possible chance on his side. The division is an out-and-out Gladstonian division. Mr. Birrell was jockeyed into the position of Gladstonian candidate by an exceedingly ingenious combination of the local magnate influence (which is nowhere more powerful than in Scotland when it condescends to go cap-in-hand) with other kinds of wire-pulling. He is a Scotchman by extraction, has never made fun of Scotland, has a pretty little reputation for some pretty little essays wherein the button-holing fashions of the day are combined with a nice little taste and knowledge in literature, speaks well, will promise anything that is asked of him. For some considerable time he had the field to himself, and was only opposed at the last moment by a candidate who showed plenty of goodfellowship indeed, and had fair local claims, but who was too late, who scandalized the unco' guid by confessing to attendance at prize-fights, exhibited no very profound knowledge even of the common-places of politics, and, above all, tried that old but always fatal game of running with the hare and hunting with the hounds—of professing himself a Unionist, but a real Home Ruler, declaring that he was opposed to Mr. Balfour's policy, and so forth. It is on this last point that Mr. Gladstone pronounces the West Fife election "positively the most satisfactory we have had," though the majority was proportionately small and the abstentions remarkably numerous. Why upon earth, if Fife is sound upon the goose of Home Rule, so many Fifers chose to vote for the spurious instead of the genuine Home Ruler—still more, why upon earth so many refused to vote for either of these candidates, both Home Rulers as they were, is a point on which we should really have liked to hear something from Mr. Gladstone. One thing only we hope, that he will not refuse us some remarks on the Dover election, and will prove, if Mr. George Wyndham is, as we trust, returned unopposed, that Dover is more satisfactory even than Fife. Mr. George Wyndham is only less abhorrent to Gladstonians than the tyrant whose minion he is. Would his unopposed return mean that all the Jacks of Dover, without exception, are fervent Balfourites? The argument that it would is at least as good a one as Mr. Gladstone's about West Fife. But when a man chooses to make two long speeches where one short one not only would have done, but would have been the proper thing, there is, we suppose, nothing else to be expected.

VERDI'S OTELLO.

THE production of Signor Verdi's latest opera by the company of the Milan Scala at the Lyceum last week would have been sufficient to render the musical season of 1889 one of the most important of the last few years, even if the work performed had not been attended with much special interest. Any new opera from the pen of the veteran musician who, whatever may be thought of the peculiarities of his style, is nevertheless the one great operatic composer living, would be sure of a respectful reception in this country, where for years past so many of his earlier works have been as familiar as household words; but the contradictory reports which were spread on the production of Otello at Milan in 1887 have aroused a widespread feeling of curiosity in musical circles as to what Signor Verdi's new work would be like. The singular habit which induces some critics to attribute every deviation from old-fashioned forms as an adherence to Wagner's theories caused the idea to get abroad that Otello was only an Italian imitation of the German master's Music-Dramas. In a similar fashion a French critic, on the production (in 1863) of that extremely un-Wagnerian work, Bizet's Pêcheurs de Perles, condemned it with the simple phrase, "Il y a du Wagner là dedans." The trick is a very simple and effectual way of saving trouble; but, in the case of Otello, as in that of Bizet's opera, a little consideration will show that it is entirely unjustified by the facts of the case. In Signor Mazzucato's interesting article on Verdi in Sir George Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, the author takes exception to the classification which has been made of the composer's style into three periods—namely, the first, from Oberto Conte di San Bonifacio (produced in 1839) to Luisa Miller (1849), the second from Luisa Miller to Don Carlos (1867), and the third from Don Carlos to the Manzoni Requiem (1874), the last great work which he produced prior to the appearance of Otello. Signor Mazzucato remarks, with much critical acumen, that the changes in Signor Verdi's style, which has developed from the crude vulgarity of Nabucodonosor (1842) to the dramatic intensity and emotion of Otello, really represent the refinement of musical feeling which has taken place during the artistic career of the composer, whose language has thus, so to say, become more elevated, because a higher language has become intelligible to his public. The truth of this will be recognized by any one who has really studied the question. During the long period in which Signor Verdi has been before the public operatic music has undergone a change as great as that effected by Gluck at the end of the last century. Rossini, Meyerbeer, Halévy, Wagner, Gounod, Bizet, and Verdi himself have all, in various degrees, had their part in the work; and, even if Wagner's has been the lion's share, it is a mistake to attribute solely to him what is, after all, chiefly the product of the Zeitgeist. In Italy this is especially the case, as a mere comparison of dates will show. From a variety of reasons, chief among which was the growing spirit of nationality, some twenty-five years ago there sprang up in Milan and Bologna a new school of earnest thinkers in various branches of art and literature. Signor Boïto's Mefistofele—in its present form a very compressed version of a work which was produced at Milan in 1868—is the best known example of the musical productions of this confraternity, though an earlier, if not so markedly original, specimen is to be found in the Profughi Fiamminghi of Signor Franco Faccio—the gifted conductor of the present operatic performances at the Lyceum—which was produced so far back as 1863. Verdi, who had even in Rigoletto (1851), Ies Vêpres Siciliennes (1855), Un Ballo in Maschera (1859), and La Forza del Destino (1862), shown that he was not unaffected by the influences of French grand opera as represented by the school of Meyerbeer, in Don Carlos (1867) took a stride in advance and displayed conspicuously the dramatic grip and emotional power which were afterwards developed through Aïda until they have culminated in the work which is now causing so much interest and curiosity. Now Wagner's Tristan und Isolde—for his most important theories as to the form of the musical drama were only fully displayed for the first time in that work—was produced at Munich in 1865, the Meistersinger following it in 1868, and Das Rheingold in 1869, so that it was practically impossible for the later works of the German master at this time to influence appreciably the course upon which the Italian School had entered—a course which has been persevered in not only by composers of such genius as Verdi and Boïto, but to a greater or less extent by such lesser lights as Mancinelli, Ponchielli, Catalani, and Franchetti. In minor details, doubtless both Signor Verdi and Signor Boïto have, in common with Wagner, employed occasionally similar devices to obtain particular effects; but the whole method of the Italian composers is at variance with that of the German, and in no respect is this more marked than in their writing for the voice. Even Wagner's most fanatical admirers are bound to admit that, in the maze of his wonderful polyphonic orchestral writing, he continually forgets that the human voice has, at least, to speak words, the meaning of which no amount of leading motives on the instruments can supply, and that in consequence his vocal writing is too often painfully trying, both to performers and audience. With Signor Verdi this is never the case. In Otello there is no orchestral interweaving of contrasting themes, but the band is throughout kept in its proper place as the accompanist of the voice, emphasizing and illustrating the dramatic situations by sonorous effects and extraordinary variety of colouring, but never, as with Wagner, leaving its proper place and commanding attention as the principal feature of the performance. The point in common which the new Italian School has with Wagner, and which causes superficial critics to class the former among the disciples of the latter, is the paramount importance with which both regard the dramatic situations. This it was which formed the basis of Wagner's reforms, and which led eventually to the "New Art" of Bayreuth, and it is the same feature which is at the root of all the apparent strangeness and novelty of Otello. From the first note to the last of the opera, the drama is never for a moment sacrificed to the music, and fortunately for Signor Verdi he has found in Signor Boïto a poet who has supplied him with a really admirable libretto, whether it be regarded as a condensed translation of Shakspeare's play or only as a poem to be set to music. Otello is not Signor Boïto's first essay at Shakspearian opera, for in 1871 he wrote a book on Hamlet for Signor Faccio, which was performed at Florence. The selection from Goethe's Faust, which forms the libretto of his own Mefistofele, and the adaptation of Hugo's Angelo (La Gioconda), which he wrote for Ponchielli, under the pseudonym of Tobia Gorrio, show that he is as talented a poet as he is a composer. Otello is divided into four acts, and Shakspeare's play is followed closely throughout, so much so that in the English version prepared by the late Dr. Hüffer many of the original lines have been included with little difficulty. The dramatic form in which the book is cast is naturally opposed to the old-fashioned lyrical libretto; the set Aria and suchlike conventionalities have been abandoned, and what concerted pieces are retained arise naturally out of the situations, and are not dragged in merely to afford the composer an opportunity of writing taking music. It will be understood, therefore, that those persons who go to hear Otello under the impression that they will come away haunted with the tune of some taking song will be disappointed; but, though this is the case, the music is never for a moment anything but melodious, and every page of the score shows signs of its Italian origin. This is, perhaps, one of the most striking features of the work. Signor Verdi's phrases and themes are cast in the same mould which has been used by every Italian composer for the last fifty years, and yet in Otello he has managed to turn them to so novel a purpose that they appear with all the charm of freshness. The music is throughout essentially Italian, and such as no other but an Italian could have written; yet, by the extraordinary care and skill with which it has been welded to the drama, the first impression the work produces is one of entire novelty. It will always remain a matter of surprise that Signor Verdi, in his old age, should have retained his powers to such an extent as to produce a work which cannot fail to have a great influence, not only on the composers of his own country, but also wherever it is performed. Opinions will probably differ as to whether the direction it gives to Italian opera is either legitimate or likely to be of enduring success; but no step in advance has ever been taken in artistic matters without provoking opposition, and the mere fact that a man of Signor Verdi's age and reputation should think it right to appear before the world as the champion of the party of operatic progress, should go far to make those who cannot at first appreciate his work at least think twice before condemning it. It would be absurd to deny that Otello is without blemishes. The second and fourth acts are much the best, and the third—with the exception of the admirable scene between Otello, Iago, and Cassio—is much the weakest. The nearest approach to failure in the whole work is the long ensemble in the third act; but the reason of this is very apparent, as the librettist has attempted to incorporate in it Iago's plot with Roderigo—an incident which, having an important bearing upon the climax of the drama, has to be brought into a prominence which is fatal to the proper balance of the music. The fourth act throughout is a masterpiece; nothing more pathetic has been seen on the operatic stage for a long time. With one exception, it is possible to speak of the performance at the Lyceum with almost unqualified satisfaction. Signor Tamagno, the Otello, who appears in England for the first time, comes with a very high Continental reputation. His voice in the upper register is certainly superb, and his acting throughout may almost be compared to that of Salvini, upon whose reading of the part it is evidently based. Unfortunately, his singing is marred by the vicious tremolo which ruins most Italian vocalists in these days; his lower register is also so weak and limited that the tones he produces in it hardly seem as if they proceeded from the same voice as the magnificent rich sounds which he produces in his upper register. M. Maurel, the Iago, is absolutely perfect, whether regarded as an actor or a singer. His delivery of the soliloquy "Credo in un Dio crudel," in the second act, and his facial expression and by-play throughout the whole work, deserve to be studied merely as a piece of acting; while his superb voice and admirable method make it a rare pleasure to listen to him. The minor characters are extremely well filled throughout; but the one blot upon the performance is the Desdemona of Signora Cattaneo, which is altogether unworthy of the surroundings. Neither in appearance, acting, nor singing is she at all fitted for the part. Her vocalization is full of all the worst defects of the Italian School, and it is painful to listen to the open sounds which she produces, accompanied almost incessantly by the horrible tremolo. The ideal Desdemona has not yet been found in Italy; indeed, it is difficult to fix upon any singer now before the public who would be entirely satisfactory in the part. Mme. Nilsson at her prime would have been admirable; failing her, Mme. Albani is almost the only prima donna who could do justice to it. Both chorus and orchestra are altogether excellent; such playing as that under Signor Faccio's able conductorship is rarely heard in any opera house. The only drawback to its proper appreciation is that the Lyceum is too small a house for the performance to produce the effect it would have in a larger space. The orchestra—though only a portion of that employed at the Scala—is too large for the theatre, and both chorus and soloists, accustomed to the vast expanse of the Milan Opera House, seem cramped by the size of the stage. It seems a pity that the performances cannot be transferred to Her Majesty's Theatre, where the size of the stage and of the auditorium would be much more suited to the scale of the performance.

TWO INSURANCE CASES.

LAST week two decisions were given—one by the House of Lords, the other by the Court of Appeal—which are of interest to insurance Companies and policy-holders. The former is, perhaps, more curious than important, though it settles a question of principle of very considerable interest. The New York Life Insurance Company is a mutual Company, having its head office in New York and a branch office in the City of London. It has no shares and no shareholders, the holders of participating policies being the members of the Company. They are responsible for all its liabilities, and they are entitled to all its assets. Besides participating policies, the Company issues ordinary or non-participating policies, and it also sells annuities. But neither the ordinary policy-holders nor the annuitants are members of the Company. They have no vote at its proceedings, are not liable for its debts, and are not entitled to share in its profits. So far, then, as the dealings with the ordinary policy-holders and the annuitants are concerned, there is no question that the Company carries on an ordinary trading business, and what gains it makes are profits properly liable to Income-tax. But the Company contended that it was not liable to pay Income-tax on the bonuses granted to the participating policy-holders—that is, to the members of the Company themselves. The Surveyor of Taxes brought the matter before the Commissioners, who were of opinion that the surplus paid in bonuses did not constitute profits or gains, but was merely the result of an excess of contributions over expenditure; and they held that, therefore, the appellants were not liable to be assessed for the Income-tax. The Surveyor of Taxes required the Commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division. The case was duly heard before Mr. Justice Stephen and Mr. Justice Wills, who gave judgment in favour of the Crown. From this decision there was an appeal to the Court of Appeal; and, after an argument before the Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Fry, and Lord Justice Lopes, the decision of the Queen's Bench Division was confirmed. Then there was an appeal to the House of Lords; and on Monday of last week the decision of the two Courts below was reversed, and judgment was given, with costs, in favour of the Company. Lord Watson, Lord Bramwell, and Lord Herschell were for reversing the decision; the Lord Chancellor and Lord Fitzgerald being for confirming the decision of the Courts below. The case has excited a good deal of interest and comment; firstly, because the Lords were so nearly divided, two being of one opinion and three of the other; secondly, because their decision overrules judgments given by the Queen's Bench Division and the Court of Appeal; and, thirdly, because, at first sight, the ruling of the House of Lords seems to be directly in conflict with a previous decision of the same House, which was to the effect that proprietary insurance Companies are liable to pay Income-tax on bonuses. It appears to us, however, that there is no real inconsistency between the decision given last week and that in Last's case, to which we have just been referring. And, further, if there is no such inconsistency, the division of opinion in the House of Lords, and the fact that the judgment of the two Courts below has been overruled, do not go to weaken last week's decision as much as at first sight may appear, inasmuch as the minority of the Lords and the two Courts below expressly based their judgment on the assumption that the decision in Last's case governed the case before them.

As stated above, there was no dispute that the Company was liable to pay Income-tax on all profits arising out of the Company's dealings with the ordinary policy-holders and with annuitants. The question at issue was whether the bonuses granted to the participating policy-holders were or were not profits in the meaning of the Income-tax Acts. It will be borne in mind that the participating policy-holders are the only members of the Company. The practice is for the officers of the Company to estimate at the beginning of the year the probable expenses of all kinds during the year, and to fix the premiums payable by the participating policy-holders in accordance with the estimate. When the year has ended and the accounts are made up, if there is a deficiency, the participating policy-holders have to make it good; if there is a surplus, part of the surplus is put by as reserve, and the remainder is distributed as bonuses to the participating policy-holders, either by increasing the policy ultimately to be paid or by diminishing the premiums of future years. The Company argued that the bonuses, so distributed, are not profits, but that they are excessive contributions made by the members of the Company, to the return of which they are entitled by the constitution of the Company. The case for the Crown was, of course, that the bonuses do constitute profits, and therefore are liable to the Income-tax. It appears to us that the majority of the Lords were right in deciding in favour of the Company; for surely it is not reasonable to hold that a body of men can trade with themselves and make profits out of that trading. The participating policy-holders, when we look at the matter closely, are an association of persons for the purpose of insuring their own lives on the cheapest terms consistent with solvency. If the officers of the Company, out of too much caution, call for excessive contributions, the excess surely cannot be regarded as profits. But it was argued, whether this be so or not, the decision in Last's case is conclusive. The facts of that case were as follows:—The London Assurance Corporation is a proprietary office—that is to say, it has shareholders who carry on an insurance business with all having insurable lives for the sake of profit. It grants both participating and ordinary policies, and it grants both not only to the outside public but to its own shareholders. The bulk of the policy-holders, however, are not members of the Company. Here, therefore, there were clearly two different bodies of people, one carrying on an insurance business with the other and making profits upon the transactions. There was no dispute, of course, that the profits retained by the shareholders were liable to Income-tax. But it was part of the contract with the participating policy-holders that two-thirds of the profits should be returned to those participating policy-holders. The question was whether the returns so made, the bonuses as they are called, are profits of the Company, and, therefore, liable to Income-tax. It was contended for the Company that they are not profits, that they are an expenditure made for the purpose of attracting business. But the majority of the House of Lords held that the true view was that the whole surplus was profits, and that the Company had agreed to share part of those profits with the participating policy-holders; therefore, that the Company was liable to pay Income-tax upon the whole surplus. We venture to think that this is a wrong view, that the bonuses are really given for the purpose of attracting business, and therefore are expenditure and not participation in profits. But, however that may be, it is quite clear that there is a broad distinction between bonuses given to members of a Company and bonuses given to outside policy-holders, and, consequently, it does not follow that the decision in Last's case governs the case of the New York Life Insurance Company.

The second case was of more importance to all who hold policies and intend to assure. A Mrs. Jarvis insured her life for a thousand pounds in April 1887, and died the following July. On the form of proposal signed by her there was a condition that if statements made by her were untrue the policy should be null and void. The Company set up a defence against paying the policy that several of these statements were untrue. She had stated that a Dr. Griffiths had attended her eighteen months before for a confinement, whereas that gentleman said that he had attended her about fourteen months before, not for a confinement, but for general ill health. She also added that she had an attack of yellow jaundice two years ago, and it was alleged that the attack was more recent. She further stated that she was of temperate habits, that her general health was good, and that she was used to much exercise. But evidence was called to show that she suffered from alcoholic paralysis and enlargement of the liver from excessive drinking. Lastly, it was alleged that a person named as a reference by Mrs. Jarvis did not exist. In fact, the case of the Company was that a conspiracy had been entered into between Mrs. Jarvis and their own agent at Cardiff to defraud the Company. The insurance had been effected without the knowledge of the husband, but as soon as he discovered that it had been made, he took steps to recover the policy. And it may be added that he swore that his wife was of temperate habits. The case was tried at Cardiff, before Mr. Justice Cave and a special jury, and the judge reported that he approved of the verdict, which was against the Company. There was an appeal to the Divisional Court to set aside the verdict and order a new trial. But, though there was some difference between the two judges, the verdict was ultimately sustained; and then the case was carried up to the Court of Appeal. Lord Esher, giving judgment, said that they were asked to set aside the verdict of a special jury approved of by the judge. It required a very strong case indeed to comply with such a request. They would be bound to do so if the Company could show that the statements were substantially untrue and the verdict perverse. But it was clear that the verdict was not perverse, and the statements were to a large extent at least substantially true. The woman admitted that she had had jaundice, she gave correctly the name of her medical attendant, and as for the alleged drinking there was a strong body of evidence to disprove it, and it was for the jury to decide which evidence was to be believed. It was suspicious, no doubt, that the referee could not be found, but it had not been proved that he did not exist. On the other hand, it was a weak point in the Company's case that they did not call their own agent who drew up the declaration and specified the reference. Upon the whole, therefore, the verdict was sustained, and, as we think, very properly so.

THE PARIS EXHIBITION.

THE great show at Paris surpasses anything that has yet been done in the way of exhibitions. An undertaking so vast and so successfully carried out answers those who would insinuate that the French have lost their spirit and their enterprise. If there is any bad side to the Paris Exhibition, it is the fatigue of seeing it. That one must feel exhausted is inevitable; but, perhaps, more might have been done to lessen the troubles of the sightseer. We must suppose that a person comes to an international exhibition with some definite purpose, that he wishes to study some special product of industry or to compare the net efforts of various countries. You may therefore mass all the arts and industries of each country in separate divisions, so that the visitor embraces the whole output of a country in one section; or you may class the exhibits in sections according to the nature of the industry. According to the first system, you would have sections classed by countries, with subsections of the different branches of industry; according to the second, you would have sections classed by production and subsections by countries. Neither of these systems has been absolutely followed, though the general arrangement of the Exhibition inclines to classification by industries. A railway of narrow gauge on the Decauville pattern spares the visitor the fatigue of walking from the main centre of the Champ de Mars to the annexe of the Place des Invalides. Those who have delayed their visit to Paris have done well; for the Exhibition has not yet got into working order, many exhibits are yet to come, and many catalogues are yet to be printed. Unfortunately this is the case even in the art section, with which we are at present chiefly concerned. On the 18th of June one or two pictures were still being hung, and the catalogues of the ten years and hundred years of art remained unprinted, and most probably unfinished. The undone, however, is a mere drop in the bucket to the achieved, and the incompleteness only annoys those who wish to go thoroughly into some special branch. A general view of the show, and of the art section in particular, justifies the supremacy which has been accorded to France in this century, as far as the fine arts are concerned. Even the Eiffel Tower, which has been so much disparaged, seems well suited to its place and purpose. The iron work, as it is extremely light and airy, disassociates itself entirely from the buildings of Paris. It seems no other than the acme or spire of the Exhibition buildings, and has no tendency to dwarf the town. Approaching from the Trocadéro one is struck by an immense view of the domes of the Central Court seen through the arches of the tower. These domes themselves are real works of art. Iron has never been used so successfully as an element of architecture. The work is flat, light, and suitably coloured, and, from the points of view of ornament and construction, this is the way to use the material. The golden-brown middle dome and the light-blue dome of the Division of Fine Arts are enough to show that iron work need not be spidery, tortured, and suggestive of the shed, the conservatory, and the railway station.

When you enter the central dome of the Fine Arts Division you come on the exhibition of a hundred years of French art. The sculpture is on the ground floor, the painting upstairs. It was hardly to be expected that a perfectly full view could be given of all the art of the century. Some men of secondary importance are omitted, and the largest and best works of some great men must still be seen elsewhere. For instance, the great landscape by Rousseau, "Le Radeau de la Méduse" by Géricault, and the "Prise de Constantinople par les Croisés" by Delacroix, remain in the Louvre. Now these pictures happen to be the show efforts of their authors. It is particularly so in the case of Géricault, and almost no less so in the case of Delacroix, who never combined to such purpose in any other canvas the qualities of lofty general design, noble subject, gorgeous colour, and some sense of form. A general view of the pictures under the dome proves that canvases go through their fading very greatly in the first fifty years. After coming out of the modern sections a general yellow-brown hue of old mastery seems to pervade this gallery. It embraces more or less every one except Claude Monet. Even Manet and Bastien-Lepage seem mellowed with a gentle touch of age, and a portrait of a lady with a dog, painted in 1870 by Carolus Duran, has gone down several degrees. Popular acclamation has not been wrong in assigning the foremost places in art during the past hundred years to Corot and Millet. Each struck a new and most personal note among their contemporaries; and their works have not yet been surpassed as effective combinations of art and nature. We see here some of their best pictures amongst the work of their contemporaries, immediate forerunners and successors, in fact, amongst pictures by Ingres, David, Géricault, Delacroix, P. Huet, Rousseau, Cabat, Flers, E. Isabey, Troyon, Decamps, Diaz, Courbet, Couture, Henner, Vollon, &c. No one seems to have used art with so much feeling for the thing expressed as these men. With Millet gesture is intimate and true—a hand sews, you feel the tension of the thread; a man digs, you feel the resistance of the ground and the strain on his muscles. Millet was not content to rival Michael Angelo in the awe-inspiring grandeur of his silhouettes; he must also convey many truths of the new scenes he undertook to treat with this dignified decoration. Corot is the sublimation of the late Romantic School, and he is also the author and master of modern open-air art. He may be seen there in numerous figure works, and still more numerous landscapes. Here, too, are the pictures of those other innovators in landscape—P. Huet, C. Roqueplan, Flers, and Théodore Rousseau; and of the later batch, Diaz, Dupré, Courbet, Daubigny, Jacque, Français, Troyon, Chintreuil, &c. Study of this school, mainly a landscape one, leads us to think that it, rather than the great figure-painters of Romanticism, determined the course of modern art. The large figure-pictures illustrative of the struggles and tendencies of the earlier part of the century are David's "Coronation of Napoleon," Ingres's "Jupiter and Thetis" and "St. Symphorien," Gros's "Departure of Louis XVIII. from the Tuileries," Géricault's "Chasseur de la Garde," Delacroix's "Le 23 Juillet 1830" and "La Bataille de Taillebourg," Delaroche's "Cromwell and Charles I.," Bouchot's "18 Brumaire," H. Flandrin's "Christ and the Children" and "Dante and Virgil," H. Vernet's "Prise de Constantine," and Couture's "Romains de la décadence." On the one hand we must put David, Ingres, and Flandrin as representing what is called the classic school of stiff and dry convention, on the other Gros, Géricault, Delacroix, Delaroche, Bouchot, and Vernet as men who began to seek the more natural beauties and interests of life. David, as might be expected from an inventor, shows the most natural feeling of the three classicists; and Flandrin is both less stiff and more solemn than his master, Ingres. To us of to-day the innovators scarcely appear to have gone far in the direction of naturalism. They turned from one form of old mastery to another and freer sort; and we feel this in spite of Gros's admirable study of candlelight, and still more admirable study of facial expression, and Delacroix's riot of colour, confusion of composition, and courageous use of tile-hats and trowsers. As for Couture, in this great canvas painted in 1847, he stands apart; he is equally far from Ingres and from Delacroix. He comprehended the classic in art differently from David and in a manner more suited to the qualities of paint and the traditions of the sixteenth century. With Gleyre he initiated a new classicism, and succeeded in the "Decadence" in leaving the most splendid piece of decoration of the century. The most notable things in the second part of this century are Courbet's "Casseurs de pierre" (1850), a common incident conceived in a new style of grandeur not unlike Millet's; P. Baudry's flat decorative panel, "A Nymph" (1862); Henner's "Byblis" (1867), quite prophetic of his present style; Manet's still luminous and fresh "En Bateau"; H. Regnault's stately "Marshal Prim" (1869), one of the few modern works that recalls the Old Masters; Falguière's noble and poetic realism "The Wrestlers" (1875); Duez's Manet-like picture of a lady amongst rhododendron trees; pictures by P. de Chavannes, Carolus-Duran, Bonnat, Cazin, Detaille, De Neuville, Yvon, Fantin Latour, G. Moreau, Elie Delaunay, Roll, Claude Monet, and, finally, many of the works of Bastien-Lepage. Passing from Corot, Millet, and 1830 to later times, one feels the originality and first-hand interest of work by Henner, Carolus-Duran, and Manet. Their influence has been and will be felt in art. Manet, Monet, Duez, Roll, and Bastien-

Lepage have all done much for the plein-air movement which to-day counts so many followers; but to Manet belongs the chief credit of its initiation. To-day his pictures stand comparison for real open-air feeling with those of Monet; beside his "En Bateau," "Joan of Arc," and even "The Potato Gatherers" of Bastien-Lepage, seem like tortured patterns in dry leather; while his "Le Bon Bock" and man reading, with their superb and solid breadth of handling, come as near a Rembrandt as any modern heads. Bastien-Lepage had great powers of observation and much sentiment; but he had a narrow vision, and was by no means naturally an impressionist.

As this collection of pictures comes down to 1878, works by many of the artists just spoken of—such as Bonnat, Carolus Duran, Henner, E. Delaunay, J. C. Cazin, Roll, Duez, Jacque, Français, Harpignies, Dupré, and Cabat—are to be found both in the ancient and modern divisions of the exhibition. The portraits of M. Carolus-Duran make one of the most undoubted triumphs of the modern sections. We question whether any portraits more thorough or more distinguished have been painted in this century than his "M. Pasteur," which was hung in last year's Academy; his "Louis Français," from the Salon of 1888; and his "Mme. la Comtesse V—," from that of 1879. Yet MM. Delannay, Bonnat, and P. Dubois are represented by portraits of such high merit that it seems somewhat rash to say that anything surpasses them. The luminousness and the superbly broad and old-masterlike style of portraits such as these fully justify Europe in sitting at the feet of France during the past forty years. That country and her pupils, meaning every country but England, continue to exercise themselves in the large figure-canvas, sometimes with a decorative, sometimes with a realistic aim. Amongst those who go in for realistic form and atmospheric envelopment, M. Aimé Morot takes a high place with his vast charge of cuirassiers, "Reischoffen," and M. Gervex with his interiors "Rolla" and "Les membres du jury du Salon de Peinture." The aspect of these interiors, with their clear, high-toned grey employed in broad even masses, is one that has been much sought for by French artists and those under their influence. Hospital scenes, for instance, by M. A. Brouillet, in the French section, and by M. Jimenez in the Spanish, are two amongst many. MM. Roll and Fourié are bold, open-air realists on a large scale; while MM. Bramtot, Cormon, and L. A. Girardot rather lean to decoration or poetical sentiment. Many painters have endeavoured to enliven the even, grey atmospheric style above mentioned, and to express the vibration of light and sunshine by suggesting contrasts of complementary colour in subordination to the masses. The style requires facility in drawing and brushing, as well as a real feeling for light; for it becomes abominable when produced mechanically. M. Besnard succeeds wonderfully at times, and especially in "Une femme nue qui se chauffe," in which modelling is marvellously conveyed in the midst of the loose effacing shimmer of light. MM. Carrière, Dagnan-Bouveret, J. Béraud, Raffaelli, Maurice Eliot, Montenard, Damoye, Duez, and Boudin are amongst those who make a fine study of light from different points of view in landscape or in figure. Admirable landscape of a severely classic sort comes from MM. Français and Harpignies. MM. Busson, Bernier, Hanoteaux, J. Binet, J. Breton, Defaux Delpy, and others paint in the solid, clear, grey style of ordinary French landscape. M. Pelouse draws landscape superbly, and his handling is quite unequalled in cleverness. M. Jules Dupré and Pointelin are Romanticists of the old school. The Dutchmen—J. Maris Mauve and others—follow more or less in this tradition. Mr. Kroyer, in the Danish section, and Mr. Sargent in the American, treat real light with as much brio, truth, and real feeling as any one. As to our own country, if its show of painting produces a general effect of feebleness and fumbling, we can console ourselves in the manifest originality of a few painters like Messrs. Watts, Burne-Jones, Whistler, J. C. Hook, and Sir F. Leighton. The works of the extreme section of impressionists are best seen in the Café Volpini, behind the picture galleries. Some of them are remarkably vivid and true, but the majority may be taken along with the dancers in the Javanese village as an entertainment more interesting than natural to Europeans.

NOTES FROM THE ZOO—THE COCOS-NUT CRAB.

AMONG the additions to the menagerie during the month of June is a Cocos-nut crab—Birgus latro—which was presented to the Society on the 14th of the month, and is "new to the collection." It is officially described as from "India," a vague, and in our opinion unsatisfactory, description of its habitat. It can be seen in the Insect-house, where it is kept in a large glass case. It is a land-crab belonging to the same family—Anomoura, or irregular-tailed crabs—as the hermit-crabs, a family which forms the connecting link between the crabs and lobsters. This species grows to a large size. The carapace has been well described as being "somewhat in the form of a reversed heart, with the apex pointing forward." The first pair of legs are armed with strong toothed pincers, or knob-claws, the left being larger than the right; the second and third pairs terminate in single nails; while the fourth and fifth have pincers, but they are small and very weak—in fact, the fifth pair of legs may almost be described as rudimentary. Its colour is most peculiar, and was well described by a lady we overheard at the Zoo as being exactly the tint of a pickling cabbage. Its appearance is far from prepossessing; indeed it is no exaggeration to say that it is as evil-looking and uncanny a creature as can be found in the Gardens.

Darwin, who describes these crabs as being found on coral islands, saw them in large numbers on Keeling Island, and the following are extracts from his extremely interesting account of them. He says:—"Keeling Island has no quadruped excepting the pig, and no vegetable in quantity excepting the cocoanut. On it the pigs, which are loaded with fat, almost entirely subsist, as likewise do the poultry and ducks. Even a huge land-crab is furnished by nature with a curious instinct and form of legs to open and feed upon this same fruit. It is very common on all parts of the dry land, and grows to a monstrous size . . . It would at first be thought quite impossible for a crab to open a strong cocoanut covered with the husk; but Mr. Leisk, one of the two British residents, assures me he has repeatedly seen the operation effected. The crab begins by tearing the husk, fibre by fibre, and always from that end under which the eye-holes are situated. When this is completed the crab commences hammering with its heavy claws on one of those eye-holes till an opening is made; then, turning round its body, by the aid of its posterior pair of narrow pincers it extracts the white albuminous substance. I think this is as curious a case of instinct as ever I heard of, and likewise of adaptation in structure between two objects apparently so remote from each other in the scheme of nature as a crab and a cocoanut-tree." He further tells us that these crabs visit the sea every night, no doubt for the purpose of moistening their branchiæ; that the young are hatched and live for some time on the coast; and that they "inhabit deep burrows, which they excavate beneath the roots of the cocoanut-trees, and here they accumulate surprising quantities of the picked fibres of the cocoanut-husk, on which they rest as on a bed. The Malays sometimes take advantage of their labour by collecting the coarse fibrous substance and using it as junk."

These crabs are alleged by the natives to climb cocoanut-trees in the night to get the cocoanuts—a story which was believed by both Linnaeus and Cuvier, but of which Darwin wrote, "I very much doubt the possibility of this." However, Cuming, who found them "sufficiently abundant" in Lord Hood's Island in the Pacific, stated that they climbed Pandanus odoratissimus—the Screw-pine—for the purpose of feeding on the small nuts that grow on it, and that he had seen them in the trees; and, no doubt, some species of Anomoura are great climbers. However this may be, there is little doubt that the only cocoanuts they eat are those which have fallen to the ground. Cuming also tells us that "when he met them in his road they set themselves up in a threatening attitude, and then retreated backwards, making both at first and afterwards a great snapping with their pincers." These crabs are said to be excellent eating when properly prepared, and under the tail of the larger ones there is a great mass of fat which, when melted, sometimes yields as much as a quart of limpid oil.

The specimen now in the Zoo is, as we have said, kept in a large glass case, the bottom of which is covered for a considerable thickness with moist sandy gravel, in which it delights to burrow, making as deep a hole as possible to rest in. It is fed on bananas, four or five of which are given to it every evening, and all of which, as the keeper informs us, have invariably disappeared by the morning. It appears to attract but little attention from the general visitors to the Insect-house, but few of whom are apparently aware that it is not only new to the collection, but also a rare and very interesting animal.

THE LATE FRANZ THIMM.

SHAKSPEARIAN literature has sustained an important loss this past week in the death of Mr. Franz Thimm, an Austrian by birth, but long since naturalized an Englishman. Mr. Thimm came over to this country when quite a youth, late in the first half of the century, and established himself as a foreign bookseller and publisher. His first important work was The Literature of Germany from its Earliest Period to the Present Day, a very useful manual for students, which deserved to be better known, the opening chapters on the legends and folklore of the German peoples being exceptionally well compiled. Some years later, when he had obtained a more perfect knowledge of our language, Mr. Thimm devoted himself to Shakspearian literature with great earnestness. He was constantly to be found at the British Museum making researches, or attending the numerous meetings of the many Shakspearian Societies, whose work and very existence are scarcely known to the general public. About fifteen years ago Mr. Thimm published the first volume of his great work, Shakspeariana from 1564 to 1871, which contains an almost complete list and account of every work written in Europe on Shakspeare, and matter connected with him or his plays, in the last three hundred years. It is an almost indispensable va de mecum to the Shakspearian student as a work of reference, and it is a fortunate circumstance that the concluding volume, left in manuscript, was completely finished a few months before the author's death. Independently of this curious work, which is the result of many years' study and research, Mr. Thimm devoted much time to completing the collections of Shakspeariana in the British Museum, Birmingham Free Library, the Memorial Library at Stratford-on-Avon, and the Boston Library. He was in active correspondence with most of the leading students of our great national poet both at home and abroad; but was—as, by the way, is often the case with literary specialists—even better known in America and in Germany than at home. Whenever there was a disputed point in connexion with Shakspeare and his rather obscure biography, Mr. Thimm was invariably applied to in order to help to settle the question, and his erudition on such occasions was only surpassed by his invariable courtesy. When a few months ago the Baconian theory was revived, Mr. Thimm took deep interest in the proceedings, and, although his contempt for the Baconians was almost tragic in its intensity, nevertheless he never permitted his prejudices to carry away his reason, and he was successful in convincing several eminent Baconians of the errors of their ways. Not less interesting was this scholarly man as a student of Goethe; but his voluminous manuscripts on this great poet and his works have not yet been published, although he frequently read long extracts from them at public meetings. Mr. Thimm was a remarkable linguist, speaking fluently seven modern languages, and he was likewise well versed in Arabic and Hebrew. During the past year his health had failed him considerably; but up to within a few weeks of his death he continued his Shakspearian researches and corrected the manuscripts of his work already mentioned.

THE OPERA.

THE admirable performance of Faust at Covent Garden last week lost some of its interest through the absence of Mme. Albani from a remarkably strong cast, which included the brothers De Reszke and M. Lassalle. Though the Marguerite of Mme. Albani is not in any respect an ideal creation, it is not one which can for one moment be adequately replaced by the rendering of Miss Macintyre. This gifted singer seems to be out of all sympathy with the character of Marguerite, and her performance was not only inadequate, as might have been expected under the circumstances, but it showed absolutely no promise, and was so far satisfactory that it left no vain regrets of unfulfilled possibilities in the minds of the audience. She exhibited a certain correct rigidity of style, the result, perhaps, of a too careful study of the part, which was particularly noticeable in the difficult Jewel scene in the third act. In the last two acts, notably in the Church scene, however, her stiffness wore off to some extent and her singing improved considerably. For some reason which is not clear, the scene was mounted as an interior instead of an exterior, without any apparent advantage. The presence of Mephistopheles inside the church is not readily accounted for, and the scornful attitude assumed by the town girls as they pass out cannot be rendered so effectively or so realistically as when the scene is played as an exterior. If Miss Macintyre failed to give a satisfactory presentment of Marguerite, M. Edouard de Reszke surpassed himself. It is impossible to exaggerate the artistic merit of his performance as Mephistopheles, which must be witnessed several times in order to be fully appreciated. A striking example of his fertility of resource has been pointed out by an observant critic, who has drawn attention to his entrance in the Garden scene, towards the close of the third act. After the exit of Marguerite towards the pavilion he enters from the back of the stage, marking every note with a step forwards. Here he has no doubt seized the true meaning of the composer. In the scene with Valentine at the conclusion of the second act the zeal of the students in threatening the fiend with their cross-handled sword-hilts rather interfered with the effect. Mephistopheles was so hemmed in that he lost his wonted dignity of carriage and seemed, for the moment, more like the baffled villain of melodrama than the Prince of Darkness. Of M. Jean de Reszke's almost ideal Faust it is needless to say more than has often been said.

An impression, which we sincerely hope is limited to a single individual, seems to exist that the brothers De Reszke are in the habit of exchanging parts, each one playing Faust and Mephistopheles alternately. The mistake is amusing enough; and it perhaps helps to explain the unfortunate position of opera in this country. The musical education of a person who supposes that a tenor can change parts with a basse chantante must have been remarkable. It is more remarkable that such a person should inform a less instructed friend on musical matters, in audible tones, during the performance of some of the most sublime passages in Gounod's opera.

LENA.

IF Mme. Sarah Bernhardt had never played any other part but that of Lena, her performance in that part alone would have marked her as an actress of the very first rank, if not, as in some sense, the greatest living actress. This is, of course, a paradox, for no actress without long and arduous training could possibly play as Mme. Sarah Bernhardt has played certain scenes of Lena. Again, the reservation given above is necessary, because no perfect artist—that is, no artist that cared to be perfect all through a play—could or would neglect so entirely as Mme. Bernhardt did more than a good half of the part assigned her. It is contended by some critics that a player who finds one half of a part a thankless task, and sees in the other half the chance of making, by giving all attention to it, an overwhelming success, is not to be blamed for neglecting the otiose portion of his or her part, and reserving all his or her powers for a second portion, which even in the hands of an inferior player would prove, to say the least, effective. We have no hesitation in laying it down as a canon that this contention is absolutely opposed to all true notions of art. The trick—we will not call it a method—is not unknown on the operatic stage, is not unknown even in plastic art, but it is one very far beneath what should be the scope of so great an actress as Mme. Bernhardt.

As a matter of fact, Mme. Bernhardt loitered and gabbled through the first two acts of Lena. She is a mistress of diction, and she spoke not a word, except sometimes her cues, which could be understood; she is a mistress of action, and she now forced, now neglected, the gesture and byplay necessary for the carrying on of the piece. For instance, in the snatching away of the letter in the first act her behaviour was like that of a Jack-in-the-box wound up from immobility to frantic action. Not the less was it worth while to endure the weary and monotonous loquacity of the first two acts for the sake of the extraordinary acting which Mme. Bernhardt was good enough to display in the last two acts. This may conceivably be rivalled, but certainly can never be surpassed. The actress's byplay in the scene where she listens to a boy's unaffected story of sincere, devoted love was an absolute masterpiece; and there should be noted especially the subtle, almost intangible, suggestion that her emotion in hearing his story was but the reflection of her own entrancing and for once unsullied love for the man she wants to marry.

Equally fine, as the only possible ending to such a scene, was the sudden freezing of her manner when she was compelled to answer this passionate appeal. A word of distinct praise is due to the young actor who at this juncture made one of the most difficult and one of the best exits we have ever seen. As to the end of this, the third act, the experienced playgoer and critic might well say to himself, "What can an actress make of the old, old story of a man saying to a woman who has her place to regain, 'Can you love me?' and her answering, 'Je t'adore!'" Here one can only say seeing is believing. Mme. Bernhardt informs this ancient reply with a new voice, a new gesture, a new intonation, a new passion, and that passion of the highest kind, which literally bring the dead words to life. The great actress's performance of the last act has been described again and again with various qualities of "word-painting," and therefore we need not now insist too much on the extraordinary excellence of the pantomime in the highest and truest sense of the word, during the whole scene which leads up to the catastrophe. To some it may sound flippant to say that all this is a feat of which Mr. Martinetti himself might be proud. Yet it is true. The greatest of histrionic art must depend largely on pantomime, rightly understood—that is, on facial expression or emotion conveyed by walk, by movement of the head and arms, without a word spoken. In this art, in this scene, Mme. Bernhardt has thus far overtopped the topmost. What follows this succeeds in the combining with this extraordinary pantomimic art a depth or height of tragedy and tenderness which may never have been reached before in an absolutely silent scene. The end of this scene is, we have no hesitation in saying, as moving a thing as ever has been seen upon the stage. But for the actress's extraordinary command of her art, it would become simply painful. As it is, only the deepest pity is aroused for the woman who, overcome by the power of the drug which she has drunk, yet tries with all the soul that lives in a dying body to answer her husband's despairing cry from outside the door locked by herself. Acting cannot go further than this.

THE BULL-BULL'S FAREWELL.

IN Fleet Street, ere the night to noon had worn,
I heard one crying with a voice forlorn:
"To-day and yesterday were full of Shah,
Will there be more of him to-morrow morn?"

There is an end of all things. Roses bloom
To fade, and beauty ripens for the tomb;
The nightingale is hushed at last; and kings
Cannot expect an everlasting boom.

"Enough," the sages say, "has always been
As good as any feast that e'er was seen."
But this sensation has been done to death,
And thou thyself must feel it, Nasr-ed-din.

Have we not writ enough (in Eastern taste)
Of the great emerald that adorns thy waist?
Has not the diamond lion in thy cap
Blazed oft enough in literary paste?

Not better could the armourer who laughed
With the sheer joy of artist in his craft
To shape thy serpent-hilted scimitar
Reckon than we the rubies in its haft.

We know thy trick of Oriental calm;
We know thy light, indifferent salaam;
Thy curiously fastened spectacles
We know as well—as well as our Khayyam.

Have we not closely studied each remark
Let fall by thee since thou didst disembark?

Not watched thee wondering at our crowded streets,
Or putting on the pot at Kempton Park?

Have we not flashed upon the lightning's wings
Thy observations upon men and things?

Do we not know thy views on English ways,
Arts, climate, horses, women, King of Kings?

Nay, have we not so oft compared thy State
With his whom Hellas collared at her gate

That every shadow seems to us the ghost
Of Xerxes, rising to expostulate?

And have we not at last run wholly through
Our scraps of Sadi and of Hafiz too?

Are not our miserable brains a whirl
Of Hadji-Baba and of Montesquieu?

In vain we beat our brows, in vain we cry
For more new adjectives; none makes reply:

Only the spirit voice within the breast
Whispers, "The fount of adjectives is dry."

Successor of Darius! well we know
That thou must see the entire and perfect show;

And yet, methinks, it will not break thy heart
When there shall come at last thy time to go.

REVIEWS.

LIFE AND LITERARY REMAINS OF EDWARD FITZGERALD.*

THE name of Edward FitzGerald first became known to a very small circle of readers when his version of Omar Khayyam grew fashionable. Published in 1859, the Rubaiyat very slowly flowered into a popularity rather intense than wide. There was a kind of freemasonry in the little book, and its admirers were inclined to swear eternal friendship. There is a story of an Englishman and an American, strangers to each other, who were involved together in some uncomfortable accident of travel. The Briton was inclined, for his own lordly reasons, to dislike and despise the American. "When shall we get out of this?" he muttered, half to himself; and the American, also half to himself, quoted, "He knows! He knows!" The pair then recognized each other as kindred souls, and brothers in Omar Khayyam. In America the tract was much more popular than at home. It used to bring young persons together, and proved a Galeotto to youths and maidens who Knew that their intentions

Were absolutely right.

In America, too, the Rubaiyat were illustrated, by Mr. Vedder, in a manner not equally pleasing to all tastes; for the only way to illustrate Omar is by arabesques of roses and nightingales on some "sweet-scented manuscript."

Omar made FitzGerald's literary fortune, a fortune which he was never at any pains to seek. Perhaps no literary success was ever gained in such a curious, casual way. FitzGerald had a habit, with which we cannot sympathize, of making perversions of foreign and classical poetry. The most astonishing examples are his Edipous in Thebes and Edipous in Athens. These are not translations so much as very free adaptations in verse, commonly blank, but casually rhyming, of the Sophoclean masterpieces. The choruses, in quite a different tone of voice, are taken direct from a translator of the last century, "Old Potter." The whole result strikes us as being neither one thing nor another; not a Greek drama, not a modern drama, not a thing of to-day, of yesterday, or of two thousand years ago. FitzGerald apologizes for his liberties in a preface, but he does not reconcile us to them. At what did he aim? If any one wants a justification of this perplexity, let him compare FitzGerald's version of the Messenger's speech on the Passing of Edipous with the noble original (FitzGerald, iii. 263; Ed. Col. 1648-1665). A more complete and absolute missing of the point, a more successful escape of all the poetry, was never made or permitted by mortal translator. The very ἀλλ' εἴ τις βροτῶν

θαναστὸς

is omitted, with almost everything else that dwells eternally in the mind of the reader. FitzGerald's perversions of the Greek are bastard and abortive things. Now his translation of Omar may, perhaps, seem as bastard to the Persian scholar, but abortive nobody can call it. People who are not Orientalists may consult Mr. McCarthy's recent prose version of the Rubaiyat, and may form some idea of how much FitzGerald gave to his original. By the least probable of all paths—a casual and capricious following of an ancient original—he reached the end, success, and produced a work which has given and will give much poetical pleasure. The secret of the fortune of his Omar is difficult and dark. Other poets of wine, death, the rose, and the bulbul leave readers who come to them by way of translations extremely cold. It must be something in FitzGerald's verse which makes all the difference; something in his verse and in his melancholy. That melancholy, again, is not at all like the sad resignation and endurance of his letters. He was no "Oriental voluptuary," but a tall Englishman, "whose friendships were more like loves," who loved best some of the greatest men of his time, and who had a sturdy affection for his country.

* Life and Literary Remains of Edward FitzGerald. Edited by William Aldis Wright. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

Why and wherefore he withdrew from all activity, why he hid his light under a bushel or on board a herring lugger, why he said to action and adventure

Too late for us your horns you blow
Whose bent was taken long ago, his letters do not explain. They are haunted by that long apprehension of national collapse which has embittered the lives of every generation since Waterloo. FitzGerald "cannot help and distresses himself as little as possible." "Don't write to me on politics, I agree with you beforehand," he says; and this admirer of big, strong men, this friend of Tennyson, Thackeray, Carlyle, hides himself from the world and shuts his eyes to what he cannot cure, like an Obermann. It is a very strange phenomenon of character, and, as we said, is unexplained, though perhaps it has an explanation. Very soon after leaving Cambridge, then so full of men of promise and vitality, he becomes a voluntary recluse, watching the wheel of existence like a British Buddha. He was un-English enough to be a vegetarian, as every one has read in Lord Tennyson's poem. He lived on the memories of old and immortal friendships, very little cheered by glimpses of the friends who were out in the world. He read the best books of the world and tinkered at them a little, collecting aphorisms in Polonius, speaking his mind with Platonic reserve in Euphranor, trying faintly to reinstate Crabbe in selections, thinking of abridging Clarissa, perverting Sophocles, adapting Calderon, and making an unexpected masterpiece of the Rubaiyat. He was like Balzac's alchemist in La Recherche de l'Absolu. Once, in some unknown way, he created a diamond—he never could recover that mastery, but there the diamond remains, "on the stretched forefinger of all Time," to quote the line obnoxious to Sir Edward Hamley:—

The worldly Hope men set their hearts upon Turns ashes—or it prospers, and anon,
Like snow upon the desert's dusty face,
Lighting a little hour or two—is gone.

He set his heart, as far as we learn, on no hope, and there was no particular light but that of loyalty and kindness on the long path of pleasant and melancholy days. The burden of his poem, "Bredfield Hall," is the burden of his thought:—

To most thou stand'st a record sad,
But all the sunshine of the year
Could not make thine aspect glad
To one whose youth is buried here.

In thine ancient rooms and gardens
Buried, and his own no more
Than the youth of those old owners,
Dead two centuries before.

He was thirty when he wrote, or half-wrote, for they are quite unfinished, those lines on his ancient home. Hawthorne might have seen in him a man bemused in the Sleepy Hollow of an English country house, lulled by the peace and dulled by the memory of the long series of lives that were passed and ended in its halls and gardens:—

'Till the Bell that not in vain
Had summon'd them to weekly prayer,
Call'd them one by one again
To the church, and left them there!

At thirty his bent was taken, perhaps earlier, and yet he was impatient with Lord Tennyson's Princess and the Idylls; he wanted from him some more stirring and spirited verse. "The last of old Alfred's best" he found in the volumes of 1842, now near fifty years ago. What was it that took the life out of him; the life, but not the heart, for he always kept the heart of a boy, and the joy in the praise of other men?

We might fill a long review with extracts of personal interest, as it is called, from FitzGerald's letters, with anecdotes of Mr. Thackeray, Lord Tennyson, Mr. Spedding, and Mr. Carlyle. All through his life he was fumbling, as it were, with the erection of a stone on Naseby field to mark the true site of the battle and of the burials. He had made some diggings long ago while Carlyle was editing Cromwell's Letters and Speeches. But nothing came of it. Every one who cares at all for the literature of England since 1830 will read these charming, melancholy letters, and learn from FitzGerald how very great a man the Laureate is, and how his prose sentences are worthy of his poetry. But few of them are published here, nor do we see very much of Thackeray, nothing more vivid than a sketch of him as he runs, singing, up the stairs to FitzGerald's rooms. We learn, too, that Thackeray's articles on pictures made the painters very wild. They talked of horsewhips; but two could play at that game, and nobody attempted it with Mr. Titmarsh. FitzGerald was crushed somehow by the mystery of the world. "Another year, with its same flowers and topics to open upon us. . . Oh! this wonderful, wonderful world, and we who stand in the midst of it are all in a maze, except poor Matthews, of Bedford, who fixes his eyes upon a wooden Cross and has no misgivings whatsoever." "It is good for a humourist to be alone," FitzGerald said; though he himself married. May we not say that it is not good for a humourist to be alone, living in his thoughts without action, sad, and a cause of sadness in others? For, though FitzGerald is never maudlin, never peevish, he is emphatically hopeless; with all his charity, which was great, he had not hope. "The old Tent-maker," he says, "fell back upon To-day (which has outlasted so many to-morrows) as the only ground he had got to stand upon, however momentarily slipping from under his feet." He, too, lived from day to day in a world where very little was permanent but his own deathless love of old friends. He writes to Mr. Lawrence, who had sent him a portrait of Thackeray (1864):—"I found your two letters, and then your box. When I had unscrewed the last screw it was as if a coffin's lid were raised; there was the dead man. I took him up to my bedroom, and when morning came he was there, reading, alive, and yet dead." He often says how in Thackeray's books he hears Thackeray's living voice, and we hear his in his letters. It is a kind voice and friendly, a wind from the dusty desert softened in passing over the green of English lawns and the water of English streams.

It comes easily enough to regret FitzGerald's want of energy, to regret it as much for his own sake as for that of letters or of life. But most who read his correspondence will agree

That life, that energy, though rare,
Are yet far, far less rare than love.

NOVELS.*

MR. R. G. DERING is happy in the first impression he makes in his novel Giraldi; or, the Curse of Love. There is a dedication, which runs thus:—"To Thomas Lowestoft, Esquire, of Braybrooke Hall, Lincolnshire, in recognition of his unwearied attempts to discourage me in my literary career, and to dissuade me, in particular, from publishing the present work, this book is inscribed by his very humble friend and servant." This preliminary taste of the writer's quality engages attention and excites interest in no small degree. On the next page is a list of characters with definitions, after the fashion of the bill of the play, the names suggesting recollections of Peacock. The Rev. Chauncey Fairweather, the Rev. Oriel St. Jerome, the Rev. Jabez Insight, the Rev. Israel Doom, the Rev. Issachar Leech, are a few of the representative figures who appear in this portentous catalogue. Nobody must suppose that Mr. Dering's personages are all clerics, or that the talk is nothing but theological discussion. There is a good deal of that; but we are getting used to it now in novels where the creeds are jostling incident and flirtation out of the running. Besides the polemical bent, there is the second title to justify. We must be shown the "curse of love." We suspect the curse of love did not present itself in any very striking manner to the mind of the author, any more than he has succeeded in making it do to the reader. Much nearer to his heart was putting convincing arguments into the mouth of Dr. Urquhart, the Agnostic, or at least defending the position of the respectable curate of the Established Church against the attacks of Dissent. Love may be left to take care of itself, and will survive worse assaults than Mr. Dering's. On the whole, we cannot but feel pleased that the dissuasions of Mr. Dering's friend did not stifle his ambition as a novel-writer. Giraldi is undeniably a clever book; satirical, humorous, and amusing; full of consistent sketching of character, mostly grotesque, but seldom absurdly improbable. It reads like the first effort in fiction of a man who has observed and thought. Giraldi, the boy Jew Jesuit, is the least successful character, perhaps because he is the most complex. He is thoroughly disagreeable. Mr. Dering's is not a smooth version of life, and very few people in his book awaken sympathy. There are crudities in the construction and peculiarities in the style. But it is an original and readable novel.

Little Hand and Muckle Gold may be regarded in the light of a literary contribution to the Pasteur agitation of the moment. The most terrible description of a death from hydrophobia we have read out of the pages of a medical book concludes the third volume. Nor has "X. L.," the author, dealt out this fearful doom in punishment of the villain of the piece. It is deepened in its horror by its being the fate of a woman—nay, a duchess, young, lovely, and good. Can any fate be more fantastical than that of a young creature, adored by her husband, worshipped by society, spoiled by neither, and mistress of every good thing this world has to offer, sent out of it by the scratch on her wrist of a vicious little pet dog, and sent, moreover, in the most hideous way the mind can conceive? "X. L." supplies a solid stone

* Giraldi; or, the Curse of Love. By Ross George Dering. 2 vols. London: Trübner & Co. 1889.

Little Hand and Muckle Gold: a Study of To-day. By X. L. 3 vols. Edinburgh and London: William Blackwood & Sons. 1889.

An I. D. B. in South Africa. By Louise Vescelius-Sheldon. London: Trübner & Co.

Miss Eyre from Boston; and others. By Louise Chandler Moulton. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1889.

A Woodland Wooing. By Eleanor Putnam. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1889.

towards the support of the Pasteur Institute. The compassion we feel for the unhappy Duchess of Tintagell—or Tintagil, as the author prefers it—dates chiefly from the hour of her forebodings as to her frightful death. The story begins in the days of the Second French Empire—opens, in fact, on the 1st of December, 1851. The social tapestry of the succeeding years was vulgar in design and coarse in execution seen even in the best light. The seamy side of it, which the author alone shows us, is unredeemably bad. The two English girls, Muriel Meredith and Madge Tyrrell, who are brought up in the worst Parisian set in the worst way, do not escape the consequences of such contact. The author is perpetually presenting them in the most dubious positions, doing and saying and hearing things all but incompatible with innocence, certainly abolishing all notion of ignorance, and yet apparently expects us to receive them as ingénues. Madge, indeed, waits till she can add to her fall the betrayal of her husband; and Muriel never actually falls in the received sense; but both had early lost all the bloom belonging to girls who have not eaten of the fruit of the tree of good and evil. Madge, who was wicked, ends in the grace of sanctity as “Sister Saint John of God.” Muriel, who was virtuous, dies snapping and howling like a mad dog. Lawrence Farquhar, who was vicious enough for a dozen, is drowned while in a fit of paralysis brought on by excess in absinthe. Such were their deaths, and their lives seem no inappropriate preparation. It will be seen that “X. L.” leads us through no pleasant paths of innocence and peace.

None but the initiated can know the meaning of the title Mrs. Louise Vesceilius-Sheldon gives her novel, An I. D. B. in South Africa; nor, in sooth, is there much enlightenment or edification either to be gained by perusal of the work. In the first chapter a gentleman, known in the social circles of the Kimberley Diamond Fields as Count Telfus, is arrested by detectives in his box in the Theatre Royal, searched on the spot, with the result of finding on his person a marked diamond; is conducted to the police station, and there shoots himself with the pistol which the officers of law had either overlooked in his pockets or had obligingly left there for the purpose. Count Telfus was an “I. D. B.” Later on another gentleman of good position is searched by more detectives for another marked diamond. He also is an “I. D. B.”; but he has a clever little wife, who saves him, literally, in the twinkling of an eye. Her black dwarf servant, Bela, has a glass eye, which his mistress had, in moments of gaiety, taken out and put in again, so as to become familiar with the process. When the detectives’ backs are turned, Mrs. Laure whips out Bela’s false optic, pops the stolen diamond into the socket, restores the glass eye, and serenely confronts the baffled minions of the law. These two incidents are the leading events of the story, which is, besides, a foolish story, written in bad taste and bad style.

Mrs. Louise Chandler Moulton, if we may judge from the volume called Miss Eyre from Boston, does not shine in prose. Fourteen little stories make up a little book, and make very little impression on the attention of the reader. A few feeble ghosts and a great deal of sentimental love flicker feebly through the fourteen, and there’s an end. Mrs. Moulton is not above taking help from her betters, and this is an amiable quality. “Riching versus Providence” is a boiling down of Dombey and Son as near to Dickens as the author could make it, which is not very near. In “Nan” a fashionable young lady is unaffectedly named Blanche Amory. This awakens, at least, a reflected historical interest. In another of the little tales we are taken into an “inodorous old house with its smell of mould blended with bad tobacco.” Miss Eyre’s aunt, Miss Quincey, spells her first name Mehitable, but, of course, in a free republic she could do that if she liked. A final gleam of pleasure is shed on finding ourselves referred to in “The Perils of a Studio” as the “savage ‘Saturday,’” and these sum up the merits of the book.

A Woodland Wooing is a homely little American story of girls and boys camping out, amusing themselves in the woods, and having generally a good time. Miss Betty Greenleaf and her brother Bob, who tell the story between them, are rough, affectionate playfellows, the young lady of the type of heroine with tousled hair and tumbled frocks, who climbs trees and is always in some hoydenish scrape, but manages to win the heart of the best parti about. There is love-making in the camp at Sippican, and some amusing incidents take place; but the fun is a little forced, and the children, drawn somewhat after the pattern of Helen’s Babies, are not quite so engaging as the author means them to be. Nevertheless, it is a bright little trifle of a book.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH.*

WE observe—with some concern, with a little amusement, and with a very little curiosity to know when these un-Christian feelings arose—that Mr. Philip Gilbert Hamerton is apparently not quite in charity with the Saturday Review. He says in his preface that we “were once good enough to say that he is ‘courteously careful not to offend.’” When a man says “good enough” in this way he generally means “ineffably bad.” Further, it seems that we wickedly, maliciously, and not having the fear of God before our eyes, wrote “after the expulsion of the Count of Paris and his family,” when, as a matter of fact, only two members of his family were formally expelled, though his whole family left in consequence of the expulsion of their father and head—as, in fact, families very commonly do. We repent in sackcloth and ashes, and will hereafter never say that “Mr. Smith and his portmanteaus” arrived at Folkestone without inquiring carefully whether any portmanteaus remained in Mr. Smith’s box-room in London. We are (still according to Mr. Hamerton) “never very charitable in our judgments about France, and not often very well informed.” Now of course, if we are not often very well informed about France, what is the use of our criticizing a book which is well informed? So Mr. Hamerton cleverly bars the judgment and the knowledge of the court at the same time.

There is, however, this of god-like about the critic, that it does not make the very smallest difference to him whether the prisoner at the bar thinks him well informed or not, charitable or not, good or not. Judges have been known to increase the sentences of prisoners for throwing boots at the Bench—an increase defensible, perhaps, on the ground that the boot is constructively thrown at Her Gracious Majesty. But in the court of criticism (which is the highest and most impartial of all courts) a man shall no more get twelve months instead of six for throwing his boots at the judge than he shall be acquitted because he has greased the judge’s palm. Mr. Hamerton’s book is interesting because he can write pleasantly enough, and because he possesses what most Englishmen do not possess—the habit of French life—having lived in France, not for a month or two, or for a year or two, or on visits now and then, but for a very long course of years as an actual householder, not in an English colony, or in the capital, or in a watering-place, but up the country among Frenchmen, and almost of them. It is true that the advantages obtained by this experience are constantly overrated, and are, in fact, more apparent than real. A man who has the faculty of “criticism of life,” and who in these days studies on a large scale the literature and the journalism, the politics and the history, of a foreign country will know ten times more about it, though (taking an extreme case) he may never have set foot on its shores, than a man not so gifted who has lived in one of its villages for twenty years. Yet the twenty years’ experience is not to be despised, and is a document in its way—a document not to be taken with implicit belief, but to be critically examined like other documents. Where Mr. Hamerton is almost on his own principles weak is not so much in his knowledge of French as in his knowledge of English life. His experiences—at least those which he quotes—are almost wholly drawn from Lancashire and Scotland, in both of which, but especially in the former, the character and ways of the people are a long way off the English “norm.” But this matters not much. A more interesting point is that Mr. Hamerton, while setting himself to redress the mistaken notions of Englishmen from his own more perfect knowledge, tells us nothing in those parts of this book which are most authentic that we did not know (ill informed as we are) before. On the subject of French dislike of England Mr. Hamerton has no illusions, and speaks most sound and sensible words, capping them with others equally sound and sensible on the paramount duty of preparation on England’s part for war. His subdivisions of the patriotic feeling, and his contrast of English and French patriotism under these several heads, are also good. He points out with acuteness and truth that, contrary to some opinions, the French are the most inhospitable and the English the most hospitable nation in the world, that French politeness is a matter of pure convention, that the English advantage in comfort and the French advantage in luxury pretty well balance each other, that French “sobriety” is a myth, that the one virtue (if virtue it be) which France indisputably possesses over England is thrift, and so forth. But we may venture to ask whether there is any really intelligent and well-educated Englishman to whom these things are not known? We think there are but few, if there are any such.

Residence, however, in a country is not everything; if it were, since we all must live somewhere, all of us would be perfectly wise. And we have noted not a few passages in Mr. Hamerton’s book where we incline to think that an ounce of critical and historical spirit (for the real historical spirit, as opposed to the spirit of the document-grubbers, is only knowledge of human nature) would have served him better than a pound of scot-and-lot paying in the neighbourhood of the Saône. We do not now refer to the past; though it would be interesting to learn from Mr. Hamerton at what time “the Catholic Church was robbed and pillaged by the English secular power.” If he means the dissolution of the monasteries, he will get into trouble with what he probably designates as the Catholic Church, which has sanctioned similar proceedings time out of mind. If he means the B. Reformation, his history must be of a singularly primitive kind. But this we pass; let it be granted that Mr. Hamerton is not a historian save of the present. But what are we to say of him when he says that “rowing exercises the arms or chest only”? Mr. Hamerton is not, we believe, a very young man; if he were, and if in an Oxford or Cambridge eight he endeavoured to row “with his arms and chest only,” we tremble to think of the language which would issue from the lips of the coach. Rien n’est sacré pour un coach. Yet again, “Where is the Englishman except Swinburne [we should say “Mr.” Swinburne, but no matter] who in reading a French poem knows good technical workmanship when he sees it?” Mr. Hamerton must be unfortunate, though no doubt he speaks with really commendable modesty of his own state of knowledge. Still it is never safe to judge entirely by oneself, and we could tell Mr. Hamerton not of one but of several Englishmen besides "Swinburne" who possess this not altogether extraordinary faculty. We should extremely like to have instances given of the "upper-class" Englishmen who, in times which Mr. Hamerton can remember, "offered French red wine at dessert as claret, without distinguishing between Burgundy and Bordeaux." They must have been very odd "upper class," indeed—perhaps Lancashire nouveaux riches. We do not know what Mr. Hamerton means when he says that success in literature is "infinitely beneath" a French gentleman. Not to mention the Duke d'Aumale, we have been under the impression that M. de Broglie and M. d'Haussonville were very much French gentlemen, that M. de Vogüé was not quite a roturier, and that even such strict professionals as the late M. de Saint-Victor, as M. de Banville, and others (we purposely only mention recent or living examples and men of unquestioned position) could "make their proofs" very fairly. But the most agreeable passage to us is one in which Mr. Hamerton writes as follows:—

* French and English. By P. G. Hamerton. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

What is still more surprising is that many English people should go out of their way to express admiration for Rabelais. Have they read him? Can they understand his old French? If they can and read him still, they need not be afraid of Zola.

The most delightful thing in this passage is that Mr. Hamerton confesses elsewhere that he has "never read any of Zola's novels." Will he permit us who have read every word of Rabelais, understanding (except those few words which no man knoweth) his "old French" "like our hand," who have also read every word of Zola, or almost every word (for the man is voluminous), to tell him in that department of art which he understands best what his comparison is worth? It is exactly as though he should say, "Do you admire Titian's Venus? Then why have you the impudence to object to this Holywell Street lithograph?"

And this brings us to Mr. Hamerton's most interesting and boldest effort—the effort to vindicate French domestic life from the imputations brought against it on the testimony of French literature. With much that he says we thoroughly agree. When he protests against being asked to believe that his own French friends and their wives are thoroughly vicious because of novels "written by some Parisians who have never seen them," we are quite with him. But this is rhetoric. Will Mr. Hamerton deny that the continuance for years—for generations—of a scheme of popular novel-writing which implies, not the universality, but the prevalence, of a particular habit is compatible with the extreme rarity of that habit in a country? Will he assert that the custom (which he himself fully admits) of allowing not merely no "falling in love," but no acquaintance at all, between married people before their marriage is not likely to lead to such a habit? Will he deny that, if the ordinary Frenchwoman is ever to know what being "made love to" means at all, it must be post-nuptially? Will he further deny that certain French customs (less universal in country than in city life, no doubt, but prevalent everywhere) of domestic arrangement and cohabitation lend themselves directly to the estrangement of man and wife, and to the familiarization of both with others? If he does, we can only in some cases set his own testimony against his own arguments, and in the others disable his judgment. No man alive is less inclined to Pharisaism than we are. But the fact is (though some alteration in national habits in each case may have been effected of late years) that when the average Englishman thinks of falling in love he thinks of an unmarried girl, and that when the average Frenchman so thinks he thinks of a married woman. The thing is not deniable.

Nevertheless, though we differ with Mr. Hamerton on this and other points, and though he thinks us not often well informed, we have read his book, as we do all honest books, with interest, and can recommend it, with the proper grains of salt, to all readers.

BUGGE'S NORTHERN MYTHOLOGY.*

ALL who take a serious interest in mythological questions may fairly be supposed to read German, though certainly not to read Danish, and we therefore record here, for the benefit of our readers, the completion of Professor Brenner's elaborate translation of a book not new, but hitherto disguised by its native language, the Studier over de nordiske Gude- og Heltesagns Oprindelse of Professor Sophus Bugge of Christiania. This great work, which may be considered as taking its place at the head of what has at present been contributed to a knowledge of Scandinavian mythology, has been the labour of many years. The first volume of the original was published in Christiania so long ago as 1880; further instalments are dated 1881, 1884, and 1888, and it is only in the present year that the author has laid the top-stone to his work. His German translator, beginning recently, has caught up the Norwegian original, and the last leaves of the latter have appeared simultaneously with the final publication of the former. Professor Brenner has performed his task with admirable care and skill, and he acknowledges the help which he has received in doing so from the venerable Dr. Konrad Maurer, than whom, now that Vigfussen has been taken from us, Europe possesses no finer Icelandic scholar.

The only important instance in which this instalment of the German translation differs from the original appears to be the introduction, with the chapter on the spread of the Balder legend, of a disquisition on the mysterious name Phol, which is found in the famous Merseburg Incantation in connexion with that of Wodan. Most writers have taken it as marking a god of the Teutonic race. Jacob Grimm and others thought that the name of this deity was to be traced in such place-names as Pfalsau (Pholesouwa) and Pfalzpoint (Pholespiunt), both in Bavaria. It has also been suggested that the word Phol was a modification of Balder itself, or, by Rydberg, of the epithet Falr applied to Balder. These and other suggestions are carefully examined by Professor Bugge in the new passage to which we call attention. He points out that the letters ph are very unlikely to be found in the name of a god of pure German origin, and that the phrase in the Merseburg Incantation—Phol ende Wuodan vuorun zi holza (Phol and Wodan go to the forest)—makes the supposition that Apollo is meant highly improbable. Professor Bugge has come to the conclusion—at first sight a rather startling one—that Phol is the Apostle Paul of the Christians. The arguments he gives are voluminous, and seem to prove that this is the correct interpretation of a passage which has hitherto baffled the critics. He holds that the Merseburg poem is in its present form corrupt, and that the pure heathen incantation probably began with the words Frija ende Wodan, the pagan goddess being afterwards turned out to make room for the Christian apostle. Professor Bugge is, therefore, of opinion that the Merseburg Spruch should no longer be included among the authorities for an early spread of the Balder legend into countries remote from Scandinavia, any more than should the Swiss saga of Baltram and Sintram, in which Müllendorf imagined that he had discovered a direct connexion with the story of Balder and Váli. In all this, as in the general tenour of his work, that excellent good sense for which Professor Bugge has always been distinguished comes into delightful prominence. He is so candid, sensible, and honest a critic that it is difficult for his reader not to be convinced that he is right.

NOVELS.*

ELABORATE landscape backgrounds in novels should fulfil two purposes; they should indicate to the reader subtle inferences and thin shades of emotion too delicate and evanescent to admit of direct expression, and, further, they should play a part similar to that of the chorus in a drama, emphasizing its central idea, rounding into unity the impression conveyed by the whole work, and suggesting, it may be, the presence of those vast mysterious forces by which human life is encompassed and directed. If they do none of these things, they are, however cleverly executed, mere excrescences, like illustrations in a text for which they were not designed.

Cum properantis aquæ per amœnos ambitus agros,
Aut flumen Rhenum, aut pluvius describitur arcus.

This rudimentary rule of good art Maxwell Gray seems to have ignored. The Reproach of Annesley contains many descriptions of rural scenery, admirably graceful and pretty in themselves, but often standing in no perceptible relation to the story. The scene of the tale is laid mainly among the South Downs; but it might equally well have been situated in Norfolk or Cornwall, and even better in a London suburb. The chief characters are essentially villa residents, people who settle here or there because the view is pretty or the soil healthy, but who have no intimate connexion with their place of abode. Villa residents are, of course, as fit subjects for fiction as any other class of people. They should, however, be painted in their habit as they live, not masquerading as country squires, country doctors, and country lawyers; let us have local colour by all means, but let the place and its inhabitants be congruous. Speaking from internal evidence only, and therefore, we hope, without offence, we should say that Maxwell Gray is better versed in literature than in life, and more practised in reflection than in direct observation. Her talent seems to us to show to most advantage in the idyllic passages, and least where a wide knowledge of the world and of the sterner and more masculine passions would tell. Possibly the success of The Silence of Dean Maitland has induced its author to adopt a kind of plot alien to the natural bent of her inclination. Many outbreaks of anger are described in the present novel, but they are the petulant rages of children rather than the concentrated fury of men. The plot is not a strong one, and lingers somewhat in the telling; as there is a mystery involved, it would perhaps be unfair to detail it; we may, however, say that it

* The Reproach of Annesley. By Maxwell Gray. 3 vols. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co. 1889.

A London Life. By Henry James. 2 vols. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

Common Clay. By Mrs. Henry Martin. 3 vols. London: Ward & Downey. 1889.

Deveril's Diamond. By Adeline Sargeant. 3 vols. London: Ward & Downey. 1889.

* Studien über die Entstehung der nordischen Götter- und Heldensagen von Sophus Bugge, Professor an der Universität Christiania. Vom Verfasser autorisirte und durchgesehene Uebersetzung von Oscar Brenner, Professor an der Universität München. Drittes Heft (Schluss). München: C. Kaiser. 1889.

hinges on the sudden disappearance of one character and the suspicion of murder cast on another, and further, that it is concerned with the three suitors of a beautiful orphan adopted by an elderly savant. Gervase Rickman, son of the savant and one of the suitors, is the most ambitious and the worst-drawn character in the book; the frequent references to his extraordinary talents and to his vast designs "of swaying the destinies of England, if not of Europe," can only provoke a smile; it is sufficiently difficult to imagine him as a successful lawyer. An effort also is required to conceive as actually walking the earth Paul Annesley, the passionate country doctor endowed with a family curse and cursed with a family temper. Edward Annesley, his cousin, a simple-hearted cheery soldier, is more human, but the female characters are much better drawn than the men. Alice Lingard, the heroine, is not very attractive, and is perhaps better suited to enlist German than English sympathies—there is a good deal of stille Innigkeit about her—but Sybil Rickman, who renounces her love for her friend's sake, lingers in the memory as wholly charming; here at least we seem to get in touch with breathing humanity. Among the minor characters are some rustics who discourse appropriately in dialect. They have evidently been studied with care, but nevertheless wear a languishing mien as of plants bedded out in uncongenial soil. The ancient curse, which suggests the title of the story, should either have been made more of or omitted. The author should have the courage of her opinions. In conclusion, The Reproach of Annesley is not a great nor a very powerful novel, but it displays much delicately imaginative insight and a very distinct literary gift. If it falls short of its aim, we may remember that its aim is very high.

Mr. Henry James's last volume of stories displays all his well-known characteristics, with these differentiating marks—that the first and longest of his tales is in its donnée (we cannot in such a connexion speak of "plot") faintly improper, and that the second contains a startling incident. We do not wish to speak disrespectfully of a very clever writer, but Mr. James's work always reminds us of those marvellously elaborate models in cork or pith which are the glory of provincial museums. It is exquisitely ingenious, a very miracle of delicate craftsmanship; but the chief question it suggests is, "Was it worth while?" No doubt rigid Determinists in possession of infinite intelligence would consider all actions and emotions as equally important, and we can imagine such august beings revelling in the fare which Mr. James provides; but we, whose little life is rounded by a sleep and who can gather but a few fragments before we pass hence, may reasonably crave for rather less process and rather more result. When Mr. James first swam into ken with Daisy Miller we were willing to welcome him as the discoverer of an unworked field. Now we find ourselves considering whether the field may not have been left so long virgin because it was not worth cultivation or fitted to bear only an occasional flower, not a yearly crop. The device, too, of taking the reader into partnership, and calling on him to gather up the loose threads and finish the story for himself, was at first flattering; but, like all flattery, it has palled with repetition. Least of all can we forgive Mr. James for the impression which he manages to convey, that he is just going to say something really first rate. His pages are strewn with the wrecks of epigrams; the hope has not yet faded from us that his next epigram will be a complete success, and hope deferred, as we all know, maketh the heart sick. For these reasons we are not ready to accord to A London Life so hearty a reception as the ability displayed in it might seem to demand. The method is delicate, but it is no longer fresh, the analysis is "thoughtful," but it is not interesting. In the first story, or rather episode, we are kept dallying on the threshold of a divorce suit—Berrington v. Berrington and others—and assist at the moral dissection of the faithless wife, her worthless husband, her modest-minded sister, and an unspeakably dreary American youth on tour in Europe. "The Patagonia" is concerned with an American girl travelling to Europe to fulfil a long-standing marriage engagement, and with her fellow-passengers. An ocean steamer is a stage exactly fitted to Mr. James's modes of work, and the tale is, in our opinion, much the best of the four. The remaining two are very slight, and call for some patience in the reading of them. The scene of the last is laid partly in Paris, and several French phrases are introduced, generally, but not uniformly (ii. 316) correct.

Common Clay is not at all a bad novel; the characters are natural enough, and the incidents do not violate probability. It suffers, however, terribly from its length. As a short story we could have given it, within its modest limits, unqualified praise. It is not brilliant; but it is sound. The plot is as follows. Wilfrid Erle, a young artist, falls desperately in love with the illegitimate daughter of a squire and a gipsy, whom he meets in a farmhouse during a sketching tour. Being strictly moral, he introduces her to his sister, and boards her out with some friends in London, to make her into a lady and eventually his wife. Before it is too late, both he and Mazella Foster, such is the girl's name, discover the folly of his scheme, and pair off, she with her former sweetheart, a gamekeeper, he with a lady of his own class, named Lesbia, and possessing a tame sparrow, but happily bearing no moral resemblance to her famous prototype.

Deveril's Diamond is a favourable specimen of the circulating library sort of novel. It contains plenty of incident, two or three crimes, an aristocratic villain, a plebeian ditto, honest British merchants, a ruined squire who regains his family place by marriage, a saturnine retainer, and other types equally fresh, all painted in colours which are nothing if not vivid and described in a style fluent to the utmost verge of grammar. The plot turns on schemes to obtain possession of a magnificent diamond, and is concerned with the fortunes of the Lady Eleanor Monckton, a girl whom the death of her disreputable father has left penniless, and who loves one man, consents to marry a second, and finds on the altar steps that she is being actually wedded to a third. Her conduct after the marriage has been celebrated recalls an episode in the work of M. Ohnet (whom Mr. Frederic Harrison, by-the-by, ranks with Tolstoi and Tourguéneff—such verdicts can culture prompt), but her husband is a most worthy and long-suffering person, and the union becomes more happy than might have been expected. The opening scene of the story, a life and death struggle in the wilds of South Africa, is extremely vigorous and raises expectations which are hardly fulfilled. Yet readers who want to beguile an idle hour might do worse than procure Miss Sargeant's latest book. It is more entertaining than many more pretentious works.

HENRY VII.*

UNSATISFACTORY as any attempt to divide the history of a country into periods must necessarily be, the reign of Henry VII. may certainly in more than one respect fairly be regarded as ushering in a new era in English history. Changes which for the most part had their origin in earlier reigns, and some of which had already begun to make themselves, appeared in full strength. The fall of the great feudal houses made way for the power of the Crown, represented and enforced by a King of remarkable ability. This was in accordance with the desires of the bulk of the people, who were weary of anarchy and violence. They wanted peace and material prosperity, and saw that they were to be attained and preserved by the establishment of a strong central power. During the preceding age the Constitution had been on its trial; it had failed to give the nation what it needed, and men were not unwilling that order should be ensured, even at the cost of constitutional liberties. The strong government set up by Edward IV. had been disturbed by the consequences of the usurpation of Richard III.; there was now an opportunity of renewing it. Henry answered the expectations of his people by making the law feared and obeyed by great as well as small, and the exaltation of the kingship brought the subject a new sense of security. As regards the foreign relations of England the change was not less marked. His reign saw the rise of a system of European alliances; under his guidance England became an important factor in Continental politics, and his wisdom prepared the way for the grander part which it played under his son and Wolsey. Neither the domestic nor the foreign affairs of the reign afford much material for picturesque writing, nor is Henry himself exactly an heroic figure. Nevertheless, the reign has a special importance as a period of political and constitutional change; while the sagacity of the King and the difficulties over which he triumphed impart interest to a narrative which, as far as mere incidents are concerned, is somewhat commonplace. Mr. Gairdner's treatment of his subject is pleasant and scholarly; he writes with some spirit, and is always perfectly lucid and readable. His view of Henry's character is, on the whole, more favourable than that which has generally been accepted; he points out that considerable allowance should be made for the necessities of his position, gives prominence to his clemency, and contends that he was naturally kind, affable, and even humorous.

After Henry of Richmond gained his freedom on the death of Edward IV. he suffered two signal reverses, each of which in the end brought him some good. The failure of the Duke of Buckingham's conspiracy was followed by severities which, as Mr. Gairdner notes, strengthened his party by forcing a large number of able and powerful men to leave England and join themselves to him; and so, when he made his second attempt, his party was consolidated and his plans matured, while Richard had by that time thoroughly disgusted the nation. The influence which Richard gained in Brittany was, however, nearly fatal to him, for Landois, the Duke's Minister, determined to deliver him up, and he had to escape from the duchy in disguise. Yet this check also turned to his advantage, for he found in Charles VIII. of France a protector with whom Richard did not dare to quarrel. The larger part of the volume is devoted to Henry's foreign policy. It was not always successful, for he failed in his attempt to maintain the independence of Brittany. It must, however, be judged by its general results. Although he found the country exhausted and disturbed, and was constantly hampered by the insecurity of his throne, he nevertheless secured strong European alliances, and managed with a minimum of bloodshed and expense to convince other sovereigns that it was worth their while to court his goodwill. At home he gave his subjects the peace and order which they desired. His strictness in all matters of finance was closely connected with his system of personal government. He had no love for Parliaments, and preferred to raise money by other than Parliamentary means, and to take care of it and increase it as much as possible, for he saw "more clearly than any previous sovereign that money was the source of power." His extortions and his parsimony are not to be regarded as the signs of mere vulgar avarice; they are to be connected, as Mr. Gairdner contends, with his whole plan of government.

* Henry the Seventh. By James Gairdner. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

In his dealings with Ireland, of which we have a clear and masterly sketch, he sought in much the same spirit as that which inspired his English policy to make the whole administration directly responsible to himself. Parliaments were summoned to do the King's business, and Poyning's Acts ensured that Irish Parliaments should do it. His wisdom is conspicuous throughout the whole of his rule over Ireland; he knew when to interfere and when to abstain from interference. As long as he was too weak to match himself with Kildare, he let matters take their course, and was ready to pardon rebellion; as soon as he grew strong enough, he began to put down faction, to punish the excesses of the great, and to enforce order. As he saw that it was hopeless to attempt to bring the Irish into subjection by using his own forces, and shrank from the expense which constant war would have entailed, he ventured to entrust the task to the strongest man in the island, rebel though he had been, and the issue justified his determination. While Kildare certainly acted with little reference to the King, his victories strengthened the royal power in Ireland, for he enlarged the Pale, and made it secure. Mr. Gairdner has been able to correct two or three statements in Bacon's Life, of which he nevertheless speaks with becoming reverence. There is, he maintains, good reason for believing that Bacon exaggerated the coldness with which Henry treated his Queen, and he quotes the story of how the news of Prince Arthur's death was received by his parents as illustrating "the more human aspects of a character often represented untruly as cold and unloving." He also throws some light from the Spanish State Papers on the schemes which Henry undoubtedly entertained with reference to the regency of Castile, after the death of Isabella—a curious bit of history unknown to Bacon. He has written on a subject which he knows thoroughly, and has produced an eminently satisfactory volume.

FANS AND FAN LEAVES.*

IN this elephant folio Lady Charlotte Schreiber has reproduced one hundred and sixty-one specimens from her extraordinary collection of printed fans, now at Langham House. In her very brief preface she has not told us under what circumstances this assemblage of curiosities was put together, and we are left to rove through her handsome volume almost like a stranger who visits an historical mansion without a cicerone. There are, however, valuable notes on the separate fans, which are of great use to us in inspecting them. The reproductions are lithographs, printed in a sort of sepia tone. This is not a process which lends itself to positive beauty; but the objects themselves are not particularly beautiful, though they are often extremely curious.

The political fans illustrate a period of about one hundred years. The earliest seems to be "The States of Europe playing at Piquet," and the date is fixed by the fact that the Pope is Innocent XI., who reigned between 1679 and 1689. The seven players are women, to whom the following speeches are assigned—not in the later and grotesque way, by allowing labels to issue from their mouths, but by printing what they have to say freely above their heads:—

France. I make the hand and play first.

Spain. I have three kings and two aces discarded, and say three kings are good.

Sardinia. A quint fourteen by tens, but not the point.

Empire. Shall I be repiqued and capoted?

Saxony. Too many cards can count nothing.

Russia. I have a seventh from the king and quint major; how can I lose with so good a hand?

Poland. I have seventy-five in point and a carte major, and am first hand; I hope to win the Game if fortune crowns my ambition.

These seven States sit on the outer side of the oval table; nearer the foreground are Britannia, Holland, and "Prusia," who look out, but take no hand in the game. The Pope declares that he does "not understand the Game," like the Heathen Chinese; while the Grand Turk rides up on a very truculent charger, and cries out, "If you don't leave off I'll tear the cards." But the Shah of Persia, who is really not unlike our present illustrious guest, pulls the Turk's trappings with one hand, while he touches his own scimitar with the other, and whispers "Seigneur Turk, Persia shall make you change your note!" Could history be taught to the idlest scholar in a more charming form? The original, it appears, is printed on paper and touched up with gold.

This is the only example of a seventeenth-century political fan which Lady Charlotte Schreiber prints. She gives a good many, dated from 1734 onwards, which deal with the vicissitudes of Sir Robert Walpole's administration. The marriage of Princess Anne with William Prince of Orange seems to have called forth great ingenuity from the makers of these fashionable toys. There was one published by M. Gamble which was sold as "The Orange Fan; with a Letter to the lovely She who has more than 30,000 Charms." This letter was written in more than passably smooth verses, in the mode of Mr. William Whitehead, Poet Laureate, bestrewn along the upper and lower edges of the fan, the design in the centre of which displayed a thickly-laden orange-tree on the left, and a "redolent rose" in full bloom on the right, with William's three-master scudding across a waveless ocean between them. In another Orange fan the bride (with a very cross expression, due to a limitation in the powers of the artist) and the bridegroom occupy the centre, flanked by bishops and beef-eaters. In yet another a pseudo-classical fancy runs positively riot. Anne, in a kind of Mantegna dress, takes the hand of William, who is dressed like a shepherd, but with an enormous coronet perched on his brows. Tiresome little half-naked amorini trip up the footsteps of the Princess and cling to her gown. A bishop in full canonicals is reading the service undisturbed by two cupids who are playing what looks like a tambourine in the air above the heads of the party, by a perfectly nude infant who is killing a quantity of snakes, or by some more decently habited young persons who are playing with a sheep. Some fashionably dressed ladies are letting a heavy hop-pole fall on the bishop, while the whole design is surrounded by a rich wreath of oranges, leaves, flowers, and fruit.

A much more business-like fan of April 22, 1740, gives a picture of Admiral Vernon's capture of Portobello in the preceding year, and another of 1741 the attack on Carthagena. After a most lugubrious funereal fan in memory of the death of Frederick, Prince of Wales, in 1751, we pass rapidly to the period of George III. The composition representing the Royal Concert of 1781 is adorned by some lines which Lady Charlotte Schreiber attributes to an Italian of the name of Giordini:—

My dear Mistress has a heart
Soft as those kind looks she gave me.

The music may have been Italian; but the lines, as Lady Charlotte Schreiber may very well be excused for not remembering, had been published just a century earlier, by Lord Rochester, in one of the best of his songs. A very funny and affected fan, well adapted to the peculiar taste of 1782, is that which was published in honour of Rodney's Victories. The Admiral, smirking very much and looking adorably juvenile, stands in gold-laced coat and white silk breeches between Neptune, who rises in a shell, clothed in two crowns and a trident, and Britannia, who is reposing on a trophy of anchors, drums, and bayonets. A winged infant descends from the skies, wrapped in a broad riband marked RODNEY, and places a wreath on the Admiral's neat tye-wig, while the hero tramples elegantly on a copious collection of flags that bear the fleur-de-lys of France. Urns, dolphins, cushions, and bay-leaves complete the scheme of decoration. There are a great many similar examples of fans which are dedicated to incidents in the Peninsular War.

Among those fans which depict social scenes, a special interest attaches to the "Bartholomew Fair" of 1721, full of little stiff figures strutting about or witnessing the cutting off of the head of Holophernes in a booth-tragedy of Judith. This book is without doubt that which was kept by Mrs. Mynns and her daughter, Mrs. Lee, for whom, at this very time, the wretched old Elkanah Settle was writing drolls, if he was not actually appearing any longer, in his own farce of St. George for England, as a dragon in a case of green leather. At all events, on this interesting fan we see depicted the identical stage on which poor Elkanah "spit streams of fire to make the butchers gaze." A rather bald and ugly fan gives us a representation of the Pump Room at Bath in 1737, the original being printed in green. In 1751 we have a scene from Ranelagh, with the great Rotunda in the centre, the pond on the left, what we take to be the Cascade in the background, and stately couples promenading among the lamps and the trees, as they did when Beau Tibbs and his party spent so disappointing an evening there. In the foreground we see the boxes in which they took their supper. There were even religious fans, and we have here a very curious, and not at all pretty, "Church of England Fan" of 1776, with scrolls and ovals full of Biblical maxims and devout precepts. As early as 1753 the Gentleman's Magazine had spoken of those ladies who "have lately contrived to improve the services of the Church to which they have the happiness to be daughters by so inconsiderable an implement as a Fan mount"; justly thinking that pictures of Silenus and his rout, of Harlequin, Pierrot, and Columbine, of the taking of Portobello, of a scene from the "Rake's Progress," and of the Judgment of Paris, all of which, and more, had been observed at one church during morning-service, were hardly suited to the solemnity of the function. Another Church-fan represents, in a style half of Watteau, half Chinese, the "Birth of Esau and Jacob," with Rebecca sitting up in bed very delicately in the middle of the composition. Another, of a more solemnizing nature, prints in columns and in excessively small type the Ten Commandments, the Creed, and the Lord's Prayer, with figures of angels between.

A fan with designs on both sides, which are not dated, but must evidently from their style belong to the end of the eighteenth century, deals with the honours in cards; and below burlesque vignettes of the suits are printed some pleasing verses, which we do not remember to have met with elsewhere, set to the tune of "The Queen of Hearts, She made some Tarts":—

The Queen of Clubs made sillabubs,
The Knave came like Big Ben,
He snatch'd the cup, and drank it up,
His toast was Rights of Men.

* Fans and Fan Leaves—English. Collected and described by Lady Charlotte Schreiber. With 161 illustrations. London: John Murray.

With hands and eyes that mark surprise
The King laments his fate ;
Alas ! saith he, I plainly see
The Knave's a Democate.

The Queen of Spades, she beat her Maids
For their immodesty,
The Knave of Spades, he kiss'd the Maids,
Which made the Queen to cry.
The King then curst that Knave who durst
Make Royalty shed tears,
Vile Knave, says he, 'tis my decree,
That you lose both your ears.

The Diamond Queen was one day seen
So drunk she could not stand,
The Diamond Knave he blushed and gave
The Queen a reprimand.
The King distressed that his Dearest
Should do so vile a thing,
Said, By my Wig, She's like the Pig
Of David the good King.

Any one who enjoys miscellaneous oddity will find an almost inexhaustible store of amusement in Lady Charlotte Schreiber's curious volume.

PIG-STICKING, MISSIONARY ENTERPRISE, AND THE SOUTH PACIFIC.*

COLONEL BADEN-POWELL writes on the premier sport of India with all the eloquence of an enthusiast and with all the knowledge of an expert. He is not slow to magnify his office. He compares hog-hunting, to its advantage, with fox-hunting. He thinks the two sports have much in common ; pig-sticking is very like fox-hunting, "only more so." In the former sport you have the great advantage of finding a quarry worthy of your steel. But pig-sticking is not, according to our author, a mere amusement. "It is most useful for developing the attributes so necessary in a soldier—namely, eye, hand, a firm seat, courage, and activity." He cannot conceive it possible that a good pig-sticker should be an indifferent soldier. The book should be read throughout. The few extracts which we quote will, we hope, whet our readers' appetite for fuller knowledge of the respectable animal of whom a French hog-hunter writes this noble panegyric:—"J'ai beaucoup fréquenté les sangliers, et parmi nos animaux sauvages je n'en connais aucun que je trouve aussi estimable. C'est un brave, un chevalier, sans peur et sans reproche, qui se bat courageusement jusqu'à la fin et meurt comme un héros." His courage is indeed dauntless and enduring. Colonel Powell says that wounds which would at least disable any other animal seem to affect the pig but little. Even with his skull splintered by a shot he has been known to charge with renewed vigour. "He is as wise as he is brave. In the matter of brains he goes in for quality and not for quantity, for there can be no doubt that his little brain is full of craft. It may be that want of sensibility enables him to keep all his wits about him up to his last breath, even when he has been wounded to such an extent as would have laid any other animal low in a state of insensibility. And even in the worst dilemma a pig never by any chance loses his head." This Ulysses of wild animals has no certain dwelling where he may be found always at home. Sometimes his abode is in the neighbourhood of a well-ripening crop of favourite grain. Colonel Powell has seen his lair within twenty yards of a watchman's hut in a melon garden. The old notion that a pig cannot swim is an exploded superstition, a very "vulgar error" indeed. He may often be seen swimming a canal on business and a river for pleasure. Water, in fact, is his favourite means of escape from his pursuers. A boar took refuge once in a native's house in a town. The magistrate was sent for; out rushed the hog, and without a pause went for the magistrate's companion, Mr. Rogers, who, having been an experienced pig-sticker in his day, met him halfway with a spear clean through his body. Away bounded the wounded beast; but the magistrate followed close on his heels, and brought him to with a spear in the spine. What he was doing in a town house is still a mystery. Colonel Powell thereabout cruelly misquotes Pope, and says:—

'Tis not that he's beautiful, wondrous, or rare,
But the mystery is how the devil he got there.

This animal was thirty-two inches high—a very respectable size. A wild boar has been seen forty-two inches high; but it is very seldom that a hunter comes across one of over thirty-six inches. We have not space to quote the thrilling account of a fight witnessed between a boar and a tiger. We can only tell the sequel. "Getting his forefeet on the tiger's prostrate body, the boar now gave two or three short ripping gashes with his strong white tusks, almost disembowelling his foe, and then, exhausted seemingly by the effort, apparently giddy and sick, he staggered aside, and lay down panting and champing his tusks, but still defiant, with his head to the foe. But the tiger was sick unto death." The tiger was no worn-out beast. He was young and lusty. When both animals were exhausted, the spectators shot the twain. Pig-sticking has its bards as well as its historians. We quote a stanza from a hunting-song by one of them:—

There's bliss in the scholar's love [? iore], my boys,
In wine and in golden store, my boys,
But the joys of the whole do not thrill the soul
Like the rush of the charging boar, my boys.

Colonel Powell explains at length what breed of horses should be ridden on a pig-sticking expedition. He also tells us what kind of dogs, if any, should be taken on the same errand, but he thinks that dogs are not required, and had better be left behind. He even gives a table of expenses for the information of those "gentlemen in England" whom he may have fired with a longing to stick the courageous and wily hog. In fact, he gives every needful information how to hunt the brave beast when living, and how to stuff him when dead. Neither does he confine himself to a description of boar-hunting in India. He gives minute information as to how the sport is conducted in Northern and South-Eastern Africa, in New Zealand, Australia, and Hawaii. He transcribes the rules of the many pig-sticking clubs in India. We subjoin a few of those of the Nuggar and Deccan Hunts. They are practical and concise:—

1. The master always to be obeyed.
2. Silence at the jungle side. No moving after being once posted.
3. No followers or spare horses to be allowed at the cover side.
6. Any one taking first spear is, if possible, to follow up his pig until it is killed.
9. Any rider jostling another, or carrying his spear improperly, to be fined one gold mohur.
11. Any member shooting a pig to be expelled the Club.

The illustrations to this book are as good and spirited as the letterpress.

Mr. Ashe's book is a record of missionary enterprise in Equatorial Africa. In 1882 he set out with a party of missionaries, journeying to various stations in the interior of Africa by way of Zanzibar. "For thorough misery and complete discomfort that twelve days' struggle against the Monsoon" surpassed anything that can be conceived. The Wagogo savages with whom the party soon came in contact were a very fierce set of warriors, who wear a thong of hide round their waists, which falls down behind and gives them the appearance of wearing tails. The women often insert in their ears a piece of wood which looks like a large draughtman. Sometimes they substitute for this piece of wood the pear-shaped end of a bottle gourd, a husk of Indian corn, a snuffbox, the handle of a teapot, a cartridge case, or the "bishop" belonging to a set of chessmen. But we must not dwell too long with this interesting tribe. We must hurry on to make acquaintance with the two monarchs who give their name to the book. The high-tempered courage, the noble spirit of martyrdom, and the cruel death of Bishop Hannington are too fresh in the minds and hearts of our readers to need recapitulation here. Suffice it to say, that Mr. Ashe writes with a full and generous appreciation of the great qualities of the Christian hero. Of Mtesa, "the causer of tears," we read that, with all his cruelty, he was a man who possessed many fine qualities. He was courteous and generous to Europeans, but he did not like the missionary's intrusion upon him of religious subjects. He shot his wives, and practised obscenities too revolting to be described. Mwanga, his successor, had a wild passion for shedding blood. He would not listen to any arguments about religion which were not presented to him in a humorous or ludicrous light, and this Mr. Ashe found himself both unable and unwilling to do. The good missionary's experiences were chiefly those of blood and slaughter, which it may be necessary to recall, but which are inexpressibly painful to read about. Mr. Ashe is no optimist in his recollections of the dark continent. He thinks that, "if you can respect and love a man after living with him in Africa, it means that, in no small degree, he has the highest qualities. . . . Africa proves a man, and he who issues unscathed from that furnace is pure gold indeed." The following observations in reference to the German operations on the coast are well worth consideration:—

If the poor Indians are ruined by the Germans, and can no longer lend to the Arab traders as in former times, at least some compensation may be found in the fact that it will probably result in lessening the power of the Arabs for slave-hunting; and, though I sympathize with our Indian fellow-subjects, I have seen too much of the bitter sufferings of the victims of these Arab traders to make me regret anything which cuts off even one source of supplying them in their inhuman traffic.

The fluency of Mr. Ashe's religious convictions is untinctured with any alloy of bigotry and narrow-mindedness. He speaks with generous gratitude of the assistance and protection afforded him by the Roman Catholic missionaries, and doubts whether we are justified in sending missionaries at all to countries which they cannot reach without being armed. He has some scruples of conscience as to whether he ought to have purchased some mangoes and oranges on a Sunday; but, like the colonel of a hussar regiment who some years ago was condemned by public opinion for flogging one of his soldiers on the Lord's Day, our good missionary had no idea that it was Sunday at all until the act was achieved. "Whether or not," he naïvely remarks, "I should have abstained from the purchase had I known the day, it is needless to inquire." The feudal titles given to some of the African nobles can hardly fail to raise a smile. That of Earl of Singo is only one degree less absurd than that of Marquis of Marmelade. Mr.

* Pig-Sticking or Hog-Hunting. By Colonel R. S. S. Baden-Powell, 13th Hussars, Author of "Reconnaissance and Scouting" &c. Illustrated by the Author. London: Harrison & Sons.

Two Kings of Uganda. By Robert P. Ashe, M.A., F.R.G.S. With Map and Illustrations. London: Sampson Low & Co.

Eric and Connie's Cruise in the South Pacific. By Captain C. F. De M. Malan, R.N. With Illustrations. London: Sampson Low & Co.

Ashe's grammar is sometimes amusing. He tells us that a certain Sebato was a tender-hearted man, "and I recollect when they killed Lugalama, he was moved to tears when he came to see me some time afterwards."

The story of Eric and Connie Egerton's cruise in the South Pacific is dull reading. It is not a sober book of travels, for some of the scenes are laid in an undiscovered island. It is far too tame for a book of adventures. It will utterly fail to satisfy boyish readers fed upon the works of Mr. Ballantyne or Mr. Kingston. But the author writes with a full connaissance de cause which should have enabled him to give his juvenile readers a simple or instructive narrative of facts. Young people will find Eric and Connie very much in the way. They would rather read of the islands and of their natives without the presence of these unamusing interlopers. The illustrations are almost ludicrously bad.

ROBBERY UNDER ARMS.*

IF any one's idle curiosity prompts him to know what the transpentine drama was like in England some two generations ago, he may turn to this long-winded book, which purports to be a story of life and adventure in the Bush and in the Australian goldfields at about the same period of time, or a little later. The wickedness of the wicked is on a much larger scale than that practised in the mother country, and "the local colouring" is, of course, essentially different; but the characters of the wicked are identical. And this is not a little odd, that a series of commonplace English plays half a century old, in which all the leading characters are thoroughly, unheroically bad, their manners and language sometimes disgusting, and always theatrical, but never dramatic, should fairly represent the actual life of some convicts in the Australian Bush as late as the space of time which lies between the years 1850 and 1860. Nor is this verisimilitude to be altogether attributed to the craft of the story-teller; for the stories he tells are authentic, and in some cases, with only the change of the principal players' names, are copied direct from Australian newspapers, and other local sources, the details having been sworn to by eye-witnesses in the local Courts. The writer, with that modesty which belongs to an author who has achieved some provincial success, trusts that his "ower true tale" will do no discredit to the rising reputation of Australian romance; but at the same time begs it to be understood that, though it is presented in the guise of fiction, "this Chronicle of the Marston family must not be set down by the reader as wholly fanciful or exaggerated; much of the narrative is literally true, as can be verified by official records." There need be no doubt about it—for it is a matter of the very smallest moment; but, if there could be any doubt, Mr. Rolf Boldrewood—if that be the author's name—has taken the best means to dispel it, for he puts the main part of the story into the mouth of one of his leading ruffians, who tells it in the first person singular, with that damnable iteration which engenders the most offensive familiarity, which is followed by a result that is at once inevitable and natural. The story is of inordinate length; the principal incidents are stealing at odd times more than a thousand head of cattle, including "an imported bull, Fifteenth Duke of Cambridge," hiding them in places which the mounted police could not possibly discover, changing or "faking" their brands, then marching the whole mob several hundred miles from New South Wales to Adelaide, and selling them in the open market in the coolest way. This little job, owing to the "Fifteenth Duke of Cambridge," lands two of the gallant "cattle duffers" in an up-country gaol, from which, however, they manage to make their escape in an effectual but purely conventional way. The distinction thus acquired raises the ambition of these Government gentry, who are now above such tricks as stealing imported bulls and horses; and, after passing some time in retreat, are resolved to fly at higher game—they "bail up" the Goulburn coach, and bag some 400*l.* or more in what is regarded as a very clever, workmanlike style. After lying quiet in their favourite cave, "after a comfortable time" they again take the road, their ideas having enlarged with their experience; and, in a manner that rouses the indignation of the whole country and the admiration of the wicked, they proceed to rob a country bank in the middle of the day, having previously locked up the local policeman in one of his own cells, and leave the manager and his clerk bound hand and foot. They again ride off in triumph with a heavy swag, and have "a good time with the girls lower down" before again going into retreat. Here they once more give themselves up to contemplation, the result of which was that "we were to stick up the next monthly gold escort." That was all. "We knew it would be a heavy one, and trusted to our luck to get clear off with the gold, and then take ship for Honolulu or San Francisco. A desperate chance; but we were desperate men. We had tried to work hard and honest. We had done so for best part of a year; but no, they wouldn't have us that way." On this occasion the bag consisted of about 14,000 oz. of gold. "It wasn't so bad"—the whole being got by the murder of only one man. After this exploit the book becomes insipid. The great disappointment of the book is, that the miscreant who here records his own and his companions' crimes, after being very properly condemned to die an ignominious death, is not hanged after all, but obtains a free pardon; is "quietly and privately married" to the girl who always adored him, and lives happy with her ever after "on the Barcoo in Queensland."

ENGLISH PRESBYTERIANISM.*

PRESBYTERIANISM has never taken any strong hold on Englishmen; it had a brief day of power, during which the country grew heartily sick of it, and then it entered on a long period of contempt, weakness, division, and heresy. To those who are attached to the cause its history must therefore be a melancholy study. Nor will they find their spirits raised by the Rev. A. H. Drysdale's volume, which, while showing that its author has an accurate knowledge of many parts of his subject, is uncommonly dull and lifeless; its pages are disfigured by a senseless use of italics and capitals, and contain frequent extracts printed in small type. The first part, which is devoted to an attempt to prove the existence of Presbyterianism here and elsewhere from very early times, contains several errors and misrepresentations. We begin with the ancient British Church and Saints Alban and "Amphiballus" (sic), and are told that the earliest record of their martyrdoms, which have of course nothing to do with the subject in hand, is given by Gildas. This is only true of the very doubtful Amphibalus; for the biographer of St. Germanus, who wrote about a century before Gildas, tells us how the bishop worshipped at the tomb of the martyred St. Alban, and carried away a relic. From St. Alban we pass to the three British "Bishops" at the Council of Arles; the inverted commas are Mr. Drysdale's, who wishes to imply by them that Restitutus of London and his fellows were not bishops in the ordinary sense of the word; indeed, he says that they were "preaching Presbyters, or pastors presiding [the italics, of course, are his] over individual congregations." We note, by the way, that he seems to believe that preaching is the highest of the priestly functions. His contention appears to be that these bishops did not belong to an order separate from, and superior to, the priesthood, and he takes good care not to refer to the words which follow the notice of Adelfius, Bishop of Caerleon—"Exinde Sacerdos presbyter; Arminius diaconus," the Bishop came to the Council attended by one of either order of the inferior clergy, "cum clericis suis." Again, he maintains that the canon ordering that seven, or at least three, bishops should assist at an episcopal ordination accords better "with a Presbyterian than with a Prelatical theory of the Church"—which is absurd. If he really thinks that the bishops of the Roman world in the fourth century were in any way subject to a Board of presbyters, or were not held to be of far greater dignity than simple priests, or were not invested with peculiar and ample authority over their churches, he is strangely ignorant of ecclesiastical history. "A Cathedral system was undreamt of." Just so; especially at Carthage, where nearly five hundred clergy belonged to the Episcopal Church. To go on to what he says of mediæval times, it will scarcely be believed that, in a sentence which has no grammatical end, he advances the opinion that the exempt monasteries were proofs of the survival of "presbyterial tradition." We should like to know what he means by talking of the "Lollard Church"; the term is ridiculous, for Wycliffe did not found a Church. Lastly—for, much as there is to note in them, we must not dwell too long on these first few pages—he formulates the constitutional effect of the suppression of the monasteries in the surprising remark that the Three Estates of the Realm ceased to be "King, Clergy, and Laity," and became "King, Lords, and Commons."

When Mr. Drysdale gets to later times he appears to us, heartily as we disagree with much that he says, to have a good knowledge of his subject. He certainly attributes far too large a share in the corrections made in the first Prayer-Book of Edward VI. to the direct interference of Bucer. That the opinions of Bucer and other foreign divines had a strong indirect influence on the revisers we do not deny; but it will be found that the Bishops had already adopted some of the alterations proposed in the Scripta Anglicana, and that they rejected others, and it is a mistake to represent Cranmer as merely "wielding the pen," while Bucer supplied matter, and even "guided his hand." After recounting how Presbyterian views took their rise in England, and marking the effect produced by the return of the Marian exiles, Mr. Drysdale passes to the "formative period" of Presbyterianism, which he dates from the work of the Convocation of 1563 to the promulgation of the Directory in 1583, and gives an account, first of the Secession of 1566-7, and then of the growth of the Presbyterian party within the Church. The members of this party attempted to obtain a system of spiritual government "mutually enforced by equals upon equals" by means of the Discipline set forth in the Directory, and of Prophesyings, which tended to introduce the lay element into the Church, and to promote the rise of a system of self-government independent of the Episcopate. To the Discipline must be traced, as Mr. Drysdale points out, the endeavour of the party to establish parochial Presbyteries, while the Classis or Classical Presbytery is to be connected with the Prophesyings. In the course of a dull, though sufficient, record of the ecclesiastical struggle of the later years of Elizabeth's reign he marks the injury which accrued to the Presbyterian cause from the more violent proceedings of the Brownists, the Family of Love, and other Sectaries, and from the vehement invectives of the Marprelate tracts. His remark that to deliver Udal to death would have been an outrage that even Whitgift was not prepared to perpetrate scarcely conveys the fact that his life was spared on the earnest intercession of the Primate. In describing the rapid increase of Presbyterian feeling during the period of King Charles's power he dwells too exclusively on ecclesiastical matters. The desire for a change in Church government was part of the general revolt against absolutism; men turned to Presbyterianism, not so much because they had a special admiration for the system as because it was closely connected with the cause of the Parliament. In this are involved both the glory and the weakness of English Presbyterianism. It encouraged and expressed the determination of the leaders of the Parliamentary party to restore constitutional government. But as a system it had no hold on the affections of the nation at large; its work was done when the country was stirred to resistance, and it was willingly cast aside as an obstacle to further progress. Laud's work is, of course, unfairly represented. As archbishop he was bound to defend the Church from the attacks of Presbyterians and Sectaries, and to enforce the observance of decency and order among her ministers. We do not say that this affords a complete defence for everything that he did on her behalf, but no representation of his relations with Puritans of any persuasion can be just or adequate which does not make full allowance for his sense of duty towards the Church. To take one example only, it is obviously unjust to blame him for discouraging or preventing the establishment of lectureships, without noting that the lecturers were for the most part disloyal to the Church, and that they showed their contempt for her ordinances by habitually abstaining from taking part in the reading of the Common Prayer. Mr. Drysdale says that the chief cause of the failure of the Presbyterians to obtain a permanent acceptance of their system was that they "lost faith in the attainableness of their own ideal." We do not quite understand what he means. The fact is that those who really cared for the system found that their cause was hopeless. They had attempted to set up a spiritual tyranny, imposed on the whole nation, and enforced by Presbyterian Courts, and the nation would not bear the imposition, and found a deliverer in Cromwell's army. An attempt is made to minimize their narrowness and intolerance. Many of them, it is allowed, protested against toleration, "as it was advanced by the Sectaries"; we fail to see the force of the qualification which Mr. Drysdale italicizes. He denies that the Scots attempted to impose their own system upon England; if he will give some attention to the facts of the case he will see how utterly he is mistaken.

* Robbery under Arms: a Story of Life and Adventure in the Bush and in the Goldfields of Australia. By Rolf Boldrewood. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

* History of the Presbyterians in England; their Rise, Decline, and Revival. By Rev. A. H. Drysdale, M.A. London: Publication Committee of the Presbyterian Church of England. 1889.

The decline of Presbyterianism is carefully traced, and full information will be found as to the various quarrels and defections which completed the ruin of the cause. Almost as soon as the period of their adversity had passed by the Presbyterians began to engage in contentions amongst themselves. The political importance which the Dissenters acquired at the Revolution led to the formation of a union between the Presbyterians and Independents. This union was, however, quickly broken by the Neonomian Controversy, in which Dr. Williams, the founder of the Library now in Grafton Street, played a conspicuous part. One of the results of this Controversy was, Mr. Drysdale says, a growing indifference to Gospel teaching among the Presbyterians. Before long doctrinal defection appeared, and a third of the Assembly held at Exeter in 1719 refused to subscribe to the first Article of the Church of England. A formal breach took place at the Salters' Hall meeting in the same year, and Arianism soon increased rapidly. Among the causes which favoured the spread of this defection were, Mr. Drysdale considers, the foolish prejudice which the Presbyterians entertained against subscription to tests of orthodoxy, their "disuse of and departure from the fully-developed Presbyterian government and discipline," and the state of the law with reference to Trusts, which prevented heterodox teachers from being deprived of the enjoyment of Presbyterian endowments. After the publication of Priestley's Corruptions of Christianity, in 1782, Presbyterian Arianism lapsed into Unitarianism. The last section of this work treats of the revival of Evangelical Presbyterianism. This revival was mainly effected through the instrumentality of the Scottish Secession, or, as it is now called, the United Presbyterian Church. It has led to the formation of a reconstituted Presbyterian body in England, which in 1888 numbered 288 congregations, under eleven Presbyteries, and appears, from the title-page of this book, to call itself by the inappropriate name of the "Presbyterian Church of England."

DICTIONARY OF MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.*

WITH a fourth volume and an appendix Sir George Grove's important work has reached the long-desired end, and the Dictionary of Music and Musicians now lacks only the final touch of completeness which a full index can give. This, we understand, will shortly appear in an additional volume compiled by

* A Dictionary of Music and Musicians. Edited by Sir George Grove, D.C.L. Vol. IV. With an Appendix, edited by J. A. Fuller Maitland, M.A. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

Mrs. Wodehouse. We sincerely congratulate the editor and the eminent writers associated with him on the successful conclusion of their labours. In its earlier phases of publication the Dictionary was assailed with not a little detraction of the tiny trumpeting kind, which for a while afflicted some of those interested in the undertaking with transient filial fears; but the murmurs of the rebellious ones, at no time of serious import, became gradually hushed as the scheme of the work took shape and its varied merits became increasingly apparent. It was inevitable that errors and omissions should occur in a work so complex and comprehensive. These are rectified in the Appendix, under the keen and painstaking supervision of Mr. Fuller Maitland. A considerable portion of the supplementary labour was rendered necessary by the peculiar objects of the Dictionary that distinguish it from all other examples of our musical literature. From Hawkins and Burney to the late Sir George Macfarren, and other recent writers, we have histories of music and musical histories of various degrees of value, yet dealing with the subject within set limitations, and at this date, in several directions, imperfect authoritative guides. Sir George Grove's Dictionary embraces the whole field of music, ancient and modern, the latest developments of contemporary art and criticism; it is a chronicle of musical activity to the most recent possible fact or event of recorded moment in the world of music. Whether in every department of the work—in biography, for instance—the articles invariably fulfil the true functions of a dictionary is perhaps open to debate. We must express the hope that when a new edition is forthcoming the great names of Bach and Handel will have a more liberal allotment of space than they have received. In this particular, at least, the Dictionary does not reflect the true relations of these august masters to modern composers. Several of the more important contributions to the present volume were noticed in the Saturday Review on their appearance in the monthly parts. Dr. Parry's articles on the Symphony and on Variations are models of exposition, and, like all the contributions of this admirable writer, excellent in form and style. In the former we have a luminous history of the Symphony and its evolution from the examples of the elders, broadening down from precedent to precedent in Beethoven to modern processes of disintegration or departure. Dr. Parry is unwilling to regard the "symphonic poem" or "instrumental drama" of Berlioz and Liszt as derived from the Symphony. In reality, he says, they are "scarcely even offshoots from the symphonic stem." Never have we seen the essential difference between the two forms of art more convincingly established than by Dr. Parry. He says, moreover, the word in season, now that so much vague or intolerable nonsense is constantly being written on the subject, in his observations (p. 39) on what is called "programme music." Among the chief composers discussed in the fourth volume are M. Ambroise Thomas, by M. Gustav Chonquet; Verdi, by Signor Mazzucato; Wagner, by Mr. Dannreuther; and Weber, by Dr. Ph. Spitta. Of theorists and composers, some of whom were virtuosi, we have notable articles in Herr Paul David's Tartini, Mr. Dannreuther's Tausig, Mr. Louis Engel's Thalberg, and the Abbé Vogler and Josef Wolf of the Rev. J. H. Mee. Dr. Spitta's "Weber" is from all aspects one of the best biographical articles in the Dictionary. Mr. W. S. Rockstro is responsible for the article on the old method of notation known as Tablature, on Thorough Bass, on the Tonal Fugue, and on Time considered in relation to rhythm—all of which exhibit the learning and exactness of definition and illustration that distinguish the writer. For the rest, it is only necessary to mention the very interesting articles on the Violin by Mr. E. J. Payne, on the Virginal by Mr. Hipkins, on Virginal Music by Mr. Barclay Squire, and Mr. John Thomas's too brief discussion of Welsh Music.

The somewhat bulky Appendix is naturally swollen by corrections and additions necessitated by the lapse of time and other obvious causes. In some instances the additions to previous articles are considerable, as in the useful catalogue from Nottebohm in the Beethoven article, in the articles on Liszt and Mozart, and in Mr. Barclay Squire's further researches into the life and works of William Boyd, the madrigalist. One of the most singular omissions in the past is now repaired by the graceful notice of Signor Boito from the pen of Signor Mazzucato, who relates the true and strange story of Mefistofele, and gives a suggestive sketch of the fastidious genius and his idiosyncrasies. Reparation is also made to Benoit and Delibes by M. Adolphe Jullien, who is truly critical in his treatment of the Flemish composer; to Auguste Dupont by Mr. Fuller Maitland, somewhat inadequately; and to Dvořák, also by Mr. Fuller Maitland, who in this instance discharges his task capably, and with distinction. Among purely technical subjects treated in the Appendix, the most important are Mr. Rockstro's articles on the Gregorian Tones and on Part-Writing. Mr. H. E. Wooldridge deals with a subject of great popular interest in his article on the musical settings of metrical Psalters in English, illustrating a richly suggestive theme efficiently. A mere survey of the Appendix sufficiently indicates how notable is its relation to the body of the Dictionary, and how far it departs from the character common to such supplements. The careful editing this Appendix reveals is, after all, only what was demanded in compiling the necessary complement to a great enterprise. Yet is the result not the less creditable to Mr. Fuller Maitland's zeal and energy.

PARROTS.*

LIVES there a man with soul so dead that he feels no pleasure in contemplating the plumage of pretty birds? There are, no doubt, people who not only have no ear for music but who positively dislike it. And there may be some who see no beauty in gorgeous colouring, however harmonious. But they must be rare, even more rare than the "Hawk-headed or Ruffed parrot," whose portrait forms the frontispiece to Dr. Greene's third volume, and of which he says that it is so scarce that a pair would be well worth 20*l.* Turning over the pages of this volume, we find nothing quite so delicately lovely as the Bourke's parakeet in the first, or showing such splendid contrasts as the Psittacus pulcherrimus in the second, but the Rock Pepler runs them very close, with its lemon and russet wings and its dark grey tail, nor is the Quaker, with its soft green and clove colour, far behind. For mere gorgeousness there is nothing in any of the volumes to beat the Blue Mountain Lory in the first; but in the new issue there are two parakeets—Barnard's and the Yellow Nape—which will rival anything else. The odd appearance of the Hawkhead, already mentioned, is balanced by that of the "Gang-Gang"—a black, or nearly black, cockatoo, with a scarlet head and crest, a most forbidding general aspect, and a reputation for killing and eating guinea-pigs. But the New Zealand "Kea," or Mountain parrot, has the worst reputation of all. It has a long, sharp beak, wholly unlike that of an ordinary parrot, and, according to the reports, it is used to kill sheep on a mountain run. It is hard to believe this story, and Dr. Greene evidently looks on it with great suspicion. The three that have been in the Parrot House at the Zoological Gardens have "preferred Indian corn to mutton." Another ugly bird is the Goliath Aratoo, a large black cockatoo with bare pink cheeks. The Vasa parrot is also plain purplish black; but Dr. Greene gives it a fairly good character, as being hardy, long-lived, domestic, and gentle. One of this species, which was figured by Harvey in Bennett's Menagerie as long ago as 1830, survived till 1880. As Dr. Greene sagely observes, some birds "submit, if not with pleasure at least with perfect resignation, to a life of captivity, and refuse to return to a state of nature when the opportunity for doing so is presented to them." He illustrates this observation with an account of two Vasas, which were placed together in a large aviary, and which, after prolonged warfare, became tolerable friends, until one died by an accident, when the other became more savage and irreclaimable than ever. But when he was taken from the aviary and placed in a small cage he became much happier in his mind, and eventually turned out a "very amiable and companionable bird." Dr. Greene has observed on various occasions that a parrot has been unhappy in a large space where he could fly about, and showed evident signs of satisfaction "when restored to the narrower precincts of the accustomed cage."

Readers of Dr. Greene's former volumes will not be surprised to find that the introduction to this one consists of an essay in answer to the question, "Do Parrots Drink?" As it seems that in some great aviaries and menageries it is not thought necessary to give the parrots water, and that nevertheless some of them are known to have survived for half a century, the question is not yet settled. Nor does Dr. Greene devote much space to it, but goes off into a passage on talking and the ways of teaching articulate speech. Incidentally he tells some pleasant anecdotes, as of a cardinal who gave a hundred golden crowns for a bird that could repeat the Lord's Prayer and the Apostles' Creed; or of the lady who said "O Polly, why did you bite my boy?" to which Polly promptly replied, "Serve him right." We then come to the Hawk-headed parrot, and Dr. Greene mentions the name of Mr. Lydon as that of the artist to whom he is indebted for the beautiful and accurate coloured engravings of each species described. Unfortunately there is hardly a picture in the whole book which we do not prefer to that of the Hawkhead. No doubt the necessity for accuracy in delineating every feather of so rare and curious a bird must be an excuse for the hardness of the picture. "Pinto," as Dr. Greene calls his specimen, seems to be a very civilized and interesting animal. His ruff is usually worn level, being only raised when he is excited. Pinto was sent to a Crystal Palace Show, and Dr. Greene seems very indignant that the judges took no notice of him, and vows that "he will not be sent there again, for he was very much upset by the whole affair and especially by the rude gaze and rude remarks of such an unwonted number of strangers." For a long time after he would not come out of his cage. Towards the end of the account of Pinto, Dr. Greene, who, by the way, always uses the editorial "We," mentions that he has acquired another bird of this species, which talks as well as a grey, and has a long repertory of tricks, rolling on its back, tossing a pebble with its feet, and standing on its head in a corner of the cage. If Mr. Lydon's portrait is not a great success it is fully atoned by the next plate which represents that beautiful but ill-named parakeet, the Psittacus pileatus of Gould, the "platycerque à bonnet rouge" of the French naturalists. That a bird adorned with all the colours of the rainbow and others should have, as in the case of Dr. Greene's specimen, to be referred to as "Pilate" seems a pity, the more so as "pileated" implies something of a cap, or toppin, whereas this exquisite bird has not even a crest. Pilate, like Pinto, has been exhibited at the Crystal Palace, also without attracting the notice of the judges. Yet, in this country at least, the Pileated parakeet seems to be very rare. Dr. Greene thinks it is allied, in habits especially, with the ground parrots, and it has long legs, and runs nimbly. It has one extremely good quality besides its beauty, for "it is not noisy in the least degree." We have already mentioned the beautiful drawing of Barnard's parakeet and that of the Quaker. This last-named comes from South America, where it is found on the mountain ranges as high up as three or four thousand feet; but the most remarkable peculiarity of the Quaker parakeet is that it departs entirely from the habits of all its congeners, and builds a nest of twigs among the branches of a tree. Most parrots, as is well known, "make their breeding burrows in the hollow limbs or trunks of trees, or, in a few instances, in the ground or under the roots of a tree." The Quaker's nest is very large and has no lining, and, from Dr. Greene's account, the birds seem to use it both as a habitation and a place of incubation. A pair which flew about at liberty built in a fir-tree and brought up a brood of four; but they strayed and did not return. If they could but be protected, there is no reason why the Quaker should not become a common bird in England, and he would be a more pleasing object flying about wild than in a cage, for he is terribly noisy.

The middle of the volume is occupied by some beautifully coloured, but not very graceful, lories, and the latter part with some Amazon parrots, one or two of which are almost ugly. But for brilliance of colour the finest plate is that of the New Guinea Eclectus. A mystery which has lately been cleared up long hung over the identity of these parrots. The male is wholly different from the female, and, strange to say, is more soberly clad. He is green, with a patch of red on either side, and with blue quill feathers and an orange beak. She, on the other hand, is bright scarlet, with a kind of blue waistcoat and a black beak. Naturalists never suspected the affinity of the two birds till Dr. Meyer, of Dresden, discovered that what had always been looked upon as two different species "stood to each other in the relationship of husband and wife." Following the Eclectus we come to the Jamaica parrot, which we cannot admire with Dr. Greene, who calls it a handsome bird; to the Red-throated, White-fronted Amazon, whose name is a description; and then to the prettiest of this class, the Yellow-naped Amazon, one of the best talkers in the world. In fact, it is a question whether this kind does not occasionally excel the grey parrot himself. It has also the advantage of being extremely hardy and of attaining to a great—literally a green—old age. One has often been identified as the friend of three generations of the same house. But the most long-lived bird mentioned by Dr. Greene was a Salmon-crested cockatoo, which had been nearly one hundred years in the possession of a family when Herr F. Schmidt, of Berlin, bought it, and it lived with him for nineteen years, and then died, not from old age, but from the effects of an accident. This cockatoo concludes the third volume of Dr. Greene's delightful work, and we are glad to observe that he makes some mention of the possibility of a fourth. If so, he will lay his readers under still greater obligation by adding a classified list of genera and species, as it is not given to us all to be able to remember the peculiarity and habitat of every parrot, parakeet, lory, conure, amazon, cockatoo, cockatiel, budgerigar, and macaw.

L'ESPOSIZIONE ITALIANA.*

THE last Italian Exhibition was, without doubt, the finest unofficial exhibition ever organized. It had an air of importance and solidity about it, which its recent successor, the Spanish, unfortunately lacks. In many of its departments it was as excellent as could possibly be, and if it was not so complete in others, the fault rests rather with the authorities in Rome than with the organizers in London. Mr. John R. Whitley, the Director-General, proved himself worthy of the great work he had undertaken. No doubt the illuminated gardens, the bands of music, and the remarkable spectacle of the Emperor Titus and his Court, opening nightly an immense but most realistic Colosseum of lath and plaster, were the features of the show which proved most attractive; but the various exhibits of a more serious character were deeply interesting, and the carved furniture and ceramics were so beautiful, and, above all, so ridiculously cheap as to open out quite a new commerce between England and Italy. The rather bulky volume which gives minute details of the manner in which Mr. Whitley and his colleagues managed to create the Exhibition and bring it to a triumphant close contains a good deal of valuable information anent Italian commerce and trade. Although published by an English firm, like the play which proved so disquieting to the peace of mind of Hamlet's mother and stepfather, it is written in choice Italian, and contains surprisingly few faults of orthography. As a record of an emphatic success, which, under happier circumstances—a dry summer, for instance, and an absence of important deaths in the Royal Family—would have been even greater than it was, it is of * Parrots in Captivity. By W. T. Greene, M.A., M.D. Vol. III. London: Bell.

* L'Esposizione Italiana di Londra—Relazione. Londra: Waterlow & Sons.

interest. We certainly owe Mr. Whitley and his friends a debt of gratitude for pleasant days and evenings spent at West Brompton among roba d'Italia of no mean description. The Italians, too, ought not to forget the excellent results of this Exhibition to their commerce. It dispersed, among the lower orders especially, many silly prejudices, and it did perhaps more than a thousand books to popularize with the masses the most charming and romantic country in the world. But the commercial advantages were so solid that many of those who exhibited have since established themselves in London. Certain art industries which the Italians understand better than any other people in the world have begun to flourish here with deserved success since "L'Esposizione Italiana" first introduced them among us, to the exhilarating strains of "Finiculi Finicula." It is surprising how much solid business can be effected to a lively tune.

NATURAL RELIGION.*

MR. MAX MÜLLER'S new book, Natural Religion, contains the twenty lectures which he delivered in Glasgow from the Gifford Chair. Even the most economical Scot will admit that Glasgow got her, or rather Lord Gifford's, money's worth. It is improbable that many lecturers will produce a volume so large, so closely packed with ideas and arguments, and so valuable as a statement of the opinions entertained by a celebrated student. His work begins with an introductory and autobiographical essay, in which he praises the Pious Founder, and gives a sketch of his own literary life and the growth of his opinions. The next four lectures deal with Definitions of Religion, including his own. That leads to a discussion of the Infinite in Nature, in Man, and in the Self. These may first be briefly considered. An instructive examination of the names for religion in various languages is succeeded by a sketch of various philosophical definitions, chiefly German, and more space is devoted to the singularly unseductive theory of Professor Gruppe. "His argument seems to be this, that religion is something so irrational, not to say absurd, that it could have been invented once, and once only, in the whole history of mankind." Mistaken Professor Gruppe! Anything that is irrational, not to say absurd, is quite certain to have been invented by man everywhere, and as soon as ever he got a chance. This leads to a discussion of the Universality of Religion, where Roskoff has a most easy victory over Sir John Lubbock. Then coming to Mr. Max Müller's own definition, we approach it through a criticism of "all our Ego-knowledge," all of which has its roots in "the universal soil of sensuous experience." Now experience is only possible through limit and the unlimited, the Finite and the Infinite. Mr. Max Müller here endeavours to show that the Infinite, in Melanesia and among the natives of North America, finds a name in Mana and Manito, "the Beyond," while Aditi does duty for the Infinite in the Rig-Veda, probably being an extension of a term for the Dawn. The conscious, explicit idea of the Infinite was thrust, as it were, on human thought by semitangible and intangible objects—as trees, mountains, rivers. True, we may say, a tree is tangible enough, "but its deepest roots are beyond our reach; its highest branches tower high above our head." It may, indeed, be replied that when man could not dig up, nor cut down, nor climb a tree, he may scarcely have been in an intellectual state fitting him to muse on its "mysterious life." But we are stating Mr. Müller's ideas, not criticizing them. Clouds, moon, stars, sky, are still more suggestive of what is oddly called "a visible infinite." For, all visions being essentially bounded, a visible infinite is like a contradiction in terms.

The tangible objects "lent themselves to no religious development," for "fetishism or the worship of stones or bones is a retrogressive, not a progressive, religious development." But the semi-tangible objects became Dryads, Nereids, and so forth; while the intangible objects, as sky, "grew mostly into great gods." In Man, too, there is an infinite, the Life, or Spirit; and that became divine in ancestor worship; finally leading to "a father of all fathers—that is, a creator of mankind, if not of the world."

Here Mr. Max Müller comes pretty near Mr. Tylor's theory. To be sure Mr. Tylor advances by steps of ghost, dream, trance, shadow, while Mr. Müller speaks of "the perception of something infinite or immortal in our parents." "A man of ordinary understanding . . . would rather be inclined to believe that what he had known, and loved, and called his father or mother must be somewhere, though no longer in the body." Why should he think this? Mr. Tylor tries to show us the steps by which this idea was reached; Mr. Max Müller merely says that the supposition was natural. As he often (and rather unjustly) reproaches his opponents for not explaining why, or how, the attribute of supernatural force was attached to "fetishes," he might himself explain why it was "natural" to believe in the permanence of the spirits of the dead. Does Mr. Max Müller, or does he not, accept Mr. Tylor's theory? In any case it is to be noted that he now lays much more stress on this element of religion than he did in his Hibbert Lectures. Lastly, the "self" in Man, reflected on, suggests psychological deities, such as the Brahmanic Âtma, Self, the germ of Buddhism.

The greater gods and ancestral spirits apparently were now endowed with morality. Thus, after long wanderings, we reach (apparently) a definition of religion as "those perceptions of the Infinite which are able to influence the moral character of man." Religion is "a psychological necessity." Man is so constituted that, by the very nature of his perceptions, he was compelled to be religious. Religion is "not, as Positivist philosophers maintain, a mere hallucination or priestly fraud."

Here Mr. Max Müller contrasts his own method, which he calls "historical," with that of certain opponents, which he calls "theoretical." And here, having stated Mr. Müller's earlier ideas as plainly as our space admits of, we shall venture to remonstrate with him for his treatment of opponents. Many of them entirely agree with him that religion was a psychological necessity. They deal less in metaphysics; but they say, with him, that man, being conscious of a limit to his knowledge, sensuous and rational, and of somewhat beyond the limit, had no choice but to people the beyond with the Divine. No men who retain a belief in the Government of the World will deny that this necessity was part of the education of man. So far we, at least, have no quarrel with Mr. Max Müller. But is he quite fair, after all, to his opponents? He calls them, or at least we understand him to call them, when they are anthropologists, members of the "theoretic school." Now, they regard their method as historical. He says they "begin with an ideal conception of what man must have been in the beginning." Yet some of them, at least, repeatedly deny that they know anything at all about the "beginning." Angel or ape, nullo discrimine agetur. They aver that, while man in the beginning is unknown, yet all the races which we can examine have clearly been what Mr. Max Müller will not call savages, but what he permits us to call People of Nature, Nature Folk. Or, if this be thought too daring an hypothesis, at least all races whom we know much of have been extremely influenced by the ideas and practices common to Nature Folk in all stages, such as Australians, Bushmen, Bechuanas, and so forth. If this be true, then many peculiarities of civilized peoples may be elucidated by what we learn of the ideas common to Nature Folk and of their mental condition. Surely this is very far from "beginning with an ideal conception of what man must have been in the beginning."

Once more (p. 87) Mr. Max Müller actually writes that there is one "article of the anthropologist faith—namely, that savages, who are far more changeable than civilized races, are stereotyped once for all and unchangeable." It is not easy either to account for or characterize this astonishing remark. As far as Anthropology has an article of faith it is that civilized races have, at least to a very great extent, been evolved at some period through the condition of "savages." That is to say, the dogma is, not that savages are unchangeable, but that they are changeable. Moreover, all anthropologists have constantly to point out changes in savage art, religion, and customs. We see the gourd developed into the pot, the beaten fibres into the woven web. We see the growth of new myths introduced to explain new problems of new knowledge. We see the family developed and changed, the movement to male from female kindred, the substitution of descent from an heroic ancestor for descent from a plant or animal or other object. Thus Mr. Max Müller accuses his anthropological adversaries of believing the very opposite of their creed. He modifies this (p. 200) where one school of anthropologists is said to derive civilization from the lowest savagery, while another school recognizes in the savage of to-day "the unchanged representative of the primordial savage." But who does this? Is it not admitted that the very lowest Australian must have advanced greatly from a lower Australian who had no boomerang? About primordial people we know nothing, but we do know that the Australian probably did not come into the world with a boomerang in his hand and his marriage laws in his head. To say that he did so, is to be theoretical, not historical.

The truth is that Mr. Max Müller frequently argues at persons whom he never names. We do not even know in many cases whom he can have had in his mind. Where are we to read the doctrines of those strange theorists who are to Mr. Max Müller what "the Atheist" is to the heated pulpiteer? How can Mr. Max Müller's Glasgow audience estimate the ideas of unnamed persons to whose works no reference is given? They listen to Mr. Max Müller, and go home believing that intelligent anthropologists hold the very opposite of their actual creed.

Zealous as he is for the historical method, Mr. Max Müller bases his own system of mythology on a theory, true or false, of the origin of speech. Men engaged in combined industries; they uttered the same shouts as they worked, these shouts became the signs of the work, "the origin of conceptual language." How does Mr. Max Müller know all this? He says "we know people in a primitive state accompany most of their common acts by sounds." Was there ever such logic! Mr. Max Müller first contends that savages are not "primitive nor primordial" (as, of course, they are not), and then he says he does know how people behave in a primitive state. Where are these people? If they are nature folk, why does he blame anthropologists for regarding nature folk as in a state, not primitive indeed, but much more backward than that of civilized folk? Either we may try to elucidate the earlier stages of religion by the faiths of nature folk, or Mr. Max Müller must not try to elucidate the beginnings of language by their conduct. He cannot have it both ways. If people who accompany most of their common acts by sounds prove that the first ancestors of man did so, then the religious beliefs of the same people cannot be rejected as evidences as to the first beliefs of the ancestors of man. Mr. Max Müller, in short, cannot call this witness, and refuse to let anthropologists call him. Perhaps at Glasgow they had logic enough to see this; perhaps they had not.

* Natural Religion. By F. Max Müller, K.M. London: Longmans & Co. 1889.

But does he really call the witness? If a theoretical anthropologist wished to prove that the origin of speech was the clamor concomitans of early men at work, he would produce many instances of nature folk who do combined work, accompanied by clamor concomitans. And then Mr. Max Müller would say, "It does not matter what these people do; they are not representatives of primordial man." And, indeed, it does not matter. But Mr. Max Müller does not even give us examples of people "in a primitive state accompanying most of their common acts by sounds." And this is the Historical, as opposed to the Theoretical, Method! So historical, so untheoretical, is Mr. Max Müller that he actually tells us the origin of Totemism, an institution so far behind us in time that even Mr. McLennan refused to hazard an hypothesis about it. Mr. Müller's hypothesis assumes, apparently, that men could draw or engrave or tattoo plants and animals before they were Totemists. Is this not theoretical (p. 522), or what possible proof can be adduced?

So it is throughout. The "historical method" relies on a theory, the theory that before man could speak he combined in labour, and accompanied his labour by clamor concomitans. Proof is said to be derived from the conduct of people in a primitive state; and yet we are constantly reminded that such people can no longer be found. Granting the truth of the theory, it is most ingeniously used to explain mythical thought and language. But it is odd to find the school which is all for history, and accuses adversaries of being theoretical, reposing on such a couch of conjecture.

It is impossible here to examine the whole of Mr. Max Müller's lectures; but it may be said that, when discussing M. Renouf's theory of the Egyptian Nutar, the criticism of M. Maspero might at least have been mentioned. In the same way Mr. Max Müller's belief that Ahanâ = Athene might have been contrasted with the views of Curtius, Preller, and Bergaigne; while the opposition of Mannhardt and Curtius to the elucidation of certain myths by certain etymologies might have been mentioned. It can hardly be necessary to add that the ideas of religion among Nature-folk which we derive from Hottentot hymns and Maori karakias are on another level of evidence than the information about Christianity which Cetewayo might have gleaned from a coalheaver. (P. 217.) For it is not from Cetewayo, but from traditional hymns and ritual, and from prayers, where these can be obtained, that we derive our best knowledge of religion among nature-folk.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

MR. J. J. WEISS (1) so seldom collects in a book any of his literary or dramatic criticisms that when he does the result is unusually interesting. Indeed, it may possibly be found worth more notice than we can give it in this particular place. The volume—made up entirely of short papers—has three divisions, which may or may not be regarded as "natural." One is headed "1830," and deals with Scribe, Dumas, and Hugo; another "1852," practically covering the whole Empire time, and going down to M. Feuille's Roman parisien, but principally dealing with M. Dumas fils and M. Sardou; the third more recent and rather miscellaneous in subject. As a critic of the form of literature, of the form of plays, M. Weiss no doubt has his superiors; but he has an astonishing faculty of penetration as to thought and matter, the works and ways of men. Here is a curiously vivid statement, not, it may be, of a truth, but of what is held by almost all Frenchmen for a truth. He imagines himself sitting with two ladies, one an Austrian Jewess, one a South American, at a representation of Odette. "Leur race," he says, "les met toutes deux à l'abri de nos idées littéraires acquises." It is one of M. Weiss's good points that you never quite know when he is speaking for himself and when dramatically. But nothing is happier than the phrase as to French "idées littéraires acquises"; and nothing is better founded, according to French ways of thinking, than the remark about "race." It is, for instance, the rarest possible thing to find a Frenchman who will treat seriously a non-Frenchman's estimate of any great French author. He may splutter at it, he may smile superior at it, but in his heart is convinced that it is a matter of "race" that the barbarian has not, and cannot have, the "idées littéraires acquises" which are necessary for comprehension even, much more for criticism. Yet we do not remember to have seen the thing put anywhere so strikingly as in these few words. And there are many similar things in the volume.

An unconventional book on a classical subject is a rare thing, and M. Sorel's book on Socrates (2) is very unconventional. It contains, indeed, such a number of unexpected remarks that we are not too sure as to the author's final result, or whether he is Socratist or anti-Socratist. What he says about Aristophanes is capital; but when we meet a man who describes the Symposium and the Republic as "deux livres qui déshonorent le génie grec," we must borrow a word from his own language, and say that he "radote." The embroilment of M. Sorel's book is further embroiled by the fact that he is half his time either backing up or vigorously fighting M. Fouillée, with the assistance on one side or another of somebody else, till the reader remembers that remarkable triangular duel in the Faerie Queene, when, as soon as two of the knights had beaten the third, one of the victors promptly deserted to the vanquished side and turned the tables on his late ally. But M. Sorel has evidently tried to look at his subject with his own eyes, not with somebody else's, and that is a great—a very great—thing.

Bonheur manqué (3) is a very tiny and pretty little volume of love verses, some of which are good. Mr. Hamerton will be surprised to hear that they are addressed to a married woman.

As Dr. Thomas justly says, Gassendi (4) has had a good deal written about him, and still he is hardly yet put in his proper place. Another shrewd remark of M. Thomas is, that if Gassendi had cared or had been able to leave terse French treatises like his rival Descartes, instead of long ones, in diffuse and rather Corinthian Latin, he would have fared better. For ourselves, we remember diving with much pleasure into his mighty folios; but though there is really no language in the world easier and pleasanter to read than such Latin, you cannot make people think so. The real misfortune of Gassendi and his Neo-Epicureanism was that the shadow of the eighteenth-century philosophes has been cast back on him, while even in the seventeenth he is represented as being a radix malorum. Gassendi, it is said, taught Molière the free thought which some persons, not perhaps entirely fools, have never been able to perceive in Molière. Gassendi, who was a plain-living, high-thinking, and very orthodox Christian, must be responsible for the orgies at Roissy; for Saint-Evremond and the libertins; for heaven knows who or what. As a matter of fact, Gassendi has the not inconsiderable testimony of Newton as a physicist; his psychology, if too materialist, is exceedingly ingenious, and nobody need be afraid to take up the cudgels for his much-decried ethics. It is as metaphysician that he leaves most, if not all, to desire. These are rather our sentiments than those of M. Thomas, but we are glad to welcome his tractate on a far too much neglected philosopher, to whom he has done justice.

M. Barthélemy Saint-Hilaire's discourse on the relations of philosophy to science and religion (5) is one of a well-known kind—a little florid and a little superficial in parts. A sketch, however short, of English philosophy which mentions neither Hobbes, Berkeley, Hume, nor Hamilton, and which gives Victor Cousin the pas with a "Cedite, Romani scriptores, cedite, Graii," addressed to English and German philosophers respectively, classes itself. But the book has the cheerful, stimulating, hortatory character of much of Cousin's own work; it is well written, and its principles are sound enough.

The history of Acadia (6) is by no means uninteresting, though it is weighted with the memory of a poem which M. de Saint-Père calls ravissant, which ravished all England and America once, but which we beg leave to pronounce one of the most mawkish pieces of pseudo-pathetic matter in limp and unscholarly form that a man of real poetical talent ever gave to the world. But the liquorice-water of Evangeline ought not to take away the savour of the real heroism after a kind which the French colonists showed in struggling with their more powerful and enterprising neighbours, and which has carried them through as a distinct and recognizable folk to the present day. M. de Saint-Père's history is very minute, perhaps a little too much so, and very careful, nor need any Englishman object to its patriotism.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

STORIES there are of the inception and fashioning of books that may be classed among certain curiosities of literature not exhaustively considered by the elder Disraeli. Of such is the editorial introduction that explains, after a melodramatic opening in the manner of the late Mr. G. P. R. James, how it came about that "the original MSS. of Sergent Marceau," the "Agate Sergent" of history, passed into English hands, were submitted to Mignet, and now, edited by M. C. M. Simpson, appear as Reminiscences of a Regicide (Chapman & Hall). "Towards the end of the month of October 1846," the record runs, "an English lady and gentleman were driving rapidly along the highway," somewhere between Marseilles and Nice, "when they were stopped by two persons, who commanded the postilions, in an authoritative voice, to turn aside from the road and follow, one of them adding, 'My will is never questioned here!'" They were all carried off to an adjacent château. The person of unquestionable will proved to be Lord Brougham, who wished only to save the travellers, Mr. and Mrs. Davenport, from further experience of bad roads in a time of floods. "This fierce jailor," as he is oddly called, treated his captives right hospitably, and did not, as the romantic reader might imagine, confine them to the donjon keep of his castle. The upshot of the adventure was that Mr. and

(3) Bonheur manqué. Par Georges de Portoriche. Paris: Ollendorff.

(4) La philosophie de Gassendi. Par P. F. Thomas. Paris: Alcan.

(5) La philosophie dans ses rapports avec les sciences et la religion. Par J. Barthélemy Saint-Hilaire. Paris: Alcan.

(6) Une colonie féodale en Amérique. Par Rameau de Saint-Père. 2 tomes. Paris: Plon.

(1) Le théâtre et les mœurs. Par J. J. Weiss. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(2) Le procès de Socrate. Par G. Sorel. Paris: Alcan.

Mrs. Davenport here met M. Carnot, the son of the great Minister, and through him were introduced to Sergeant, then in his ninety-sixth year, and living at Nice. The old engraver and ex-deputy was disposed to be garrulous; though it is pretty obvious, from the recollections of his revolutionary career dictated to Mrs. Davenport (now the dowager Lady Hatherton), that his characteristic caution and shrewdness had not deserted him in his old age. The materials of the present volume comprise also a previous memoir written in 1801, certain contributions to the Revue Rétrospective in 1830, and notes on Brissot's Mémoires and other books of the kind. The compilation is by no means satisfactory. The attempt to connect Sergeant's "disjointed notes" by a narrative of the French Revolution which is a bald summary of history can only be of service to the general reader whose knowledge of the subject is imperfect. Sergeant's recollections are interesting rather than important. Naturally enough, he was peculiarly sensitive to certain charges brought against him after the old order of things had given place to new. His defence is much more satisfactory when dealing with the "agate" incident than in the matter of the September massacres. He always strenuously denied any share or responsibility in the latter. Yet his explanation is full of contradictions. He was one of the four Police administrators at the time, and he controlled the arms, ammunition, provisioning, &c., of the National Guard. He confesses in one place that he could post the National Guard wherever he pleased. Yet he does not explain why they did not interfere, or why he should go into the country at this crisis. That he did not sign Marat's circular may be perfectly true. But he knew that Marat had authority for putting his name to it, and was therefore responsible for the fresh massacres it occasioned at Versailles. Of one other mysterious matter, the theft and recovery of the crown diamonds, he gives a very curious and circumstantial account. Other curious points to be noted are his dislike of Mme. Roland, his repeated declaration that Robespierre was no friend to him, and his evidently genuine belief in every kind of Royalist plot, the influence of English gold, and the power of Pitt. His portrait in the present volume, from a sketch made in 1847, is decidedly prepossessing. Of his artistic skill we have also specimens in the portrait of his brother-in-law, the heroic, much-sung General Marceau, and in the frontispiece, an aquatint of the period, which depicts his wife, the dauntless "Emira," visiting Sergeant in retirement, after his flight from Paris in 1795.

The Rambler Papers, by Jeffrey C. Jeffrey (Allen & Co.), is a book that scarcely responds to its title. It is a brisk and bright story of military life, the hero of which is the unpopular man of his regiment, the heroine a charming and self-willed girl, and the remaining characters are sketched with a good deal of truth and point. There is, indeed, an essay on peculiar people interpolated, wherein the shades of Shelley and Byron and Dr. Johnson form an astonishing trio; but this were much better banished from the book. The parodies in verse of these poets are of the most harrowing kind.

The larger portion of Professor F. W. Newman's Anglo-Saxon Abolition of Negro Slavery (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.) is a reprint of essays from Fraser and a lecture on President Lincoln's policy, published in 1863 by the Emancipation Society. The book carries us back to those far-off days when Mr. Gladstone's assurance of the independence of the Southern States was so eloquently and firmly pronounced. Professor Newman's views on the subject of abolition are familiar to everybody. Those who would know how speedily he out-Garrisoned Garrison, and fell in with Wendell Phillips, and what he had to say of Lincoln's "shallow expediency," may now profitably revive their failing recollection.

Lovers of good literature, and cheap, may be commended to the "Minerva Library" edition of The Bible in Spain, edited by Mr. G. T. Bettany (Ward, Lock, & Co.) This is an excellent reprint, with neat binding, good type, and fair woodcuts. Of Mr. Walter Scott's series of translations of Count Tolstoi we have a fresh instalment, The Physiology of War, by Huntington Smith, from a French version. To the "Camelot Series" Mr. Charles Sayle contributes a Selection of Lord Chesterfield's Letters (Walter Scott), showing discrimination in the choice and an unnecessary assumption of "the superior person" in the final judgment of the high-toned "prefatory note." We cannot praise Mr. Ernest Radford for giving excerpts from Gebir in his selected Poems of Walter Savage Landor, "Canterbury Poets" (Walter Scott). Gebir is a fine poem, and ought not to be snipped thus.

All who long for smokeless air in cities should read Mr. B. H. Thwaite's lecture, Gaseous Fuel (Whittaker & Co.), a little book, illustrated by diagrams, on the chemistry of gaseous fuel and the application of natural gas, including water gas, to purposes of lighting and manufactures.

The Rev. J. H. L. Zillmann, a clergyman of the Church of England, and "one of the oldest free white born natives of Queensland," has much that is interesting to recall concerning early missionary efforts among the aborigines of Australia in Past and Present Australian Life (Sampson Low & Co.) Mr. Zillmann's opinion of the natives—we should say the black natives—whom he knew in their primitive state before the spread of colonization, is more favourable than that of most writers. Of their imminent extinction in Victoria he seems totally convinced. In fact, he anticipates their complete extermination throughout the continent in another fifty years.

We have received two recent additions to the useful and handy "Ancient and Modern Library of Theological Literature"

(Griffith, Farran, & Co.); the First Apology of Justin Martyr, translated by William Reeves (1717), and The Ecclesiastical History of the Second and Third Centuries, illustrated from Tertullian.

We have also received Dr. Douglas Lithgow's Heredity: a Study with Special Reference to Disease (Baillière, Tindall, & Cox); History of Hindu Civilization, by Ramachandra Gosha (Calcutta: Ram & Friend); and Dr. Reinhart Hoerning's Descriptions and Collation of Six Karaite Manuscripts, with autotype reproductions (Williams & Norgate), the MSS. now in the British Museum, formerly in the Shapira collection.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

ADVERTISEMENTS intended for the SATURDAY REVIEW should be addressed to the MANAGER of the ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT, at the OFFICE, 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON.

A printed Scale of Charges can be obtained on application.

THE UNITED STATES.

The Annual Subscription to the SATURDAY REVIEW, including postage to any part of the United States, is £1 10s. 4d. or $7 39, and may be forwarded direct to the Publisher, Mr. WILLIAM BOYCE, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, or to Mr. B. F. STEVENS, American Agency, 4 Trafalgar Square, London. International Money Orders can be sent from any office in the United States, and Subscriptions, payable in advance, may commence at any time.

The SATURDAY REVIEW is duly registered for transmission abroad.

The publication of the SATURDAY REVIEW takes place on Saturday Mornings, in time for the early trains, and copies may be obtained in the Country, through any Newsagent, on the day of publication.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW Bill of Contents will be forwarded every Friday Evening by post, prepaid, to any Newsagent in Town or Country on application to the Publisher.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 1,759, JULY 13, 1889:

Delagoa Bay and Arbitration.
Ireland. More New Style. Egypt.
Dogs, Cats, and Muzzles. The Elections and the Government.
Gentlemen and Players. Mr. Gladstone's Statesmanship.
The Salvation Army Nuisance. The Bull Fight in France.
Dr. Allbutt's Case. The Persecuted Thompson.
The Business of the House. The French Army Bill.
The Royal Grants Committee.
Theatrical Children.
The Natural History of Heraldry.
"When Mrs. Boffin is not Present."
Verdi's "Otello." Two Insurance Cases.
The Paris Exhibition.
Notes from the Zoo—the Cocos-nut Crab. The late Franz Thimm.
The Opera. "Lena"
The Bull-Bull's Farewell.

Life and Literary Remains of Edward Fitz Gerald.
Novels. French and English.
Bugge's Northern Mythology. Novels.
Henry VII. Fans and Fan Leaves.
Pig-Sticking, Missionary Enterprise, and the South Pacific.
Robbery under Arms. English Presbyterianism.
Dictionary of Music and Musicians.
Parrots. L'Esposizione Italiana.
Natural Religion. French Literature.
New Books and Reprints.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

SCOTTISH PROVIDENT INSTITUTION

No. 6 ST. ANDREW SQUARE, EDINBURGH.

RESULTS for 1888.

NEW ASSURANCES COMPLETED £1,163,000.

Being for the 15th year in succession above a million.

PREMIUMS IN YEAR £558,875.

TOTAL INCOME £855,886.

CLAIMS (including Bonuses*) £328,530.

* Averaging 49½ per cent. on Policies Participating.

REALISED FUNDS, £6,516,468

(the Increase in year being £401,212).

PREMIUM FOR £100 AT DEATH:
With Profits.

Age next Birthday	Payable during Life	Limited to 21 Payments
25	£1 18 0	£2 12 6
30*	2 1 6	2 15 4
35	2 6 10	3 0 2
40†	2 14 9	3 7 5
45	3 5 9	3 17 6
50	4 1 7	4 12 1

* A man of 30 may secure £1,000 at death by the yearly payment of £20 15s., which generally assures £800 only.

Or he may secure £1,000 by twenty-one yearly payments of £27 13s. 4d.—being thus free of payment after age 50.

† At 40 the Premium ceasing at 60 is, for £1,000, £33 14s. 2d.—about the same as most Offices require during the whole of life. Before these Premiums have ceased the Policy will have shared in at least one division of profits. To Professional Men and others, whose income is dependent on continuance of health, this limited payment system is specially recommended.

COMBINES THE ADVANTAGES OF
Mutual Assurance with Moderate Premiums.

THE PREMIUMS are so moderate that an Assurance of £1,200 or £1,250 is generally secured from the first for a yearly payment which elsewhere assures (with profits) £1,000 only—equivalent to an immediate Bonus of 20 to 25 per cent.

The WHOLE PROFITS go to the Policyholders, on a system at once safe and equitable,—no share being given to those by whose early death there is a LOSS. On this principle large additions have been, and will be, made to the Policies of those who live to participate, notwithstanding the lowness of the premiums.

The SURPLUS at last Investigation was £1,051,035, of which £350,345 was reserved for future participation. The number who shared was 9,384. First shares were (with a few unimportant exceptions) from 18 or 20 to 31 per cent., according to age and class. Other policies were increased 50 and 80 per cent.

The SOCIETY has taken a leading part in the REMOVAL OF FORFEITURES.

POLICIES, as a rule, are WORLD-WIDE, and free from Restrictions on Residence after five years—provided the Assured has attained age 30.

Surrender Values compare favourably with other first-class Offices.

June 1889.

JAMES WATSON, Manager.

BRANCH OFFICES:

GLASGOW, 29 St. Vincent Place.
 ABERDEEN, 259 Union Street.
 BRISTOL, 31 Clare Street.
 LIVERPOOL, 25 Castle Street.
 NEWCASTLE, 3 Queen Street.

DUBLIN OFFICE: 16 College Green.
 BIRMINGHAM, 95 Colmore Row.
 LEEDS, Royal Exchange.
 MANCHESTER, 10 Albert Square.
 BELFAST, 23 Donegall Place.

Secretary in London—J. MUIR LEITCH,

OFFICE, 17 KING WILLIAM STREET, E.C.

Subject, by special Acts of Parliament (1848 and 1884), to the jurisdiction of the English and Irish Courts.

Copies of Annual Report containing Tables of Rates and Full Information may be had.

GROSVENOR GALLERY,
 SUMMER EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. 9 A.M. to 7 P.M.
 Admission, ONE SHILLING.

THE NEW GALLERY, REGENT STREET.—SUMMER
 EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. 9 till 7. Admission, One Shilling.

THE FATHER DAMIEN MEMORIAL FUND.

President of the Committee.
 H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES.

Hon. Treasurers.
 Sir Algernon Borthwick, Bart., M.P., 139 Piccadilly, W.
 Edward Lawson, Esq., 42 Grosvenor Square, W.

Frank Harris, Esq. Hon. Sec.

Bankers.
 Messrs. Coutts, Strand.
 Sir Samuel Scott & Co., Cavendish Square, W.
 London and Westminster Bank, Lothbury.

The death of Father Damien, completing the noble sacrifice of himself for his brother men, has suggested the thought that the sympathy of the United Kingdom ought to find expression in a substantial memorial of his work.

It is proposed therefore—

1. That a sum of not less than £500 be appropriated to a memorial to be erected to Father Damien in some public place at Kalawao, and that estimates and designs for a statue, in stone, marble, or bronze, be invited from Mr. Gilbert.

2. (a) That a Fund be formed, the interest of which shall be devoted to the medical treatment and care of indigent British lepers in the United Kingdom.

(b) And that a sum of money be set apart and placed under the control of trustees for the endowment of two Studentships, one student to make the United Kingdom and the remainder of Europe his field of investigation, and the other to go abroad and study the disease in China, the Colonies, and elsewhere. The Studentships to be held for a period of three years, to be renewed by the Trustees if thought desirable.

3. That a Commission be appointed, for not less than one year, consisting of three members, one to be named by the Royal College of Physicians, one by the Royal College of Surgeons, and one by the General Committee of "The Father Damien Memorial Fund," to go out to India for the purpose of investigating the disease of leprosy there, and that the Indian Auxiliary Committee be requested to add two members to this Commission.

The Committee invite public Subscriptions for the above-mentioned objects, while wishing especially to draw the attention of the public to the fact that a large sum of money is needed in order to properly treat the 200,000 lepers in India who are now in many districts without ordinary medical care. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, speaking on this subject at Marlborough House on June 17, said:—"The heroic life and death of Father Damien (de Veuster) has not only roused the sympathy of the United Kingdom, but it has gone deeper; it has brought home to us that the circumstances of our vast Indian and Colonial Empire oblige us, in a measure at least, to follow his example, and this not for foreigners and strangers, but for our own fellow-subjects. India, with its 200,000 lepers, and our Colonies, with their unnumbered but increasing victims to a loathsome, deadly disease, that has hitherto baffled medical skill, have a far stronger claim on our aid than the poor natives of the Hawaiian Islands could ever have had on the young Belgian priest who has given his life for them."

Donations and Subscriptions forwarded on account of "The Father Damien Fund" to the above-mentioned Treasurers or Bankers, or to the Hon. Secretary of "The Father Damien Fund," Marlborough House, St. James's, will be acknowledged in the public Press.

A Y R T O N & T H O M A S, PATENT AGENTS.

Conduct every kind of British, Foreign, and Colonial Business connected with PATENTS, DESIGNS, AND TRADE MARKS.

Mr. H. M. THOMAS, Author of "The True Position of Patentees," being a practical engineer, PERSONALLY SUPERINTENDS the applications in respect of mechanical inventions.

Moderate Terms. No charge for preliminary advice.

Telegraphic Address, "Prolonged, London."

9 & 10 Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, W.C.

SCHWEITZER'S
COCOATINA.

GUARANTEED PURE SOLUBLE COCOA.

This Old-established Article retains its position as "the finest Cocoa in the market." It is unequalled in purity and flavour, bears the strictest Chemical test, and keeps in all climates.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS AND ECONOMICAL.

VAN
 HOUTEN'S
 COCOA.

PURE—SOLUBLE.
 BEST & GOES FARTHEST.
 EASILY DIGESTED.
 MADE INSTANTLY.

"Once used, always used—its PURITY is beyond question."
Health.

"It is admirable—flavour perfect—and so PURE."
British Medical Journal.

C. J. VAN HOUTEN & ZOON,
 WEESP, HOLLAND.

FRY'S

J. WYBRANTS OLPHERTS, M.D., says: "I find it the most agreeable beverage of the kind I have ever tasted, delicious both in flavour and odour."

PURE CONCENTRATED

E. BUCKNILL, M.D., says: "Your Pure Concentrated Cocoa is so extremely nice that I have ordered it for family use."

COCOA.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, Strand, W.C.—The COUNCIL earnestly appeal for DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS. £20,000 required for new Nursing Establishment, enlargement of Medical School, the Convalescent Home, and current expenses. Bankers: Messrs. Drummond.

ARTHUR E. READE, Secretary.

ILFRACOMBE.—ILFRACOMBE HOTEL. Thoroughly furnished, equipped, and decorated. 250 Rooms. Eight Lawn-Tennis Courts. Large Swimming Bath, Private Baths. Descriptive Tariff of Manager.

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

PROVIDENT LIFE OFFICE,
50 REGENT STREET, W., and 14 CORNHILL, E.C., LONDON.
Founded 1806.

Existing Assurances	..	..	..	..	£7,470,866
Invested Funds	..	..	..	..	£2,539,609
Annual Income	..	..	..	..	£322,963
Claims and Surrenders paid	..	..	..	..	£8,697,671
Bonuses declared	..	..	..	..	£2,971,852

Prospectuses and full information to be obtained at the Head Office, or of any of the Agents.

CHARLES STEVENS,
Actuary and Secretary.

NATIONAL PROVIDENT
INSTITUTION.

FOR MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE.
See New Prospectus, page 17, for particulars of ENDOWMENT-ASSURANCE POLICIES combining
LIFE ASSURANCE at MINIMUM COST with provision for old age.
48 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON.

LONDON ASSURANCE CORPORATION.
Established by Royal Charter, A.D. 1720.
7 ROYAL EXCHANGE AND 43A PALL MALL, S.W.

Marine, Fire, and Life Assurances have been granted by the Corporation for more than a century and a half.
Funds in hand exceed £3,500,000.

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH LAW
LIFE ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION (Established 1839).
12 Waterloo Place, London. 120 Princes Street, Edinburgh.
Whole Life Bonuses never less than £1 10s. per cent. per annum.
Annuities. Loans. Liberal Conditions.
ARTHUR JACKSON, General Manager } 12 Waterloo Place,
FRANCIS E. COLENSO, F.I.A., Actuary } London.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY,
Established 1836.
LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE.
INCOME AND FUNDS (1888).
Fire Premiums £615,000
Life Premiums 203,000
Interest 149,000
Accumulated Funds £8,581,000

PHENIX FIRE OFFICE
LOMBARD STREET and CHARING CROSS, LONDON.—Established 1782.
Moderate Rates. Absolute Security.
Liberal Loss Settlements. Prompt payment of Claims.
W. C. MACDONALD } Joint Secretaries.
F. B. MACDONALD }
Losses paid over £17,000,000.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.
Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 22 PALL MALL, S.W.
Subscribed Capital, £1,200,000. Paid-up, £300,000. Total Invested Funds, over £1,600,000.
E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

THE BANK of SOUTH AUSTRALIA, Limited.
ESTABLISHED 1841.
PRINCIPAL BRANCHES, ADELAIDE and MELBOURNE.
CAPITAL, £800,000. RESERVE FUND, £100,000. RESERVE LIABILITY, £800,000.
LETTERS OF CREDIT and BILLS on demand are issued on the Bank's Branches and Agents throughout the Australian Colonies. Telegraphic transfers made. Bills negotiated and sent for collection. DEPOSITS received for fixed periods, at rates which can be ascertained on application.
31 Lombard Street, E.C. JAMES ANDERSON, General Manager.

THE FEDERAL BANK OF AUSTRALIA,
Limited.
JOINT BANKERS TO THE GOVERNMENT OF VICTORIA.
HEAD OFFICE—MELBOURNE, VICTORIA.
Branches in Victoria, New South Wales, and South Australia.
Authorised Capital, £2,000,000. Subscribed, £800,000.
PAID-UP CAPITAL, £400,000. RESERVE FUND, £90,000.
LONDON BRANCH, 18 KING WILLIAM STREET, E.C.
London Board of Directors.
Sir HENRY BARKLY, G.C.M.G., K.C.B.
Lieut.-General Sir ANDREW CLARKE, R.E., G.C.M.G., &c.
Hon. HOWARD SPENSLEY.
Banking business of every description connected with the Australian Colonies transacted.
FIXED DEPOSITS of £50 and upwards received for periods from SIX MONTHS to FIVE YEARS, and the highest rates of interest allowed.
18 King William Street, E.C. JOHN H. BUTT, Manager.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.
THREE per CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables; the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application.
FRANCIS RAVESCROFT, Manager.

First produced and designated CORN FLOUR
by BROWN & POLSON in 1856.

BROWN & POLSON'S
CORN FLOUR

Was in the Field some time before any other was anywhere heard of, and no other has now an Equal
Claim to the Public Confidence.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS'
UPRIGHT IRON GRAND PIANOFORTES.
Prices from 40 Guineas upwards.
JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Pianoforte Makers by Special Appointment to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, 1889.—18, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W. Lists free.

THE BEST NATURAL APERIENT.—

The Apollinaris Company, Limited, London, beg to announce that, as numerous Aperient Waters are offered to the public with marks, names, and designations very similar to those which are used for the HUNGARIAN APERIENT WATER so long imported by them, they have now adopted an additional Label of their own, comprising their REGISTERED TRADE MARK of SELECTION, which consists of

A RED DIAMOND.

This Label will henceforth also serve to distinguish the Hungarian Aperient Water sold by the Company from all other aperient waters.

DEMAND THE DIAMOND MARK.

Of all Druggists and Mineral Water Dealers.

CARDINAL AND HARFORD,

The oldest established Importers of

ORIENTAL

CARPETS.

THE LEVANT WAREHOUSE,

108 & 109 HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

Catalogues post free.

FOR THE DECORATION OF THE HOME
visit THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY'S Gallery,
74 New Oxford Street, W.C. A noble display of Copies of THE GREAT MASTERS, framed and unframed.

The Chef-d'œuvres of THE NATIONAL COLLECTIONS of London, Paris, Rome, Dresden,
St. Petersburg, Madrid, &c. &c.

Catalogue of 186 pages, Sixpence, post-free.
A descriptive Pamphlet free by post on application to

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY.

GOOD MORNING!

Have you used

PEARS' SOAP?

AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

Dr. PAGET,
SURGEON-DENTIST,
445 STRAND, W.C.
(Facing Charing Cross Station.)

ARTIFICIAL TEETH,
without plates. Perfect imitations
of the natural teeth. Artistic, painless, and perfect. Most moderate fees. Consultations free daily.
Illustrated pamphlet post free.

THE GREATEST of all PIANOFORTES.

THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES, New York & London.
Steinway Hall, LOWER SEYMOUR STREET, Portman Square, London, W.

BOOKS, &c.

H. SOTHERAN & CO.

BOOKSELLERS, BOOKBINDERS, AND PUBLISHERS.

GENERAL AGENTS FOR PRIVATE BOOKBUYERS & PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS
IN AMERICA, INDIA, THE COLONIES, AND FOREIGN PARTS.

A MONTHLY CATALOGUE of SECOND-HAND BOOKS, published over forty years; Specimen No. gratis and post-free.

Telegraphic Address: BOOKMEN, LONDON. Established 1816.

136 STRAND, W.C. AND 36 PICCADILLY, W.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW, No. CCCXXXVII.

will be published on WEDNESDAY, July 17.

CONTENTS:

1. CANADA: ITS DEVELOPMENT AND DESTINY.
2. SHAKSPEARE AND VENICE.
3. OLD AGE.
4. DIARY AND LETTERS OF GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.
5. VIRGIL.
6. THE AGE OF STEEL.
7. ANCIENT INDIA.
8. DUELLING.
9. 1789 AND 1889.
10. THE AMERICAN COMMONWEALTH AND ITS LESSONS.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street.

CONTENTS of No. LVI. JULY 1889. Price 6s.

THE CHURCH QUARTERLY REVIEW.

- | | |
|--|-------------------------------------|
| 1. THE HISTORY AND PHILOSOPHY OF LUXURY. | 7. LITURGICAL DEVELOPMENT IN INDIA. |
| 2. MYSTICISM IN THEOLOGY. | 8. SAVONAROLA. |
| 3. ANCIENT ROME. | 9. RECENT HYMNOLOGY. |
| 4. DÖLLINGER AND REUSCH ON THE JESUITS. | 10. LUCKOCK ON THE DIVINE LITURGY. |
| 5. MARK PATTISON. | 11. HUTTON'S ESSAYS. |
| 6. THE ORIGINS OF IRISH CHRISTIANITY. | SHORT NOTICES. |

SPOTTISWOODE & CO., NEW STREET SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

PALESTINE EXPLORATION FUND.

Now ready, with Supplement, 3s. 6d.

QUARTERLY STATEMENT for JULY 1889.

CONTENTS:

- NOTES AND NEWS.
HERR SCHICK ON RECENT DISCOVERIES NEAR THE CHURCH OF THE HOLY SEPULCHRE, and on Mount Scopus, &c.
MR. JAMES GLAISHER'S METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.
MAJOR CONDOR'S REPORT ON MANNERS AND CUSTOMS, and Notes on the Phenicians, Hittite Monuments, South Wall of Jerusalem, &c.
MR. GEORGE ST. CLAIR ON THE MOABITE STONE.
MRS. FINN ON ANTIOCH, AND THE ROCK FOUNDATION OF SOLOMON'S TEMPLE.
HERR SCHUMACHER'S REPORT AND MAP OF "ABILA OF THE DECAPOLIS." &c. &c. &c.
ALEXANDER P. WATT, 2 Paternoster Square, E.C.

Now ready, Part II., Vol. LII., JUNE 1889. Price 5s.

ROYAL STATISTICAL SOCIETY'S JOURNAL.

CONTENTS:

- THE ALLEGED DEPOPULATION OF THE RURAL DISTRICTS OF ENGLAND. By Dr. W. OGLE, M.A., F.R.C.P.
THE LAWS OF MIGRATION. By E. G. RAVENSTEIN, Esq., F.R.G.S.
MISCELLANEA: (1) France 1789-1889. An Economic Centenary. By A. NEYMARCK (a translation).—(2) German Literature in 1889.—(3) Emigration and Immigration in 1889.—(4) "Bunker" Coal Consumed.—(5) Notes on Economical and Statistical Works.—(6) List of Additions to the Library.
London: E. STANFORD, 25 and 27 Cockspur Street, Charing Cross, S.W.

STAMMERERS and STUTTERERS should read a book by a gentleman who cured himself after suffering nearly forty years.

Post free for 13 stamps, from
Mr. B. BRASLEY, Sherwood, Wilsden Lane, Brondesbury, London; or Green Bank House, Hall Green (near Birmingham).

Now ready, demy 8vo. cloth extra, gilt top, 25 full-page Illustrations, by the Author, 18s.

PIGSTICKING, or HOGHUNTING: a Complete Account for Sportsmen, and others. By Captain R. S. S. BADEN-POWELL, 13th Hussars; Assist. Milit. Sec., South Africa, Author of "Reconnaissance and Scouting," "Cavalry Instruction," &c. &c.

HARRISON & SONS, 59 Pall Mall, Booksellers to the Queen and H.R.H. the Prince of Wales.

THOUGHTS for ENTHUSIASTS at BAYREUTH. By the Honourable Mrs. BURRELL.

PART I. A Literary and Historical Guide to Bayreuth, tracing the Connection of the Hohenzollern Family with the Principality, containing the Tradition of their "White Lady" and Facsimiles of Old Prints, notably the original Plan of L'Ermitage, mentioned by the Margravine of Bayreuth in her celebrated Memoirs (II. 257), but never hitherto published with them. Imperial 8vo. vellum, only 100 copies, choicely printed in old style by C. Whittingham, on the best handmade Van Gelder Paper, each copy numbered, with numerous Facsimiles of Prints, &c. Price 21s. net.

PICKERING & CHATTO, 66 Haymarket, London, S.W.

Now ready, with Portrait and Map of the Stanley Route, price 2s. 6d.

ONE MAN'S POWER.

EMIN PASHA: his Life and Work in Equatorial Africa. By the Rev. HENRY W. LITTLE, Author of "Madagascar: its History and People."

London: J. S. VIRTUE & CO., LIMITED, 26 Ivy Lane, E.C.

This day, royal 8vo. cloth, 21s.

PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW.—Selected

Cases, Statutes, and Orders, illustrative of the Principles of Private International Law as administered in England, with a Commentary. By HORACE NELSON, M.A., B.C.L., Barrister-at-Law. 1889.

STEVENS & SONS, LIMITED, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON.

BOOKS.—A PENNY WEEKLY JOURNAL. Published every Thursday. Best medium for the Purchase and Sale of Second-hand Books. Weekly Prize Competitions.

88 Chancery Lane, W.C.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly, London. All the New and Standard Books. Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c. Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates per annum, paid in advance:

Any part of the United Kingdom	£1 8 2
India and China	1 12 6
Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America	1 10 6

STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

Full information on this subject may be found in the Publications of the MARRIAGE LAW DEFENCE UNION.

A List of PAMPHLETS (4d. each and upwards) will be sent free on application to the Secretary, G. J. MURRAY, Esq., 1 King Street, Westminster, S.W.

HURST & BLACKETT'S
NEW NOVELS.

A CROOKED PATH. By Mrs. ALEXANDER, Author of "The Wooing o't," "The Freres," &c. 3 vols.

A POOR GENTLEMAN. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of "It was a Lover and his Lass," "Agnes," &c. 3 vols.

HILARY ST. JOHN. By Mrs. A. PRICE, Author of "A Rustic Maid," "A Wilful Young Woman," &c. 2 vols.

WITH EVERYTHING AGAINST HER. By Colonel CUTHBERT LARKING, Author of "Bandobast and Khabar" &c. 3 vols.

IRIS DACRE. By ALICE MANGOLD DIEHL, Author of "The Garden of Eden" &c. 2 vols.

DEVERIL'S DIAMOND. By ADELINE SERGEANT, Author of "Jacobi's Wife," "No Saint," &c. 3 vols.

LONDON: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED,
13 GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET.

CHAPMAN & HALL'S NEW BOOKS.

A CENTURY OF REVOLUTION.

By W. S. LILLY,

Author of "Ancient Religion and Modern Thought."

Demy 8vo. 12s.

[This day.

REMINISCENCES of a REGICIDE. Edited from the original MSS. of SERGEANT MARCEAU, member of the Convention and Administrator of Police in the French Revolution of 1789. By M. C. M. SIMPSON, Author of "The Letters and Recollections of Julius and Mary Mohl." Demy 8vo. with Illustrations and Portraits, 14s.

LIFE and LETTERS of CHARLOTTE

ELIZABETH, Princess Palatine and Mother of Philippe d'Orléans, Regent of France, 1652-1722. Compiled, translated, and gathered from various Published and Unpublished Sources. Demy 8vo. with Portraits, 10s. 6d.

EGYPT UNDER ISMAIL: a Romance of History. By J. C. McCOAN. With Portrait and Appendix of Official Documents. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

[This day.

THE POLITICAL LIFE of OUR TIME.

By DAVID NICOL. 2 vols. demy 8vo. 24s.

"The author has read, he has thought, and he can write.....He writes with great good sense of the land-laws of the country.....He discusses intelligently the relations of labour and capital, of commerce and finance."—Saturday Review.

LONDON: CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED.

Lately published, 2 vols. demy 8vo. with Illustrations, 24s.

PASSAGES IN THE LIFE OF SIR LUCIAN ELPHIN,

OF CASTLE WEARY.

Edited by his SISTER.

"Realistic in the best sense of the term. There is also a touch of romance about the book that imparts to it a sensible charm."—Morning Post.

"On a far higher level than most of its peers succeed in reaching."—World.

"Clever, unusually well written, and of a tone as healthy as the streams and hedgerows it so well describes."—Dundee Courier.

"The personages are all clearly and firmly outlined and finished with an insight into human nature, a mastery of detail and an instinct for effect that no veteran novelist need be ashamed of."—Scottish Leader.

"A work of quite exceptional ability."—Liverpool Mercury.

EDINBURGH: DAVID DOUGLAS.

AND ALL BOOKSELLERS.

LONDON: HAMILTON, ADAMS, & CO.; SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, & CO.

PARIS EXHIBITION.—The FRENCH DICTIONARY

for TOURISTS—BELLOWS' POCKET FRENCH DICTIONARY. 32mo. with 4 Maps, roan tuck, 10s. 6d.; morocco, 12s. 6d.

"Complete."—Times. "Without a rival."—Spectator. "The most portable."—Scotsman.

TOUS les VERBES.—CONJUGATIONS of all the VERBS, French and English, with Tables of Weights, Measures and Equivalent Values, from Bellows' Dictionary. Second Edition. 32mo. 6d.

LONDON: TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL.
PARIS: ERNEST LEROUX, 28 RUE BONAPARTE.

AND ALL BOOKSELLERS.

TO BOOKBUYERS and LIBRARIANS of FREE LIBRARIES.—The JULY CATALOGUE of valuable NEW and SECOND-HAND WORKS, offered at prices greatly reduced, is now ready, and will be sent, post free, upon application to W. H. SMITH & SON, Library Department, 186 Strand, London, W.C.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON'S LIST.

Now ready at all Libraries.

"MEMORY'S HARKBACK."

THE RECOLLECTIONS OF
DR. GRETTON.

1 vol. demy 8vo. 12s.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "COUNTESS IRENE."

ROBERT LEEMAN'S DAUGHTERS.

By J. FOGERTY, Author of "Lauterdale," "Caterina," &c.

3 vols. crown 8vo.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "FASCINATION" &c.

PAST FORGIVENESS?

By Lady MARGARET MAJENDIE, Author of "Precautions" &c.

2 vols. crown 8vo.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "NELLIE'S MEMORIES."

THE SEARCH FOR
BASIL LYNTHURST.

By ROSA N. CAREY, Author of "Not Like other Girls" &c.

3 vols. crown 8vo.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY AT ALL LIBRARIES.

3 vols. crown 8vo.

MARIE CORELLI'S NEW ROMANCE.

ARDATH:

The Story of a Dead Self.

Wherein are described the Wonder and Terrors of Al-kyris, the Lost City Magnificent.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DUKE'S MARRIAGE."

PRINCE RODERICK.

By JAMES BRINSLEY RICHARDS,

Author of "Seven Years at Eton" &c.

3 vols. crown 8vo.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

BOOKS ABOUT THE COUNTRY.

Third Edition, tastefully printed in crown 8vo. and bound in cloth, gilt lettered, 5s.; or with gilt edges. 5s. 6d.

BY LEAFY WAYS: Brief Studies in the Book of Nature. By F. A. KNIGHT. With numerous beautiful Illustrations by E. T. Compton."One likes to fancy how Gilbert White would have welcomed Mr. Knight had they been contemporaries, and of the talks they would have had together. He would have found a man after his own heart—full of pleasant chat, deeply versed in all the latest literature, gifted with a brilliancy of expression such as the old author never aimed at, even supposing he could have attained it. The author leads us through all the varying year in a series of delightful chapters."—Academy.

Tastefully printed, crown 8vo. Illustrated, bound in cloth, gilt edges. 5s.

COMPANION VOLUME TO "NATURE'S FAIRY-LAND."

HAUNTS of NATURE. By H. W. S.

WORSLEY-BENISON, Fellow of the Linnean Society, Lecturer on Botany at Westminster Hospital Medical School. With numerous beautiful Illustrations by Charles Worsley."We are not surprised that the author of these pleasant and accurate descriptions of birds, flowers, and nature in her changeable moods should have been compared to Richard Jefferies, or that a man like Professor Dallinger should have seen in his work much of the spirit of the late Charles Kingsley."—Leeds Mercury.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "HAUNTS OF NATURE."

Third Edition, tastefully printed, crown 8vo. handsomely bound, with gilt edges, and Illustrated, 5s.

NATURE'S FAIRY-LAND; or, Rambles by Woodland, Meadow, Stream, and Shore.

"Those who are acquainted with the works of Charles Kingsley will need no better recommendation of this book than that it seems imbued with much of the spirit of that eminent observer of Nature. . . . We would urge all to obtain a copy of this attractive and pleasant volume with which to beguile their holiday hours at the seaside or among the mountains."
Professor DALLINGER, F.R.S., in The Wesleyan Naturalist.

Fcp. 4to. bound in cloth, each 7s. 6d.

THE FIRST AND SECOND SERIES OF

THE ANGLER'S NOTE-BOOK and NATU-
RALIST'S RECORD. By the late THOMAS SATCHEL, Author of "Bibliotheca Piscatoria."This work reproduces much old angling matter from scarce and little-known books, and chats pleasantly and sympathetically of woods, fields, and streams, teaching many rare lessons and furnishing much valuable information concerning angling and natural history, past and present, to those who love the country and its elevating influences. Much new and valuable bibliographical information is also contained in the volume.The Second Series can be had on hand-made paper, 12s. 6d. net; 12 Whatman Copies have been printed, 21s. net.

CHEAP EDITION NOW READY.

Handsome crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d., post free.

OUR FANCY PIGEONS, and RAMBLING

NOTES of a NATURALIST. A Record of Fifty Years' Experience in Breeding, and in Observation of Nature. By GEORGE URE, of Dundee."Not only will pigeon fanciers be glad to see this edition, but all lovers of folklore and students of natural history will miss a treat if they fail to secure a copy."—Dundee Advertiser.

Just published, handsome royal 4to. strongly bound, 17s. 6d.

THE SCOTTISH ART REVIEW. Vol. I.

LONDON: ELLIOT STOCK, 62 PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

NEW BOOK BY H. RIDER HAGGARD.

CLEOPATRA: being an Account of the Fall

and Vengeance of Harmachis, the Royal Egyptian, as set forth by his own hand. By H. RIDER HAGGARD. With 29 Full-page Illustrations by
M. Greiffenhagen and R. Caton Woodville. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.* * Fifty Large-Paper Copies have been printed on Dickinson's Fine Art Paper.
Price can be obtained through all Booksellers.

JUDGE LYNCH: a Tale of the California

Vineyards. By GEORGE H. JESSOP. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

BY THE WESTERN SEA: a Summer Idyl.

By JAMES BAKER, Author of "John Westacott" &c. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

NATURAL RELIGION. The Gifford Lectures

delivered before the University of Glasgow, in 1888. By F. MAX MÜLLER, K.M., Foreign Member of the French Institute. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

UNSPOKEN SERMONS. By GEORGE MAC-

DONALD, LL.D. Third Series. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

SWISS TRAVEL and SWISS GUIDE-

BOOKS. By W. A. B. COOLIDGE, Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, and
Editor of the "Alpine Journal." Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

STRENGTH: How to get Strong and keep

Strong, with Chapters on Rowing and Swimming, Fat, Age, and the Waist.
By RICHARD A. PROCTOR. With 9 Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 2s.

MAUNDERS' BIOGRAPHICAL TREA-

SURY. Edited by W. L. R. CATES. New Edition, with Supplement to 1888, by the Rev. JAMES WOOD, Edin. Fcp. 8vo. 6s.

The EDINBURGH REVIEW, No. 347,

will be published on July 15.

CONTENTS:

1. CHARLES, EARL GREY.
2. THE RAILWAYS OF ENGLAND.
3. VILLARI'S LIFE OF SAVONAROLA.
4. THE ROLL OF BATTLE ABBEY.
5. THE LAND OF MANFRED.
6. MARIA THERESA, EMPRESS.
7. THE DUKE OF COBURG'S MEMOIRS.
8. GARDINER'S HISTORY OF THE CIVIL WAR.
9. IMPERIAL FEDERATION.
10. THE HAMILTON MANUSCRIPTS.
11. HER MAJESTY'S OPPOSITION.

The ENGLISH HISTORICAL REVIEW.

Edited by the Rev. MANDELL CREIGHTON, M.A. LL.D.

No. 15, JULY. Royal 8vo. price 5s.

1. Articles.

CONTENTS:

- THE WAR OF 1870-1: AFTER SEDAN. By His Honour Judge WILLIAM O'CONNOR MORRIS.
- RECENT CRITICISM UPON THE LIFE OF SAVONAROLA. By E. ARMSTRONG.
- THE BATTLE OF TOWTON. (With a Plan.) By Prof. CYRIL RANSOME.
- THE LORDS OF CHIOS. By J. THEODORE BENT.
- THE REPUBLIC OF GERSAU. By the Rev. W. A. B. COOLIDGE.

2. Notes and Documents—The Introduction of English Law into Ireland: by Professor F. W. MAITLAND—Project for Taxation presented to Edward I.: by C. V. LANGLOIS—Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper and the Relief of Taunton: by Samuel R. GARDINER, LL.D.—Cromwell and the Insurrection of 1655, Part III.: by C. H. FIRTH—The Plunket Manuscripts: by Miss Mary Hickson—Letters of the Rev. William Ayerst, 1706-1721 (concluded): Edited by C. E. DOBLE.

3. Reviews of Books.

4. List of Historical Books recently published.

5. Contents of Periodical Publications.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.

Ready at all Booksellers' and Libraries.

"THE STORY OF THE NATIONS."—Vol. 20.

THE HANSA TOWNS. By HELEN ZIMMERN. Large
crown 8vo. with Maps and Illustrations, cloth, 5s. Presentation Edition, gilt edges, 5s. 6d.

Will be published on July 22, crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

FROUDACITY: West Indian Fables by Mr. FROUDE, explained by J. J. THOMAS, Author of "The Creole Grammar."NOW READY, THE FIFTH VOLUME OF "UNWIN'S NOVEL SERIES."ISAAC ELLER'S MONEY. By Mrs. ANDREW DEAN.
Small crown 8vo. cloth, 2s."A bright, interesting, and clever story."—Scotsman."A worthy addition to a notable collection."—Manchester Examiner."Good reading, cheap in price, and handy in size, 'Unwin's Novel Series' is admirable for the holidays."—Nonconformist.

LONDON: T. FISHER UNWIN, 26 PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

MESSRS. WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS' PUBLICATIONS.

NEW BOOKS.

BY SIR THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

THE SONG of the BELL; and other Translations from Schiller, Goethe, Uhland, and Others. By Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

BY THE LADY MIDDLETON.

THE STORY of ALASTAIR BHAN COMYN; or, the Tragedy of Dunphail. A Tale of Tradition and Romance. By The Lady MIDDLETON. Square 8vo. 10s.

BY T. T. STODDART.

ANGLING SONGS. By THOMAS TOD STODDART. New Edition. With a Memoir by ANNA M. STODDART. Crown 8vo. with Portrait, 7s. 6d. [This day.]

BY LADY STAFFORD.

HOW I SPENT MY TWENTIETH YEAR; being a Short Record of a Tour Round the World, 1886-87. By the Marchioness of STAFFORD. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. with Illustrations, price 8s. 6d.

TWO NEW NOVELS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "AUT DIABOLUS AUT NIHIL."

LITTLE HAND and MUCKLE GOLD: a Study of To-day. By X. L., Author of "Aut Diabolus aut Nihil." 3 vols. post 8vo. 25s. 6d.

II

BY MRS. COMYNS CARR.

MARGARET MALIPHANT. A Novel. By Mrs. COMYNS CARR. Author of "La Fortunina," "North Italian Folk," &c. 3 vols. post 8vo. 25s. 6d.

BOOKS FOR SUMMER READING.

GEORGE ELIOT'S NOVELS. Cheap Editions.

Crown 8vo. with Illustrations.

ADAM BEDE.....	3s. 6d.	SILAS MARNER	2s. 6d.
THE MILL ON THE FLOSS	3s. 6d.	ROMOLA	3s. 6d.
FELIX HOLT, THE RADICAL	3s. 6d.	DANIEL DERONDA	7s. 6d.
SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE	3s.	MIDDLEMARCH	7s. 6d.

GEORGE ELIOT'S LIFE. Cheap Edition.

Crown 8vo. with Portrait and other Illustrations, 7s. 6d.

WISE, WITTY, and TENDER SAYINGS, in Prose and Verse. Selected from the Works of GEORGE ELIOT. Sixth Edition. Fcp. 8vo. cloth gilt, 6s.

SARACINESCA. By F. MARION CRAWFORD. Fourth Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE MAID of SKER. By R. D. BLACKMORE. New Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

EPISODES in a LIFE of ADVENTURE. By LAURENCE OLIPHANT. Fifth Edition. Post 8vo. 6s.

ALTIORA PETO. By the same Author. Eighth Edition. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 6s. Cheap Edition, in boards, 2s. 6d.

PICCADILLY. By the same Author. Cheap Edition. Illustrated boards, 2s. 6d.

FOUR BIOGRAPHIES from "BLACKWOOD." JANE TAYLOR—HANNAH MORE—ELIZABETH FRY—MARY SOMERVILLE. By L. B. WALFORD. Crown 8vo. 5s.

A STIFF-NECKED GENERATION. By the same Author. Crown 8vo. 6s.

REATA: What's in a Name? By E. D. GERARD. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

BEGGAR MY NEIGHBOUR. By the same Author. New Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE WATERS of HERCULES. By the same Author. New Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

ELIZABETH, and other SKETCHES. By the Author of "Miss Molly." Crown 8vo. 6s.

MISS MOLLY. By BEATRICE MAY BUTT. Cheap Edition. Boards, 2s.

MY TRIVIAL LIFE and MISFORTUNE. By "A PLAIN WOMAN." New Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

POOR NELLIE. By the same Author. New Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

DOUBLES and QUILTS. By L. W. M. LOCKHART. Fourth Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

FAIR TO SEE. By the same Author. Ninth Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

MINE IS THINE. By the same Author. Eighth Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

HURRISH: a Study. By the Hon. EMILY LAWLESS. Fourth Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

MR. MURRAY'S LIST.

ENGLISH HANDBOOKS.

LONDON AS IT IS. Maps and Plans. 16mo. 3s. 6d.

ENVIRONS of LONDON, including a Circuit of 20 Miles round the Metropolis. Two Parts. 21s.

ENGLAND and WALES. Arranged Alphabetically. Map. [New Edition nearly ready.]

EASTERN COUNTIES—Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridge-shire, and Essex. Map and Plans. Post 8vo. 12s.

KENT. Map and Plans. Post 8vo. 7s. 6d.

SUSSEX. Map and Plan. Post 8vo. 6s.

SURREY, HANTS, and the ISLE of WIGHT. Maps and Plans. Post 8vo. 10s.

BERKS, BUCKS, and OXON. Map and Plans. Post 8vo. 9s.

WILTS, DORSET, and SOMERSET. Map. Post 8vo. 12s.

DEVON. Maps and Plans. 7s. 6d.

CORNWALL. Maps. Post 8vo. 6s.

GLOUCESTER, HEREFORD, and WORCESTER. Map and Plans. Post 8vo. 9s.

NORTH WALES. Map. Post 8vo. 7s.

SOUTH WALES. Map. Post 8vo. 7s.

NORTHAMPTONSHIRE and RUTLAND. Maps. Post 8vo. 7s. 6d.

DERBY, NOTTS, LEICESTER, and STAFFORD. Map. Post 8vo. 9s.

SHROPSHIRE and CHESHIRE. Maps and Plans. Post 8vo. 6s.

LANCASHIRE. Maps and Plans. 7s. 6d.

YORKSHIRE. Map and Plans. 12s.

DURHAM and NORTHUMBERLAND. Map. Post 8vo. 9s.

THE LAKES, WESTMORELAND, CUMBERLAND, &c. A New and thoroughly Revised Edition. With Maps. Post 8vo. [Nearly ready.]

SCOTLAND. Maps and Plans. 9s.

IRELAND. Maps and Plans. 10s.

ENGLISH CATHEDRALS.

With 420 Illustrations. Crown 8vo.

NORTHERN DIVISION. 2 vols. 21s.

SOUTHERN DIVISION. 2 vols. 36s.

EASTERN DIVISION. 21s.

WESTERN DIVISION. 16s.

WELSH. 15s.

ST. PAUL'S. 10s. 6d.

ST. ALBANS. 6s.

COMPANIONS TO THE HANDBOOKS.

THE RAILWAYS of ENGLAND. By W. M. ACWORTH. Second Edition. With 56 Illustrations. 8vo. 14s.

FIELD PATHS and GREEN LANES; or, Country Walks in Surrey and Sussex. By LOUIS J. JENNINGS, M.P., Editor of the "Croker Papers." Fourth and Cheaper Edition, with Illustrations. Post 8vo. 6s.

WILD WALES: its People, Language, and Scenery. By GEORGE BORROW. Post 8vo. 2s. 6d.

THE WILD SPORTS and NATURAL HISTORY of the HIGHLANDS of SCOTLAND. By CHARLES ST. JOHN. A New Edition. Beautifully Illustrated with 70 Woodcuts. Crown 8vo. 15s.; or Cheap Edition, without Illustrations, post 8vo. 3s. 6d.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.'S LIST.

1 vol. royal 8vo. handsomely bound, 25s.

THE ALPS. By Professor F. UMLAUT, Ph.D.

With 31 Full-page Plates, 80 smaller Wood Engravings in Text, a General and Geological Map of the entire range of the Alps.

"Unquestionably the most useful and reliable guide to the entire range of the Alps that has yet been published."—Morning Post."No writer has made a more complete and more systematic study of the Alps than Professor Umlaut. The English translation omits no essential part of the original work; it deals not only with the topography of the entire range, but gives a clear account of the leading features, scientific, historical, and ethnological."—St. James's Gazette.

Crown 8vo. with 3 Maps, 5s.

CELTIC IRELAND. By SOPHIE BRYANT,

D.Sc., Author of "Educational Ends."

"Mrs. Bryant's chapters upon the influence exerted by Irish thought and learning, arms, and arts upon the neighbouring island and upon Europe in the early centuries of our era, her account of the laws and state of society in Pagan and Christian Ireland, and of the political institutions and arts of Erin in its palmy days, are deeply interesting."—Scotsman."No reader will rise from the perusal of the volume without the pleasurable feeling that he has been both instructed and delighted."—Manchester Guardian.

Demy 8vo. 5s.

IRELAND: its Health Resorts and Watering-

Places. By D. EDGAR FLINN, F.R.C.S. With Maps, showing Distribution of Temperature and Rainfall throughout Ireland.

"Mr. Flinn's book will be a revelation to many, and we hope it may be the means of making Ireland's resources in this direction better known. The book contains much information about numerous seaside places, as well as inland, and mineral-water health resorts. There are useful, instructive chapters on the Irish people, the general aspects of the climate of Ireland, and mineral waters and their uses."—Times."English people, for the most part, know little of the charming seaside places and inland mineral springs described in this book. Mr. Flinn's book may well incite readers to go further afield in search of health on the Irish coast. He offers much valuable assistance to invalid and tourist alike."—Saturday Review.

Square 8vo. 6s.

THE HISTORY of a SLAVE. By H. H.

JOHNSTON, F.R.G.S., F.Z.S., &c., Author of "The Kilimanjaro Expedition" &c. With 47 Full-Page Illustrations, engraved Facsimile from the Author's Drawings.

"The volume has a distinct value to serious students of African life and manners. It is the story of a slave told by himself—a man born somewhere about the Niger region half a century ago, who has gone through many vicissitudes since. The poor fellow tells his story in a simple, natural style, and Mr. Johnston has been very successful in keeping up the delusion. Altogether the book is well worth reading."—Times.

THE WAGNER FESTIVAL AT BAYREUTH.

PARSIFAL: a Festival Play by RICHARD

WAGNER. A Study by ALFRED GURNEY, M.A., Vicar of St. Barnabas', Pimlico. Fcp. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Crown 8vo. 5s.

JACOB'S LETTER; and other Stories. By

ROWLAND GREY, Author of "By Virtue of his Office," "Lindenblumen," &c.

"The author's charms of style and of sentiment give distinction to the simplest sketch. Delicate workmanship is the attribute common to all these graceful stories. The unconscious influence of children is illustrated with rare sympathy and admirable art in 'King Philip'; indeed, we know of no treatment of this attractive yet difficult theme so successful, from the artistic point of view, as this exquisite little story."—Saturday Review.

BY THE LATE ELLA BAKER.

BERTRAM DE DRUMONT: a Thirteenth

Century Romance. 5s.

"We are not sure that any English writer since Scott has revealed a greater faculty than Miss Baker displayed in this book of giving life and verisimilitude to the incidents and personages of a remote age."—Scottish Leader.

KINGSCOTE STORIES. 5s.

"The stories are simple, realistic, and bright."—Morning Post.

KINGSCOTE ESSAYS and POEMS. 2s. 6d.

"The subjects are treated with originality and from an exceptional point of view."—John Bull.

A PRIMROSE LEAGUE HANDBOOK.

A MANUAL of POLITICS. In Three Chapters, with Footnotes and Appendices. By FREDERICK GEORGE LEE. Small crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

BI-METALLISM.

THE ECONOMIC CRISIS. By MORETON

FREWEN, B.A., Trinity College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

"An interesting book on some highly important questions."—Morning Post."A plain, useful contribution to the discussion of a most urgent and important question."—Daily Telegraph."So brightly written as to be of interest to the general public."—Saturday Review."Perhaps one of the strongest, certainly one of the most popular, of all recent appeals in behalf of bi-metallism."—Scotsman.

New and Enlarged Edition.

UNFOLDINGS of CHRISTIAN HOPE. By

CHARLES B. WALLER, M.A., Vicar of Woodford Bridge, Essex. Crown 8vo. price 3s. 6d.

"Those interested in the much-discussed questions of eschatology will find much to interest them in this volume."—Manchester Examiner."This book may be commended as an interesting contribution to the study of these great questions."—Scottish Leader."A scholarly essay."—Liverpool Post.

Vol. I. demy 8vo. 16s.

THE BIBLE TRUE from the BEGINNING.

By EDWARD GOUGH, B.A. (Lond.), Congregational Minister, Barrowford.

"It is a work of extensive learning, of great thoroughness, of considerable argumentative power, of luminous exposition, and of voluminous compass."—Scotsman."Its matter is so full of suggestion, so provocative of far reaching speculation, that, in spite of the impossibility of accepting many of the conclusions set forth, the attention is engrossed from the first page to the last. The volume may be regarded as a quarry of valuable materials for the use of the Biblical student."—Glasgow Herald."The work is a distinct and valuable contribution to eschatology."—Christian World.

GERALD MASSEY'S POEMS NOW IN PRINT.

Two Series, 5s. each, pp. 380 and 424.

MY LYRICAL LIFE: Poems Old and New.

By GERALD MASSEY.

"I rejoice in acknowledging my own debt of gratitude to you for many an encouraging and noble thought, and expression of thought, and my conviction that your poems in the mass have been a helpful and precious gift to the working classes (I use the term in its widest and highest sense) of the country. Few national services can be greater than that which you have rendered."—JOHN RUSKIN.

Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

VERSE MUSINGS on NATURE, FAITH, and FREEDOM. By JOHN OWEN, Author of "Evenings with the Skeptics," and Editor of Glanville's "Scepis Scientifica."

Small crown 8vo. 5s.

DIVINE PHILOSOPHY. A Poem. By

JOHN WADDIE.

"There can be small question that in 'Divine Philosophy' we have a powerfully conceived and nobly expressed poem."—Graphic.

Small crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

GLANLUA; and other Poems. By WILLIAM

LARMINE.

"Tradition, myth, and the old-world picturesque are the materials Mr. Larmine has used, and he has turned them to excellent account. His verse is strong, fluent, and imaginative."—Academy.

LONDON: 1 PATERNOSTER SQUARE.

MESSRS. WHITTAKER'S LIST.

Demy 8vo. with numerous Maps, Plans, &c., 14s.

MOROCCO: Journeys to the Kingdom of Fez and to the Court of Mulai Hassan. With Itineraries constructed by the Author, and a Bibliography of Morocco from 1844 to 1887. By H. M. P. DE LA MARTINIÈRE, F.R.G.S., Member of the Geographical Society of Paris, and of the Topographical Society of France. With a Preface by Lieutenant-Colonel TROTTER, 93rd Highlanders.

"A remarkable book on that partially explored north-west corner of Africa which still exhibits all the phenomena of low barbaric government. . . . We cannot part from the book without once more drawing attention to its admirable route maps and plans of cities, and the useful list of published works, maps, and charts at the end of the volume."—Spectator."He had exceptional opportunities of making himself acquainted with the facts of social life in Morocco; and in a simple, graphic, and clever narrative he describes exactly what he saw."—Nature.

Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

THE WORKING and MANAGEMENT of an ENGLISH RAILWAY. By GEORGE FINDLAY, Lieut.-Col. Engineer and Railway Volunteer Staff Corps, Assoc. Inst. C.E., General Manager of the London and North-Western Railway. With numerous Illustrations.

"Mr. Findlay's book displays so much knowledge and ability that it well deserves to rank as a standard work on the subject."—Nature."A very interesting work throughout. . . . To all railway shareholders we commend the chapter upon 'Management.'"—Railway Engineer."Mr. Findlay has provided a lucid account of the methods by which the vast system of communications is maintained in England."—Morning Post.

Cloth, gilt-top, 10s. 6d.

DOD'S PEERAGE, BARONETAGE, and

KNIGHTAGE of GREAT BRITAIN and IRELAND, including all the Titled Classes, for 1889.

This differs from all other Peerages in—I. Its low price. II. Its enlarged contents. III. Its facility of reference.

"As carefully and as conscientiously edited as ever."—Times."The great merit of the work lies in its brevity, and in the mass of information it provides."—Morning Post.

NEW VOLUMES OF THE SPECIALISTS' SERIES.

HYDRAULIC MOTORS: Turbines and

Pressure Engines. For the Use of Engineers, Manufacturers, and Students. By G. R. BODMER, A.M. Inst. C.E. With numerous Illustrations, 14s.

ALTERNATING CURRENTS of ELEC-

TRICITY. By THOMAS H. BLAKESLEY, M.A., M. Inst. C.E. Second Edition, Enlarged, 4s. 6d.

"It is written with great clearness and compactness of statement, and well maintains the character of the series of books with which it is now associated."—Electrician.

* * * A COMPLETE CATALOGUE of Messrs. WHITTAKER'S Publications sent free to applicants.

LONDON: WHITTAKER & CO., PATERNOSTER SQUARE.

MESSRS. BELL'S NEW BOOKS.

Ready, fcp. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

NAMES and SYNONYMS of BRITISH

PLANTS. Collating the Nomenclature of the London Catalogue, English Botany, Babington's Manual, Bentham's Flora, and Hooker's Student's Flora. With an Appendix giving other Names and their Synonyms; and a List of Authorities for Plant Names. By the Rev. G. EGERTON WARBURTON.

(Uniform with Mr. Hayward's Botanist's Pocket Book.)

NEW VOLUME OF PREBENDARY SADLER'S CHURCH COMMENTARY.

THE EPISTLES of ST. PAUL to the GALATIANS, EPHESIANS, and PHILIPPIANS. With Notes Critical and Practical. By the Rev. M. F. SADLER, Rector of Honiton, and Prebendary of Wells. With Three Excursuses: I. The present application of the teaching of this Epistle (Galatians)—II. Christian Liberty—III. Faith and the Faith. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Fourth Edition, Revised and Enlarged, demy 8vo. 10s. 6d.

DICTIONARY of the FRENCH and ENG-LISH LANGUAGES, with more than Fifteen Thousand New Words, Senses, &c. By F. E. A. GASC. With 40 pp. of New Supplements.

The Fourth Edition differs widely from its predecessors; the improvements and additions embodied in the work exceed in importance and number those of the second and third together; as a notable feature the spelling of some more words is modernized according to the best usage; and the Supplements, further enlarged, are recast for the third time.

GASC'S POCKET FRENCH DICTIONARY

(FR.-ENG., ENG.-FR.) Forty-fifth Thousand, 2s. 6d.

GASC'S ABC TOURISTS' FRENCH BOOK.

Cloth, 1s.

ARITHMETIC. With 8,000 Examples. By

CHARLES PENDLEBURY, M.A., F.R.A.S., Senior Mathematical Master of St. Paul's School. Third Edition, Revised and Stereotyped. With and without Answers. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.; Two Parts, 2s. 6d. each.

[Cambridge Mathematical Series.]

The EXAMPLES (without Answers) can also be had in a separate volume, 3s.

In use at the under-mentioned Schools:—St. Paul's, Winchester, Charterhouse, Christ's Hospital, Merchant Taylors, &c. &c.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

CLARENDON PRESS NEW AND STANDARD BOOKS.

NEW AND RECENT BOOKS.

THE OXFORD EDITION OF THE VULGATE NEW TESTAMENT.

Just published, 4to. stiff cover, 12s. 6d.

NOUUM TESTAMENTUM DOMINI NOSTRI IESU CHRISTI

LATINE Secundum Editionem Sancti Hieronymi ad Codicum Manuscriptorum Fidem Recensuit IOHANNES WOODSWORTH, S.T.P. Episcopus Sarisburiensis, in Operis Societatem Adsumto HENRICO IULIANO WHITE, A.M. Societatis S. Andreae Collegii Theologici Sarisburiensis Vice-Principali; Partis Prioris Fasciculus Primus Evangelium Secundum Mattheum.

* * A Critical Edition of S. Jerome's Revision of the Latin Testament has long been required. The present work was begun in 1877, and is based upon the accurate collation of representative Manuscripts, covering the most important groups of authorities which are at present distinguishable. Much attention has also been given to the ante-Hieronymian versions, as well as to the printed Vulgate Texts and to the labours of such scholars as Erasmus, Robert Stephens, Sabatier, and especially Richard Bentley. What the last-named intended to perform for the Græco-Latin text is here done, for the first time, for the Latin. Without claiming finality for the text of which the first fasciculus is now published, the editors believe that it is far more correct than any that has yet seen the light, and that the material here collected will be a necessary help to any future inquiry in this field.

A NEW GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON.

Just published, small 4to. cloth, 12s. 6d.

An INTERMEDIATE GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON. Founded upon the Seventh Edition of "Liddell & Scott's Greek-English Lexicon."

This Abridgment of the Oxford Greek Lexicon has been undertaken in compliance with wishes expressed by several experienced School Masters. It is an entirely new work, and it is hoped that it will meet their requirements. It differs from the old Abridgment, in that, 1st, It is made from the last Edition (1883) of the large Lexicon.

2ndly, The matter contained in it is greatly increased. This increase has been caused by giving fuller explanations of the words, by inserting the irregular forms of Moods and Tenses more fully, by citing the leading Authorities for the different usages, and adding characteristic phrases. Generally speaking, words used only by late writers and scientific terms have been omitted. But from Homer downwards, to the close of Classical Attic Greek, care has been taken to insert all words. Besides these, will be found words used by Aristotle in his moral and political treatises, by Polybius and Strabo in the books generally read by students, by Plutarch in his Lives, by Lucian, by the Poets of the Anthology, and by the writers of the New Testament.—From the PREFACE.

A VOLUME OF SELECTIONS FROM CLARENDON.

Just published, crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d.

CHARACTERS and EPISODES of the GREAT REBELLION. Selected from the History and Autobiography of Edward, Earl of Clarendon, and Edited, with Short Notes, by the Very Rev. G. D. BOYLE, M.A., Dean of Salisbury.

* * Uniform with the "Wit and Wisdom of Dr. Johnson," by Dr. Birkbeck Hill.

NEW EDITION OF MR. ELLIS'S "CATULLUS."

Just published, Second Edition. Revised and Enlarged, 8vo. cloth, 18s.

A COMMENTARY on CATULLUS.

By ROBINSON ELLIS, M.A., LL.D., Fellow of Trinity Coll., Oxford, and University Reader in Latin Literature.

Just published, small 4to. cloth, gilt top, 21s.

CHRONICON GALFRIDI le BAKER de SWYNEBROKE. Edited, with Notes, by E. MAUNDE THOMPSON, LL.D., F.S.A., Principal Librarian of the British Museum. With a facsimile of a folio of the MS., a Map of the Raid of the Black Prince, and a Plan of the Battle of Poitiers.

FOR LONDON UNIVERSITY B.A. EXAMINATION, 1890.

Just published, crown 8vo. paper boards, 3s.

TWO of the SAXON CHRONICLES

PARALLEL (787-1001 A.D.), with Supplementary Extracts from the others. A Revised Text, Edited, with Introduction, &c., on the basis of Professor Earle's Edition, by C. PLUMMER, M.A., Fellow of Corpus Christi College, Oxford.

NEW EDITION OF CLARENDON'S "HISTORY OF THE REBELLION."

6 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, £2 5s.

CLARENDON'S (EDWARD, EARL of)

HISTORY of the REBELLION and CIVIL WARS in ENGLAND. Re-edited from a fresh collation of the original MS. in the Bodleian Library, with Marginal Dates and Occasional Notes, by W. DUNN MACRAY, M.A., F.S.A.

4to. cloth, 30s.

FOSSILS of the BRITISH ISLANDS, Stratigraphically arranged. Part I.—PALÆOZOIC, Cambrian and Silurian Species. By ROBERT ETHERIDGE, F.R.S.

BOOKS for the OXFORD LOCAL EXAMINATIONS, 1890.

CÆSAR.—DE BELLO GALlico.

BOOKS III.—V. (For Schools). With Notes and Maps. By CHARLES E. MOBERLY, M.A., late Assistant Master at Rugby School. Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

"Stands high among the best classics we have met." Saturday Review.

XENOPHON.—HELLENICA. BOOKS

I. and II. With Introduction and Notes by G. E. USHER-HILL, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Magdalen College, Oxford. Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 3s.

"It is long since we have seen a more thorough piece of work. The notes are clear and to the point." Academy.

EURIPIDES.—MEDEA. With Introduction and Notes by C. B. HEBERDEN, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Brasenose College, Oxford. Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s.

"Will be found useful. The notes are practical and to the point." Spectator.

"All that an edition of this play should be." Oxford Magazine.

LIVY.—BOOK XXI. With Introduction and Notes by M. T. TATHAM, M.A., Balliol College, Oxford, Assistant Master at Westminster School. Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

"A thoroughly good school-book." Saturday Review.
"The book contains a vast quantity of good work, and we can heartily recommend it." Journal of Education.

NEW WORK BY PROFESSOR NETTLESHIP.

Just published, 8vo. cloth, 21s.

CONTRIBUTIONS to LATIN LEXICOGRAPHY. By HENRY NETTLESHIP, M.A., Professor of Latin in the University of Oxford.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED.

Just published, Third Edition, crown 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.

A SHORT HISTORY of FRENCH LITERATURE. By G. SAINTSBURY, M.A.

"It is in many ways a masterpiece." Athenæum.

NEW VOLUME OF THE TRANSLATIONS OF FOREIGN BIOLOGICAL MEMOIRS.

Just published, 8vo. cloth, 16s.

ESSAYS upon HEREDITY and KIN-DRED BIOLOGICAL PROBLEMS. By Dr. AUGUST WEISMANN, of the University of Freiburg. Authorised Translation. Edited by E. B. POULTON, M.A., F.L.S., Tutor of Keble College, Oxford, SELMAR SCHONLAND, Ph.D., and A. E. SHIPLEY, M.A., F.L.S., Fellow and Lecturer of Christ's College, Cambridge.

* * Uniform with "Memoirs on the Physiology of Nerve, Muscle, and of the Electrical Organ," Edited by Professor J. Burdon-Sanderson.

NEW EDITION OF MERRY'S ARISTOPHANES' "CLOUDS."

Just published, Third Edition, extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 3s.

ARISTOPHANES.—CLOUDS. Edited, with English Notes, Introductions, &c., by W. W. MERRY, D.D., Editor of "Homer's Odyssey" &c.

* * A Volume of the Clarendon Press Series of Aristophanes' Plays.

NEW EDITION OF LOTZE'S "LOGIC."

Second Edition, 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 12s.

LOTZE'S LOGIC. In Three Books: of THOUGHT, of INVESTIGATION, and of KNOWLEDGE. English Translation. Edited by B. BOSANQUET, M.A., Fellow of University College, Oxford.

NEW EDITION OF HUME'S TREATISE ON HUMAN NATURE.

Crown 8vo. cloth, 9s.

A TREATISE on HUMAN NATURE.

By DAVID HUME. Reprinted from the Original Edition in Three Volumes, and Edited by L. A. SELBY-BIGGE, M.A., Fellow and Lecturer of University College.

PLATO.—The APOLOGY. Edited, with

Notes and Introduction, for the Use of Schools, by ST. GEORGE STOCK, M.A., Pembroke College, Oxford; Editor of "Plato: Meno." Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth limp, 2s. 6d.

"A better edition could not be placed in the hands of the student." Schoolmaster.

A CLASS-BOOK of ELEMENTARY CHEMISTRY. By W. W. FISHER, M.A., Demonstrator of Chemistry in the University of Oxford. Crown 8vo. cloth, 4s. 6d.

"The book is of sterling value." Nature.

EUCLID REVISED. Containing the Essentials of the Elements of Plane Geometry as given by Euclid in his first Six Books. Edited by R. C. J. NIXON, M.A., Mathematical Master, Royal Academical Institution, Belfast. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

Sold in Parts, as follows:—Book I., 1s. Books I. and II., 1s. 6d. Books I.—IV., 3s. Books V. and VI., 3s.

"We heartily recommend the book to the attention of schoolmasters." Journal of Education.

BOOK-KEEPING. By Sir R. G. C. HAMILTON, K.C.B., and JOHN BALL, Co-Examiners in Book-keeping for the Society of Arts. New and Enlarged Edition. Limp, 2s.

Ruled Exercise Books adapted to the above may be had, price 2s.

* * * Specially selected by the Commissioners of National Education, Ireland.

SHAKESPEARE.—KING HENRY the FIFTH. Edited by G. W. ALDIS WRIGHT, M.A., D.C.L. Extra fcp. 8vo. stiff covers, 2s.

STANDARD BOOKS FOR PRIZES.

THE OXFORD EDITION OF BOSWELL'S

JOHNSON.

BOSWELL'S LIFE of SAMUEL

JOHNSON, LL.D., and JOURNAL of a TOUR to the HEBRIDES. Edited, with Notes, &c., by G. BIRKBECK HILL, D.C.L. 6 vols. medium 8vo. leather back, cloth sides, with Illustrations, £3 3s.

"An edition which, for splendour, accuracy, and completeness, excels that of any other English classic." Westminster Review.

A HANDSOME GIFT-BOOK.

THE WIT and WISDOM of SAMUEL

JOHNSON. Selected and Arranged by G. BIRKBECK HILL, D.C.L., Editor of the Oxford Edition of "Boswell's Life of Johnson." Tastefully printed in crown 8vo. cloth elegant, gilt top, 7s. 6d.

"An extremely interesting book." Globe.

AN INTRODUCTION to GREEK

SCULPTURE. By L. E. UPcott, M.A., late Scholar of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, Assistant-Master in Marlborough College. Crown 8vo. cloth, 4s. 6d.

"A very excellent epitome of the subject." Saturday Review.

NEW EDITION OF HOOKER'S WORKS, REVISED BY DEAN CHURCH and PROFESSOR PAGET.

THE WORKS of that LEARNED and JUDICIOUS DIVINE, MR. RICHARD HOOKER. With an Account of his Life and Death by ISAAC WALTON. Arranged by the Rev. JOHN KEBLE, M.A. Seventh Edition. Revised by the Very Rev. R. W. CHURCH, D.C.L., Dean of St. Paul's, and the Rev. F. PAGET, D.D., Regius Professor of Pastoral Theology, Oxford. 3 vols. 8vo. cloth, 36s.

"It ought to be on the shelves of every clergyman's library, and ought not to remain there." Church Quarterly Review.

CONCISE ETYMOLOGICAL DIC-

TIONARY of the ENGLISH LANGUAGE. By W. W. SKERT, M.A. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 5s. 6d.

"Mr. Skeat's larger dictionary has established his title to the gratitude of all scholars; and of his smaller dictionary we can only say that it is not less useful and valuable." Saturday Review.

LOGIC; or, the Morphology of Knowledge. By B. BOSANQUET, M.A., late Fellow of University College, Oxford. 2 vols. 8vo. cloth, 21s.

"This book is very much the most important philosophical work that has been published in the English language since Lewes's 'Problems of Life and Mind,' and in saying this I do not overlook Jevons's 'Principles of Science' or Green's 'Prolegomena to Ethics.'" Academy.

THE LAW and CUSTOM of the CON-

STITUTION: a Statement of the Law relating to the Existing Legislative and Executive Institutions of this Country, with Historical Explanations. By Sir W. R. ANSON, Bart., D.C.L., Warden of All Souls' College, Oxford.

Vol. I. PARLIAMENT. 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.

Vol. II. THE EXECUTIVE, to follow.

"An excellent exposition of a very difficult subject. To students the work will be invaluable." Times.

THE ELEMENTS of JURISPRU-

DENCE. By T. E. HOLLAND, D.C.L., Professor of International Law, Oxford. Fourth Edition, demy 8vo. 6s. 6d.

"Decidedly the best text-book we have seen on the subject." American Law Review.

A HISTORY of ENGLAND, principally in the Seventeenth Century. By LEOPOLD VON RANKE. Translated by Resident Members of the University of Oxford, under the superintendence of G. W. KITCHIN, D.D., and C. W. BOASE, M.A. 6 vols. 8vo. cloth, £3 3s.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY of ENGLAND, in its Origin and Development. By WILLIAM STUBBS, D.D., Lord Bishop of Oxford, late Regius Professor of Modern History, Oxford. Library Edition. 3 vols. demy 8vo. £2 8s.

Also in 3 vols. crown 8vo. each 12s.

SEVENTEEN LECTURES on the STUDY of MEDIEVAL and MODERN HISTORY and KINDRED SUBJECTS. By WILLIAM STUBBS, D.D., Bishop of Oxford, late Regius Professor of Modern History, Oxford. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. cloth, price 8s. 6d.

"Of altogether exceptional value." Times.

THE STANDARD HISTORY of GERMAN LITERATURE.

A HISTORY of GERMAN LITERATURE.

By W. SCHERER. Translated from the Third German Edition by Mrs. F. C. CONYBEARE. Edited by F. MAX MÜLLER, M.A. 2 vols. 8vo. cloth, 21s.

"The best introduction to the study of German literature available in our language. It is systematic, comprehensive, catholic, and modern." Pall Mall Gazette.

MR. NEWMAN'S EDITION of the "POLITICS."

THE POLITICS of ARISTOTLE.

Edited, with Introductory Essays and English Notes, by W. L. NEWMAN, M.A., Fellow of Balliol College, late Reader in Ancient History, Oxford. Vols. I. and II. 28s.

"A work of the first magnitude of its kind. May prove the definitive edition for a long while to come." Oxford Magazine.

BY PROFESSOR JOWETT, M.A.

ARISTOTLE.—The POLITICS. Translated into English, with Introduction, Marginal Analysis, Essays, Notes, and Indices. Vols. I. and II. Vol. I. containing the Introduction and Translation. Vol. II., Part I., containing the Notes. 21s.

"The most agreeable and helpful English version." Pall Mall Gazette.

PLATO.—The DIALOGUES. Translated into English, with an Analysis and Introduction. New Edition, 5 vols. £3 10s.

PLATO.—The REPUBLIC. Translated into English, with an Analysis and Introduction. Third Edition, 12s. 6d.

THUCYDIDES. Translated into English, with Introduction, Marginal Analysis, Notes, and Indices. 2 vols. 32s.

FULL CLARENDON PRESS CATALOGUES sent free on application.

LONDON: HENRY FROWDE, CLARENDON PRESS WAREHOUSE, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

Printed by SPOTTISWOODE & CO., at No. 5 New-street Square, in the Parish of St. Bride, in the City of London, and Published by WILLIAM BOYCE, at the Office, No. 38 Southampton Street, Strand, in the Parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, in the County of Middlesex.—Saturday, July 13, 1889.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,760, Vol. 68.

July 20, 1889.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

PEACE OR WAR?

IN a telegram published by the Times on Tuesday morning from its Vienna Correspondent it was said, "The idea that a great European war is inevitable is entirely of Russian origin. Nobody in Germany or Austria-Hungary wants war." The remainder of the Correspondent's statements are well founded enough; but in this particular part of them there is certainly mistake. That it is Russia which is the sole, or almost the sole, disturber of European peace, and that, if European peace is disturbed, it is most likely to be Russia's fault, is a certain truth. But the "idea" that a great European war is, if not "inevitable," hardly less probable than a thunderstorm in a hot July, is certainly not a purely Russian idea, but one common to all persons of good information and intelligence in all countries. Further, it would be agreeable to believe that "nobody in Germany wants war." Unfortunately there are the very strongest reasons for believing that there are bodies in Germany, and very highly placed bodies too, who regard the probable dissension between Boulangists and anti-Boulangists as the best possible opportunity for a fresh attack on France, for reducing what are thought to be her menacing preparations, and for settling in a sinister fashion the various small, but not unimportant, grievances between the two nations. It is not indeed believed, or to be believed, that Prince BISMARCK shares this disposition. His interest is too strong in "playing CHARLE-MAGNE" rather than in running even the remotest risk of exchanging what is at present the most glorious and fortunate record of any German, if not of any, statesman, for one with an ending certainly not more brilliant and possibly clouded with disaster. But there are others who are in exactly reverse case to the Prince, who have their record to make, and who, even if they lost the first game, would have in the ordinary course of things ample time for a return match. The interests at stake are so great that the advocates of letting well alone may not improbably prevail for a time, but still it is almost certainly incorrect to say that there is nobody in Germany who wishes for war—unless, indeed, it be meant that the principal German person who wishes for an occasion of war is not at the moment in Germany. And it is also (unluckily) rash to say that, in the present precarious condition of French politics and the continued eclipse of French statesmanship, there is not a considerable chance that France will give that occasion.

As to Austria-Hungary the assertion is no doubt much truer, if not absolutely true. Even the most hotheaded Hungarian denouncer of Count KALNOKY's policy as timid does not exactly wish for war; he only thinks that a less ostentatious display of not-wishing for it might peacefully obtain greater advantages. It is true that, in the opinion of a respectable minority of soldiers and politicians, the dangers with which war is supposed to threaten Austria are not a little exaggerated. To alter the phrase of Sir HENRY KILLEGREW, Austria already has a very good cause, and it is by no means certain that she might not find herself in possession of a good horse and a good sword. Her ill luck, explicable as it was, in the two last great wars in which she engaged, the delicate instability of her constitutional arrangements, and the motley character of her population are of course serious drawbacks. But it is sometimes forgotten that in any probable war the immensely greater part of her frontier is practically secure from attack, that even Bosnian insurrection and Servian hostility would require from her for the time nothing but moderate defensive exertions, and that she could concentrate almost her whole strength, either for defence or offence, on the Galician side. Still, the risks would undoubtedly be great, and the character and amount of probable gain are not such as should tempt any sane Austrian or Hungarian to wish for war. The time is not ripe for any further extension southwards; and such an extension, if it is to come, is much more likely to be secured by a continuance of the exhibition of good government in Bosnia and the Herzegovina than by aggression. The financial condition of the Empire contra-indicates any unnecessary exertion; and the possession of such a frontier as that of Galicia, which is absolutely destitute of natural protection, and may be said almost to invite attack, is, of course, a source of weakness. Therefore it may be said truly enough that Austria's voice, unless on compulsion, will not be for war.

Yet, as has been said, there are voices, and weighty voices, in Germany which would perhaps be for it, which would certainly not be against it; there is a very strong, and it is believed a growing, inclination towards it in Russia; and there is probably, despite the Exhibition, less of a disinclination to it in France than there has been for some time. Without attributing to General BOULANGER the propensity to eat fire which some persons attribute to him, it is fair and reasonable to remember that he is, after all, General BOULANGER. Nor can it be denied that, for some time past, the active, long-continued, but hitherto vague, dislike of recent Republican Governments has taken in popular speech the well-known old form of abuse of a tas d'avocats, and the like. Yet in all probability, unless the bellicose influences in Germany should increase and prove uncontrollable, it is from the East not the West that the match will be set to the train. There are plenty of trains ready. Cretan insurrection or discontent has long been the stormy petrel of the Eastern question, and the bird is in full flight now. Moreover, it is pretty well known that the Greek Government at least is not actively abetting the agitation and the supply of arms (which ought to be stopped at all hazards)—that the abettor is elsewhere. It appears to be absolutely impossible to find out the truth about the Armenian complaints, though it is very significant that the charges against the principal scapegoat, MOUSSA BEY, seem to have dwindled down from definite accusations of the most atrocious crimes to vague generalities of brigandage and raiding. But it has been repeatedly pointed out that it really does not matter in the very least for the purpose of the agitators whether such accusations are false or true. The fact that they are made, and that well-meaning people like Mr. BRYCE can be induced to take them up, is sufficient. Undoubtedly, however, the point of chief anxiety is Servia. The reported arming of the reserves—that is to say, of the peasantry—could have no possible signification of a comfortable kind, for no one of Servia's neighbours has the very faintest intention or inclination to attack her. The return of Queen NATALIE would be a certain evil; yet the presence of a child upon the throne with no one to direct him but statesmen of exceedingly doubtful fidelity to his dynasty and to the independence of the country is an evil hardly less. Yet it is improbable almost to the point of impossibility that either the Eastern causes of disturbances or the Western causes will be sufficient by themselves to bring about a disturbance of any kind; and in this fact lies, though it is a very uncomfortable comfort, the chief hope of prolonging peace. Such a purely Western disturbance as that of 1870, and such a purely Eastern disturbance as that of 1877, are now about equally unlikely, and the very magnitude and universality of the dangers involved constitute to some extent recognizances obliging each nation to keep the peace. Unluckily that which is most inclined to break it, and has also most to gain by doing so, has at the same time least to lose—an invulnerability which has sometimes prompted political paradoxers to wish that Russia might be allowed to attain some of her objects in order that by so doing she might multiply the points at which some harm can be done her. This, however, is little more than jest. Speaking seriously, it cannot be said that the elements of possible danger are in any way less, or are any the less combustibly disposed, than they have been for some years. Indeed, there may even have been a distinct increase of temperature in the quarter noted above.

THE PARNELLITE PROTEST.

IT was no doubt unnecessary for the President of the Special Commission to remind Sir CHARLES RUSSELL and Mr. ASQUITH that, though their client was of course able to withdraw his retainer from them, he would "remain subject to the jurisdiction of the Court." The intimation thus drily given at the close of Sir CHARLES RUSSELL's brief statement detracted considerably from the impressiveness of an incident which had been prepared and led up to with so much solemnity, and, as has been admitted, it could not have been necessary for the enlightenment of Mr. PARNELL's counsel; but we are far from regarding it as superfluous so far as the unthinking and incurious public is concerned. English Parnellite commentators who talk with ludicrous effrontery about the "collapse of the Commission" have outdone their Irish allies in the attempt to persuade people that Mr. PARNELL and his fellow-members have actually some sort of right to withdraw themselves morally, if not technically, from the jurisdiction of Sir JAMES HANNEN and his colleagues. But Mr. HEALY, whose speech at the National League meeting is well worth studying in connexion with this new phase of the case, is not far behind the Daily News in coolness of assumption and audacity of bounce. He observed at the meeting referred to that the "retirement of the Irish party from the proceedings of the Special Commission in London would give satisfaction to the Irish race at home and abroad." No doubt it might give great satisfaction to the Irish race at home and abroad if the Parnellites were in a position to "retire" from the proceedings of the Commission; but they are no more at liberty to do so than a prisoner at the bar is at liberty to retire from the trial, or (if they think that comparison prejudices the issue) than the Commission itself is at liberty to withdraw from the inquiry in which it is engaged. All that the Irish party have done is to deprive themselves of expert assistance in laying their case, so far as it may be affected by subsequent evidence or advocacy, as favourably as may be before the Commission. They have not even stopped their own mouths, for it will be perfectly competent to each or all of them to represent their own interests in their own persons; but, even if they had parted with this right, they would not, and could not, have divested themselves of the liability of accepting and submitting to the judgment which they had foregone all the legitimate means of influencing.

This being so, and, in spite of the newspaper and platform swagger about "retirement," too obviously so, for anybody to miss, it may well have puzzled some ingenuous minds to explain to themselves the latest Parnellite move. Their difficulty has been probably increased by the consideration of the alleged ground on which the step has been taken. For even the most ingenuous mind must have been a little staggered by the pretext put forward for the revocation of Sir CHARLES RUSSELL's and Mr. ASQUITH's retainers; even innocence itself must have felt it to be just a little "thin." Certain of the charges and allegations preferred against Mr. PARNELL alone—for none of the other persons implicated therein are represented before the Commission—have shared the discredit attaching to the witness on whose testimony they mainly rested, and have been accordingly withdrawn by the accusers. So much the better for Mr. PARNELL, and, in so far as the simplification of their task is concerned, so much the better for the Commission. There, it might be thought, the incident should have dropped, at any rate until the time came for the Commission to deal with it in their report. But because Mr. PARNELL believes, or pretends to believe, that these charges were the deliberately fictitious manufacture of the Irish Loyal and Patriotic Union, and because, on the strength of that belief, or pretended belief, he is naturally desirous of overhauling the records of the I. L. P. U., he argues, or feigns to argue, that the Commissioners are bound to compel discovery of the matters about which he is curious, and makes their refusal to do so a reason for directing his counsel to return their briefs. This is a little too preposterous to succeed even with the least legal of minds. The requirements, or the supposed requirements, of Mr. PARNELL's peculiar position, still less the feelings which he entertains, or professes to entertain, towards those whom he charges with having wilfully traduced him, cannot possibly be the measure of, or bear any relation to, the legitimate scope of an inquiry which a certain tribunal has been appointed by Parliament to institute into certain charges and allegations. Even if it were admitted, as it is very far from being, that Mr. PARNELL had reasonable cause to suspect the existence of a conspiracy to prefer false charges against him, the Commission would still have no power to compel the production of any other evidence than such as went directly to the truth or falsity of the charges in question. Mr. ASQUITH's argument to the effect that the identities, characters, motives, and past proceedings of the persons by whom the charges were in the first instance formulated have a bearing on their credibility, does not display its "ingenious" quality very strikingly to any one but a Gladstonian reporter. To us, indeed, its ingenuity appears to be of a rather dangerously double-edged kind. For, considering that the chief of the charges, if not the sole charge, in respect of the origin of which the Court was asked to order the production of the I. L. P. U.'s books was to the effect that Mr. PARNELL had dictated and signed certain notorious letters, the inference suggested by Mr. ASQUITH's contention is rather an awkward one for him. Are we to understand that the authenticity of the PIGOTT letters, or any of them, is still an open question? We hardly expect an affirmative reply to this; but, if the question is no longer an open one, what becomes of Mr. ASQUITH's argument as to the relevance of the documentary evidence of which he has been pressing the Commission to order the production?

It is not improbable, however, that Mr. PARNELL is just as conscious of the hollowness of the pretext on which he revoked his instructions to counsel as are any of his critics. He has had to ride off on this transparently fictitious excuse, for the very excellent reason that no better "mount" was to be had. The Parnellite case was all but closed, and, if any sensational protest was to be made at all against the proceedings of the Commission, it had to be made at once. That this flimsy pretext should have been selected, therefore, does not surprise us in the least; nor, indeed, should we have been greatly surprised if it had been even flimsier still. The protest, we say, had to be made. The tactics which have created this necessity would have been plain enough without Mr. HEALY's obliging commentary; which, however, has now made their meaning absolutely unmistakable. Mr. HEALY has found it difficult for months past to restrain his feelings of disgust at the continued association of the Irish party ("association" is good) "with the proceedings of the Commission." He regards "the submission of the Irish leader to the jurisdiction and authority of that tribunal, a kind of tribunal of penance, to which they were bound to resort for full absolution, as one of the most lamentable incidents in the history of the present movement." We can quite understand the incident appearing lamentable to Mr. HEALY, and there is a good deal of truth in his comparison of the submission of the Parnellites to the tribunal as a form of "penance"—though there were other parties besides the penitents who were interested in the "absolution," and who, perhaps, as a matter of fact, insisted on the performance of the rite. What has happened, in short, has been this. Mr. PARNELL and his political associates were forced by their Gladstonian allies to appear and plead: with what results for themselves is a question which has yet to be decided, and which we have not the least desire to prejudge. But we surely do not go beyond the limits of fair comment on this latest move of the Parnellites in pointing out the inference which it obviously suggests, not as regards the result of the inquiry, which it would be improper to attempt to forecast, but as regards their own view of what this result is likely to be. For, if their withdrawal of their counsel does not mean "hedging," we are absolutely at a loss to assign it any meaning whatever. On the plainest and simplest construction of it, it seems to indicate that Mr. PARNELL and his party, after having duly appeared and pleaded, after having had the benefit of the services of the most eminent advocate in England, and after having had a daily opportunity of testing the scrupulous steadiness of hand with which the Commission hold the scales of justice, still consider it necessary to make provision against an adverse verdict by picking a quarrel with the tribunal on a ridiculously trivial question of procedure, and paving the way for future declaration that they were unable to get fair play from their judges. They cannot expect any other inference than this to be drawn from their conduct, and they will have no sort of right either to surprise or resentment if it is. If Mr. HEALY and his friends felt sure of "absolution," as he calls it, they would not be in such a mighty hurry to get away from the confessional.

AN OUTBREAK OR AN OUTRAGE?

IT is, perhaps, something to have discovered an occasion when the Browning Society might have been of some use, and it is only in the nature of things that on this particular occasion the Browning Society was not at hand, thus justifying its master's lines about the too infrequent coincidence of time, place, and person. In a journal of less respectability than the Athenæum the verses which appeared last Saturday, signed ROBERT BROWNING, and addressed to EDWARD FITZGERALD, would have read like a hoax; as it is, we most reluctantly suppose them genuine, and only regret that the Society did not in some way interfere to save its idol from a gross blunder. It seems that Mr. BROWNING had read in a private letter of Mr. FITZGERALD's to the late Master of Trinity the words "Mrs. BROWNING's death is rather a relief to me, I must say. No more Aurora Leighs, thank God!" After which Mr. FITZGERALD acknowledged that "she was a woman of real genius, I know," and finished with some general remarks as to women's mission which had been in different forms made before by St. PAUL and other persons of sense. Upon this Mr. BROWNING thinks it well to write a douzain, informing the shade of the translator of OMAR KHAYYAM that "you thanked God my wife was dead" (which it will be observed Mr. FITZGERALD had not done), that there was no eye or ear acquaintance between the two (which might, it should seem, have shown Mr. BROWNING that there could be no personal reference), and then declaring, with somewhat posthumous valiancy, that "were yourself alive, good Fitz" (Lord TENNYSON, Mr. THACKERAY, and some others of his early intimates called Mr. FITZGERALD "FITZ," so Mr. BROWNING does so), he, Mr. BROWNING, would be puzzled to return him thanks. "Kicking you seems the common lot of curs" (also, it may be noted, Mr. FITZGERALD might perhaps not have been easy to kick)—"While more appropriate greeting lends you grace: Surely to spit there glorifies your face, Spitting from lips once sanctified by Hers."

Among reasonable admirers of Mr. BROWNING, with whom we are proud to rank ourselves, there can, we should suppose, be but one opinion as to the deplorable bad taste and folly, not to mention the remarkable English, of this tirade. Conjugal affection is one of the very best things in the world. But the conjugal affection which some thirty years after date goes out of its way to make the chance revelation of a colloquial sentiment expressed in confidence to a friend, and never intended for publication at all, the occasion for foaming at the mouth with vulgar threats of impossible chastisement, and for putting references to a dead wife's kisses in a context of kicking and spitting, is not a good thing at all. It is clear from Mr. BROWNING's own statement, as well as from Mr. FITZGERALD's words, that he had no personal knowledge of and was making no personal reference to Mrs. BROWNING; but was speaking of her in the capacity in which by her own act she had given any man a right to speak of her, that of a person who wrote and published books. Even so he calls her a "woman of genius," of "real genius." But he thought, which is a perfectly sound and defensible opinion, that women in literature "only do what men do better"; he evidently (in which some not incompetent critics agree with him) thought Aurora Leigh a very intolerable book, and he probably (again with the same assent) thought that Mrs. BROWNING's genius was alloyed with vast quantities of sentimental gush, bad verse, bad taste, and the like. To express which thoughts he used a phrase which is almost a stereotyped phrase in a private letter to a private friend. Will any one say that a man might not write "Mr. GLADSTONE's death is a relief to me, I must say. No more Home Rule Bills, thank God!" without being considered guilty of a heartless insult to Mr. GLADSTONE's relatives? As for the mixture of brag and Billingsgate with which Mr. BROWNING retorts, his words themselves recall not the worst passage in old English literature. These words, to the author rather than translator of one thing which Mr. BROWNING at his best has hardly outdone, to a man of letters and a gentleman like few, to the dear and faithful friend of the greatest Englishmen of his generation, are

As though a man should spit against the wind,
The filth returns in 's face.

THE MOBILIZATION OF THE FLEET.

THE preparation for the Naval Manœuvres is in its way nearly as important an event for the navy as the passing of the Defence Bill. The measures which are being taken to prepare the ships for that inspection on the 3rd of August, which will not be a review, are up to a certain point a rehearsal of actual war, not less, but rather more, complete than the manœuvres to which they are the preliminary. The series of operations in which Admiral BAIRD will be allowed a chance of playing a return match for last year with Admiral TRYON are very good practice, no doubt, but with the best will in the world they must be a make-believe. But the mobilization is actually what it would be in war-time. The exertions which are being made to show the German EMPEROR on the 3rd of August a force not inferior in magnitude and efficiency to his own army would have to be repeated in every detail if the fleet were being made ready for more serious work. The value of the experiment—for, in spite of previous practice, it is still something of that kind—will, of course, depend on the thoroughness with which it is done; but it can hardly be done at all without giving officers and men, the Admiralty and the Dockyards, excellent training.

There are many things to be tested by the mobilization. In the first place, there is the mere size of the fleet. It is something to know that we can in a week, without straining the resources of the navy, add forty battle-ships and cruisers to the fleets in commission, provided, no doubt, that all is good that is upcome. If the ships are good and the engines sound, if the guns are ready and the ammunition is at hand for the guns, this force is enough to encourage the country out of one fear. As long as it is there and available there will be no sudden invasion of England—that much is certain. A fleet that can be manned, coaled, and provisioned in about a week will be ready long before any hundred thousand invaders are on board their transports within striking distance of this country. Of course everything depends on whether this can be done effectively for purposes of work, and not only approximately for purposes of show. This will to some extent be tested in the forthcoming manœuvres, and is of considerably greater importance than showy "raids" on watering-places. Of not less importance than the number and quality of the ships is the question whether men to handle and officers to command them are also ready. On that point there is great doubt, and the mobilization does not promise to dispel it. The Admiralty would have made a better experiment if, instead of calling almost exclusively on the bluejackets whom it already has in barracks and the Coastguard whom it has always at call, it had made an attempt to see how far it could rely on the men of the Naval Reserve. This course might the more profitably have been followed, not only for the instruction it would give the Admiralty and the Reserve men, but because these periods of service in the manœuvres are found to be somewhat of a grievance by the Coastguard, on whom they entail a loss of pay. As their value, their training, their readiness, are beyond dispute, it might be as well to spare them for the sake of trying a force which has never yet been tested. The trial at least remains to be made, and as these yearly mobilizations develop its turn should come. Another weak spot which will necessarily be tested, and we trust be honestly tested too, is the supply of stokers for the navy. It is notorious that we are badly supplied at present, and that the difficulty of recruiting is great. As the efficiency of a modern warship must needs depend largely on its machines, this is a very serious defect indeed, and one calling for prompt remedy quite as much as deficiencies in ships or guns. Neither ships, guns, nor engines are of more value than suits of armour on stakes set up on the sea-shore without trained men to use them. There is yet another part of the naval force which is known to be below its proper strength. The list of lieutenants is short, and, what is worse, these officers are discontented, and very reasonably discontented. In war-time the list would require to be increased by about three hundred new officers, and where they are to come from nobody knows. Besides, the condition of officers in this rank is making parents daily less willing to send their sons into the service. Nine out of ten of them have little or no chance of ever reaching the rank of commander. Their certain fate is to be kept in the rank of lieutenant for eighteen years or so, to be then sent into the Coastguard, and retired in middle life on a pension equal to about half the pay of the manager of a branch bank in a small country town. Whether the Admiralty likes it or no, it will have to learn that this is not the kind of career which a parent in his senses will readily allow his son to follow. Moreover, a senior lieutenant in HER MAJESTY'S service is a gentleman of not less education, or put in a less important place, than a head clerk in a Government office, and might, therefore, be as well paid. The difficulty of finding a remedy is not small, no doubt; but a remedy must be found, otherwise the Admiralty will one day learn that no candidates have presented themselves for the Britannia.

THE SALVATIONIST NUISANCE.

ON the value of the Salvation Army's services to the cause of true religion there are two opinions. There is the opinion which the Salvation Army has of itself, and there is the opinion which other people have of the Salvation Army. But no one acquainted with the subject disputes the proposition that the Army is a nuisance. Certainly the last person to deny such a statement would be Mr. BOOTH himself. He would say, if he were consistent with his previous utterances by speech and pen, that it was his duty to create a nuisance, since in no other way could he arrest the attention of the thoughtless, and disturb the conscience of the apathetic. It is true that there are some people more Salvationist than Mr. BOOTH or "RAILTON," who say that the Army is a quiet and well-conducted body of men, persecuted by local authorities because it is not of their way. But these gentlemen, such as Mr. HENRY FOWLER, and other highly respectable people of the same type, speak at their ease. They enunciate the principle of religious liberty, and they plead, quite superfluously, that Mr. BOOTH has a right to worship God after his own fashion. Of course he has, with trumpets, also, and shawms, so long as he does not make the lives of his neighbours a burden to them. It is all very well to argue, in the artificial stillness of the House of Commons, where there is no noise except what members choose to make themselves, that a band of pietists shall not be harassed because their proceedings seem vulgar to the refined and fanatical to the supercilious. But suppose a man's wife is ill, and a gang of Salvationists roar their blasphemous jargon immediately under her windows, accompanying their shouts upon that most discordant of all instruments, the harmonium. Suppose that, when requested to be quiet or go away, and when told the reason, they rudely decline, and continue their performances. Such has been the hard fate of Mr. BENNETT, a resident of Dalston, who attended before Mr. BROS at the Dalston Police Court this week. Mr. BENNETT, who seems to be a man of forbearing and obliging disposition, said that he had allowed these things to be done for eighteen months without a murmur, and that, so far as he was concerned, they might have been done for ever. But when his wife fell sick, he felt bound to intervene, with the result, or want of it, which we have already indicated. What does a rampant bawler from Gospel barracks, or a strapping Hallelujah lass, care for the miseries either inflicts on racking heads and shattered nerves?

Mr. BROS gave Mr. and Mrs. BENNETT what relief he could. That is to say, he issued summonses against the Salvationists for using a noisy instrument to collect a crowd. The harmonium is not the only weapon employed, although it may be the noisiest and the worst. There are also cornets, and of course there are drums. Neither drummers, cornet-players, nor performers upon the harmonium, recognize the authority of the secular Courts. When one drummer is convicted, another drummer takes his place, and bangs rather more loudly than his predecessor. While, however, the Salvationists do not hesitate to proclaim that the ordinary tribunals are not good enough for them, and that a Divine command is laid upon them to make themselves as disagreeable as possible, they are not exempt from the human and not very amiable frailties of spite and revenge.

Mr. JOHN PHILLIPS, who acted as spokesman of the inhabitants before Mr. BROS on Tuesday, summed up his woes and those of his neighbours in the following plaintive language. "We are in a state," said this worthy man, "we are in a state of—I don't know what to call it—perturbation. Ever since the summonses were heard crowds of people have assembled, and we have been threatened that our windows will be broken if we go on with these proceedings." Mr. BROS will, it may be hoped, persevere in the course upon which he has entered, and which it is his duty to pursue. He has granted a summons against the new drummer, and cheerfully promised others against "other members of the same band as their offences arise." Their offence is rank, it smells to Heaven. For the performances in the Salvationist halls, ribald mummery as they seem to most decent Christians, some excuse may be made. Those who are not so unfortunate as to live in immediate proximity to Pandemonium may avoid this unlovely display. Even the processions through the streets, mischievous and tiresome as they are, only add one more to the difficulties of peregrination and the inconveniences of life. But the deliberate torture of the sick, whether in hospitals or private houses, is so horribly cruel that we can hardly understand how an organization which tolerates such atrocities is itself tolerated by the public.

ELECTIONS AND ELECTIONEERING.

THE present week has been one of some interest in the matter of elections. Separatists of a militant temper have hardly yet done groaning over the unopposed return of the Private Secretary of the Abominable at Dover; the middle of the week was occupied by Mr. WILLIAMS-DRUMMOND'S gallant and most well-advised, though for the moment hopeless, fight in Carmarthenshire; and by the time that these words are read the result of the Marylebone election, unknown at the time we write, will have been published. These constituencies make a trio fairly representative of the three classes—small urban, large urban, and county—into which, with a few isolated exceptions, the whole electorate is now divided; and, unless something very strange happens in Marylebone, they will all have supplied evidence of the falsity of Home Rule pretensions. It is, indeed, unlikely that Mr. BOULNOIS will be able in the most favourable event to muster the thumping majority which seated Lord CHARLES BERESFORD. Though an excellent candidate in his way, Mr. BOULNOIS has not the universal popularity and the multifarious "agreements" of the sometime commander of the Condor and the Nile gunboats, while Mr. GEORGE LEVESON-GOWER is a much stronger candidate than Professor BEESLY. Nobody could deny that that denouncer of the wicked literary men who belied pure patriots like CLODIUS and CATILINE, sovereigns of blameless life like TIBERIUS, was, with all his crotchets, a man of very considerable ability; but it was ability of a kind not in the least likely to ingratiate itself with such a constituency. Mr. LEVESON-GOWER, on the other hand, has almost every quality suited to charm the Gladstonian mind. He is one of those young men who, having no political opinions of their own, nor perhaps either ability or desire to arrive at any, and seeing that Mr. GLADSTONE seemed to be "well set in" some years ago, discovered that they were Gladstonians, and who, by the very force of their previous political vacuity, have been fortunately able to stow away all Mr. GLADSTONE'S new doctrines since, and probably have room for more. If he is not a lord, he is near of kin to several lords, and that is with Radicals a very great thing when it comes to individuals, however dreadful the House of Lords may be to them in its collective capacity. Mr. LEVESON-GOWER has promised nearly everything that was asked of him, is duly authenticated by a voucher from Mr. GLADSTONE, has a tolerable trick of speaking, and, in short, is very well fitted for his part. The only thing to be said against the "generous youthful politicians of the Eighty Club," as an enthusiastic print described them the other day, is that they are rather too much alike. A little more brains may in this specimen correct the absence of blood; a little more blood in that specimen may correct the absence of brains. But, as a rule, they are all nicely educated, all prepared to promise anything that is asked of them, all decently expert in the more facile arts of the debating society, all ready to swear by Mr. GLADSTONE, and to turn the Empire and the Constitution topsy-turvy to his or anybody else's order. They might be distinguished by numbers, like torpedo-boats, if it were not that their names, as in the present case, sometimes constitute their principal claim to the confidence of the independent elector.

The contest in Carmarthenshire was more interesting to the political student, because it was a genuine contest between two fit and proper persons of local claims; but its interest was somewhat lessened by its foregone conclusion. We do not in the least despair of carrying Welsh seats in numbers when more light has been let into the dark places of the Principality, at present illuminated only by the very murky torches of the great Mr. GEE and his likes. One main reason of the fury with which Gladstonians regard the recent progress of the Welsh Church, and of their zeal for its destruction, is fear of this very enlightenment. But for the present there is little for the Welsh Tories to do but to hold such vantage points as they can keep, like PELAYO (whose real name was no doubt MORGAN, as in his heretical namesake's case) in the Asturias, and harry the infidels as well as they may till the tyranny is overpast. Mr. WILLIAMS-DRUMMOND has done this very well, making a large reduction in the late Mr. POWELL's majority. The electoral war is the happier in that here the privilege of fighting another day can be secured without any necessity of flight. But such contests are only cheerful spectacles for the expert in politics. Lord SALISBURY's remarks at the Beaumont Hall on Tuesday have reference to another series of contests, of which Marylebone itself is one. As Lord SALISBURY might have said, Wales itself is not at the present moment anything like so apparently hopeless a subject for Tory warfare as London was for years after the first Reform Bill. The present preponderance, not merely of Unionist but of Tory members, is due in part, no doubt, to the new franchises, which have swamped the narrow Liberalism of the average small shopkeeper of the last generation, but much more to bold and steady work, for which there is as much room now in Wales as there was then in London. And it has also to be remembered that the same process which won London can lose it if its working is transferred to the other side. The County Council elections, in which what is beyond all doubt and to demonstration a minority, and a comparatively small minority, actually succeeded in obtaining a majority, and a large majority, of seats, gave an awkward reminder of the impossibility of ever sitting still in politics. Lord SALISBURY, of course, set before his audience how great the danger of such sitting still is, and every one who has studied the details of political history knows this. Even London, satisfactory as is the Tory and Unionist majority, gives plenty of room not merely for defensive but for offensive work. The blunders which lost Kennington must be avoided; but there are many metropolitan seats which are in the hands of Radicals, and which should be wrenched from them. A very slight effort, for instance, would displace Sir CHARLES RUSSELL and Mr. ROWLANDS, Professor STUART and Mr. LAWSON, with not a few others. Indeed, so fortunately mixed are the component parts of the London boroughs that there can hardly be said to be one which might not be, and ought not to be, represented by a Tory.

This kind of address (it is understood that Lord SALISBURY's was the first of a series) is something of a novelty, but it is a novelty well imagined, and likely to do good. Why it should give electors any particular pleasure to hear such addresses addressed, as it were, personally to them, is easier to understand than to explain. The average man of a certain station and education is neither flattered if the PRIME MINISTER mounts the platform for him nor annoyed if the PRIME MINISTER does not. He would probably, in any case, much rather read the speech comfortably in five minutes during his breakfast than listen to it uncomfortably for an hour after his dinner; and, if he has a kind heart, he would probably prefer that the PRIME MINISTER himself should enjoy a similar indulgence, by being permitted to print instead of to deliver. But the majority of the new electors seem to take such speeches as personal compliments, and to derive a mysterious, but considerable, delectation therefrom. They are certain to get them from the wrong side if they do not get them from the right, and therefore it is desirable that the right should bestir itself. Lord SALISBURY's sketch of present affairs at home and abroad naturally contained nothing very novel. But in such cases the reverse of the hackneyed Horatian maxim seems to be true, and things that have been read by the eyes seignius irritant than things which the faithful ears drink in from the actual lips of a statesman. On one subject—the sugar bounties—Lord SALISBURY was speaking to persons very nearly concerned. His language was duly guarded, but the workmen of the East of London will do well to understand that a measure which would have done them much good, and on which not a few of their hearts were set, has been wrecked much less by the opposition of France than by the arts of faction. And whether they are political economists or not, they can also have little difficulty in appreciating the real nature of the assertion that the price of sugar has risen because the state of things which the Government tried to remove is now assured of continuance for at least another year.

THE MOGUL COMPANY.

THE decision of the Court of Appeal may not be the last which will be given on the case of the Mogul Steamship Company. So much is at stake, there are so many interests concerned, that every effort will be made to take the case to the House of Lords. It is only right that the opinion of the highest authority should be obtained on a question of such importance, and the Mogul Steamship Company will be doing a service if they fight their battle to the end. In the meantime, however, three judges out of four have decided that the course taken by the combination of steamship Companies which drove the Mogul Company from the China trade was not illegal. This proportion may, perhaps, indicate what the end of the conflict may be expected to be. In any case, it has a value of its own. We have heard at times that in this country the power exercised by American Trusts would never be tolerated. Unless, however, Lord ESHER is in the right, while his colleagues and Lord COLERIDGE are in the wrong, it is hard to see what there is that an American Trust does which an English Trust could not do. As things are now going in business, this is a fact which it is well to note and estimate.

The history of the dispute is simple enough. The P. and O., Glen, and Ocean Steamship Companies trading to China found it advisable to make an arrangement by which cut-throat competition could be avoided. They so arranged their business that they did not get into one another's way, and could keep the freights up. The Mogul Steamship Company desired to enter into this fellowship; but the three allied Companies were of opinion that there was no more business to be done at Shanghai and Hankow than they could comfortably manage, and refused to accept a new partner. The Mogul Company then decided to compete against them. Upon this the allies began what is known in America as a rate war. They not only took cargoes at a freight which entailed a heavy loss, but they offered inducements to shippers not to employ vessels of rival Companies. A rebate was promised to customers who dealt with them exclusively, and refused to all who freighted their competitors' ships—unless there happened to be none of their own in port at the time, or none which had space to take more cargo. The result of this was, and could only be, to crush competition, since shippers could not neglect their own interests, and other Companies could not keep vessels lying at Hankow and Shanghai in the hope of securing the crumbs which fell from the table of the "Conference." This is what the Mogul Company has endeavoured to impeach as a conspiracy to limit the freedom of trade, and what Lord COLERIDGE, Lord Justice BOWEN, and Lord Justice FRY have declared to be only a permissible form of competition. They may seem to have come to a somewhat harsh decision; but those who look at it without prejudice will probably conclude that it is supported by very solid reasons. It is unpleasant for a shipowner to be told that, if he endeavours to share in the profits of a particular trade, his rivals may combine to ruin him; for this is what the judges have told him. But the unpleasantness is inevitable. After all, trade, from its very nature, is the effort of one man or combination of men to undersell others. The right to undersell is only limited by the obligation not to do so by violent or dishonest means, and the obligation imposed by the facts of the case not to make the effort in such a way as to ruin yourself. The Mogul Company does not deny that any of its three enemies could have fairly done the things it complains of. The combination is what constitutes the grievance. But, as Lord Justice BOWEN said, no one can imagine a regulation which would prevent such a combination as this which would not also put restrictions on trade in general. In truth, as the Americans are finding out, the difficulty of dealing with the Trusts is precisely this. Nobody has yet invented a regulation which will stop them, and will yet leave capital free from destructive restrictions. Competition is the one defence against them. In fights which are carried on with money those who have a great deal must needs have an advantage over those who have less. The one check on the capitalist is the danger that, if he abuses his power in order to extort extravagant prices, he will provoke a competition by which he will suffer. But, if the check is to work effectually, trade must be left free. Protective duties, and laws against badgering, forestalling, and regrating, are alike restrictions which, by keeping down competition, do more to strengthen the hands of the capitalist than they do to limit him. We are afraid that the Mogul Steamship Company must find what consolation they can in this for the results of their unlucky fight with the "Conference" in China.

THE GOODNESS OF DR. BARNARDO.

A MUCH greater personage than Dr. BARNARDO was once described as a good man in the worst sense of that term. We have not the statistical patience to calculate how often in the course of his somewhat discursive judgment the MASTER of the ROLLS called Dr. BARNARDO a good, or a very good, man. Mrs. BROWNING's pious aspiration that the good God might pardon all good men is scarcely less relevant to the case before the Court than these gratuitous tributes to the virtue of a contumacious defendant. It might as well be said that because Lord ESHER is a very clever man he cannot make mistakes, whereas everybody knows that he does make them, and that not unfrequently. Dr. BARNARDO's motives, which we have no desire to impugn, are beyond the scrutiny even of Lord ESHER. If fussy benevolence can be pleaded as an apology, not only for defying the law, but for interfering with other people's children, we may as well close the Courts and abandon the idea of the family. Dr. BARNARDO, having now been pronounced in contempt by two properly constituted tribunals, will perhaps see the necessity of producing the child whom he deliberately sent out of the Court's jurisdiction, with the effect, if not with the intention, of evading legal process. His "motives," though they operated so strongly upon the impressionable mind of Lord ESHER, are fortunately immaterial. We say "fortunately," because, if they had to be determined, there would be no data upon which to determine them. A man may always say, through himself or his counsel, that in whatever he does he aims at the regeneration of society or the improvement of the race. Laws are in their nature general, and we are not yet living under the moral dictatorship of Dr. BARNARDO. A gentleman who keeps a Home, and spells it with a capital H, is not entitled by the law of England to break up homes for which a small "h" suffices. Now it is quite true that Dr. BARNARDO did not forcibly enter the house of MARY ANNE TYE's parents for the purpose of taking MARY ANNE away with him. Mrs. TYE did at one time agree that the child should be kept under Dr. BARNARDO's superintendence, and ultimately sent to the colonies. But before MARY ANNE left England the mother asked to have her back again, and Dr. BARNARDO had no right to refuse. It seems more than doubtful whether she was not exceeding her powers when she made the agreement. But, at all events, she could revoke whatever authority she could give, and Dr. BARNARDO was guilty of intolerable presumption in depriving her of the custody of her own daughter.

Dr. BARNARDO's counsel could not, of course, argue, even before the MASTER of the ROLLS, that Dr. BARNARDO, being a good man, might do exactly what he pleased. Their point, such as it is, was that, having sent the child away before the order of habeas corpus was issued, and being, therefore, unable to comply with the order, he had not committed contempt of court. But this contention has failed, as it deserved to fail. Dr. BARNARDO handed the girl over to the care of Mme. RAUMONT (or ROMANDE), whom Lord ESHER declares, in his effusive style and limited vocabulary, to be "as good a lady as Dr. BARNARDO is a good man." However good a lady Mme. RAUMONT may be, she is not the mother of MARY ANNE TYE, and has no more right to take her from her parents than if she were the worst woman alive. When Lord MEATH has succeeded in engrafting the principle of adoption upon the English law it will be different. Mme. RAUMONT may then become a sort of Public Guardian, on the analogy of Lord HERSHELL's Public Trustee. But at present she cannot be allowed to say, "I am a good lady, you are a bad woman; hand me over your child." The worst part of this case is the utterly reckless manner in which Dr. BARNARDO made charges against the girl's parents. These charges have now been most ungraciously withdrawn, not without strong pressure from the Bench. But Dr. BARNARDO had no excuse for making or for believing them. He said that the child's mother was living in adultery, whereas she is lawfully married to a second husband; that MARY ANNE was sent into the streets to beg, of which there is no evidence whatever; and that her stepfather had endeavoured to corrupt her, for which shameful imputation no ground has been alleged. These poor people may be in a humble position of life. But character is quite as important to them as to Dr. BARNARDO or Mme. RAUMONT, and philanthropy is a poor excuse for slander. Dr. BARNARDO's imprudence, to use no harsher word, will certainly not serve the cause which he professes to have at heart. Men and women who require no testimonial from Lord ESHER, but who make the world brighter by their presence, are engaged in helping and teaching and preparing for the struggles of life children who are real outcasts from society, and have no other friends on earth. The labours of these excellent persons are only too likely to be thwarted and hindered by conduct which, however well intentioned, excites the zealous and not unreasonable disgust of the most independent class in the community.

THE CASE AGAINST THE GENERAL.

THE Procureur-General's case against General BOULANGER is much such a document as those who remember his demand for leave to prosecute, and have taken due note of the long delay in the proceedings against the pretender, must have expected. It is wordy, abusive, and for the most part singularly vague. The one really precise charge it brings—a charge of peculation—makes the rest of it superfluous. If there is, indeed, any evidence to support the accusation that the General has taken bribes and pocketed public money, there is no reason why M. QUESNAY DE BEAUREPAIRE should have been laboriously engaged for months in working up a case against him on the charge of treason. To English ideas, at least, there seems to be a certain indecency in the line the Procureur-General has taken. He is supposed to be stating to the Senate the grounds on which he will accuse the General of treason; but the most effective part of what they would call in Scotland his libel is taken up with charges which he acknowledges must be brought before another Court, and are only given here for information. The rest of the document is devoted to a repetition of the well-known facts that General BOULANGER is very ambitious, very pushing, very anxious to become popular, and not at all scrupulous as to the decency of the means he uses to attain his ends. All that is true; but it does not amount to treason. M. QUESNAY DE BEAUREPAIRE is, indeed, certain that there is treason; but, unless he has evidence in his hand which he has reserved, his proofs only amount to the assertion that no man could possibly be so vulgar, so pushing, so impudent as the General is without being a traitor. The declamatory, abusive style of the indictment, the round assertion against M. ROCHEFORT, and the spiteful personalities about Count DILLON are not so strange in French legal proceedings as they would be in English; but even in France when a Public Prosecutor has a definite charge to make he can make it. If M. QUESNAY DE BEAUREPAIRE is vague on the charge of treason, it must be because he cannot be precise; if he gives his own deductions from perfectly well-known facts as proofs of a criminal design, it must be because he has nothing better to give. This at least is what Boulangists, and many who are not Boulangists, are saying already. Considering how entirely the Requisitoire is an amplification of M. QUESNAY DE BEAUREPAIRE's former slashing leader, and remembering why the last Procureur-General retired from office, it is not very rash to conclude that it will be the final judgment passed on the whole of the proceedings taken before the Senate.

The charge of fraud looks more serious. The General is accused of doing a definite thing, in a specified place, on a given date, in a particular manner. It is a good charge as far as it goes—so good that one wonders it has not been before the Court a long time ago. If anything could ruin the General a proved charge of fraud would. Then why not make it in the regular way early?—for, after all, this matter of the coffee-tablets, the debts of BOULANGER père, the mistress who had been six months in prison, and the twenty-centime commission on the epaulettes, cannot have been discovered only yesterday. The General has declared that he will face a jury. With the splendid case M. QUESNAY DE BEAUREPAIRE describes it would be perfectly safe to suspend the proceedings before the Senate, and put the General in the dilemma of either keeping his word or allowing this ruinous charge to go against him by default. By not taking this course the Government not only seem to be supplying the General with a good excuse for staying away, but they show a decided want of confidence in the strength of their case. The document is, in truth, much too full of the futile cleverness which has distinguished most of the proceedings of the present French Ministry. It is supposed that M. TIRARD and his colleagues wished to keep a tribunal ready in which the General could be tried by political opponents, who would condemn him on the ground that he is a discreditable popular nuisance, while they would also supply themselves with an excuse for demanding his extradition from the English Government. This scheme must be accepted with some reserve, because we can hardly suppose that the French Ministry are so ignorant as not to know that the English Government would not grant the extradition without previously obtaining a guarantee that the General would not be tried before a special tribunal on a political charge. In that case a verdict of guilty would make the laborious proceedings before the Senate futile. An acquittal, which would be much the more probable result, would be a worse blow to the Parliamentary Republicans than the election for Paris itself. It is probable that the TIRARD Ministry are innocent of the foolish calculation attributed to them. They are only going on the general rule that you are more likely to hit with two barrels than one. There is some force in this consideration; but then, even with two barrels, you must see that your weapon is properly loaded and well aimed. We have no great confidence either in the loading or the pointing of M. QUESNAY DE BEAUREPAIRE's fowling-piece.

TWO UNIONIST SPEECHES.

THE two speeches delivered last Wednesday by Lord HARTINGTON at a house dinner of the City Liberal Club, and by Mr. GOSCHEN as the guest of the National Union of Conservative and Constitutional Associations, very neatly and appositely supplement each other. Lord HARTINGTON discussed the various shadowy and shifting schemes of Gladstonian Home Rule; while the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER examined the internal condition of the party which has sacrificed to the phantasms aforesaid whatever reputation for consistency and independence, whatever firmness of purpose and unity of will, it once possessed. The particular line taken by the speaker at the Liberal gathering was the extremely effective one, which we are glad to observe that Unionists are now more and more frequently adopting—that of pinning Mr. GLADSTONE to the only definite modification of his Home Rule scheme to which he has ever given an assent, which he cannot wriggle out of, and quietly exposing the monstrous consequences to which it leads. For Unionist purposes it is practically enough to know, not all the cards in the Old Parliamentary hand, but the one card which he has been unwillingly forced to play. And we know now that, whatever may be the other features of the next Separation scheme that Mr. GLADSTONE may produce, it will, at any rate, provide for the representation of Ireland in the Imperial Parliament. Lord HARTINGTON has already done good work in fixing public attention on the startling political corollaries of this admission; and he exhibited them with an even more fatal clearness and cogency the other night. Unionist speakers could not, in our opinion, be better employed. The argument is one which, judiciously handled, can be brought home to minds which remain unimpressed by reasoning from “first principles.” People who cannot be easily convinced of the fundamental unsoundness and essentially mischievous tendencies of legislative separation can be brought without much difficulty to comprehend the enormous practical inconveniences and absurdities to which it would lead.

Mr. GOSCHEN's review of the domestic situation, if we may so call it, within the ranks of the Gladstonian party, and the relation of its various sections to each other on questions of general politics, was of a singularly telling kind. His remark that “our opponents are ceasing even to be “Gladstonians” was the epigrammatic expression of a fact which the public, indeed, are not likely to have overlooked altogether, but which they have hardly yet appreciated, we suspect, in all its bearings. The recent relaxation of the bonds of discipline within the Gladstonian ranks is eloquent of something more than mere impatience and unruliness among Mr. GLADSTONE's more advanced followers. It is, in fact, a disclosure of what has been, from the first, the true nature of the compact between the revolutionary section of the Radicals and their leader. No one who knows these politicians and their purposes can have supposed that their adhesion to Mr. GLADSTONE's Irish policy was inspired by pure enthusiasm, either for the cause or for its distinguished advocate. No doubt they had a certain sympathy with Parnellism as representing the glorious principles of disorder and resistance to constituted authorities; but there is nothing, and there never has been anything, in their record to lead to the belief that they have ever had any special sympathy with Irish Nationalist aspirations. At any rate, we may say, with much confidence, that there are many other “causes” in which the English Radical is far more deeply interested, and which were much nearer to his heart and much more often in his mind at the time when he consented to swallow Mr. GLADSTONE's Home Rule policy whole. His “business” reasons for performing this operation in 1886 were simple enough. He and his fellow-Radicals were willing to give Mr. GLADSTONE the, at that moment, invaluable support of their votes, in consideration of his giving their own fads the benefit of his name and reputation, his oratorical and Parliamentary abilities, and the “glamour” which he was then still supposed capable of exerting over the masses. They are now beginning to insist on their own share in the advantages of the contract, and to demand their leader's performance of his own part in it, and the situation is becoming interesting accordingly.

WRANGLING WORKERS.

THE Workers' Congress, or Congresses—for there are more than one—have met in Paris, and have begun by a bout of squabbling as a preliminary to talk. The question to be settled is who represents the workers. Two bodies of candidates are in the field—the representatives who have been elected and the representatives who have elected themselves. They cannot agree. The first, inspired by the eloquence of Mrs. ANNIE BESANT, and directed by the wisdom of Mr. FENWICK, M.P., are ready for co-operation on reasonable terms. They have their domestic difficulties, not to be overcome without strenuous efforts. Among the French delegates there is one who is a rabid Boulangist, for Boulangism intrudes even here. To him other French delegates have vehemently objected. Mr. FENWICK, M.P., had great difficulty in persuading the other delegates not to pass a vote of censure on the Society which had sent this black sheep. At last the workers were prevailed upon to agree that their Congress had no call to wander into politics. Even a majority of the French delegates saw that at last, after they had received help from the foreigners, who, presumably, care very little whether the brave General proves ultimately to be the uppermost snake or not. By the efforts of Mr. FENWICK and the foreign delegates, the Congress was saved from undergoing in its very infancy the sad fate which befell the Spanish International. This body, as a delegate from the Peninsula explained, came to an untimely end because the members would persist in wrangling over speculative questions—a not uncommon weakness among workers when they leave their last and take to the stump. For the present one Congress is safe, and can devote itself to voting that it ought to have the moon. It can decide unanimously that no worker should work for more than eight hours, or before sixteen years of age, or should be expected to take less pay for shorter hours.

On the great question who is to speak for the workers there has not been the same agreement. Unluckily, a Marxist opposition has been started to the genuine meeting of delegates—this is their description of themselves. Possibly the Marxist may have another name for them. Whether or no, the Congress which is named or nicknamed after the author of that portentous work Das Kapital will not agree to the terms of the other Congress. And yet they seem moderate enough. The workers—who include the laborious Mr. FENWICK, M.P.; Mrs. ANNIE BESANT; Mr. BROWN, of the American Knights of Labour, who has left his forge, or other place of toil, to cross the Atlantic; Danes, Spaniards, Russians, Prussians, Poles out of Poland, and others who have escaped from slavery to the capitalist to freedom in Paris—made a modest request. It was that the Marxist friends of the worker would be good enough to show some evidence that they were chosen by workers. It was no more than they were prepared to do themselves, as they had shown by spending hours in the examination of their credentials. The Marxists refused to obtemperate to any such demand. So there was no coalition, and the two Congresses will go on separated by the abyss. Far be it from us to decide on the points at issue between these respectable authorities. We do not even know what is the definition of a worker as the word is understood by Congresses. It can hardly include those who do not work with edged tools, spades, or hammers. On the other hand, if it is confined to those who live by weekly wages earned by the toil of their hands, how is it that so many of them are found in possession of the means and leisure to run to Congresses all over Europe? There are a good many persons whom we fear Mr. FENWICK, M.P., would scorn to count as workers, who would find it difficult to leave their avocations to dance attendance at miscellaneous talkee-talkies in foreign capitals. If we may venture to express an opinion, however, it would be that the Marxist Congress was perfectly right in refusing to hear of verification of mandates. It would lead to most absurd results if the representatives of workers were called upon to show that they had ever done a day's work other than writing or speaking in their lives, or to prove that they were expressly chosen by workers. The more shining lights of the order are either honestly convinced faddists with a pill for producing beneficent earthquakes, or shrewd persons who make a business of being delegated. KARL MARX was a specimen of the first, and if we were put to it we should have no difficulty in finding specimens of the second class. If they are subjected to a verification of powers, which of the honourable body of Socialistic reformers will be safe? Therefore they are right in refusing to listen to any such demand, and to go on representing the working class by natural right. Perhaps their day is a little on the wane, and they will not be heard of as they have been; but they would not prolong it by submitting to the demands of Mr. FENWICK, M.P., nor yet Mrs. ANNIE BESANT.

THE RECOVERY OF TITHES.

IT may certainly be said of Ministerial Bills that the larger is as much the enemy of the smaller as the better, according to the French proverb, is of the good. A Government which has been rash enough to promise a "comprehensive measure" for the settlement of any question always finds it exceptionally difficult to carry any less important Bill relating to the same subject. It matters not whether the two relate to wholly distinct branches of the question, whether one deals with points which find no place in the other, whether the passing of the smaller will simplify the enactment of the latter, whether the object of the former is one which presses, while that of the latter will keep indefinitely. The Government who take the course in question find themselves opposed by three forces—a force of faction, a force of pedantry, and a force of hypocrisy. One class of opponents oppose the smaller measure nominally because it is not the larger one, but really because they do not want any legislation at all on the subject. A second, honestly foolish, oppose it because they really believe that there is some occult wisdom or virtue in insisting that perfectly easily separable parts of a subject shall not be separated. And a third class oppose the smaller measure on the same pretext as the first class, not because they do or do not want any legislation at all on the subject, but because they wish to sit on the fence between those who do not and those who do.

There has seldom been a more perfect illustration of the trinoda necessitas which confronts Ministerial legislators in the matter than was furnished by the debate of last Thursday night on the second reading of the Tithe Rent

Charge Recovery Bill. Of course the three classes of opponents to it were, as is always the case, most unequally divided. We have no doubt that there was a certain amount of genuinely wrong-headed objection—such, for instance, as avowed by Major RASCH—to proceeding with this Bill at all except under a distinct pledge from the Government that they would proceed forthwith to introduce their larger measure; but the bulk of the opposition comes from politicians of the type, on the one hand, of Mr. DILLWYN and Mr. THOMAS ELLIS (not the Mr. ELLIS who is drawing up a proscription-list of Irish resident magistrates—that is Mr. JOHN ELLIS), and, on the other hand, of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT and Mr. HENRY FOWLER. The Tithe Rent Charge Recovery Bill has nothing to say, as its name implies, to anything but the question of the mode in which the tithe-owner is to recover his dues from the tithe-payer. Instead of proceeding by the cumbrous and unpopular mode of distraint, he would be empowered under the Bill to proceed for his tithe as for an ordinary debt in the County Court. No question is raised as to the amount of the tithes, as to the incidence of the tithes, as to the proper person to receive the tithes, or as to the application of them when received. The Bill simply says that the person or persons entitled to receive them, whoever they may be, shall henceforth be able to recover them in this way, and not in that way, from the persons liable to pay them. As Mr. MATTHEWS pointed out, the Bill might be accepted with equally good reason by persons the most violently opposed to each other on the whole question of tithe-owning and tithe-paying considered at large. Nobody denies that tithe is a charge upon the land, and that it must and ought to continue to be payable by somebody to somebody, for application to some purpose or other; and, since nobody denies this, nobody can deny that the introduction of a "good, safe, and rational mode of collecting the tithes" would, in any conceivable set of future circumstances, be a change for the better. And, since this also is undeniable, it might seem difficult, if not for Mr. DILLWYN and Mr. THOMAS ELLIS, who would almost admit that, for purposes of their own, they would rather not see a "a good, safe, and rational mode" of tithe-collecting introduced, at any rate for Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, to oppose the present Bill, on the ground that a larger one had been promised. Yet Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT was equal to the feat—a feat equivalent to arguing that it is "piece-meal" procedure on the part of a builder to put doors in a house until he knows the name of the person who will ultimately occupy it. Sir WILLIAM, whose tender recollection of Nun-Appleton and Bolton-cum-Percy, and the ancestral "spade-husbandry allotments," forbid him from desiring, or at any rate admitting a desire, to keep alive a quarrel which is tending to the injury of the Church of England, had, of course, to rely solely upon the contention that the Government were not justified in dealing with the process of tithe-recovery, unless and until they dealt with the tithe-question as a whole. And a mighty elegant thing in contention he made of it; as any one who reads his speech will see.

THE WHITECHAPEL MURDER.

THE murder committed on Tuesday night at Whitechapel has the main distinctive features of the series of similar crimes which occurred a year ago. It was in the same neighbourhood; the victim was a street-walker, her throat was cut, and her body to some extent mutilated; the crime was discovered apparently immediately after its commission; the murderer got clear away, and there is, at the moment of writing, no particular reason to suppose that he has been caught. It is, therefore, considered to be proved that the "fiend or maniac" who is assumed to have committed all the previous murders also committed this one, and that may possibly be the case. The fact is that we know nothing except that eight women have been murdered in a year and a half under closely similar circumstances, and those circumstances are of the most brutal and horrible kind.

It must be depressing to persons suffering from exaggerated enthusiasm of humanity to observe the unquestionably prevailing disposition to take Whitechapel murders as a matter of course. There has been some attempt in the daily press to puff the most recent crime into importance; but this seems to be largely due to the fact that the newspapers just now are exceedingly dull. The SHAH is all very well to stare at, but does not supply exciting reading. Nobody neglects the ordinary business of life in order to talk about the Earl of FIFE. The formal throwing up of the sponge by Mr. PARNELL had been a good deal discounted by his evidence and that of his followers, even if the greater part of the public had not long ago made up its mind as to the merits of the whole proceeding. The pacific condition of the House of Commons is not an isolated phenomenon, but rather an index of the general state of mind, which is one of reasonable content with the existing state of affairs at large. Even so the last murder is not much talked of or thought about. There is not really anything surprising in this. The only element of interest in the Whitechapel murders is the question how the murderer or murderers manage to escape, although he or they must go so near to running great risk of detection. Where a murder is committed, and the murderer escapes in the ordinary way, the problem of discovering the criminal derives most of its interest from the assumption that he was actuated by one or more of the ordinary motives—avarice, revenge, lust, or one of the primary human passions—and that it is mainly through the consideration of these that the guilt must be brought home to the guilty person. In the Whitechapel murders it is pretty clear that no motive has been at work except a disgusting, and happily rare, desire of miscellaneous butchery. There is no reason whatever to suppose that in any of these cases the murderer had any personal ill-will against, or indeed any personal knowledge of, his unfortunate victim. In every case any other woman would have answered his purpose equally well. This makes these murders uninteresting to the student of crime from the romantic point of view—that is, from the point of view of the commentator who studies it for the light it throws upon human nature generally. Again, it follows from the very nature of these crimes that the victims attract as little sympathy as is possible. They have been, without exception, unfortunate and lonely, if not almost friendless, persons. If they had all been mothers of families, or each the centre of a circle of friends and acquaintances, the indignation aroused by their butchery would have been far less abstract and far deeper and more widely spread. This circumstance, too, goes a long way towards explaining the single mystery about the commission of the crimes. The victims put themselves voluntarily at the mercy of the murderer, and unconsciously assist him in avoiding the danger of detection. A very moderate degree of manual skill is all that he requires to enable him to do his work in secrecy and with despatch. It is therefore natural, though not particularly gratifying, that these crimes should fail to arouse any genuine public interest, except in the immediate neighbourhood in which they are perpetrated.

The one observation which can profitably be made upon them is this—that, though it is easy for the murderer in any given instance to escape, it is practically certain that, either now or in future—if there should unhappily be further recurrences of the same sort of crime—he will do something that ought to lead to his detection. It is, therefore, the duty of the police, and of everybody who may in any way be mixed up in the matter, to use every effort that energy can compass or ingenuity suggest for the solution of the mystery. It is worth while to reiterate this very commonplace observation, because of the danger that the apathy, almost amounting to indifference, of the newspaper-reading and newspaper-writing public may infect the persons charged with the duty of detecting criminals. There may be some temptation to feel that the topic is one of dull routine, and to make in a more or less perfunctory manner the investigations which have so often proved fruitless. This is a danger to be guarded against; and it is agreeable to infer from the opportunely published Report of the Commissioner of Police that it has been, and will be, guarded against by the force of which he is the head.

MR. STUART'S PROGRAMME FOR LONDON.

MR. GOSCHEN'S recent speeches are marked with a special purpose, and this conclusion may be drawn from them with perfect confidence: at least one member of the Cabinet—and he no old Tory, but a politician bred in Liberalism and practised in its creed—has some misgivings as to the wisdom of the County Councils Act. To be sure, he limits his observations on that score to the proceedings and plans of the London Council; but his warning remarks have an application far beyond the metropolitan area. The mischiefs he dreads may begin nowhere else, though that is unlikely; but if the Radical Socialists who practically constitute the London Council succeed in planting them in the capital, we may be sure that they will speedily extend to every populous city in Great Britain.

Before Mr. RITCHIE'S Bill became law it was as clear as it is now that a complete change had passed over the party called Radical. Or, rather, the old Radical party had become extinct, just as the old Tory party had disappeared; the place and the name of Radicalism being taken by a faction which never had a footing in English politics before. This is the Radical-Socialist party, which Mr. GOSCHEN perceives to be absorbing the whole forces of the Opposition, while it openly proceeds upon principles of the most lawless and destructive character. But since Mr. RITCHIE'S Bill was discussed there have been no developments in this party that might not have been foreseen—none, indeed, that were unforeseen. Not only one year ago, but two or three years ago, it was obvious enough that the new Radicalism depended for success upon a vigorous Socialist propaganda; a propaganda for which the ground had been prepared, first by the satisfaction of all the demands of the old Reformers, and next by admission to the franchise of a vast number of voters very needy, very ignorant, very impressionable, and more capable of violent “demonstration” than any other set of men in the community. Moreover, it was equally evident at the time of which we speak that, all the more sober and sobering elements of Liberalism being withdrawn from Mr. GLADSTONE'S command, the whole mob of sentimentalists, impressionists, faddists, and downright revolutionaries that were enlisted to make up his forces would combine in due course under the Socialist-Radical flag. No doubt those who foresaw the event believed that it would not be declared till after Mr. GLADSTONE'S retirement from political life or his departure from this mortal scene. But, if we may speak plainly of such things, that could only be a matter of a few years—a period no longer, perhaps, than the natural duration of a single Parliament. Nevertheless, what happened? Without need, without call, certainly without the pressure of popular demand, all the machinery which the Radical Socialists could wish for was placed at their disposal. This was done by the establishment of County Councils, in place of a system of local government which might here and there have got into bad hands (the fault and the remedy lying with the ratepayers alone), but yet a system of which no complaint was heard. When Mr. RITCHIE'S Bill came under debate it was sometimes called a purely Radical measure. Just as often that description of it was denied; it was, in fact, and when properly understood, a strictly Conservative measure. In truth, it was something else. It was a Bill for the equipment and advancement of Radical Socialism. It was a Bill to provide the new Socialist party with a means of getting on, and with official machinery for forcing its principles into practice.

It may be true that, so far, the evils of the change appear distinctly in London alone. But—in London alone! What does that mean? How much is it seen to imply when we remember that the London district now returns sixty members to Parliament; that most of the members depend for election on masses of illiterate and poor men; that these voters, already solicited to discontent by their needs and a deepening sense of them, are now addressed by an organized body of Radical Socialists in authority, who offer them the fun as well as the profit of upsetting a social system which can have no obvious charms for them; and that the Socialist-Radical majority of the Council have not only direct representation in the House of Commons, but are backed to all intents and purposes by an Opposition that has passed into a new phase of activity. It is this last-named circumstance, evidently, which has aroused Mr. GOSCHEN'S misgivings. He sees that the party of Mr. GLADSTONE is ceasing to be Gladstonian. Later revelations and developments convince him, as others are convinced, that not Mr. GLADSTONE alone, but his nearer political associates also, are losing authority; and that “the conditions which are now placed upon him are such that it will be the violent section of his party which will give its character to the future legislation of this country.” More particularly he sees that at the next general election London will certainly be fought on Radical-Socialist principles—a belief which receives special justification from the legislative programme recently issued by Professor STUART on behalf of the majority in the London Council; and the natural inference is, not only that good government in London may be endangered, but that the government of the whole country may be shared by the preachers of Radical Socialism.

Look at Mr. STUART's programme. It includes nine Bills, "introduced by all the London Liberal members." First, there is a Housing of the Working Classes Bill, which "places the necessary cost on the ground-values of London." Next, a Bill for "metropolis rating amendment," placing the capital cost of permanent improvements on the ground landlords. Then comes the Constabulary Bill; the intention of which is to transfer to the friends of Messrs. HYNDMAN, CONYBEARE, and GRAHAM complete control of the London police, though of course those gentlemen may not command a majority in the Council "every time." Under this proposal the police will not always have the same instructions as to the preservation of law and order, but different ones—according as the municipal elections go. Another of the Council's legislative measures deals with the Poor-rate on Radical-Socialist principles. By another the funds of "the City Companies and others" are regulated; while a brace of Bills provide that the Parliamentary franchise shall be altered for the special benefit of "metropolitan occupiers and lodgers." This at once brings back the reflection that none of these changes could be made for London alone. The most important of them could be demanded just as reasonably for all the greater cities in the kingdom; and, being granted to London, would stand as an "anomaly" for indignant protest and immediate removal. And yet there is hardly one of these measures which is not either offensive to good government or menacing to the economic system on which society is built. It appears, then, that London is not alone concerned with the "capture" of its municipal constituencies by the Radical Socialists, or alone affected by the propaganda that proceeds from the London Council. The whole country is concerned with it and affected by it, both socially and politically; especially since the all but complete transformation of Mr. GLADSTONE's following into a Radical-Socialist party, in sympathy with the dearest wishes of Professor STUART.

Mr. GOSCHEN has spoken plainly, but not too soon. It is impossible to undo the mischief that was done when the Local Government Act was passed to establish and endow the New Radicalism; but something may be done before the next elections, municipal and parliamentary, to repeat and emphasize Mr. GOSCHEN's just alarms. This fact at any rate may be insisted on, for it has now become manifest to see. There are still two parties in the State. One is Conservative, though not more Conservative than Liberalism was in its most useful and honourable days. The other is an hitherto unknown sort of Radical party, whose methods begin by destruction and end in experiment. It is between these parties that the choice of the country has now to be made; and between the leaders of those parties, such as they are seen to be.

THE FLORAL PARADE.

TO speak truth with due regard for courtesy, this spectacle did not prove to be altogether so magnificent as a vain people thinks. There was too little of it, and too much of what there was stirred feelings remote from admiration. Among the carriages paraded—less than a score, including dogcarts and such unostentatious vehicles—there were several which might have been pronounced as charming as could be, had not one reached a pitch of excellence which left competition behind. The majority, however, showed rather good intentions than brilliant execution. If the Royal Botanic Society literally wish, as they say, "to encourage the use of Floral decorations as in the South of Europe," hasty and ill-considered festoons of garlands were quite as appropriate as the works of art on which we shall gladly dwell in a moment. They, indeed, represent the type of floral decoration in the South of Europe, according to our experience. But the "Triumphal Canopies, Banners, Flags, Wreaths, Garlands, Triumphal Arches," scattered about the grounds, for competition, really betrayed too much of the sancta simplicitas. That they were inconspicuous is the best that can be said for them in general. Most people went by, or under, without suspicion that such guileless objects could be designed to attract attention. To describe would be heartless, yet, lest the reader should think we exaggerate, one or two must be named, in sorrow, not in anger. Let us hope it was an exhibitor of irresponsible years who set up a twelve-foot length of unplanned deal, with "stays" of string unadorned, and twined round it a garland of laurel, with a poppy and a yellow dahlia at six-inch intervals; so artless the whole arrangement, that eighteen inches of rough white wood and uncertain lengths of unsophisticated string betrayed themselves between each circuit of the scanty wreath. Close by stood another essay of the same infantile school; in this instance the "stays" were pleasantly concealed by calico of varied hue; and branches of laurel, tied on, a foot or two apart, replaced the garland. Similar examples might be noted elsewhere—as the triumphal arch of evergreens by the great conservatory, which most people observed, and all who observed regarded with a puzzled smile; the Triumphal Canopy—of laurel, for the most part, supported on four naked posts borrowed from the lawn-tennis ground; the—but it is enough. To our thinking, these adjuncts of the festival, each bearing its number, seriously entered for a prize, have as much interest as the fine things on the parade-ground. They offer food for thought. If the work of little children—there was no evidence on that point—adults must needs have superintended them, and the management must have acquiesced. There were too many to allow the supposition that it was all a joke. We conclude that the Royal Botanic Society will "meet a want very generally felt," as the advertisements say, by teaching us the art of floral decoration out of doors.

Probably not a few among those thousands of spectators in the brightest and costliest of summer raiment dolefully observed that weather should have been imported from the South of Europe to harmonize with its diversions. Those who came early, indeed, experienced some trying samples of our climate, and those who kept themselves dry hardly kept themselves cheerful until the Princess of Wales brought sunshine with her. The Broad Walk, railed in, made a charming and a brilliant vista nevertheless, such as we do not often behold in this capital, or any other. Though visitors did not try much to aid the general effect by making floral decorations of themselves, most ladies wore a bouquet—generally of roses. Here and there, indeed, an enthusiast displayed a sash constructed of flowers, instead of the usual materials. It looked an uncomfortable article of attire. As for the men, they seemed rather to make a point of abjuring even buttonholes on this occasion. Certainly they were less frequent than at an ordinary fête of the Royal Botanic Society. At four o'clock the Parade opened with Mrs. E. Ledger's victoria, and those who applauded that superb display might well credit that the glories of Nice were going to be superseded. After all, gold is the colour for effect. We call it "staring," if clumsily used; but that means the same thing in an offensive sense. Here all was admirable, from the "running footman" who marched ahead, epauletted, sashed, embosomed in dark-red roses, to the ponderous festoon of gold which overhung the back of the vehicle. One might say with truth, probably, that no inch of harness, or panel, or wheel could be discerned. The horses were jet black, to carry the harmony through; and the ladies, in golden silk, occupied a bower of white lilies. If that magnificent equipage could be beaten, there must be wonders, indeed, behind! It was not beaten, nor approached, in its special department. Next, as many thought—though the judges did not take the same view—was Mrs. Horner's victoria, with an iron-grey pair, and a striking decoration in dark crimson roses, the lady within it wearing green silk to match. The authorities, however, preferred Mr. Sherwood's village cart, and their choice is intelligible. Roses of two colours were employed here—red and pink—in delightful contrast. The wheels especially lent themselves to this combination; the circumference and the axle-box concealed beneath flowers of Duke of Edinburgh, as we imagine; the spokes clothed in La France. But these things, were they not set forth in the daily press? Perhaps the effect of the cavaliers in doublet and trunk hose and plumed hat, and silk stockings, has not had justice done to it. People seemed to be rather bewildered at the sight, not expecting that the customs of the South of Europe would be carried to the pitch of masquerading in broad daylight. This feeling changed to pity as the unfortunates circled slowly round, their poor silken legs visibly shrinking from our British zephyrs. Prettiest sight of all beyond question was the sedan-chair, built up of roses apparently, in which two small boys—one of them a girl, it was said—carried their tiny sister. They wore the dress of the Irish chairmen—light-blue coat, breeches, and white stockings—and the whole made a perfect Meissonier. But it was hard work for such mites to carry even a baby round and round the long course. One of them could not forbear to put down his load in the very presence of the Princess of Wales, and rub his hands ruefully before accepting the prize, which roused equal laughter and commiseration. Another pleasant incident was caused by the proceedings of Master Paget-Bowman's pony, a delightful little beast. This young gentleman thought proper to array himself in armour, with a very long plume in his helmet, which, when he uncovered to salute Her Royal Highness, swept the nose of his little charger. Promptly it resented the tickling insult, snatched the helmet, and refused to give it up, shaking its head prettily.

Upon the whole, though everybody laughed a little, and some a great deal, not without cause, there was more than enough of beautiful display to encourage the Society. We may hope that those who were somewhat absurd, or showed ignorance of the sort of thing required, will profit by the object lesson which was so well set by the minority.

PROFESSIONAL TATTLE.

THERE never was button on the foil that made this hurt. But we surgeons are a secret generation. And, if it were not for hot blood and ill blood, what would become of the two learned faculties? Thus spoke, wisely, the surgeon who dressed

Frank Osbaldistone's hurt after the duel with Rashleigh. And there is every reason to believe that his encomium on his own "faculty" (which might have been extended to the other that profits by hot blood and ill blood) was in the main and in old days well justified. Even men who are not very old can recollect when it was the rarest of things for a doctor to talk about his patients; while a solicitor who talked about his clients' affairs would have either been thought a black sheep, for whom striking off the rolls was too good, or a silly fellow who was not likely to do much harm, because in a very short time he would not have the opportunity of doing any. There are, however, not wanting persons—and those persons not wanting in commerce with the world—who say that all this is quite changed. There was always a certain latitude allowed to doctors in talking of one patient to another for (as the Articles of the Church of England have it) "instruction of life and example of manners." The wonderful effects which Lady — had experienced from the judicious throwing in of bark at the right moment might be justly alleged to induce Mrs. — to take that medicament; and if the Rev. —, who had got to the fanciful stage of gout, received momentary relief in fancy from being exhorted to follow Sir —'s celebrated cure by hot cabbage leaves, neither parson nor baronet could be much hurt by that transaction. The kind of thing to which we are referring is quite different, and must of late years have struck almost any one who frequents dinners, clubs, and places where they talk. At a casual "dinner of boys" some representative of one of the two learned faculties will enliven the circulation of an entrée with an account of the "midlands" (as poor Mr. de la Pluche used to say), of somebody or other who may or may not be known to the company; and it is an interesting question in which case the offence is greater. In the case of public men, bulletins may be drawn up with all the care and discretion in the world, but that will not prevent one of the signatories from whispering some hours later in a drawing-room, to some score or so very particular friends (each of whom has the thing as an exclusive privilege, and under pledge of absolute secrecy), the precise matters which the invalid does not wish to have published. Indeed, perhaps because they are presumed to be more appetizing, it is, as a rule, those precise matters which the invalid does not wish to have published of which the medical adviser of this class is most lavish. To do the other faculty justice, this loquacity does not seem to have affected lawyers quite so much. Yet little birds flit about saying that the popularity of some very popular members of that profession is due directly to the obliging and skilful way in which they dish up A's private affairs for the amusement of B, C, and D.

Now this is vanity and a sore evil. Nor is it difficult or unfair to connect it with that pestilent development of journalism which now and then (as in a case of the lowest kind tried by Mr. Justice Charles the other day) the law steps in to tackle, but of which it is thought by some old-fashioned people that mere law can never take quite the proper cognizance in the proper way. We should be sorry to think that any lawyer or doctor of any mark or likelihood whatever actually traffics paragraphs of gossip against coin of the realm; though, after the vile services which have been rendered by men of honourable professions, there really is no knowing. But the two evils rather come from the same fount than are connected the one with the other as cause and effect. As the gutter journalist caters for the public who pay him pence and halfpence, so does the doctor cater for his miscellaneous friends and actual or possible patients. Legs and arms, heads and st-m-chs, "a, e, i, o, u, and sometimes w and y," and the like, are presumably found as interesting as coats, hosen, and hats, as tittle-tattle about peers and penny-a-liners, and as those astonishing paragraphs which make the round of the lower class of newspaper, telling how Mr. Jones, who wrote Hootings of an Owl in the Wilderness, is five feet high, has red hair and squints, abides at a bower of roses in the vicinity of Peckham, and busies himself, by way of an amusement for his leisure hours, in collecting cigarette-ends. One sometimes wonders whether the men and women who listen (for they do listen) to stories about my Lord A's inside from the person whom my Lord A—good man!—has just fee'd, in the belief that the state of his inside will no more be talked of by his doctor than the state of his conscience by his confessor, ask themselves the surely obvious question, Is this the way he talks about Me? Apparently they do not; for the greatest babblers in the faculty are often the most achalandés. But, however this may be, the thing is, as has been said, an obvious nuisance; it is increasing, and it ought to be put down. In both the professions into which it seems to have crept professional opinion has a pretty considerable power, and it is surely time for it to see whether that power cannot be exerted to restore the old standard of etiquette, or rather of decency and honour.

RACING.

THE days in which the Northumberland Plate was the only great event in the racing world between Ascot and the Newmarket July Meeting are things of the past, and we may dismiss that race for this year by saying that it was won by Lord Durham's five-year-old mare, Drizzle, a winner of half a dozen aces last season, who had only 6 st. 10 lbs. on her back, and that the race was chiefly remarkable for the light weights carried by the seven starters, not one of whom carried more than the winner, while most of them carried much less. On the following day a field of twenty-two came out for the Seaton Delaval Plate of 1,500*l.*, for two-year-olds, and the race was won by Loup, a chestnut colt with a great deal of quality, capital loins, and wide, muscular quarters, to whom we shall have to refer presently. On the same day, at Sandown, the Electric Stakes of 2,000*l.* was won by Mr. H. Milner's filly, Listen, who started first favourite on the strength of a reported private trial, her only public performances having been to run unplaced at Leicester last year and to tumble down when running for the Prince of Wales's Stakes at Newmarket this spring. On the last day of the Sandown First Summer Meeting, Chevalier Ginistrelli's Signorina, of whom we shall have more to say by-and-bye, gave her backers what servant-women call "a turn," for after 5 to 2 had been laid freely upon her, she barely won the British Dominion Stakes by a head, after a tremendous struggle with the Duke of Westminster's Orwell, a Bend Or colt, to whom she was giving 12 lbs. and sex.

On the first day of the Bibury Club Meeting, Lord Zetland's brown filly, Margarine, who had won her only other race, now won the Champagne Stakes of 825*l.*, the third in the race being Merry Monk, for whom Lord Dudley had given 2,250 guineas last year. In the preceding race Mr. C. Rose's Arcadia, who had previously won a couple of races worth 1,535*l.*, was beaten by a head by Mr. N. Fenwick's beautiful filly, Pluie d'Or, by Bend Or; and Mr. R. H. Combe's Imogene, who was giving the other pair 5 lbs., was only a neck behind Arcadia. It looked a very close thing between them; but, as it is said that Imogene hit her leg on the way to the post, that Arcadia's saddle slipped, and that Pluie d'Or swerved, it is difficult to say what the running was really worth. The same afternoon the hitherto unbeaten Semolina won the Bibury Club Home-Bred Foal Stakes, and she walked over for a stake a couple of days later, achieving her eighth victory with considerably over 5,000*l.* to her credit. A description of this famous filly's first defeat, which occurred on Wednesday last, will not come within the province of this article. There was a pretty race for the Stockbridge Cup between Lord Hastings's St. Patrick, Mr. W. Low's Napoleon, and Lord Penrhyn's Noble Chieftain, who were divided by half a length and a neck; and at the weights they carried it was an even closer affair than it looked; but we shall have to show later on that this form was all upset last week at Newmarket. An hour later the Selling Plate farce was played once more, when Mr. H. S. Leon's two-year-old brown filly, Swallowtail, was sold for no less than 820 guineas more than the 200*l.* which her owner was to receive for her. On the last day of the Stockbridge Meeting Mr. H. Milner's Riviera, the future heroine of the valuable Portland Stakes, won the Hurstbourne Stakes of 1,150*l.*, "hands down by a length," from Prince Soltykoff's Keythorpe, the winner of a Triennial at Ascot.

At Kempton Park, in the presence of the Shah, Chevalier Ginistrelli's Signorina, who, like Semolina, was unbeaten, won the Kempton Park Grand Two-Year-Old Stakes. Although she started first favourite, many people expected her to be beaten by Mr. J. H. Houldsworth's Alloway, an immense colt, by Springfield out of Lady Morgan, that was running in public for the first time, but was said to have been proved in private to be superior to Martagon, a colt in his stable that had run Signorina to a head at Manchester. Signorina, however, gave him (counting sex) the equivalent of 7 lbs. and a beating by half a length; so the reported trial—if, indeed, it ever took place—can hardly have been correct, and, on Wednesday last, he showed very moderate form at Leicester.

The Princess of Wales's Handicap of 2,000*l.*, on the last day at Kempton, was a very unsatisfactory race, as there was one of the worst starts of the season, and the finish was spoilt by Martley, who, at the distance, tried to "savage" Thunderstorm, and then swerved against Johnny Morgan. The latter colt, nevertheless, managed to win by a neck from Thunderstorm, who, by the way, died in consequence of an accident at Reading Railway Station two days afterwards. Lord Hartington won the Kempton Park International Two-Year-Old Plate of 1,000*l.* with his neatly-made chestnut colt, Marvel, who gives every promise of proving a useful racehorse.

The favourite for the July Stakes, on the first day of the Newmarket July Meeting, was the Duke of Hamilton's Loup, who, as we have already said, had won the Seaton Delaval Plate at Newcastle. He now beat Keythorpe at least as easily as Riviera had beaten him at Stockbridge. Fielders won heavily over the Visitors' Handicap, which was won by Mr. G. Haughton's Arundel, against whom 20 to 1 had been laid. He had run eight times before this season without winning a single race. Curious form, again, was shown by Lord Penrhyn's Noble Chieftain in winning the Bottisham Plate in a canter by three lengths; for, as we observed above, St. Patrick and Napoleon, who finished in front of him at Stockbridge, appeared to be at least his equals at the weights; yet now Fullerton, Love-in-Idleness, and the hitherto unbeaten two-year-old, Scotch Earl, had not a chance with him. The Bunbury Plate (for which 11 to 4 was laid on Napoleon, and 8 to 1 was offered in vain against Robin Hood) was an interesting example of the paradox, so often apparent in racing, that things equal to the same are not always equal to one another, for Robin Hood now beat Napoleon at even weights, and therefore seemed to be equal to Fullerton, because Napoleon had beaten Noble Chieftain at 10 lbs., and Noble Chieftain had beaten Fullerton by several lengths at even weights—yet, strange to say, for the Hunt Cup at Ascot, when receiving 41 lbs. from Fullerton, Robin Hood had finished a long way behind him. It is but fair to add that Fullerton only ran fourth for that race, a head behind the third.

The racing on the second day at Newmarket was not very interesting. Mr. Lowther won the first and the last races. The Thursday's racing was more important. St. Helen, who finished second for the Oaks in Rêve d'Or's year, several lengths in front of Hawthorn, was now handicapped as much as 31 lbs. below that filly for the Hare Park Handicap, which she won easily. Three two-year-olds that had cost 7,450 guineas as yearlings ran for a Private Post Sweepstakes of 250 guineas each, and there did not appear to be many pounds difference between them, as Lord Dudley's Merry Monk, who was stopping at the finish, only won by half a length from Mr. W. Low's rather lightly-made Gold Wing, who was three-quarters of a length in front of Mr. W. De La Rue's somewhat backward Heckberry, an own brother to Energy. The Chesterfield Stakes was an interesting race, because Baron de Rothschild's Heaume, who had run the famous Surefoot to a length at Ascot, and had good claims to be considered the second best colt of his year, was to meet Riviera, Loup, and two new-comers in the Duke of Portland's Memoir and Lord Calthorpe's Wood Nymph. Riviera was the favourite, but, after a sharp struggle, Heaume won by three-quarters of a length from Loup, who beat Riviera by a neck. This form has been directly reversed during the present week in the Portland Stakes; but we must reserve our notice of that race for a future occasion. A terrible mistake was made when 2 to 1 was laid on "Mr. Abington's" Pioneer for the Midsummer Plate, as Antibes, to whom he was giving 9 lbs. besides weight for sex, beat him by a length. This was an immense improvement upon Antibes's running at Ascot, where she had only finished sixth to Pioneer. Mr. J. Lowther, who was in great form at the meeting, won the Ellesmere Stakes with King Monmouth from Colonel North's Royal Star, whom he had purchased two days earlier for 1,900 guineas. Lord Hartington's smart filly, Marvel, continued her victorious career in the Stud Produce Stakes.

Previous public form had been considerably upset during the week; but the grand climax occurred in the race for the July Cup on the Friday, when Prince Soltykoff's Mephisto, who had been unplaced to St. Patrick, Napoleon, and Noble Chieftain at Stockbridge, won easily by a length from St. Patrick, although he was only meeting him on 6 lbs. better terms, while Noble Chieftain, with 5 lbs. better terms, finished twice as far behind St. Patrick as he had done at Stockbridge, and Napoleon, who had been a neck in front of Noble Chieftain at Stockbridge, now only ran fifth, although there was no alteration in their relative weights. We should add that, whereas Napoleon gave St. Patrick 5 lbs. and ran him to half a length at Stockbridge, he could not now get within some lengths of him at even weights. When horses belonging to owners above all shadow of suspicion run in such in-and-out fashion, it may be well to be charitable in judging the form shown by the horses of less reputable racing-men. One more instance of the perversity of horseflesh was afforded in the next race, when the Duke of Westminster's Lozenge, who was said to have "scarcely touched an oat" since her arrival at Newmarket on the Monday and to be altogether "off colour," beat a field of fourteen two-year-olds for the Princess of Wales's Cup, as if in the very best of health and spirits.

A large quantity of blood stock has been sold during the last few weeks. The Royal yearlings realized 11,745 guineas, at an average of nearly 420 guineas, the highest price being 3,000 guineas, which was given by Colonel North for a colt by Hampton out of Land's End. The Newmarket sales were some of the most successful ever held there. On the Monday, Lord Rosslyn's mares and foals made high prices. As much as 1,750 guineas was paid for Feronia, a mare twenty-one years old, with a filly foal. Her daughter, Allegra, with a colt foal, was purchased by Mr. D. Baird for 4,000 guineas; and 1,500 guineas was given for her daughter, April Fool, who had distinguished herself by running in thirty-seven races, and winning only three. The Duke of Portland gave 3,000 guineas for Miss Middlewick, a brood mare by Scottish Chief out of Violet. Lord Willoughby de Broke gave 1,800 guineas for Joyeau, and 1,100 guineas for her foal by St. Simon. Among what were termed "miscellaneous properties," Little Sister (the dam of Thunderstorm, whose death we have already noticed), with a foal by Saraband, made 2,000 guineas. On the Tuesday, a yearling by Isonomy was purchased for 2,500 guineas by Colonel North, and one by Hampton for 2,600 guineas by Mr. D. Baird, while Mr. E. Baird gave 2,000 for another by Xenophon. Among older horses, Paloma, a three-year-old that had been beaten in each of the five races for which she had run this season, was also purchased by Mr. E. Baird for 2,100 guineas. On the Wednesday, Captain Machell gave 3,000 guineas for a yearling by Isonomy, and Mr. W. Low 2,500 for one by Galliard. The next day, the seven Blankney yearlings averaged about 1,120 guineas apiece; a colt by Bend Or, among the Mentmore yearlings, made 2,050 guineas; and one by Sterling, from the Yardley Stud, 2,250. We have dwelt at some length on these sales in order to show that the increase of valuable stakes is influencing the price of fashionably-bred blood stock.

FREE-TRADE IN DISEASE.

ABOUT thirteen months ago there was a discussion in the House of Commons which did as little credit to that body as any discussion which has taken place during the existence of the present Parliament. The leaders of a movement characterized by everything which is opposed to Christian charity, to good sense, and to science fastened upon admitted defects in the working of certain regulations to deliver a general attack upon a whole system of beneficial enactments in India. It was then made apparent how far public opinion has advanced in enlightenment during the last few years, and with what rare courage the House of Commons is prepared to discharge the important stewardship entrusted to it. Not very long since the Contagious Diseases Act in England was repealed by a snap vote of the House of Commons, when even Liberal Ministers, who are more exposed to the dictation of uninformed sentiment than their opponents, were half disposed to vindicate their official responsibilities. But the effect of Mr. Stansfeld's chance victory, magnified as it was by his fanatical following, has been to take the backbone out of men of sense and experience, and to reduce them in public pitifully to acquiesce in mischief for which they cannot find language of contempt and condemnation severe enough in private. The Government occupied a strong position when the day came for Mr. McLaren's motion last June. It was one thing to repeal the Act in England. No man of sense and humanity could certainly approve the repeal. But, after all, the conditions of life make the enforcement of such salutary legislation in England more difficult; and the country is not responsible for exposing its soldiers to such peculiar temptations as surround them in India. There the young soldier is deprived of the influences and distractions which attend him at home; and, as the proportion of married men is necessarily very small, his lot is virtually one of enforced celibacy. For, in spite of all that has been done and is being done in India to give the European private occupation and amusement, the boy-soldier (for short service has given us mere youths infinitely liable to temptation) must often be cooped up all through the hot days in dreary and monotonous barracks, where the only surroundings are the purlieus inhabited by the camp-followers. Here, if anywhere, the Government which sends the soldier out is responsible for mitigating the consequences of placing him in so trying a life—consequences which will be inevitable as long as human nature endures. This would seem to be a plain duty, and one in which Government should be kept up to the mark by the sense of the entire community.

We could wish the obligation had been put plainly before the country last summer. And, indeed, we have reasons for believing that such was the original intention of the proper authorities. But when the time came a panic was discovered in the ranks, and the discovery affected the leaders with even more alarming pusillanimity. One honourable member dared not face the feeling in his constituency; another even embraced (though he was really ashamed to avow it) the opportunity of setting himself right with certain people for a former vote; and it was reported that scarcely some poor forty or fifty men could be got to have the courage of convictions that were shared, at the most moderate estimate, by two-thirds of the House. Therefore, although some good sense was talked by Sir J. Gorst, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, and Sir R. Temple, the position was practically surrendered at discretion, and no authoritative attempt was made to show Mr. McLaren and his friends that, after all, Christian charity was not ranked on their side, or to demonstrate to the good people who voted that "what is morally wrong cannot be politically right," where the morality came in, and in what direction. We do not wish, however, to dwell upon the scene, or to recapitulate incidents so disgraceful, including the unctuous tributes which were paid to the motives of the repealers. The Indian Government was naturally forced to accept the somewhat unconstitutional interference of the House of Commons; and a despatch in accordance with Mr. McLaren's views was sent out by the Secretary of State. Nine out of thirteen members of his Council, however, recorded their dissent, foreseeing the result. What was then feared and foreseen is now reported to have come too terribly to pass. A positively alarming spread of disease has quickly followed upon the abolition of the Acts. The Indian papers of last mail announce that Lord Lansdowne's Government have been obliged to draw up a remonstrance, or at any rate to lay the whole state of the evil before the authorities at home. They may have no hope of affecting Mr. McLaren and his friends, but it is as well that the facts should be known, and the responsibility shifted to the proper quarter. It is, indeed, time. Free-trade in disease has, within a year, brought down two out of every five men throughout the strength of the European establishment in India. Or, to put it in another way, a whole brigade is put miserably hors de combat (just when Sir Wilfrid Lawson is overflowing with pity for the Dervishes), and last June's discussion has cost the nation more than many a regular engagement. It is not, however, on the grounds of the efficiency of our troops that any expostulation can be addressed to the deliberate promoters of this evil. Nor can they be asked to reconcile the consequences of their action with their own extraordinary professions. Mr. McLaren, though he would probably care for a drunkard who had brought on delirium tremens by persistent intemperance, would let the victim of his own inexperience waste in disease, and argue that the world was better for the (moral) lesson conveyed by his suffering. But may not some of the reasonable people and honourable members who condemn this fearful mischief in private pluck up courage enough to proclaim their faith also in public, now they realize the magnitude of the evil their cowardice has contributed to foster?

HOW NOT TO TRACE YOUR OWN PEDIGREE.

FEW people are absolutely without some sort of interest in the lives of their ancestors, and yet very few indeed have successfully accomplished the somewhat difficult task of tracing their own pedigree. It is a matter that requires a lavish expenditure of time and trouble, and usually the results attained are so trifling that "practical" men rarely inquire into their family history unless there is some possibility or probability of pecuniary results. Except with some such object in view the vaguest family traditions suffice for the average Briton. There are, however, persons who make up their minds to write their family history, but, being entirely without genealogical skill, they are quite at sea until some good friend recommends to them Phillimore's How to Write the History of a Family and Rye's Records and Record Searching. With these handbooks the amateur genealogist need waste no time in his self-imposed duties, and, if not frightened by the immense mass of material to be searched, he ought to turn out a creditable family history, assuming, of course, that he has a family, and that his family has a history.

Phillimore and Rye are not the only authors who claim to guide the faltering steps of the inexperienced genealogist. In fact, quite recently a neatly-printed pamphlet of forty pages has been published with the following title:—How to trace your own Pedigree, or, a Guide to Family Descent. By P. Fancourt Hodgson, late Clerk of Heralds' College, London. Being a Handbook, by consulting which any person may trace his own pedigree, either for legal or literary purposes. For the former purpose to show a right to titles, estates, or unclaimed money in Chancery. For the latter purpose to trace descent from an honoured family. It will also be found invaluable to the American and Colonist wishing to trace his ancestry in the Old Country. (London: Pickering & Chatto.) Notwithstanding the frequent repetition of several words the title is a striking one, and promises sufficient to make the mouth water. By the use of these marvellous forty pages (according to the author) any person may trace his own pedigree "to show a right to titles, estates, or unclaimed money"; and those who have a noble scorn for pelf may yet be glad, under the immediate direction of one claiming to be an ex-official of Heralds' College, to "trace descent from an honoured family"! This is such a magnificent promise that one instinctively turns to the little instrument that is to do so great a work; but the result of an examination hardly bears out the lavish anticipations of the title-page. Of course Mr. P. Fancourt Hodgson, late Clerk of Heralds' College, has compiled his book at the request of numerous friends, and equally of course he has never heard of the two essential books we have named; for he informs us that there have been "a few works" published with a similar object, "but these have been expensive, and are now mostly difficult to obtain"; and he therefore "submits this book of reference to the public, at a cost which will render it accessible to all, and which will supply full information in a condensed form on the subject up to date"; and trusts that he may in some measure help to advance the "science of proving family descent." The books we have mentioned are neither expensive nor difficult to obtain. The pamphlet of Mr. P. Fancourt Hodgson, late Clerk, &c., is, no doubt, still cheaper; but it labours under the disadvantage of being useless when it has been obtained. Mr. Hodgson announces a novel discovery that he has made—namely, that in the public libraries of the kingdom "it has been noticed that genealogical works and MSS. are more consulted than any other class of literature." This discovery should be of interest to librarians, who have hitherto been under the delusion that fiction was most in demand at the institutions in their charge, and ought also to solve the doubt that exists in many minds as to genealogy being a department of literature at all. Nor is it open to Mr. Hodgson to claim that it is a form of fiction; for that is said only by those who sit in the seat of the scornful, and could not be the judgment of one who claims to be a high priest of genealogy. The genealogical tyro will probably first turn to the chapter on preliminary steps. Now to an ordinary person the first step in making a pedigree would be to have a chat with some of the oldest members of his family, and to extract from them such information as would form a sound basis upon which to work. But Mr. Hodgson not being an ordinary person, sends his reader first to the family deed-box and, failing a deed-box, to the old family Bible. Why the Bible is only to be consulted when there is no deed-box, Mr. Hodgson does not explain.

The anxious inquirer, having obtained a few links of the pedigree, has next to find out the origin of his surname, and then to ascertain whether or not the family is entitled to coat armour. When he has got so far, he is thought to be strong enough to venture among the MSS. at the Heralds' College, British Museum, and elsewhere. At the Museum the pupil of the late Clerk of Heralds' College has considerable work cut out, for he is told that he should consult the Cottonian, Harleian, Egerton, Lansdowne, Sloane, Royal, and Additional MSS. Wills and parish registers are rightly described as important, but the neophyte might usefully be informed that many thousand wills have been indexed by local Societies, and that a number of parish registers are now safely in print. The account of the Public Record Office is not quite so slipshod as the rest of the book, though the author refers to the "folios" of Sims's "Manual" instead of to its "pages," has not heard of the "Index Library," and forgets to mention that the Recusant Rolls do not come down to the present time, as recusancy is no longer an offence at law.

The chapter devoted to printed sources is one of the most amusing in the book. It consists of a list, purporting to mention "several of the different classes of books and publications, and, in many cases, the names of the books themselves, which may profitably be consulted." Five pages are occupied by this list, in which Mr. Hodgson has carefully and thoughtfully prefixed "A.D." to the dates, so that no one will be tempted to regard Stacey Grimaldi as a pre-Christian author. Notwithstanding this care, the list is one to give a painful shock to the bibliographer. Foster's "Collectanea" is called "Miscellanea, Foster's," John Burke's History of the Commoners is ascribed to his son, Sir Bernard; while the Gentleman's Magazine, the London Magazine, the European, G. E. C.'s New Peerage, and Howard's Miscellanea, each occur twice. On the other hand, books like Foster's Alumni Oxonienses, Anthony à Wood's great work, and the Athenæ Cantabrigienses are not mentioned at all. The list of societies "established for genealogical and kindred purposes" does not include the Chetham, the Oxford Historical, or the Surtees Society. The "Lists of Foreign Protestants," published by the Camden Society, is ignorantly set out as two separate books. The chapter on "Other Useful Sources of Information" is filled with a variety of odds and ends which the author appears to have forgotten to classify into their proper places. Thus coats of arms and seals should surely have been dealt with in the heraldic chapter. A few lines in this, the last chapter but one of the book, is the first occasion on which the author speaks of the value of family tradition.

Although Mr. Hodgson informs us that he has taken some pains to make his book useful to Americans, he must not be annoyed if the long-headed Yankees decline to follow implicitly the lead of an author who misquotes the title of such a well-known book as Hotten's Original Lists, and spells Massachusetts with only one t. The New Englanders would not have pardoned this, even to Artemus Ward, much less to Mr. P. Fancourt Hodgson, who is merely an unconscious humourist. While studying the American part of Mr. Hodgson's book a dreadful suspicion occurs that perhaps this muddle-headed pamphlet is not quite as original as the author would like us to suppose. But let us put it down to mere coincidence that the New England Register has the same number of volumes in 1889 that it had in 1887 when it was named in Mr. Phillimore's book; that the list of American Societies and of English Public Libraries named by Mr. Hodgson and by Mr. Phillimore are almost identical, though in his list of libraries the late Clerk of Heralds' College has omitted the Incorporated Law Society, and has inserted the University College Library, Cambridge, an institution for which the Cambridge Calendar may be searched in vain. Seriously speaking, a person trying under the literary guidance of this book to compile a family history would be put on the wrong track immediately, would waste time looking in deed-chests when he ought to be interviewing his grandmother, and would be trotting up to London from the country to get from a musty and illegible manuscript information that he could have seen in print at the nearest public library. Mr. Hodgson is probably incorrigible; but to any future genealogical pamphleteer we would say, be careful to name the authorities from whom you borrow phrases, lists of societies, and such like; at least quote correctly; do not commit more errors in grammar than you can help; and, finally, obtain a copy of How to trace your own Pedigree, by Mr. P. Fancourt Hodgson, late Clerk of Heralds' College, London, and use it as an almost unerring indication of what should not be done.

SOME HUMOURS OF SOMERSET HOUSE.

SOMERSET House is a bulky edifice daily to be discovered between the Strand and the river, on the site of the Protector's old mansion. It was erected in its present form after designs by Sir William Chambers, and its stately façade, one of the ornaments of our city, is a notable example of Palladian architecture. A wing of this building is given up to the public service in the capacity of General Registry of Births, Marriages, and Deaths. The ground so far is one of common knowledge. The careless individual, however, who directs his steps along the pavement extending between Temple Bar and Charing Cross, and who stops midway in his course, would probably not be led to think that a fund of quiet merriment lay hidden behind the massive stonework, the solemn portals and pillars which abut so severely at this point upon the Strand. Who being in search of the risible would descend on Somerset House? The interest here, it might be supposed, is all for the statist, the statesman, the man of Blue Books. Yet there is no lack of humour here, notwithstanding; jokes, it is true, not excruciatingly amusing, rather those of old men and of thoughtful people, for the most part. Indeed, could a man spend his days in these sombre chambers, life exist in the dreary round of "general search" and incessant entry, if the law of compensation had not provided some such solace? Droll records, quaint instances of registration, striking coincidences stumbled upon in dull hours and amid the colourless routine work by which wages are earned, lucky wind-falls of the intellect that, like the judicial bons-mots which relieve some blank proceeding of the Chancery Division, serve to put new energy into dejected heads; that beguile the travail of a day; that in a moment exceptionally propitious may even send a series of precise and official laughs floating right through the thick masonry which divides the street from the scene of registration labour.

With these clerical jokes, if they come to be marshalled on paper, there is a fatal generic drawback—they lose in the process of transplanting so much of their excellence. The genius loci is essential. It is almost a shame to dig them out. It needs the air of Somerset House, the every-day drudgery of the Civil Service, to impart to the appetite that especial zest, that flavour to the palate, which brings satisfaction to the taster—who ought to be a clerk engaged hourly in the making of books such as Lamb would not have described as literature. To be appreciated fully, these jokes must be turned up in the pages of the registers. To find them really sportive, the reader must hunt them down in the orthodox manner. Further, he must not really be hunting for them when he discovers them, but hit upon them haphazard just when he is thinking of something else that is wearisome.

There is, by way of example, the memorable case of Mr. Yellow and Mrs. Blue. They were husband and wife, it will be recollected. They had one child, a daughter, who no sooner came of age than she abjured her patronymic, causing her friends to receive an intimation that in future she would be found at home only as Miss Green. The matter did not end here. During several weeks of a particular leap year, when her mind was a gale of excitement, she was on the verge of proposing marriage to a Mr. Red, her complementary colour, whom she learned to know through the columns of a match-making newspaper. She had already settled, among other things, to name her offspring Master or Miss White, in agreement with the exigencies of sex, when suddenly her plans came to the ground with a clatter, and, turning filial once again, she eventually died as she had been born, as Miss Yellow, prematurely and disconsolate, amid the derision of all who knew her, a baffled chameleon. Her conduct seems inexplicable. It was certainly reprehensible. But they who are informed are aware that there was method in Miss Yellow's vagaries; in taking the several steps enumerated above she was only doing her best to fulfil the conditions of an eccentric testament by which considerable property was left to her if she acceded to its provisions. And most assuredly she would have become Mrs. Red, with property in her own right, if the will on which her hopes depended had not been overturned in the courts, and her testator declared mad at the time of its execution. His mind had been fired by Sir Isaac Newton's discovery of the blending of the prismatic hues. An isolated case of this nature can be little impressive, particularly when we have the rationale at our hand. But the coincidence of names becomes singular, curious, startling, when we have read of thousands of Yellows and Blues who have married, not with one another, but quite without method or humour, and about whose descendants there is nothing that is not absolutely commonplace.

The registers disclose a number of striking combinations of Christian name and surname, some of which are ingenious:—

Front-name.	Surname.
Ether	Spray
Foot	Bath
Pascal	Lamb
River	Jordan
Morning	Dew
Christopher	Corpse
Offspring	Dear
Smith Follows	Smith
Orange	Lemmon
Colonel	Sergeant
Ever Virtuous	Sanders
Rose Shamrock	Anthistle
Mily Miles	Mills Overy
Thomas	White Hatt

Of these, "Rose Shamrock Anthistle," at any rate, is good for a daughter of the United Kingdom.

Christian names of the more ambitious kind are plentiful. A son is named "Arthur Wellesley Wellington Waterloo Cox" (Births, 5 A. p. 318); another "Napoleon the Great" (2 B. 307). A labourer calls his daughter "Lady Elizabeth" (1 D. 674). There is an instance of a hereditary knighthood or baronetcy formed in this manner, where a father, "Sir Francis" Howard, registers his son anew as "Sir Francis" (1 C. 340). Charles Hassall, described on the register as a medical herbalist, and presumably as anything we please in real life, comes to his son's assistance with the front-names, "Doctor Jervis St. Vincent Beresford" (8 C. 322). The son of "Horatio Nelson" Baker is named "Ewart Gladstone" (1 A. 637). Jewett, a parent of sporting proclivities, registers his child "Edward Byng Tally Ho Forward" (11 A. March 1865). An innkeeper's son is "Robert Alma Balaclava Inkermann Sebastopol Delhi Dugdale" (8 E. 512, November 1857). A long name bestowed by a Chartist on his daughter is "Fanny Amelia Lucy Ann Rebecca Frost O'Connor Douall Luck Holberry Duffy Oastler Hill" (16, 298, September 1842). "One Too Many" (4 A. 81) and "Not Wanted James" (1 D. 312) are the titles of unfortunate children. "Is it Maria" (8, 367) discloses a parental mystification answered, in the case of the other sex, by "That's It, Who'd Have Thought It" (2 A. 505). "George Henry" is subsequently prefixed to this absurd string of derivations. The wife of Thomas registers her son as "Young Thomas" (5 A. 173), and James Stewart calls his son "Young James Gorston" (6 D. 454). The daughter of John Buckingham Smith is christened "Laughing Waters" (sic), which later gives way in the "certificate of naming" to "Minnehaha." "Richard Cœur de Lion Tyler Walter Hill" (1 A. 13) is a further instance of pompous names.

Stillborn children are not registered. Yet a child is entered as having died aged "a few seconds" (9 A. 201). A singular entry is that of a child registered, without name, as of "sex unknown" (8, 440).

Humour is less rampant in the sphere of marriage entry. Emily Walton, however, is wedded to a husband called "Tighu ma qual O'Temerah Hope de Hindley Turner" (9 C. 147). In the register of marriage a column is set aside for the "condition" of the parties, whether they be spinster, bachelor, widow, or widower. On p. 149, vol. xviii., the bridegroom is described as "fat," the bride as "somewhat lean." The ecclesiastic presumably responsible for this entry is yet entrusted with the care of 470 souls; and as his waggishness occurred half a century ago, we may believe he has long since chanted an appropriate palinode.

Among deaths, Richard Toohair is similarly described as a "living skeleton" (8 B. 534). The occupation of a man deceased is given as "Passionist" (8 B. 526). A schoolmaster at Knighton, in the Principality, dies of "political stroke"; this, too, as early as 1839. Here is a coincidence which perhaps yields to an ill-natured explanation; two officials of the same parish—one rate-collector, the other overseer—make away with themselves in the same week (5 B. 283). Births show a more notable coincidence where two children of the same family are born on leap-year day—one in 1868, the other in 1880.

Many parents, usually of the lower middle class, find pleasure in giving their children a plurality of names. Brown, a clerk in the Income-tax Department, calls his daughter Sarah Jane Mary Ann Emma Elizabeth Caroline Isabella Eliza Martha Catherine Matilda Evelyn Margaret Rosamond. This string is sufficiently lengthy; but Sarah . . . Brown is outpaced by the twenty-six titles borne by the daughter of Arthur Pepper, a laundryman, whose girl's name is one of the longest, if not the very longest, in existence. Spread out its entire length it runs—Ann Bertha Cecilia Diana Emily Fanny Gertrude Hypatia Inez Jane Kate Louise Maud Nora Ophelia Quince Rebecca Starkey Tereza Ulysis (sic) Venus Winifred Xenophon Yetty Zeus. She has a name for each letter of the alphabet, and her names, with the exception of the surname, which of course is last, are in alphabetical order. She was born in 1883; and, if she has not subsided under the weight of her christening, she may be yet with us. Frankly, let us not grudge Ann Pepper her good fortune; we cannot attain to it ourselves; we admit as much and yield, for our forbears have neglected us. Let her enjoy her position, the privilege of first, while she may. She cannot hold it long. When it is known that she has precedence by dint of the many names bestowed on her by her godfathers and godmothers, she will be met, challenged, and easily defeated by a rival, some weakling of the cradle whose baby laughter little suspects the horrid length to which nomenclature has advanced in its regard. There is no end to the resources of name-giving. A new hand will hold the palm, a new record be established, were it needful that a new form of registration-book be designed with pages sufficiently large to contain it.

These are some examples of registration humour; they are select in the sense that they are not exhaustive, but they are not select in the completest sense, for to the fortunate or careful searcher they may not be the best. The general philosophical reflections suggested by them are obvious. At any rate, there is no room for them here.

DIE MEISTERSINGER AT COVENT GARDEN.

MR. AUGUSTUS HARRIS may be sincerely congratulated on the result of his bold experiment of producing the Meistersinger in Italian, with an international cast, last Saturday. The difficulties to be overcome were so considerable, that a decidedly inadequate performance might have been justly received with much forbearance; but, owing to the great care and zeal that have evidently been lavished on the work by all concerned in it, an interpretation has been secured that in many points challenges comparison with any that has been yet heard. To our thinking, the most remarkable feature of last Saturday's representation was indubitably to be found in the Hans Sachs of M. Lassalle—an impersonation from every point of view of extraordinary excellence. Always a good actor, M. Lassalle has perhaps never before attained so complete a mastery over any part committed to his charge, and of his singing it would be difficult to speak with too much praise. His intonation was faultless throughout, and his delivery of the noble music of the third act such as only great artists can attain to. He is worthy of high commendation for the total absence of any approach to the excessive emphasis which has hitherto characterized the interpretation of some of the most able exponents of the part. Why the opening of "Wahn! wahn!" should have been suppressed it is not easy to understand. The other and less important cuts have been as judiciously executed as cuts can ever be. The praises of so admirable an artist as M. Jean de Reszke need not be written here, and it seems almost unnecessary to say that his Walther was a refined and thoughtful impersonation. It struck us, however, on a first hearing as falling a trifle short in the poetic fire and inspiration which distinguish the character. Mme. Albani has never been heard to greater advantage than in the part of Eva, the beautiful writing with which it abounds throughout the third act being brought by her into especial prominence. On the Beckmesser of Signor Isnardon we have much praise to bestow. He sang the difficult music committed to his charge with correctness and style; but he may perhaps be accused of endowing Wagner's gnarled and desiccated pedant with some faint approach to a heartier humour than that eminently acrid conception can admit of. M. Montariol, on the other hand, is perhaps somewhat wanting in richness of humour in his otherwise excellent rendering of David. The Magdalena of Mlle. Bauermeister and the Kothner of M. Winogradoff are distinctly important and agreeable features in the present interpretation. Signor Mancinelli has in the main acquitted himself creditably of his difficult task, but his departures from the tempi enforced at Bayreuth are not happy; the manner in which the overture was played was somewhat coarse and noisy, and the beautiful introduction to the third act met with inadequate treatment. There is at present a certain want of nervous accent and delicate light and shade felt throughout in the orchestra; but these are no doubt defects which will be to a great extent remedied at subsequent performances. The choruses are in the main satisfactory. We owe a debt of gratitude to Signor Mazzucato for his brilliantly successful Italian version—an admirable and arduous achievement without which satisfactory representation of Die Meistersinger on the Italian Opera stage would have been an impossibility.

THE GREAT PICNIC.

LONDON Society, with its accustomed enthusiasm, threw itself upon Lord's for its annual picnic on the Friday and Saturday of last week, and, inspired by the weather, in even more than its usual numbers. For days past the fortunate members of the Marylebone Club had been besieged with applications for seats, and, had tickets been purchasable, they would have commanded a high price. Not only was every seat in the members' enclosure allotted, and every place in the grand stand taken, but over a thousand "rovers" were issued, which give the privilege of sitting on a member's seat when vacant, but with the unpleasant proviso that you must turn out whenever the legitimate owner arrives. When to these have to be added the rows of drags and carriages, some four or five deep in places, and all crowded with occupants, and when the six thousand or so who paid at the gates are taken into account, a very pretty idea may be formed of the vastness of the task of providing food for such a multitude. For one thing is certain; whether they care about the match or not, all are hungry, and all mean to have a good lunch before they leave the ground. The method of this has advanced with years, like everything else. Time was when there was space enough round every carriage for hampers to be unpacked and fowls carved in a comfortable fashion; later, room became more contracted, and servants had to make cup and serve viands as best they could in a breakback attitude underneath the carriage. Chicken and champagne we always had; but we used to lodge our plates on the doorsteps and balance our glasses on the receptacles for carriage-lamps. Now the order is entirely changed, and civilization, aided by the kindly efforts of the M.C.C., has triumphantly marched on. The acquisition of the "Nursery" ground threw open wide possibilities, which have been eagerly seized upon. Huge tents have been erected, in which are rows of tables, each capable of seating about sixteen people; these may be engaged beforehand by any member, and here, seated on a comfortable chair and waited on by your host's servants, you may, and probably do, enjoy a lunch much more luxurious than you would have at home. In a still better position, perhaps, are the tables spread under the roof of the asphalted court on the same ground; for there, untouched by rain or sun, you may inhale the fresh air around you, unimpeded by the canvas walls of the tents. Some few retain their conservative predilections and adhere to the carriages, but it is to these favoured resorts that Society, as a rule, now troops across the ground when the clock strikes the welcome hour of two. It does not seem many years since an Eton master was severely commented upon because he supplemented his luncheon with ices and liqueurs, and ended with an elaborate dessert. Poor man! he was only before his time, for such things are common enough now, and excite no remark. But let not the most lavish giver of luncheons think he has done his duty if he confines his hospitalities to that meal only. Though his entertainment be so varied and profuse that it is not concluded till three o'clock, or after, by five the craving for tea will have set in, and he will meet with black looks if he is not prepared to satisfy it. Thanks to the thoughtful care of the Committee of the M.C.C., this is not so difficult a matter as formerly. They have purchased houses bordering on the ground apparently with no other object than that of gratifying this taste. One house is labelled "Hot water may be procured here"; another "Teas provided"; but many heroically provide for themselves. One may see on the Nursery ground neat little camp-fires resting on a few bricks, and sheltered from the wind by an empty champagne-box, for the purpose of boiling water; while in other places spirit-lamps attain the same end in a still simpler way. Then at last the desires of the day are satisfied; but the cares of the host are not over, on the first day at all events. He has to go carefully over remnants, and ascertain which of his pièces de résistance will be presentable for the next day's lunch; he must calculate whether So-and-so, who turned up unexpectedly with two hungry friends, will put in an appearance to-morrow, and whether the strength of his party will be augmented or diminished. These are matters of anxious consideration for the male mind, which always has the direction of these affairs at Lord's; yet it must be conceded that masculine hospitality is wont to err only on the side of excess.

It would be wrong, however, to infer that increased luxury has swallowed up all interest in the game that is being played, even among the female element. On the contrary, girls play so much cricket nowadays that many are quite competent to criticize a match, and can appreciate a neat cut or a good bit of fielding. There is plenty of enthusiasm, therefore, on the ground, without taking into account the furious partisanship of the boys, or the more discriminate applause of the Pavilion. And the match was not undeserving of it. Harrow came up with a strong reputation, and, in the opinion of many good judges, were the strongest team the school had put forward for twenty years. Eton, on the other hand, have never been famous at playing a losing game, and their friends were nervous lest a terrible collapse might occur, as was the case against Winchester. Happily this did not happen; and though they lost the match, they fought it with dash and spirit. Friday was devoted to the first innings of Harrow, in which Wills, Hoare, Jackson, Napier, and Chaplin all distinguished themselves, the total reached being 272. Considering the state of the ground, this number, though large for a boys' match, could not be deemed excessive, for the Eton bowling was not formidable, and Studd, from whom most was expected, was not up to his usual form. The Eton fielding, though occasionally faulty, was never loose; and, excepting a bad miss off Jackson, there were no glaring errors in catches. When the last wicket fell at four o'clock, the rain came down, and then was to be seen one of those marvellous transformations which can only occur at Lord's. The brilliant parterre of colour changed in a moment into a dull circle of water-proofs and umbrellas; and as the rain poured on pitilessly, people sought for shelter in every direction, and a stampede towards the gates began. For once we regretted the absence of the Shah, for his observations on this curious scene would probably have been novel and interesting. Three-quarters of an hour of such a torrent were sufficient to saturate the turf hopelessly, and no more play could take place. More rain fell in the night, so that, when Eton entered on their innings on Saturday morning, they had a much more difficult wicket to play on than their opponents. Crum, Tollemache, Davenport, and Tristram each played a good innings; but the total reached was only 169—three short of the number necessary to avert a follow-on. The Harrow bowling was not so deadly as might have been expected. Jackson and Wills were very smart in the field; and Gowans, a late choice, very successful in keeping wicket. Eton's second venture produced a remarkable innings from Gosling, who was batting for forty minutes before he scored a run, and who at length achieved 35 runs in two hours and thirty-five minutes. Going in first, his was the eighth wicket to fall. Tollemache played brilliantly for 29, and Davenport hit hard and soundly for 42. Still, the total reached was only 152, leaving Harrow but 50 runs to obtain. It had been arranged that play should be continued till 7.30, so that the chances of a draw were minimized. As it happened, Harrow knocked off the required runs with the loss of only one wicket, with a quarter of an hour in hand. The victors were deservedly cheered, the defeated Eleven commiserated, the crowd dispersed, hampers were packed up, and the great Picnic of 1889 was over.

THE THEATRES.

IT was, no doubt, the interest aroused by the recent production of Ibsen's Doll's House at the Novelty Theatre rather than its success which moved the manager of the Opera Comique to bring out the same writer's Pillars of Society for the benefit of Miss Vera Beringer on Wednesday afternoon. The excellent translation of the play by Mr. William Archer has been accessible in book form for some time; but it may perhaps not be out of place to mention that the piece tells the story of a successful and hypocritical shipowner, one Consul Bernick by name, who is the leading man of a small, but rising, Norwegian coast-town. Bernick has built his fortune on the "ruin of another's fame," that other being his brother-in-law, Johan Tønnesen. The piece opens with the return of Tønnesen from America. This extraordinary person, who surely has no existence out of Ibsen's play, though he had cheerfully borne the ignominy attaching to one who has betrayed a woman, in order to save his brother-in-law's reputation in the little town, is naturally resentful when he discovers on his return that Bernick has repaid his kindness by allowing him to labour under the suspicion of robbing the till. Now it happened that at this time Bernick was just about to complete the arrangements for carrying out a large and delicate financial operation, and the disclosures which Tønnesen threatened would have involved him in absolute ruin; so that when the latter, with wonderful forbearance, proposes to go to America during the two months' grace which he grants Bernick, the shipowner readily allows him to take his departure in a vessel which he knows to be unseaworthy. The ship does not go to sea after all, and Bernick, brought to see the error of his ways by the influence of the heroine, confesses his crimes, with some reservation, it is true, in the matter of the ship, to a deputation of his fellow-townsmen, promises to "share his life-work" with his wife, and do all things that are to be expected from a good Ibsenite. These old materials are very skilfully used, and the piece is full of those fine touches which are rarely absent from Ibsen's work, if we may judge from the specimens which have been translated into English. As there seems to be some likelihood, however, of our stage being deluged with dramas closely modelled on Ibsen's method, it is not inopportune to point out some of the more glaring faults in the piece we are now considering.

The Pillars of Society is constructed on a method of false realism, and inasmuch as the trivial treads closely on the heels of the untrue, the play often degenerates into the merest enfantillage. No doubt Norwegian manners and morals are different to, if not better than, those of "The Great World"; but it is difficult to believe that even in Norway Bernick's perfectly legitimate attempt to make a fortune out of the railway scheme would be considered dishonest. The means he employed are perfectly familiar to business men of unimpeachable honour all over the world. The real blot on the piece from an artistic point of view is the conclusion. If the curtain had fallen on the powerful scene where Bernick believes that his only son had run away to America on board the coffin ship which he had allowed his brother-in-law to sail in, a very fine effect would have been attained. But the opportunity of dragging in a tedious woman, with her dreary cant about "full lives," "sharing life-work," and the rest, was not to be lost, so that, as in the Doll's House, an excellent acting play is spoilt in order that the author may air his views on the influence of woman in a place and at a time eminently unsuited for the ventilation of such a subject. It must also be borne in mind that these plays were, in a great measure, written in order to satirize the detested middle class. The satire is of the poorest quality, much as it may delight an audience dulled by Socialistic oratory. Such satire, indeed, would not have been fit to season the revolutionary tracts that filled the tinker's pack of Mr. Sprott of happy memory. Let the vices of the middle class, or any other class, be ridiculed by all means; but let not the ears of an audience to whom the voice of Mr. Pecksniff is familiar be insulted by the fustian of Consul Bernick and his fellows. In conclusion, it is pleasant to be able to praise the acting and stage management unreservedly, if an exception be made in the case of Miss Geneviève Ward, whose acting was hardly as good as might have been expected from the character of the part of Lona Hessel, which ought to suit her peculiar style admirably. The recitation of "Ostler Joe" by Mrs. Kendal, and the ever-delightful "Three Fishers," sung by Mme. Antoinette Sterling, concluded the performance.

Mr. Tree's closing performances for the season at the Haymarket, consisting of revivals, have been treated in as careful and masterly a manner as if the plays were presented for the first time to a critical public. Mr. Tree's Gringoire, in The Ballad-monger, has gained immensely in force and tenderness, and suggests even more than before that there is a vast field at the actor's command in the region of romantic drama. Mr. Brookfield's Louis XI. has also gained in all the detail of byplay which goes so far to make up a fine rendering of a part, and has gained especially in tragic impressiveness in the speech in which the King grows furious against the mob without. Miss Norreys gives to Loyse a singular charm of grace, pathos, and of the simplicity which comes of finished art; and Mr. Allan repeats with new skill and new perception what was before a very good performance of Olivier. In The Red Lamp Mr. Tree could hardly better his Demetrius; nor could Mrs. Tree well improve her exquisite and forceful presentation of the Princess. Mr. Brookfield is, even for him, strangely plausible and natural in the part of Zazzulich—a part very easy to either miss or over-accentuate. There is not an intonation or a gesture in Mr. Brookfield's performance which one could wish other than it is. Mr. Allan has, again, improved on his former reading of Kertch; and Miss Norreys was charming as Olga. The play is one which we must hope to see retained in Mr. Tree's repertory.

THE BANK DIVIDENDS.

THE inference to be drawn from the bank dividends declared for the past half-year and the reports that have yet appeared is, that banks depend much more largely now than they formerly did upon Stock Exchange business for their profits. Trade is undoubtedly much better than it was twelve months ago. It is still steadily increasing. And as wages are rising in every direction, and for the most part prices also, it would seem to follow that the demand for trade purposes for accommodation from bankers must be larger than it was in the first half of last year. And yet only a small minority of the banks have declared higher dividends than they did this time last year. Of the purely metropolitan banks, only one, the London and Westminster, pays a dividend at a higher rate, the rate for the past half-year being 16 per cent. per annum, and for the first half of last year 14 per cent. per annum. Of the banks which are both metropolitan and provincial, only one also pays a higher rate of dividend—14 per cent. per annum against 12½ per cent. per annum twelve months ago. Of purely provincial banks, only four pay higher rates of dividend. Roughly, that is to say, about four-fifths of the banks declare the same rate of dividend now that they did twelve months ago. It is true that in a few cases the capital of the banks has been increased, and consequently it requires a larger amount to pay the same rate of dividend. It is also true that many of the banks carry forward a larger amount of undistributed profits to the new half-year than they did twelve months ago. But the increased amount so carried forward is not sufficient to allow of any addition to the rate of dividend. No doubt the dividends twelve months ago were highly satisfactory, and shareholders have no cause to complain that the rate is maintained. Nevertheless, it is probable that most of them expected an increase, not only because, as we have just been observing, trade is much better now than it was a year ago, but also because the rate of discount has, taking the whole half-year together, been higher than it was in the corresponding period of last year. The average rate of discount of the Bank of England for the six months ended with June last was a trifle over 3 per cent., whereas in the first half of 1888 it was a trifle under 2½ per cent. per annum. And the average rate of discount in the open market during the past six months was 2½ per cent. per annum, against 1½ per cent. in the first half of last year. The first and the principal explanation, no doubt, is, as we have said above, that the banks now look to the Stock Exchange rather than to trade proper for the profitable employment of their funds. Speculation has been much less active so far this year than in the corresponding period of 1888; firstly, no doubt, because prices are so high as to discourage the more cautious from engaging in new ventures, but chiefly because of the difficulties accumulated in Paris in consequence of the failure, in such quick succession, of the Panama Canal Company, the Comptoir d'Escompte, and the Société des Métaux. The intervention on the failure of the Comptoir d'Escompte of the Bank of France and other great banks to support the Paris Bourse, and thereby prevent a crisis, for a little while stimulated a wild speculation. But that speculation came to an end in a few weeks, and since Easter business upon the Stock Exchanges of Europe has been much less active than for some years past. There has, in consequence, been but slight demand for loans from bankers for Stock Exchange purposes. And although, therefore, the rate of discount has been higher than in the first half of last year, the rate of interest has, upon the whole, been lower, at all events upon Stock Exchange transactions. The falling off in Stock Exchange business has fully counterbalanced the increased activity in trade operations, and has thus disabled the banks generally from increasing their rates of dividend.

Another cause of the comparative stationariness of dividends is the small return now made upon investments. As bankers have found that they cannot employ remuneratively all their funds in discounting bills and making loans to merchants and manufacturers, they have turned more and more, not only to the Stock Exchange for the employment of those funds, but also to investment proper. But the high prices to which securities have now risen, and the numerous conversions that have lately taken place, have materially reduced the interest derivable from investments. For example, at the present time the holder of a million Consols derives 2,500*l.* a year less from his investment than he did before Conversion. And it is to be recollected that interest is being reduced, not upon Consols only, but upon the debts of all States which have high credit. Further, it is to be borne in mind that during the past six months new issues have not been of such large amount as in the first half of last year, and, therefore, have not yielded to bankers as large profits. Lastly, we would remind our readers that there has been a very considerable import of gold since the beginning of the year. It will be in the recollection of our readers that last autumn the export of gold became so large that the rate of discount had to be raised again and again. For a while it was feared that a monetary crisis might be brought about. To prevent this, extraordinary efforts were made to attract gold. And during the half-year, and more particularly during the past three months, very large amounts of the metal have been imported. The result of this import in conjunction with the falling off in Stock Exchange business was, that rates of interest and discount fell rapidly. In the month of January the Bank of England reduced its rate of discount, by three successive steps, from 5 to 3 per cent., and somewhat later it lowered it to 2½ per cent. In the outside market the fall in the discount rate was even more rapid. For a considerable time past the open market rate has ranged from a little over 1 per cent. to about 1½ per cent. Although, therefore, the average rate of discount both of the Bank of England and of the open market has been higher than in the first half of last year, the tendency of rates has been almost uniformly downwards. But it is always found that profits are less easily made in a falling than in a rising market. In the case of bankers, for example, it is not possible for them to reduce the rates they allow upon deposits as rapidly as the rate of discount falls. They can easily enough put down the rates they allow upon new deposits. But it is a slower process to lower the rates they allow upon old deposits. The consequence has been that the difference between the rates which bankers have been paying upon deposits lodged with them and the rates which they have been receiving upon loans and discounts has not been larger materially than in the first half of last year. These causes of stationariness to which we have just now been referring have been, however, less effective than the falling off in Stock Exchange business. Had the demand for the Stock Exchange been really active it would have rapidly absorbed the additional supplies in the hands of bankers, and would, therefore, have raised very considerably the rates both of interest and discount. It is, then, the state of the Stock Exchange more than anything else that explains the comparative stationariness of bank dividends at the present time.

For the half-year upon which we have now entered the prospects of bank shareholders are decidedly brighter. There is little probability that much more gold will be received from abroad, while there is almost a certainty that very considerable amounts of the metal will have to be exported. The demand for it in Paris continues strong, and, it is feared, will increase, while as the year advances there are sure to be, as there always are, large demands for other foreign countries. This of itself will force up the rates of interest and discount. Besides, holiday-making and harvesting will necessitate the withdrawal from London of considerable amounts of both coin and notes, and in the autumn there will be the usual withdrawals of gold for the English provinces, for Ireland, and Scotland. Trade is still improving, and may reasonably be expected to be more active than ever in the autumn if peace is preserved. Besides, it is reasonable to expect that speculation on the Stock Exchange, which has been dormant for some months past, will revive as soon as the holidays are over. Good trade at home and abroad, and abundant harvests in America as well as in Western and Central Europe, will tend to stimulate it; while it is known that the great capitalists all over the world have entered into contracts with Governments, trading Companies, and municipalities for new issues of all kinds as well as for fresh conversions. If peace is preserved, it will be the interest of those great capitalists, therefore, to support markets, as the phrase goes—that is, to buy largely in order to encourage the speculative classes to apply for the new loans and Companies that are to be brought out. If speculation revives, the demand for loans for the Stock Exchange will increase, and will further send up rates of interest and discount. In a rising market bankers will be able to make larger profits, and therefore, unless some unforeseen, untoward accident occurs, bank shareholders may reasonably look forward to higher dividends at the end of the new half-year.

OTELLO, AS MUSIC AND DRAMA.

IT is a common imputation of the enemies of Italian Opera that the traditions and method of the Italian lyric stage are extremely unfavourable to the dramatic singer. Whenever a great artist did by chance as it were arise, he was said to triumph by genius over difficulties, and not to have found in Italian Opera a congenial and even fostering environment. The question whether a German could have wit has not been more frequently provoked than the equally interesting problem that involves the possibility of the operatic tenor being an actor. The latter problem has been repeatedly solved, it is true, and on the Italian stage, while on the German stage it is the vocal capacity that is generally woefully deficient. Signor Tamagno's Otello is one of the most remarkable examples of the conjunction of the tenor and the actor in our times. M. Maurel's Iago, again, is unquestionably one of those exceedingly rare impersonations that are perfect in both aspects. It would be hard to say whether the intellectual pleasure it affords is derived more from the singer's gifts than from the actor's resources. For once, at last, we have the exceptional opportunity of testing the true value and scope of music in the representation of drama. And it is obvious that both these fine performances of M. Maurel and Signor Tamagno are great examples, because they interpret a great work with singular fidelity and sympathy, and not because the artists triumph over those supposed disabling conventions which some persons imagine to be inseparable from the Italian operatic stage. The artistic relations of the drama and music, concerning which there has been rather more of contention among theorists than of practical demonstration among composers, are illustrated in Signor Verdi's latest opera with such remarkable freshness and force and such unfaltering consistency to a noble ideal, that it is impossible to doubt the immense influence the work must exercise on the dramatic music of the future. In Otello the union of the drama and music is attained without the least violation of the legitimate functions of the one field of art or the other. How far this masterpiece of the popular composer will reconcile opposing factions it were difficult to forecast, and is perhaps a question of little importance; but it cannot be doubted that this mature work of Signor Verdi's versatile and prolific genius will greatly modify the views of those who are altogether in antagonism to Italian Opera. Some few years since the approaching extinction of Italian Opera was confidently proclaimed by a little sect of Wagnerian devotees; now the institution flourishes as it has not flourished these twenty years past, and in its latest development, in Otello, we have an example of dramatic opera essentially modern in its rejection of old conventions and artifices, yet retaining the distinguishing characteristics and following the independent method of the Italian School. There is a finer accord between the poet's work and the composer's music than heretofore. But there is no breaking away from the old canons of art in the composer's treatment of the orchestra in relation to the voice, and this is as clearly manifest in the more elaborate concerted numbers as in such purely lyrical settings as the plaintive "Willow" song in the final act.

One of the most notable points in Otello is the extraordinary power and clearness with which the composer has realized the dramatic conception and exalted it. Too many are the instances in opera where the poet and composer appear unequally yoked, and employ different, if not discordant, interpretative channels. There are numberless persons, naturally susceptible to musical impressions, for whom the musician's view of music as the ally and co-exponent of dramatic art is almost, if not quite, unintelligible. They appreciate in a song or ballad, accompanied by a single instrument, the union of perfect music and noble words; but "dramatic music," in which action and development share, and the full resources of the orchestra are employed, is either a phrase of little meaning or so complex as to defy definition. The musician's theory is lucid and sound; though, when tested by stage representation, it seldom carries conviction to the mind of the old playgoer. Musicians are in agreement as to the advantages that should accrue to the drama when wedded to music. By exalting speech into song—which includes, of course, declamation and recitation—the art of the dramatic poet receives a finer interpretation, and, as the late Sir George Macfarren has it, increased clearness and more varied significance. This is an ideal seldom attained, save by the greatest masters; but it is suggested with singular fulness at the Lyceum by Otello. Even the old playgoer, who would relegate music to the chamber or concert-room, must abate his scepticism considerably should he study the fine performances of M. Maurel as Iago and Signor Tamagno as Otello, and will inevitably class M. Maurel's masterly acting among his most memorable experiences of the stage. Fortunately for all alike, the musical and non-musical, Signor Boito's admirable version of Shakspeare's play, by its condensed form, its spirit and fidelity, facilitates the process of conversion in those persons whose estimate of the capacities of dramatic music is unstable. It has been well said that M. Maurel's acting deserves in itself the keenest study. His superb voice and perfect method are equally notable. The perfidious frankness of "honest Iago" is suggested with inconceivable subtlety in that scene of exquisite invention where the dreaming Cassio murmurs of "sweet Desdemona," and in the not less wonderful acting in the "proof" scene, where Cassio produces the handkerchief. The extraordinary mobility of face, the infinite expression of features, the finely graduated alternations of sweetness and malevolence, the inscrutable smile, the eyes that flash or lower—seductive, or frank, or boding—produce an impression the intensity and profundity of which are beyond all analysis. You are haunted by its Protean wealth of suggestiveness. From the musical point of view the climax is reached in the passionate soliloquy, "Credo in un dio crudel," a characteristic interpolation of Signor Boito, the music to which is worthy of comparison with the terrible and sinister scene in Fidelio wherein the spirit of Pizarro is poured forth in tempest. Here, beyond all question, the force of interpretation could not be surpassed, and the composer would risk much if the part were entrusted to other hands. And as much is due to Signor Tamagno, whose magnificent voice is of the miraculous order, whose Otello is prodigiously imposing, and offers several striking points in the acting which our confident young actors might better themselves by studying. It is a pity that the Desdemona of Signora Catanéo falls short of the general excellence of the Lyceum company; nevertheless it must be said of Otello that "music and poetry agree," not in the mere lyrical meaning of the poet, but in the larger sphere of dramatic art, and the demonstration is of the most convincing and complete kind that has ever been produced on the stage.

RECENT CONCERTS.

DURING the past fortnight the number of concerts has at length shown signs of diminishing, and the end of the exceptionally busy musical season seems drawing near. July is not usually a month of much activity in the musical world, or at least in that portion of it which is made up of concert-givers and concert-goers; and what few entertainments of the kind have taken place which demand notice do not rely for their attractiveness upon any special novelty. Such performances as Mrs. Mudie-Bolingbroke's Evening Concert on the 3rd, in which the concert-giver was assisted by Fräulein Olga Islar—a German soprano with a somewhat thin voice, but possessed of considerable executive talent—Mrs. Mary Davies, and Messrs. Tivadar Nachéz and Arthur Friedheim, or that given by Herr Waldemar Meyer on the following evening, which was only remarkable for the opportunity it afforded of comparing the different styles (each excellent in its way) of two English contraltos—Mme. Patey and Miss Wakefield—call for little more than bare mention. The same remarks apply to the State Concert given at the Albert Hall on the 5th inst. to the Shah of Persia, when, in spite of the excellent singing of Mr. Barnby's Choir and the solos contributed by such artists as Mme. Albani, Mme. Patey, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Watkins Mills, the musical interest of the performance was by common consent acknowledged to be entirely secondary. Two concerts given on the afternoon of Saturday, the 6th, deserve somewhat more attention. At Prince's Hall, Herr Max Heinrich, assisted by Miss Lena Little and Herren Schönberger and Hess, performed an interesting programme of pianoforte and violin music, songs, and duets. Herr Heinrich is to be thanked for producing three of Schubert's least-known, but finest, songs—namely, "An Schwager Kronos," "Sehnsucht," and "Die Taubenpost"—each of which is in its way a gem, and most characteristic of the wonderful versatility of the Viennese master. The first-named, in particular, is admirably suited to the declamatory style of the German-American singer, who was also heard to advantage in Schumann's "Die beiden Grenadiere" and Jensen's fine, but little known, song "Alt Heidelberg, du feine," besides taking part with Miss Little in two duets by Brahms. Herr Hess's excellent playing of Bach's "Chaconne" is also worthy of mention, and the concert cannot be let pass without a word of praise to Herr Schönberger, who, besides taking part with the violinist in Mr. Oliver King's well-written, if not very interesting, Sonata in D minor, and playing three solos of his own composition, accompanied all the vocal numbers in a manner which considerably added to the completeness and excellence of the performance. Such an example deserves to be followed by other pianists, for both singers and audiences have much to complain of in the way in which accompaniments are too often played, even at concerts of the first rank. On the same afternoon as Herr Heinrich's concert, the veteran English tenor, Mr. Sims Reeves, gave a long concert at St. James's Hall, when he once more proved how a good method of vocalization can triumph over the ravages of time. The programme mostly consisted of well-known songs, the concert-giver himself singing Blumenthal's "Message" and Balfe's "Come into the Garden, Maud," both of which were greeted with a perfect storm of applause from the crowded audience. An interesting feature in the concert was the performance of Curschmann's "Dithyrambo," "Evviva Bacco," by Messrs. Sims Reeves, Edward Lloyd, and Ben Davies. It is not often that an opportunity is afforded of hearing three such tenors of English origin together. The other artists who took part in the concert were Mme. Antoinette Sterling, Mlle. Marie van Zandt, Signor Foli, the Boston Lotus Glee Club, and a clever pianist from St. Petersburg, Mlle. Hélène de Duncan, who made a successful first appearance in this country in solos by Chopin and Liszt. Mr. Henry Irving and Mr. Toole also contributed familiar recitations.

The last Richter concert of the season, which took place on Monday the 8th, was devoted entirely to the performance of Berlioz's Faust, the principal solos in which were taken by Mrs. Mary Davies (vice Mme. Nordica, who had been originally announced to appear), Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Herr Max Heinrich. The performance, so far as the orchestra and soloists went, was worthy of Herr Richter's reputation as a conductor; but it is difficult to understand how he can have been satisfied with the singing of the chorus, which was both slovenly and inaccurate, and far inferior to what London audiences have been accustomed to hear in this work. The Richter Choir evidently needs thoroughly reorganizing; until this is done it would be better altogether to avoid performing elaborate choral works. That admirable artist, Mme. Backer-Gröndahl, whose advent is one of the most noteworthy features of the past season, gave an interesting concert at Prince's Hall on the afternoon of the 13th, when an opportunity was afforded of hearing her in several solos by Schumann and Chopin, as well as in her own graceful compositions. Her performances at the Philharmonic Concerts showed that, as an interpreter not only of the romantic music of her fellow-countryman, Grieg, but also in the great compositions of Beethoven, she is a performer of rare ability and power. Her playing of a selection of pieces by Schumann was not so satisfactory, not from any technical defects, but because her readings are opposed to those to which English audiences are accustomed, and with which they have been made familiar by Mme. Schumann. Mme. Backer-Gröndahl was assisted by Miss Louise Phillips and Herr Johannes Wolff, the former of whom sang with great charm and finish seven songs by the concert-giver, all of which were most favourably received, and are likely to become general favourites, owing to their spontaneity and freshness. The Dutch violinist took part in Grieg's Violin Sonata, Op. 45, which he played in all respects excellently. The same cannot be said of his performance of an extremely meretricious Polonaise by Laub, or of an equally worthless piece which he played for an encore in response to the applause bestowed upon his playing by an indiscriminating audience.

REVIEWS.

THE RUBAIYAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM.*

IN October 1884, when there was no small political stir about the Lumsden mission to Central Asia, that well-known artist

* Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam. Translated by Justin Huntly McCarthy, M.P. London: David Nutt. 1889.

Mr. William Simpson managed to find time to pay a visit to the tomb of Omar Khayyam, tent-maker, astronomer, and poet, in company with the Chief of the mission. The tomb is about two miles south of the city of Nishapur or Nishabor, as it is sometimes written. Mr. Simpson describes the burial-place as surmounted by a blue dome, never architecturally beautiful, and at the time of his visit much in decay and disrepair. And to add to the unpleasant effect caused by the fall of plaster and the litter of bricks, the burial-place of the poet-philosopher was overshadowed by that of a deceased Imamzadah. One Mahomed Maruk, the brother of Imam Reza, the eighth Imām, who lies at Meshed, is buried in Omar's garden of roses, and we apprehend, in the opinion of the neighbours, takes precedence of a man who, by his own account, seems to have been much given to strong drink. There is little discrepancy in the account of the poet's life, whatever there may be in the interpretation of his writings. He was born in the fifth century of the Hegirā and the eleventh of the Christian era, and he lived under no less than five of the Seljukian kings. He studied theology and philosophy under a learned doctor, a Sunni, and had for his fellow-students two men who afterwards figured conspicuously in Oriental history. One is known as Nizam-al-Mulk, the Minister of Alp Arslan. The other became the head of the worshipful Fraternity of Assassins, and eventually procured the death of his fellow-student and benefactor, Nizam-al-Mulk. Omar Khayyam wisely preferred a life of retirement and ease to promotion at Court. An assessment on the revenues of Nishapur assured him of a competence. He was placed in charge of the Royal Observatory, reformed the Calendar, wrote some mathematical treatises, and is now best known by his Rubaiyat, or short poem in stanzas of four lines. The manuscripts of this work are not numerous and they vary considerably in length. No copy exists at the India Office. One was discovered by Dr. Sprenger at Lucknow. There is one in the Bodleian Library and there are others at Shiraz and Teheran. The late Mr. FitzGerald, as is well known, first brought the Rubaiyat to the notice of the public in 1858. Two hundred copies of his version were printed, offered for five shillings, and ultimately sold for a penny apiece. Later editions met with more favour, and it has been recently the fashion to go into rhapsodies over the poet of Nishapur as if he were a second Lucretius. M. Nicolas, a French translator in 1847, held the opinion that by wine and wassail Omar only means the Deity. Mr. Whinfield's elegant translation, with notes and a preface, was published in 1882.

Mr. Justin McCarthy has turned from the History of his father and the politics of his countrymen to find distraction in poetry, and has learnt the Persian language sufficiently to translate Omar Khayyam into prose. And by way of accentuating his adoration he has printed the whole of his book in capital letters. Words fail him when he tries to express his feelings. The Rubaiyat is a new revelation. He has drunk its red wine from an enchanted chalice. He carried a small copy with him to Venice and to the fairest cities of Italy. He thought it superior to Tasso and Horace. Omar to him became a religion. We are not surprised when we are told that Mr. McCarthy became a burden to his friends. All this seems to have happened from a perusal of the spirited translation by Mr. FitzGerald. What Mr. McCarthy's feelings are now, when he has given us a version nearer the original than those of Mr. FitzGerald and Mr. Whinfield, can only be surmised. His best wish would, however, be fulfilled if some traveller would kindly take a copy of his, Mr. McCarthy's work, and cast it in the dust before the tomb described by Mr. Simpson. It is a pity that this could not have been done when Sir P. Lumsden went out to Penjdeh.

That in Omar Khayyam's short poem we find traces of a philosophical, inquiring, and reflecting mind is indisputable. He was evidently a man of originality; perplexed, as many have been before and since his time, by the mysteries of human existence. He cannot make out why man was formed, whence he came, or whither he is going. Life to him is a chessboard, on which the pawns are moved by a Higher Power. The Heavens are like a lamp; the sun is a candlestick; the earth is a shade. Again, the world is a body, and God is its soul. Angels are its senses, and its limbs are represented by living beings. All the wise and pious men who ever lived are asses and sounding drums. They tell stories about the skies, but never solve their riddles. Mullas would do better to sip wines, and sport with Houris beneath shady trees. With all these free opinions there are mixed dicta about predestination, the inability of the clay to prevail with the potter, the hollowness of friendship, the uselessness of prayer, the hypocrisy of devotees, the inutility of mosques and fasting, prohibited pleasures, impure bodies, and misused lives. That all these reflections should come from a Mohammedan who wrote from the neighbourhood of the desert, in the eleventh century of our era, in the most polished of Oriental languages, without plagiarism as far as we can see, and with a vigour of style and independence of thought which brought down on him the wrath of the orthodox Mussulman party, is doubtless a matter to merit literary recognition. But it may fairly be asked whether the terms in which Mr. McCarthy and some very eminent Orientalists and poets have spoken of this rhyming wine-bibbing recluse and astronomer are not a trifle extravagant. For, after all, to what does this Oriental Agnosticism lead? Why, to revelry and drunkenness, as we shall prove from the mouth of Omar and his translator. Possibly, as the manuscripts hitherto discovered do not contain exactly the same number of stanzas, Mr. McCarthy may have hit on a copy in which too much space is allotted to one topic. Mr. Winfield in his preface informs us that one manuscript has only 31 stanzas, another 158, a third 464, and a fourth as many as 800. But this is how Omar speaks in Mr. McCarthy's version. People who drink no wine and plume themselves on temperance may commit deeds a thousand times more vile than honest drunkenness. Omar would like to grasp the Koran in one hand and the cup in the other. Even if wine does not lead him to the goal of his desires, he will not turn back on his path. A hundred miracles become clear to him when drunk. A Sage appeared to the poet in a dream, and bade him drink wine as he would soon sleep sound enough beneath the earth. Make most of time, he says, when the spring is bursting and when blossoms adorn the trees. A drop of wine is worth all the kingdoms of the earth, and the tile that covers the jar is worth a thousand lives. Omar would prefer a flagon of wine, a crust of bread, and a book to the enjoyment of power. When he dies, he would like a wine-flagon to be made out of his dust. He would wish to drink from the beginning of the week to the end—the Mohammedan Friday included. An old man seen drunk at the door of a tavern inspired him only with slight disgust. A nightingale sang in his ear, and told him to make the most of his time. There is no paradise like a limpid stream in a meadow, and a mistress as fair as the Houris. He would sell a diadem for the flute of a female minstrel, and a turban and silk for a cup of wine. If the Evil One himself had tasted wine he would have bowed himself before Adam. Omar is ready to go to the tavern at the dawn of day. Wine, in short, is everything—life, devotion, friendship, and a crown. And the moment in which wine makes a man happy is better than the rewards of this world or the next. What, we may ask, would be thought of the poetry of Horace if he had done nothing but repeat nunc est bibendum in every other ode, or what should we think of Burns if he had made Willie for ever brew a peck of maut, and invite Rob and Allan to a carousal for seven days in the week?

If critics, translators, and Orientalists are determined to find the scattered members of a poet everywhere in these stanzas of a toper, we cannot say them nay; and it is to be admitted that when Omar is sober he handles topics of which we find traces in Arthur Clough, in Matthew Arnold, in Thackeray, and in that Hebrew monarch who, as Thackeray sings, wrote about the vanity of vanities under the solemn cedars. We are quite ready to allow that Omar's poetry of the tavern is diversified by some pithy aphorisms, some philosophical reflections, and some pointed remarks on fate, free-will, predestination, and other crucial questions familiar to those who wander dreamily on the borderland between doubt and belief. But his tendency leads him to melancholy, if not to despair. Friendship is not to be sought. Your best friend is your worst enemy. All things here below are visionary. Abandon all search after the unattainable, and give yourself up to the joys of the present time. Then in a more thoughtful strain we are warned that to be good is everything, that to be over-careful only leads to trouble, that the fire of hate is not to be fed with the breath of passion, that the world is only a caravanserai, that the slave who repents will be pardoned by a generous master, that the foreknowledge of God must not be made the support or excuse for sin, that the Almighty is slow to punish and swift to pardon, that it is better to lighten one sad soul than to people a world, and more noble to capture one free man with charity than to liberate a thousand slaves; and that if we can only understand the motions of the wheel (of Heaven) we shall perceive that there are two kinds of men, those who know good and evil and those who know neither themselves nor anything else. On reading these and similar sentiments we are glad to forget some very questionable expressions, dignified with the title of poetical sublimity, in which Omar, provided he can get drunk, bids adieu to thoughts of good or evil, and prays that if God will not begin to build the world again the name of Omar may be blotted out from the Book of Life.

While we entertain a due sense of the labour, scholarship, and criticism which the translators of the Rubaiyat have shown, and of the great poetry into which one of them has translated it, we have found the best notice of Omar Khayyam in an article contributed to the Calcutta Review just thirty years ago by Mr. E. B. Cowell, the inspirer of Mr. FitzGerald himself. That profound Orientalist shows that Omar with his philosophical insight had not made the wiser choice. His poetry, says this gentleman, is a poetry of animal life, and, for all his resolute will, lively feelings, and scientific knowledge, he misused his powers and wasted his strength. In justice to his recent translator we subjoin a few extracts, and have compared them with Mr. Winfield's version. To bring Mr. McCarthy's prose alongside of either of the poetical versions of his predecessors is no easy task. Different manuscripts have been consulted by each translator. The order and sequence of the originals are not the same; and we have searched Mr. Winfield's edition, as well as the recent edition of Mr. FitzGerald's work by Mr. Wright, for the same stanzas, often without success. But the following quotations give a fair notion of the general tenor of the poem.

Mr. McCarthy says:—

Give me a flagon of red wine, a book of verses, a loaf of bread, and a little idleness. If with such store I might sit by thy dear side in some lonely place, I should deem myself happier than a king in his kingdom.

This in Mr. Winfield's verse becomes:—

Give me a flask of wine, a crust of bread,
A quiet mind, a book of verse to read.
With thee, O Love, to share my lowly roof,
I would not take the Sultan's crown instead.

This tune of "Hoc erat in votis" was sung, not unsuccessfully, by the late Charles Lever when he told us about the Pope, the Sultan, and their happy lives, in Harry Lorrequer.

Again, Mr. McCarthy translates his author:—

The drop of water sorrowed to be sundered from the ocean. Ocean, smiling, said:—We are all in all, God is within and around us; and we are divided but by an imperceptible point.

This with Mr. Winfield is rendered:—

The drop wept for his severance from the sea,
But the sea smiled, "for I am all," said he.
"And nought exists outside my unity:
My one point circling, apes plurality."

We give the preference to the simpler prose of this quatrain. As an example of want of continuity, we observe that in his next stanza Mr. McCarthy sighs for a place of rest or wishes to be born again after a hundred thousand years, while Mr. Winfield flies off to bulbuls and roses that blossom and fade. In the next and our last quotation Mr. McCarthy's version strikes us as the best:—

Poor man, thy passion, like unto a watch-dog, gives forth hollow sounds. It masks the wiles of the fox, it seeks the sleep of the hare; it blends in one the rage of the tiger with the hunger of the wolf.

Mr. Winfield turns this into:—

These raging passions their poor souls oppress,
As dogs, with noisy barks, the house distress.
Foxes are they in craft, and hares in sloth;
In fury tigers, wolves in wantonness.

Slothful hares and wanton wolves only become intelligible when read in Mr. McCarthy's version. After all, we must own a preference for Lalage compared to Leila; and we should still take Horace for a pocket-companion in our rambles, and not Omar Khayyam as he was by himself he.

NOVELS.*

THE main purpose of Miss Annie Thomas's novel appears to be to show the utmost space of time during which a villain, who is also an unparalleled idiot, can continue to perpetrate bigamous villainies without being found out, in spite of doing everything imaginable to ensure detection, short of explicitly announcing the fact to both ladies and to all his acquaintance. The author puts it at something less than a year, and this is how it fell out. An evil-minded, ill-mannered, dull, and singularly unattractive person named Phillipps inherited a lucrative partnership in a commercial undertaking, and at the same time developed into Phillipps-Twysden. In that character he wooed, won, and married the beautiful Violet, and to them was born a son Jack. After a few years of wedded discord Jack's papa went to Plymouth unknown to his wife, calling himself Phillipps, so that no one might suspect who he was. When he got there he heard that one Florence Arle was going to a fancy ball in the character of Marguerite—or, as purists or Scotchmen would say, Gretchen. It occurred to him that a female with so delightful a name as Florence Arle must be surpassingly charming, and he therefore went to the ball dressed as Faust. Florence Arle turned out to be an ordinary sort of girl, not quite a lady, and with "starry green-grey eyes." So, after a deal of fussing, and one or two narrow escapes, owing to the circumstance that Florence Arle knew some people who knew some other people whom Phillipps in his character of Phillipps-Twysden knew, Miss Arle went through the form of marriage, and her betrayer set to work making muddled schemes for being in two places at once. Before long came a fatal day when the alleged Mrs. Phillipps (Florence) asked Mrs. Phillipps-Twysden (Violet) to lunch. The bigamous monster heard of the impending entertainment, and, indeed, was pressed by Florence to take part in it. With superhuman cunning he stole the several large photographs of himself which were the principal ornaments of Florence's apartments. Florence was much annoyed at their disappearance, and completely remedied it, as far as practical purposes went, by showing Violet a miniature of the faithless one which she wore on a string round her neck. This incident upset the apple-cart—indeed, both the apple-carts. Violet held her tongue; but she kicked the bigamist out of a large country-house which she had recently inherited. In the course of a few days Florence also discovered the fraud of which she had been a victim. She made up her mind that it was not worth while to make a disturbance, so she quietly withdrew, and the poor bigamist was left without any wife at all. Then his heart yearned after his son Jack, and he went down to Violet's country-house; and she gave him dinner, and

* That Other Woman. A Novel. By Annie Thomas (Mrs. Pender Cudlip), Author of "Denis Donne" &c. &c. London: F. V. White & Co. 1889.

Past Forgiveness? By Lady Margaret Majendie, Author of "Fascination" &c. &c. London: Richard Bentley & Son. 1889.

Clare Strong. A Novel. By G. Beresford Fitzgerald, F.S.A., Author of "Lilian" &c. London: F. V. White & Co. 1889.

sent him to sleep at the public-house; and that night the mansion caught fire, and Philipps-Twysden saved the lives of Violet and her son, but was himself consumed in the flames. Florence married a bore who had for many years been desperately in love with Violet. The plot is the worst part of this novel. Granting that it is profitable, or even lawful, to tell such a story, it is fairly well told, and written in moderately good English, without any solecisms worse than a duchess addressing a baronet by his surname in a moment of expansive emotion.

Past Forgiveness? is all about French people; and it has pleased Lady Margaret Majendie to remind the reader every now and then that the people are French by making them utter literal translations of French phrases. "Little young girls" are mentioned three or four times; and "in a situation of the most romantic" is a not exceptionally hideous example of the absurdity of trying to write French in English words. The hero is a young man of literary genius, and a great prig, whose throat "swelled with a sense of gladness when he was able to release a fellow-creature from pain." The heroine, a "little young girl" fresh from a convent, caught him starving, restored him to life, and married him. But they had an enemy, who was very wicked, and rather mad. (At least, if he was not mad, the genius was, because each was persuaded that the other had stolen his ideas and MSS., and published them in a highly successful book. Lady Margaret seems quite satisfied that the hero was sane and the villain mad, but although this view is to some extent borne out by the fact that "the villain it was that died," we confess to a suspended judgment.) Hence ensued dangers and catastrophes, which need not be further revealed than by the intimation that their main scheme bears a curiously close resemblance to that of The Cloister and the Hearth. Lady Margaret Majendie is unfortunately a writer of incomparably less vigour, liveliness, and originality than Mr. Charles Reade. For these weaknesses she is, perhaps, not entirely responsible, but she would do well to imitate her predecessor in the attention which he bestowed, or is supposed to have bestowed, upon the accessories of his romance. If an Italian sailor really told the genius that both "wind and tide" were in favour of a steamer overdue at Genoa from Marseilles, he must have been either very incompetent or guilty of unseasonable jocularity. In either case his offence was venial compared to that of a certain Alphonse, who was by way of being a masher, and asserted that he gave sixty francs a dozen for his cigarettes. Sixty francs a dozen is 20*l.* a hundred, or four shillings each. If that young man was not misreported, he might really almost have passed with distinction half an hour of examination in Probate Court No. 1.

Anybody but a critic might rise from the perusal of Clare Strong with a mild sensation of wonder whether the words "The End" had not somehow been misplaced, and whether a further search among the library books would not reveal the existence of a third volume with the story in it. This would be because anybody but a critic generally ignores the prefaces of novels, and by ignoring the preface of Clare Strong he would have omitted to acquaint himself with the motive which animated Mr. G. Beresford Fitzgerald in his biographical labours. "It seemed to" Mr. Fitzgerald "that the life of Clare Strong had as much human interest in it as many biographies which" he had "recently perused, after first having heard their praises sounded." Mr. Fitzgerald proceeds to indicate the sort of biography he means. It would be invidious to particularize; but it is a sort with which every one is familiar, and of which there have been no especial new instances for the last month or two. We concur with Mr. Fitzgerald in his estimate of his own work. Mr. Clare Strong made himself remarkable chiefly by three things. First, he married a particularly vulgar American with a dazzling complexion and yellow hair, who in due course ran away with an opera-singer. Secondly, he had a friend of his boyhood, called William Penrose, whom he loved dearly, and who turned out a shocking prig, went into Parliament, attained the dizzy height of eminence now adorned by Mr. Ashmead Bartlett, was made a Privy Councillor when the Ministry went out, died of consumption, and was buried in the presence of "many famous people," some of whom "even shed tears over the grand career" summarized above. Thirdly, he had a way of being oddly treated by testators. A grandmother left away from him some three or four thousand a year which should have been his. Then it was left back to him, along with a house, by the grandmother's legatee, who imposed the condition that if Strong ever married both house and fortune would go to somebody else. This is all well enough, because testators frequently make themselves more or less ridiculous. But that Mr. Strong should believe such a condition to be valid, and actually give up the house and fortune on his marriage with the American, is too great an outrage on probability. All the same, it is the most exciting episode in the life of Mr. Clare Strong.

THE SAGAS OF THE NORSE KINGS.*

MR. CARLYLE, in his work The Early Kings of Norway, says that, were Snorre Sturlason's Sagas of the Norse Kings well edited and furnished with maps and chronological summaries, they would deserve to be reckoned among the great history books of the world. Mr. Anderson, sharing this opinion, has undertaken the task, and will thereby earn the gratitude of all students of Norse history and traditions. He has, however, been careful to state the limits within which he has conducted his researches. He has not thought it his province to examine manuscripts, to make original researches, or to criticize the labours of the scholars of the North. His object was to incorporate the fruits of those labours, and to bring Laing's edition of the Sagas up to the present standard of scholarship. To this end he has searched Unger's edition of the original text, and has brought the English translation into accordance with it, has omitted some of Laing's notes and added others of his own, and has been careful to give dates and supply full indexes, maps, and a chronological table, as suggested by Mr. Carlyle. It would, therefore, appear that in Mr. Anderson's edition of the Sagas English-speaking students have as faithful and well illustrated a text as they can require. But we could wish that he had carried his labours a little further, and had added to these volumes a clear and interestingly written synopsis of the history they deal with. Such a sketch would be most valuable, especially if it filled up the gaps of the original Sagas with facts gathered from such other sources as might be available, and threw the light of learning upon their dark and crooked places. As things are we have conscientiously read the four thick volumes under consideration from cover to cover, bringing to the study a certain acquaintance with other branches of Scandinavian literature, and yet must confess that but a small portion of the people and events with which they deal are at this moment clearly present in our mind. This arises from several causes above and beyond personal incapacity. Thus, notwithstanding the praise heaped upon them by Mr. Laing, these Sagas cannot be called a model of historical writing. Although occasionally picturesque and incisive, the style is, on the whole, bald in the extreme. Here is a specimen, taken absolutely at random, which sets out the history of a certain Halfdan:—

* The Sagas of the Norse Kings. From the Icelandic of Snorre Sturlason. By Samuel Laing. Edited by Rasmus B. Anderson, LL.D. London: John C. Nimmo. 1889.

Halfdan was the name of King Eystein's son who succeeded him. He was called Halfdan the Mild, but the Bad Entertainer—that is to say, he was reported to be generous, and to give his men as much gold as other kings gave of silver, but he starved them in their diet. He was a great warrior who had been long in Viking cruises, and had collected great property. He was married to Hlif, a daughter of King Dag of Vestmara. Holtar, in Vestfold, was his chief house; and he died there on a bed of sickness, and was buried at Borro under a mound. So says Thiodolf:—

"By Hel's summons a great king
Was called away to Odin's Thing.
King Halfdan, he who dwelt of late
At Holtar, must obey grim Fate.
At Borro, in the royal mound,
They laid the hero underground."

This kind of writing, although it has the merit of simplicity, when followed over an expanse of fourteen hundred pages ends in confusing the mind. Nor are matters made easier by the unfortunate fact that the Norse kings were frequently namesakes of their most prominent rivals. Several Olafs in the field at once are as bewildering to the reader as were a plurality of Richmonds to an historical character. The narrative is, indeed, enlivened by frequent battlepieces; but few except those who have experienced know the amount of skill required to give individuality to the accounts of a succession of battles fought by people of the same race, armed in the same way, and animated by the same class of motives. The task was too much for the original Sagawriters, hampered as they were by the necessity of telling the facts as they came to them, and the result is a distressing similarity in their descriptions. There are exceptions, indeed, as in the admirable narrative of the great fight at Stiklestad between Olaf the Saint and the Bondes, in which the former lost his life, diversified as it was by the moving incidents of Olaf's death and "Dag's Storm"; but such variety is comparatively rare.

In short, the reader who expects to find in these historical records the same vivid personal interest that animates every page of those delightful works the best Iceland Sagas, such as Burnt Njal or Grettir the Strong, will be grievously disappointed. The history of the Norse kings is food for students, and can never be a popular book; indeed, the measure of popularity expected for it by its present editor is clearly indicated by the fact that he has limited his edition to three hundred and ten copies for English and two hundred and ten for American circulation. This is to be regretted, because there is much in the work that is of almost priceless interest to all peoples of Norse and Anglo-Saxon stock.

The Sagas of the Norse Kings, or the Heimskringla, as the book is more generally called—a title taken from the first word of the manuscript, and meaning the World's Circle—are the work of Snorre Sturlason, a prominent Iclander of the thirteenth century. Snorre was one of the most remarkable men of a remarkable race. He appears to have been singularly unscrupulous, and quarrelsome as Grettir the Strong himself. Also he loved money, and raised himself from the most modest beginnings to the position of the richest man in Iceland. His life was one long war, and finally he was murdered by his own relations at the age of fifty-three. But, notwithstanding the troublous times in which his lot was cast, and the prominent part that his ambition and love of wealth caused him to play in them, this Iclander found time to be a scholar, and to commit to parchment the records of the past that his untiring industry had collected. But, though Snorre was learned, his learning did not go far enough. A friend sent him a warning of the plot to assassinate him, written in secret runic character. Snorre could not read it, and was killed. The Sagas begin with the legendary history of Odin, the founder of the Yngling race, and end with the history of Magnus Erlingsson, who died in 1184, or about sixty years before Snorre's murder. Odin, according to the Heimskringla, lived in the country east of Tanais in Asia, in a country called Asaland, and was chief of the city As-gard. Thence he found his way to the North, and became the forefather of the Norse kings. The Heimskringla does not attempt to fix the date of this emigration of Odin and his followers, but Mr. Laing does. If we understand his argument rightly, he considered that emigration to have taken place at a date subsequent to the Christian era. In support of this position he adduces certain resemblances between Odinism and Christianity, which to us, at any rate, are not particularly convincing. Thus he positively states that "the use of the sign of the Cross also as a religious symbol appears to have prevailed in Odinism in the earliest times, and must have been borrowed from Christianity." We do not see the necessity; the sign of the Cross is to be seen on the walls of Egyptian temples, but few would be rash enough to assert that it was, therefore, borrowed from Christianity. As Rydberg points out in his work on Teutonic Mythology, which is also presented to the English reader by Mr. Rasmus Anderson, Roman history shows that those parts of Europe that are Teutonic now were Teutonic at the beginning of our era, that the Scandinavian peninsula was then inhabited by a Teutonic people famous for their ships and warriors, and that centuries must have already passed before the colonization of the peninsula could have attained that position. Indeed, it is almost inconceivable in the brief period of time which elapsed between the birth of the Christian era and the dawn of Scandinavian history that Asiatics, of whatever type, could have developed into the blue-eyed, golden-haired Norse warriors of whose deeds these pages treat. If ever there was a race which stands apart among the peoples of the world, it is the Teutonic race; and it seems almost certain that its great and singular characteristics, that in themselves seem to partake of the conditions and surroundings among which we first find them, must, especially in the slow soil of the North, have required many generations to grow and harden upon the softer Aryan stock.

The first two Sagas in the Heimskringla, those of the Yngling family and of Halfdan the Black, are so mixed up with fable and shadowy tradition that little reliance can be placed on them. But in the third, that of Harald Harfager, we begin to tread firmer ground. The history of this king is, indeed, particularly interesting, both because he succeeded in breaking the power of the small kings and Bondes or yeomen—if we may apply the term to the "udal born" freemen of the North—and in bringing Norway under his sole authority, and also on account of the colonization of Iceland, which took place in his reign. Numbers of the udal landowners of the kingdom, rather than bear the unaccustomed burdens that Harald sought to lay upon them and the loss of independence, abandoned their ancestral homes, to found an aristocratic Republic upon the inhospitable shores of Iceland, of which there is, so far as we know, no exact parallel in the world's history. Notwithstanding his stormy career and constant wars, Harald reigned for a period of nearly seventy years, and at last enjoyed the distinction, in or about the year 930, of dying of sickness in his bed, a lot that fell to few Northern warriors in those days. Into the history of his immediate successors the narrow limits of a review do not permit us to enter; so we will pass on to Olaf Haraldson, the Saint, who was born in the year 995, and reigned from 1015 to 1030. The life of this king, who was a contemporary of Canute, is told of in the longest and most important Saga in the Heimskringla, and its perusal may be recommended to those readers whom a weakness of the flesh deters from an exhaustive study of the work. Particularly interesting is the account of the way in which Olaf, then in the pay of King Ethelred, took London Bridge from the Danes, by tying his ships' cables round the piles and rowing with the stream till they were torn from their bed. But of the wars of Olaf, which were endless, we have no space to speak. Ultimately, after many adventures, he became King of Norway, and, being a zealous Christian, set himself to spread the light among the heathen folk with a vigour which amply accounts for the speedy conversion of the North. We read that, "if there were any would not renounce heathen ways, he took the matter so zealously that he drove some out of the country, mutilated others of hands or feet, or stung their eyes out; hung up some, cut down some with the sword; but let none go unpunished who would not serve God." To come to secular affairs, the gentleness of Olaf's disposition may be judged of from the fate he meted out to the two kings, Hrorek and Gudrod, who purposed to rebel against him. He punched out Hrorek's eyes and cut out Gudrod's tongue, and many of their followers were similarly served. Of such stuff were saints made in the Saga days. But Olaf was destined to qualify for the dignity in his own person. He was driven from his kingdom by the Bondes, for whom his aggressive holiness proved too heavy a burden, and finally fell in the great battle of Stiklestad while attempting to regain his crown. After his death he became a truly remarkable saint, and many were the miracles that he worked, sometimes in the most unexpected places. Next to that of Olaf, the Saga of Harald Sigurdson, more commonly known as Harald Hardrade, will probably prove most attractive to English readers. It was this Harald who fought at Stamford Bridge with Earl Tosti against Harald Godwinson, King of England, immediately before the battle of Hastings, and there earned the seven feet of English ground Harald Godwinson had promised him. The account of the battle is very interesting; but for it, as for many other matters and events we have no space to touch on, the reader must be referred to the Sagas themselves. As has been said, he will not find them light reading; but if he perseveres he will not be without his reward. Through the long, and often monotonous, record of blood, cruelty, and ambition, he will learn how great a spirit, and how true a love of freedom, animated the old Norse warriors of whom they tell. He will see, also, how, in the course of centuries, the savagery has vanished from the stock, while the love of freedom and some of the indomitable spirit still remain. For to a very large degree we are the direct descendants of these sturdy farmers and Viking robbers; and it is probable that the Anglo-Saxon race owes much of its success in the struggle of the world to the strain of Norse blood which permeates it everywhere. In conclusion we may be permitted to give a single instance—there are many such in the Sagas—of the bravery and indifference to death of which these men were capable. The Jomsborg Vikings, a robber community of peculiarly strict principles, who would not even admit women to their company lest their gentler presence should turn men's thoughts from war, had on a certain occasion registered vows in their cups which brought them to trouble when sober. Thirty of these men, led by a certain Vagn, were captured and chained together. The rest of the history we give in the words of the Saga (vol. ii. p. 130):—

Then up came Thorkel Leira, and said:—"Thou madest a solemn vow, Vagn, to kill me, but now it seems more likely that I will kill thee." Vagn and his men sat all upon a log of wood together. Thorkel had an axe in his hands, with which he cut at him who sat outmost on the log. Vagn and the other prisoners were bound so that a rope was fastened on their feet, but they had their hands free. One of them said:—"I will stick this cloak-pin that I have in my hand into the earth if it be so that I know anything after my head is cut off." His head was cut off, but the cloak-pin fell from his hand. There sat also a very handsome man, with long hair, who twisted his hair over his head, put out his neck, and said:—"Don't make my hair bloody." A man took the hair in his hands and held it fast. Thorkel hewed with his axe; but the Viking twitched his head so strongly that he who was holding his hair fell forwards and the axe cut off both his hands and stuck fast in the earth.

Then Earl Eirik came up and asked, "Who is that handsome man?" He replies, "I am called Sigurd, and am Bue's son. But are all the Jomsborg Vikings dead?"

Eirik says, "Thou art certainly Bue's son. Wilt thou now take life and peace?"

"That depends," says he, "upon who it is that offers it."

"He offers who has the power to do it—Earl Eirik."

"That will I," says he, "from his hands." And now the rope was loosened from him.

Then said Thorkel Leira, "Although thou should (?) give all these men life and peace, Earl, Vagn Akason shall never come from this with life." And he ran at him with uplifted axe: but the Viking Skarde swung himself in the rope, and let himself fall just before Thorkel's feet, so that Thorkel fell over him, and Vagn caught the axe and gave Thorkel a death wound.

Then said the Earl, "Vagn, wilt thou accept life?"

"That I will," says he, "if you give it to all of us."

"Loose them from the rope," said the Earl, and it was done. Eighteen were killed and twelve got their lives.

Truly it may be said of the Norse Vikings that nothing in their lives became them so well as their manner of leaving them.

MR. GRETTON'S RECOLLECTIONS.*

MR. GRETTON is quite right in thinking that an old man with a mens sana in corpore sano has no right to fritter away his latter days in "twirling his thumbs." A man needs not to have been great or illustrious to be a pleasant autobiographer; nor need he have taken a place in the front ranks, or have sat in the first row of stalls; from the dress-circle he may have seen many things which it is well worth while to remember. Of course he must not have slunk altogether out of view; in the slang of the day he must not have taken a "back seat." Mr. Gretton witnessed the Jubilee of George III., he has seen that kindly monarch leaning on the arm of Queen Charlotte and wearing a large-sized cocked-hat. He remembers the excitement caused by the assassination of Spencer Perceval. Although he did not actually know Pitt's Bishop Tomline, whose intellect he admired nearly as much as he despised his almost incredible meanness, he knew all about him. Of this meanness Mr. Gretton gives a striking example. He knew many of our famous judges, and he talks almost with tenderness of Chief Baron Pollock, whose "noble presence and intelligence, and speaking kindliness of eye" seem to have left a lasting impression on him. He saw the Duke of Wellington and the Master of Peterhouse in 1834 exchanging acts of old-time courtesy and politeness; and he tells a pleasant anecdote of the great soldier. At the installation of the Marquess Camden as Chancellor of Cambridge, the Duke received the honorary degree of D.C.L. Immediately afterwards, at a garden party at Sidney, Gretton, who approached the gate just after the Duke, heard his Grace give his name to the porter as "Dr. Wellington." He tells another very characteristic anecdote of the Iron Duke. His Grace, during the occupation of Paris, gave an order that no English officer should give a challenge to, or accept one from, a French officer. A French marshal, shortly after this order, shoved an English colonel from the pavement into the street. The Englishman knocked him down. When the maréchal made a formal complaint the Duke sent a written reprimand to the colonel, and in it enclosed an invitation to dinner. Mr. Gretton's estimate of the late Sir Francis Burdett strikes us as being sensible and just, and should go far to neutralize Lord John Russell's flippant sarcasm about that once famous politician. "Sir Francis Burdett never changed his foundation principle. In his early days the masses were a good deal trodden down. After the Reform Bill it was the classes that were shoved to the wall. Sir Francis changed his colours, but not his principles." Of Barnes, the Master of Peterhouse, Mr. Gretton tells an amusing story. Barnes was very kind to poor folks, and was consequently much pestered by beggars. A poor fellow came to him one day and urged that he was footsore. Barnes offered him a pair of old shoes, which were declined by the beggar as being either too large or too small. "Take them, then," said the Master, "to the gentleman over the way. He will give a good deal for them." The "gentleman over the way" was the senior Fellow, who was supposed to be rather impatiently waiting for the reversion of the mastership. Mr. Sheepshanks, Dean of Jesus, wrote to a peccant undergraduate an order to write out fifty lines of a satyr of Juvenal. This placard appeared next day on the walls of the college:—

* Memory's Harkback through Half a Century, 1808 to 1858. By F. E. Gretton, B.D. London: Richard Bentley & Son.

The Satyrs of old were monsters of note,
With the head of a man and the feet of a goat;
But the Satyrs of Jesus all Satyrs surpass,
With the shanks of a sheep and the head of an ass.

Mr. Gretton wanders over a wide range of people and places, and always talks pleasantly. He went once to hear Paganini fiddle on one string, but he says he would not step across his threshold to hear him do so again. His feelings on the subject are expressed in these rhymes:—

Who are they who spend their guineas
To hear sweet strains of Paganini's?
Pack o' ninnies!

He wishes that he had never heard Joachim, as it has spoiled him for hearing with pleasure any one else.

But the genial octogenarian's good stories of others must not make us forgetful of himself. In early boyhood he migrated from the neighbourhood of Windsor to the city of Hereford, where the deanery overlooked a ladies' school, kept by a Mrs. Lincoln. The Dean's son-in-law wished the lady to block up one of the windows from which the young ladies overlooked the deanery garden. The schoolmistress refused, and wound up the correspondence with these scathing words:—"The old saw that the Devil overlooks Lincoln is now reversed, for Lincoln overlooks the Devil." By the regulations of the Cathedral two canons were bound to be present at each service. Canon Kidley, when it was his turn, preferred toasting his toes over the fire at home. The canon who had officiated called on him in the afternoon, and complained that they had made a most disgraceful appearance in the choir stalls that morning. "Indeed, Mr. Canon," replied Kidley coolly, "then I am very glad that I did not make one among you." Another clergyman always abruptly concluded his sermon in the very middle of his argument when the clock placed in the gallery opposite the pulpit warned him that it was one o'clock. When remonstrated with by a gentleman who had wished to hear the logical conclusion of his premisses, "Sir," said the preacher, "I will spoil no poor man's pudding." From Hereford our author was sent to Shrewsbury school, and he has many pleasant anecdotes to tell us of his famous master, and of Lord Hill and of Jack Mytton, who were the two greatest local celebrities. He chats pleasantly about another famous schoolmaster, Dr. Parr, who posed to be a great man, but who was chiefly remarkable for his pomposity and arrogance. Of Keate, of Eton, he tells an amusing anecdote. A boy called Bosanquet, who stickled for the French pronunciation of his patronymic, refused to answer to his name when it was given out in the way in which it is usually pronounced in England. Keate laid him on the flogging block, and, as he tickled him, exclaimed, "Sir, I will flog you—

Sive tu mavis Bösänquēt vocari
Sive Bösänquēt."

The chapter in this work on "Episcopal Recollections" is particularly interesting. We have stories of Bishops Ryder, Lonsdale, Carr, Phillpotts, Thirlwall, Gray, and Colenso. Mr. Gretton summarizes the character of Colenso by saying that he was a man "sure to take up the poker by the wrong end and soil his fingers." "Bishop Gray set himself to uphold the simple truth of the Scriptures, and guard the simple untutored natives from being led into error under the guise of truth." Mr. Gretton was ordained by Bishop Bethell as deacon and by Bishop Marsh as priest. He himself appears to be a sound Churchman of the old school, with as few yearnings towards Rome as towards Geneva. He is not backward to acknowledge the zeal, learning, and piety of the newer generation of clergy, though he in no wise admits that the clergy of his youth deserved all the contemptuous tolerance with which they are so often spoken of nowadays. When the polemical hubbub was at its height an old lady asked Mr. Gretton whether he was High or Low. "Neither one nor the other," he replied. "Ay," she said; "then you are Jack and the game." When Mr. Gretton was once curate to a Doctor of Divinity, his rector never came within the limits of the parish unless he chanced to pass through with his beagles. In a parish in which there was only Divine Service every other week the ministrant chanced to go there by mistake on the wrong Sunday. Being there he wished to hold the service; but the clerk explained to him that that was impossible, as a goose was sitting on her nest in the pulpit, and would not be off it until the next Sunday.

In his long experience Mr. Gretton has met with fellow-priests of very peculiar opinions. One gentleman thought it necessary to burn his copy of Shakspeare, considering it an immoral book. Another spoke in his sermon of the Blessed Virgin as "a respectable young woman." A third would not forgive Sir Walter Scott for denying to an impertinent querist that he was the author of the Waverley Novels; yet this same gentleman was guilty of a much more serious breach of honesty in the unacknowledged quotations from other preachers which he introduced into his own sermon.

On the moot question whether sermons had better be written or extempore, Mr. Gretton quotes the capital dictum of the hard-headed North-countryman, Dr. Postlethwaite, formerly Master of Trinity, who said to a young Levite, "Wroite, mon, wroite; mony a fule talks fulishly, but he is a fule indeed that writes fulishly."

The subjects treated of in this book are so multifarious that we cannot even refer to all of them. Rutlandshire, Devonshire, Wales, Buxton are among some of the places much talked about. Chatsworth is said to be little better than the "representative of a plethoric purse," but Mr. Gretton has hardly words in which to express his intense admiration of Haddon Hall and Hardwick. He discusses the Peninsular War and the Crimea, and tells us a capital story of Soult and Lord Hill. When the Duke of Dalmatia was ambassador to England he was to dine one day with the Duke of Wellington. "When he arrived Lord Hill was standing with his back to him. Soult came stealthily up, seized him by the shoulders, saying, 'Ah, my friend; I have caught you at last.'" Readers of Napier's Peninsular War will understand why the remark was both apt and flattering. Mr. Gretton reminds us that the not uncommon sign for a public-house of "Tumble-Down Dick" was intended to commemorate Richard Cromwell's spiritless abdication. He tells us of the famous Prince Eugene that, being an Italian by birth, a Frenchman by training, and a German by adoption, he proclaimed his threefold nationality by his signature, "Eugenio von Savoye."

Mr. Gretton's memory is like the elephant's trunk which picks up small and great things alike. He can discuss the genesis and etymology of Bergami pears and Stilton cheese, and he can laugh over the story of a brother clergyman who delighted to say that his name was Jack Tate, but his wife's was "dictate." The story of the snubbing administered by a Judge of Assize to a clergyman who wore a blue coat and brass buttons, and posed as a country gentleman, reminds us of a scene which took place once in Lord Ellenborough's Court. A gentleman dressed in the fashion of the day offered himself as a witness in the case before the Court. When the proper officer proceeded to administer to him the usual oath, the man objected to be sworn, on the ground that he was a member of the Society of Friends. "You a Quaker, sir!" said the Lord Chief Justice sternly, "then how dare you to insult the Court by coming here in the disguise of a reasonable being?"

We heartily wish our readers as much pleasure from the perusal of this kindly book as we have ourselves derived from it.

BOOKS ON IRELAND.*

WE have already noticed the reprint of Sir Charles Russell's Parnell Commission speech. We notice it again in what would have been the proper place in order only to make one remark of some force. This book has been sent to us for review; and it is absolutely impossible to review it in any real sense without the risk, or rather the certainty, of gross contempt of court. When that is the case it does not need much argument to show that the publication is improper.

Mr. Robert Dunlop's volume on Grattan has the reverse effect to the famous "disappointing little book in the Revelation."—When one begins it the taste seems to be likely to prove bitter. Mr. Dunlop uses the terms "nationality," "freedom,"

* Speech before the Parnell Commission. By Sir Charles Russell. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

Grattan. By Robert Dunlop. London: W. H. Allen. 1889.

Celtic Ireland. By Sophie Bryant, D.Sc. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co. 1889.

I. L. P. U. Pamphlets and Leaflets, 1888. London: Irish Loyal and Patriotic Union. 1889.

Disturbed Ireland: the Plan of Campaign Estates. By T. W. Russell, M.P. London: Truslow & Shirley. 1889.

The Irish Union, Before and After. By A. K. Connell. London: Cassell. 1889.

Glimpses of Erin. By S. F. and A. L. Milligan. New edition. London: Marcus Ward & Co. 1889.

Thomas Drummond: his Life and Letters. By Barry O'Brien. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co. 1889.

and so forth, in the silly Irish sense which would equally justify Mr. Conybeare's Cornish supporters in agitating for independence of Northampton and Newcastle; and in various other ways he inspires doubts, as, for instance, by speaking as if he believed in the absurd description of Swift as an Irish patriot. Swift, as has been shown over and over again, and as every one ought to know now, was simply an English Opposition politician, who wished to embarrass the English Ministry, but to whom "ascendancy" was as much a doctrine of nature as anti-Walpolism. Afterwards, however, Mr. Dunlop improves very much, and he ends by a frank declaration that the expediency of the Union, the methods by which it was carried, and so forth, have really nothing to do with the burning question of the present day. His admiration of his hero is, indeed, rather excessive. The kind of windy rant, diversified by facile epigram, which has always passed with a certain section of Irishmen for oratory, and of which Grattan's was a capital example, requires, perhaps, a special palate to enjoy it. We should ourselves say, for instance, that for real eloquence Grattan's mouthing cannot compete for a moment with the manly sense of Fitzgibbon's best speeches (by the way, Mr. Dunlop should not speak as he does of the great Lord Clare—that is how fools speak, and Mr. Dunlop is not a fool). However this may be, we do not curse Mr. Dunlop, but rather bless him. He has the sense and honesty to confess that Fitzwilliam's recall (which our Gladstonians, who probably never heard of Fitzwilliam till three years ago, hold up as the causa malorum) was inevitably brought about by Fitzwilliam's own breach of faith and indiscretion in the dismissal of John Beresford.

Celtic Ireland is rather a large title for a book, and some critics might like to feel sure that Doctor of Science Sophie Bryant had qualified herself for dealing with it by original study. Very likely she has done so, though the books she quotes are usually English and recent, or translations of older works. This, however, seems to us a minor matter. It is generally of far less importance whether a man can read originals or not than whether he can apply the due historical criticism in the due historical manner to them. In this respect Doctor of Science Sophie Bryant strikes us as a little deficient. Here is a note:—

The Spanish records agree with the Irish, as already noted, that there was emigration from Spain to Ireland. Colmenar in the Annals of Spain and Portugal (1741), vol. ii. p. 55, sums up the matter thus: History informs us that two hundred years before Jesus Christ, &c.

What in the sacred name of the learned Doctor's doctorate is the value of a statement made by a compiler in 1741 to the effect that something happened long before the Christian era? We can show Miss Bryant (we cannot go on doctoring her) much earlier authority for the founding of Troynovant. Does she believe that? She refers elsewhere to Dr. Madden and his "quantity of evidence" to the same effect. Would it not have been well to give us some, especially considering the mutability of things in Spain itself? However, perhaps this is to consider too critically. Miss Bryant has got together a useful digest of her authorities, and has not put her foot through the cinis dolosus much oftener than might be expected of a lady-doctor.

We have more than once noticed and not seldom drawn upon the invaluable publications of the Irish Loyal and Patriotic Union. The most effective and the most useful of these are the abundant extracts given from "Nationalist" newspapers, speeches, and the like—a very arsenal of weapons for the right side, the admissibility of which the wrong side cannot deny. Here is the true history of Mr. John Mandeville—here the inimitable series of attributions of the vilest crimes to Lord Spencer and Sir George Trevelyan, which Sir George Trevelyan and Lord Spencer have swallowed so Christianly, and here much else that is precious. In common, and in the same paragraph with, this we may also notice another useful reprint, that of Mr. Russell's accounts of his visits to the Plan of Campaign estates. Such things are storehouses of truth, to be kept constantly at hand as a resource against the extraordinarily vivacious reappearances of falsehood.

Mr. A. K. Connell's pamphlet on The Irish Union, Before and After is a sufficiently sensible little book. If there were much chance of sensible books doing good in such a matter, we should recommend it to many readers. Unluckily, we believe most firmly that the average voter never makes up his mind on any question by reading sensible little books. He may sometimes be converted by some very significant or startling fact or fiction, but otherwise he goes right or wrong with his party. It is, therefore, much more important to keep men to the right party and the party leaders to the right course than to attempt to argue large political questions with individuals. Still, every statement of the truth may do good; and Mr. Connell has, for the most part, stated most undeniable truth.

We do not know whether Seaton F. Milligan and Alice L. Milligan are husband and wife or brother and sister; but in either case they have, by collaboration with pen and pencil, and probably by some preliminary journeyings about the island of their birth, produced a rather pleasant little combination of history and guide-book—a combination unusual, and therefore rather piquant. The guide-book is, on the whole, preferable to the history. For instance, we do not think that the finding of Roman coins in Ireland is exactly a proof that Niall and Dathi invaded Gaul and went as far as the Loire and the Alps; while we do think that, if in the year 400 or thereabouts an Irish army had appeared in either of these places, we should have heard something of it from historians of or near the time. But this is the kind of thing to which one grows accustomed in treatises on Irish history. The miscellaneous part is much pleasanter and more trustworthy, containing agreeable sketches of Irish life, hints for tours which are not to be neglected, verses which have something of the usual musical fluency of Irish verse, and other very tolerable things.

It has been the fashion among Separatists recently to bestow a good deal of rather damaging glorification on the memory of Thomas Drummond, the predecessor of Mr. Burke (whom Nationalists murdered), fifty years ago, the inventor of the lime light, and beyond all question a notable person. Drummond died young as a man (he was only forty-three) and younger as a politician, for he had been an engineer officer till but a few years before his death. There can be little doubt that had he lived a very considerable alteration would have taken place in his attitude towards Irish policy. He did not live to see the beginning, or rather the revival, of downright disloyalty in the Young Ireland movement, much less its sequel in Fenianism, Home Rule, and the present Separatist and land-grabbing agitation. He was a keen Whig, who found the landowners of Ireland generally Tory. He regarded (the sweet reasonableness of Drummond is often praised) the Orangemen as "demons." He did all he could to prevent the violence of the peasantry in the tithe matter (which then obscured rent somewhat) from being mitigated by the police. His conduct in this matter puzzled, as Mr. O'Brien admits, even his staunch friend and very complacent chief, Lord Morpeth, who put to him in writing the practicably unanswerable question, "What am I to say when it is objected thus—'You tell applicants that the sheriff or the Court may order out assistance for them; but you tell the police never to budge without a reference to, and the direction of, Government'?" He was such a bad political economist that he got a well-deserved snub from the cool head of Spring Rice for accusing Irish landlords of exporting food when their tenants were starving. He carried on against the Orange Society a persecution ten times as relentless as Mr. Balfour is charged with carrying on against Nationalists, and he actually endeavoured to prevent Orange processions from escorting ordinary funerals. At this very time that he thus attacked Orangeism he seems to have regarded Ribbonism as a thing that could only be finally put down by legislative enactments (of course in the tenants' interest). Although he was too masterful to be exactly a tool of any one, there is ample evidence here that he, Lord Morpeth, and Lord Mulgrave looked to O'Connell for orders at every turn; and there is at least one letter from O'Connell to Drummond given in this volume which denounces, in the most hectoring tone, the supposed intention of putting a Tory Protestant lawyer on the Bench. Finally, there is the notorious affair of the letter to the Tipperary magistrates, in which Drummond put the famous claptrap phrase, "Property has its duties as well as its rights." Mr. O'Brien is lost in astonishment at the fact that the Tipperary magistrates objected to this. He does not consider, though he most honestly gives the information himself, that the lecture of which it formed part was delivered on the text of the shooting of two landlords. Other landlords may naturally have been a little hurt at discovering that the official whose duty it was to preserve order in their country thought it part of the "duties of property" to stand being shot at—which in the circumstances might naturally seem to them to be his meaning.

We do not, therefore, think that Mr. O'Brien has done much service to Drummond's memory by this book. His loudly-vaunted secret of government would seem to have been nothing else than the old and fatal one of governing by a party—the party being for the time that which was hostile to England, to honesty, and to order. As for the execution of the book, it is pretty much what those who are acquainted with Mr. O'Brien's former books will expect. It is well enough written, and the writer's strong prejudice in opinion is not incompatible with a tolerably fair statement of fact. But it is far too long for its facts; a history of the Orange Society and of the "Fairman plot" is dragged in with little or no relevance, and solid slabs of the author's previous works are hurled without mercy at the reader's head. Still, it is well to have, put by an avowed advocate, the claims of this much-talked-of person to Irish statesmanship. We are quite content with the presentment.

PATMORE'S PRINCIPLE IN ART.*

THIS little volume will meet with disfavour in many sentimental quarters. It is positive, and even disdainful, in its repudiation of many popular theories of the day, while it attacks the great army of prigs on almost every side of their inertly-moving mass. We are far from asserting that we are always in unison with the views which it puts forward, or that we do not think its pages sometimes disfigured by a crudity which is the result of prejudice. But we welcome it as eminently vivid, eminently stimulating. Even where it most arrogantly contro-verts accepted opinion it lives, and its life is that of a distinguished and elevated intellectual being. There is no fourth-hand repetition here of views passed on from critic to critic, no acquiescence in the mental morality of Sleepy Hollow. Above all, there is a rejection of humanitarianism which is truly refreshing, and as rare in these days as it is courageous. These essays may be briefly described as dealing with the action of the moral nature upon artistic production. They open with some examination of the philosophical laws which should govern art and authorship. They proceed to examine certain modern poets from Crabbe to Mr. Swinburne. They close with a series of observations on the proper evolution of great ideas in architecture. Painting is hardly touched, sculpture very briefly and inadequately, and music not at all. Principle in art and literature is exemplified mainly in relation to poetical and architectural style.

* Principle in Art, &c. By Coventry Patmore. London: George Bell & Sons.

Mr. Coventry Patmore is vexed in spirit, as he well may be, at the desultory character of the expressed opinion—the “chatter,” as he calls it—which passes for criticism nowadays. He admits the sympathetic quality of the best of it, but he laments the absence of positive precept. His position is clearly stated by himself when he says that “it would be well if the professed critic would remember that criticism is not the expression, however picturesque and glowing, of the faith which is in him, but the rendering of sound and intelligent reasons for that faith.” It is evident that he has felt the disadvantage of the molluscous order of criticism, which, not possessing any backbone of law, seeks to make up for it by a soft and supple resignation to the mere sentiment of physical or even of moral beauty. Mr. Patmore suggests that in the writings of Aristotle and of some moderns there exists a supply of material from which a body of Institutes of Art might be created. It is probable that the school of Jesuit critics, who towards the end of the seventeenth century attempted to adapt Aristotle to the requirements of modern literature, appeals to him as highly, although temporarily, meritorious. But he nowhere refers to this school of Rapin and Bossu, nor does he offer the slightest suggestion with regard to the process of formation of a new order of Aristotelian criticism. Here Mr. Patmore becomes a disappointing guide. If his Institutes are introduced, and if they are made to work so satisfactorily as to supersede the “deciduous chatter” of the reviews, then they must be prepared to cover a wide field. They must decide, and that once for all, between M. Zola and Sir Walter Scott; they must tell us whether Tolstōi is the ideal novelist, and whether Walt Whitman writes poetry or no; they must affirm that history is to be composed either in the style of Dr. Stubbs or after the fashion of Mr. Froude and Lord Macaulay. The one-and-seventy jarring sects of arts and letters must all be silenced, and must worship together, with bowed heads, in the Temple of Nature. It is all very well for Mr. Patmore to wave his prophetic wand and murmur, “Let Institutes of Art be formed,” without explaining what scope or what authority they would possess. It is the old story. It is easier to condemn than to create, easier to point out the errors of a floating and irresponsible system of æsthetics than to sketch the lines upon which a positive system should be instituted. Mr. Patmore is more practically serviceable when he defines the value of one or two pieces of critical work, and in particular the Laocoon of Lessing, as pointing the way to a scientific criticism the conclusions of which shall be demonstrable and irreversible. The method of Lessing, however, can scarcely be conceived as appropriate to the endless variety and lawlessness of modern art and literature.

In dealing with recent poetry, by which we mean the whole of the famous verse which has succeeded the romantic revival, Mr. Patmore constantly returns to the charge that it has neglected, to a far greater degree than the poetry of any previous age, the principles of intellectual integrity; that to secure brilliancy and force it has surrendered humanity, truth, and sincere clearness of expression. The accusation is a paradoxical one, as we are accustomed to claim for the poetry of the present century the special merit of a revolt against conventionality, indifference, and untruthfulness. What Mr. Patmore says in this connexion may be quoted, for it is characteristic of his entire attitude towards modern literature:—

To a soundly trained mind there is no surer sign of shallowness and of interior corruption than that habitual predominance of form over formative energy, of splendour of language and imagery over human significance, which has so remarkably distinguished a great deal of the most widely praised poetry of the past eighty years. Much of this poetry has about as much relation to actual or imaginative reality as the transformation scene of a pantomime; and much more—called “descriptive”—has so low a degree of significance, and betrays so inhuman an absorption in the merest superficies of nature, that when the writer pretends to deal with those facts and phenomena of humanity which, directly or indirectly, are the main region of every true poet’s song, he has to overcome our sense that he is an habitual trifier before he can gain credit for sincerity, even when he is giving utterance to what may really be a passing strain of true poetic thought and feeling. A poet who is thus constantly occupied with the superficies of nature may probably attain to an accuracy and splendour of analytical description which has its value in its way, and which may, in certain transitory conditions of popular taste, raise him to the highest pinnacle of favour. But such poetry will be judged, in the end, by its human significance; and the writer of it will have the fatal verdict of “heartless” recorded against him—a verdict which even in the time of his favour is implicitly pronounced by the indifference with which his professions of human principle and feeling are received, even by his admirers.

We are in doubt regarding but one word of this interesting passage. It does not appear to us that “heartless” exactly expresses the fault which Mr. Patmore desires to stigmatize; some of the worst poetry—that is to say, the most showy, the most ephemeral—having been published by persons of tender and guileless character. This is a commonplace, of course; but a lack of distinct apprehension of it seems to lie at the bottom of Mr. Patmore’s charge of “heartlessness,” as of Mr. Ruskin’s famous belief in the personal holiness of the builders of Amiens and Beauvais, and in the personal wickedness of painters like Caravaggio. It is safer, we think, to use the word “insincere,” because there may be an intellectual and an imaginative insincerity, the mental honey produced by a pure heart being mingled with the wax of conventionality or lack of spiritual apprehension. Keats was a better artist when he wrote the Ode on a Grecian Urn than Shelley was when he wrote the more hysterical parts of Epipsychidion, not, as Mr. Patmore thinks, and as even Mr. Matthew Arnold seemed ready to allege, because he was a better man, but because, at that moment at all events, the runnings of his imagination were fresher and more sprightly, his insight keener, and his style more under control.

What Mr. Patmore should really aim at, as, indeed, he frequently seems to perceive, is not a set of fresh Aristotelian Institutes, or a body of artistic precepts around which, however adroitly they were fashioned, mediocrity would instantly begin to crystallize, but a moral code applied to the products of the imagination. We are far too apt to consider, in literature as in other things, that good motives justify an error in action. It is impossible to make the writers or the singers of bad hymns perceive in what their foolish doggerel offends. The obtuse insincerity of the writer is repeated by the reader, and words that have no sense or value are found to be of “great comfort” to those who employ them. This is the most flagrant example of a general error, the more refined form of which is seen in the avidity with which people accept the least genuine and valuable parts of the work of great poets as being quite as beautiful as their really immortal conceptions. Mr. Patmore, in his chapter called “Poetical Integrity,” has some very admirable remarks on this weakness, and analyses with great acumen the fatal tendency which draws the genuine poet of confined genius to endeavour to go on saying “fine things” when the fountain of his inspiration is stanchd.

The principal fault which we have to bring against this accomplished and interesting little volume is a slight want of coherence in its parts. If Mr. Patmore had written a sketch of his theory of poetical philosophy it might have possessed less freshness than this series of individual expressions, some of which, we fancy, date from many years back; but it would at least have presented a unity of form and a consistency of detail which we sometimes miss here. We should not have been told at one end of the book that what has genuinely gratified a good judge once will always gratify him, and at the other that the muse which pleased the early manhood of such a critic often stands before his elder judgment revealed as a false Duessa. We should have missed the repetition within a few pages of what was for once a very striking adaptation of a Catholic phrase, “O felix culpa,” but was too odd to be used in the same connexion twice. Such trifles as these, however, do not affect the general value of the book, which is an important contribution to a class of literature but scantily represented in this country, and seldom, indeed, illuminated by sanity and genuine insight. Mr. Patmore excels in short and pithy sayings, apophthegms, which take fancy captive, and linger in the memory. It would be easy to collect a posy of these. We quote a few which we have marked in passing:—

Pathos is the luxury of grief, and when it ceases to be a keen-edged pleasure it ceases to be pathos.

The femininity of these poets [Shelley and Keats] is a glorious and immortal gift, such as no mortal lady has ever attained or will ever attain.

A sensible person can easily distinguish between that which he cannot understand and that in which there is nothing to be understood. (“Blake.”)

A Problem will not sing even in the process of solution. (“Clough.”)

Genius, like sanctity, is commonly more or less foolish in the eyes of the world.

Purity ends by finding a goddess where impurity concludes by confessing carrion.

Emerson’s American admirers sometimes spoke of him as an “angel”; at any rate, he was a sort of sylph.

Such phrases as these grow as thick as blackberries on Mr. Patmore’s bush, and have even more flavour in them when eaten by the wayside than when gathered, as we have done, in a dish. The only essay we could wish away is the last, “Thoughts on Knowledge, Opinion, and Inequality,” the contents of which are mainly political, and seem to possess but little relation to Principle in Art. Mr. Patmore’s views on politics are in the main identical with our own, but he expresses them with a violence which is out of place on the slopes of Parnassus, and with a hopelessness which is out of place anywhere. He had better confine himself in future to those fields of poetry, mysticism, and imagination where, if he is not always right, he is always distinguished and charming.

BOOKS ON DIVINITY.*

THE republication in a collected form of Dr. Lightfoot's papers on Supernatural Religion has long been anxiously looked for, and will be welcome in many quarters. For some time past they have been on the list of authorities recommended by the Theological School at Oxford, and have been painfully studied in scattered numbers of the Contemporary Review. Many an undergraduate, weary of futile visits to the shelves of the Union, will quote Expectate venis as he purchases this volume. We are grieved to notice that the reason for the republication even now is the sickness of their revered author. May he long be spared to edify and adorn the Church. The excitement which attended the first appearance of these famous essays is now an old story; and they will be read, like Bentley's Phalaris, rather as models of critical method and finished workmanship, and for the rich stores of information in which they abound, than with reference to the dispute that originally called them forth. Only middle-aged people can now remember the extraordinary sensation produced, sixteen years ago, by the appearance of Supernatural Religion. It was one of those furori that periodically disturb the habitual British phlegm. Many reasons contributed to this result. The book made an immense parade of learning; it was written in a trenchant, hard-hitting style; it went the full length; and its anonymity, so jealously guarded as to suggest some disgraceful reason why the author withheld his name, completed the charm. There was possibly a delightful scandal about to break upon the world. Perhaps a bishop had written the thing. All the world flocked to buy the book, which ran through as many editions as a fashionable novel. Believers read and trembled; the man about town read, and was much relieved to find that he had always been right, though he did not know it—Christianity was an exploded idea. Even reviewers lost their heads, and talked their very finest about the learning, the precision, the calmness, the impartiality of the Great Unknown. Yet it was evident on a first glance that the Latin and Greek of the author were grotesquely bad; that his imposing array of references was so given that, without very great labour, it was impossible to tell what it was worth; that the judicial quality was conspicuous by its absence; and that the most offensive charges were made against honourable men, apparently without the least sense that any one could feel annoyed by them. It was this last obtuseness that drew down the author's chastisement. He was guilty of the extraordinary stupidity of charging Dr. Westcott with mendacity in respect to a certain passage of Irenæus, and supported the charge by an error in Greek grammar such as no decently-educated schoolboy would make. This affront to his friend was more than Dr. Lightfoot could bear, and hence arose this masterly series of papers. It is pleasant to read again the well-remembered passages—that in which Dr. Lightfoot argues with grave humour that the Supernatural Religion before him could not be the volume known by that name to various reviewers, who are "plainly dealing with some apocryphal work, bearing the same name and often using the same language, but in its main characteristics quite different from and much more authentic than the volumes before me"; that in which he estimates the critical position of Hitzig, who derived the name of Æsop from the "hyssop" that springeth out of the wall, and found out that the Epistle to the Philippians is a plagiarism from the Agricola of Tacitus; that in which he ploughs his way through a long list of references, in which the Rev. R. Cook, Vicar of Leeds, appears as Cocus, and the other authorities, though all quoted for the same purpose, are shown to have differed from one another and from the author; that upon the Silence of Eusebius, and many others. It is delightful to watch again these touches of the master hand, so light, yet so strong and certain; and to recall the joy with which those, who were young in those days, tried to realize the feelings of the enemy who was being so spoken to in the gate. The essays are reprinted exactly as they first appeared, except for a few subsequent notes which are distinguished by being enclosed in brackets. Some alterations might have been made in view of recent investigations; especially we know more of Tatian's Diatessaron, and, thanks to the Bishop of Durham himself, of Ignatius, than was known in 1874. Possibly it was from a desire to incorporate these modern results in his papers that Dr. Lightfoot delayed the reprinting so long. What has been added to our knowledge in the interval all goes to strengthen his position. But it is better that we should have the book as it is. It has already taken its place among classics. It is probable that before long the author of Supernatural Religion will be remembered only as the man, sine tribu sine nomine, who was slain by Dr. Lightfoot in the Contemporary Review.

Dr. Salmon's Infallibility of the Church is a set of lectures delivered by their eminent author, while still Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Dublin, on the claim of the Church of Rome—or, as we must now say, of the Bishop of Rome—to be accepted as the infallible guide and judge in all controversies touching the Christian faith. Dr. Salmon's object, as defined in the preface, is to facilitate the reunion of Christendom by inducing the withdrawal of claims which can neither be granted nor compromised. If this was really the idea with which he wrote, he, too, has "launched an olive-branch from a catapult." If we may be permitted to regard the lectures as intended to arm their hearers for battle, we may call them admirable; but they are pacific only in the sense of the old adage Si vis pacem para bellum. But what can a Regius Professor of Divinity do better than supply his pupils with the sharpest and toughest weapons for a controversy which even in England is serious and in Ireland is menacing? Dr. Salmon has accomplished this task with that wide and accurate scholarship and that keen, clear intelligence that distinguish all he writes. But his spear is not like that of Achilles, which healed the wounds it made. What he says is delivered in a pungent, unsparing style, abounding in good stories and apt, homely illustrations, with a scornful flip in almost every sentence. It fixes itself upon the mind; but, if we did not happen to be on the same side, we should find it a little exasperating. The lectures are printed almost exactly as delivered, with necessary notes and a few additions. There is a genuine extempore ring about them, and not the expressions only, but the arrangement, has an easy discursive flow, which makes it difficult to reproduce the argument in a compact form. Indeed, no résumé could do justice to a subject so wide and intricate, or to the learning with which it is here treated. Dr. Salmon begins with the more abstract and ends with the more concrete aspect of his subject. The first question considered is whether there is or ought to be any infallible guide in matters of faith. Probably this to many minds is the most important question of all. They think that there must be; and, as no other Church claims the prerogative, they find themselves irresistibly drawn towards the Church of Rome, which does. Dr. Salmon's answer is, that, if by infallible guide we mean one that can resolve every doubt that may present itself to the soul of man, there is none; if, on the other hand, we mean one that can teach us all vital and essential truth, it is to be found in Scripture with a certain help from tradition. "Dr. Hawkins, the late Provost of Oriel, summed up our doctrine on this subject in the formula—the Church to teach, the Scriptures to prove." What this means—the use of Scripture in the early Church, and the nature, value, and limitations of tradition—is admirably explained by one who knows exactly what tradition is. Here come in some excellent remarks on the paralysing effect of a belief in infallibility in the wide sense. God does not, for reasons that we can well understand, save men in * Essays on Supernatural Religion. By J. B. Lightfoot, D.D., D.C.L., LL.D., Bishop of Durham. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

The Infallibility of the Church: a Course of Lectures delivered in the Divinity School of the University of Dublin. By George Salmon, D.D., Provost of Trinity College, sometime Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Dublin. London: John Murray.

The Hallowing of Criticism: Nine Sermons on Elijah preached in Rochester Cathedral. By the Rev. T. K. Cheyne, M.A., D.D., Oriel Professor of the Interpretation of Holy Scripture at Oxford, Canon of Rochester. London: Hodder & Stoughton.

Paul of Tarsus. By the Author of "Rabbi Jeshua." London: George Redway. 1889.

The Epistle to the Hebrews, in English; with Appendix. By Frederic Rendall, M.A., formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and Assistant-Master of Harrow School. London: Macmillan & Co.

The First and Second Epistles to the Corinthians; with Notes Critical and Practical. By the Rev. M. F. Sadler, Rector of Honiton, Prebendary of Wells. London: Bell & Sons. 1889.

Sermons for the Christian Year: a Selection from the Quebec Chapel Sermons of Henry Alford, sometime Dean of Canterbury. London: Rivingtons. 1889.

The Faithful Departed; and other Sermons. By the Rev. Charles Page Eden, M.A., sometime Fellow and Tutor of Oriel College, and Vicar of St. Mary's, Oxford, late Vicar of Aberford and Canon of York. London and Oxford: Parker & Co. 1889.

The Light that Lighteth Every Man: Sermons. By Alexander Russell, B.D., late Dean of Adelaide; with Introduction by Very Rev. E. H. Plumptre, D.D., Dean of Wells. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

The Worship of Heaven; and other Sermons. By the late Rev. Daniel Trinder, M.A., Vicar of Highgate, and Rural Dean, late Vicar of Teddington; with Preface by the Lord Bishop of Derry and Raphoe. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co. 1889.

Our Catholic Inheritance in the Larger Hope. By Alfred Gurney, M.A., Vicar of S. Barnabas, Pimlico. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.

Christianity and Islam in Spain, A.D. 756-1031. By C. R. Haines, M.A. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co. 1889.

The Apostles. By Ernest Renan. Translated from the original French. London: Trübner & Co.

Leaves from St. John Chrysostom. Selected and Translated by Mary H. Allies. Edited, with Preface, by T. W. Allies, K.C.S.G. London: Burns & Oates, Limited. 1889.

A Manual for Holy Days: a Few Thoughts for those Week Days for which the Church provides Special Services. By F. C. Woodhouse, M.A. London: Wells Gardner, Darton, & Co.

The Bible and the Papacy. By Rev. R. Belaney, M.A., Cambridge. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co. 1889.

What are the Catholic Claims? By the Rev. Austin Richardson, late Professor of the Institut St. Louis, Brussels; with an Introductory Essay by the Rev. Luke Rivington. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co. 1889.

The Sternness of Christ's Teaching, and its Relation to the Law of Forgiveness. (Norrisian Prize Essay for 1888.) By J. F. Bethune-Baker, M.A., Pembroke College, Cambridge. Cambridge: Macmillan & Bowes. 1889.

The Lord of Humanity; or, the Testimony of Human Consciousness. By Frederick James Gant, F.R.C.S., Senior Surgeon to the Royal Free Hospital. London: Hatchards. 1889.

An Inquiry into the Basis of True Christian Unity. By the Rev. S. Kettlewell, M.A. Vol. II. London: Wells Gardner & Co. 1889.

Ruling Ideas in Early Ages, and their Relation to Old Testament Faith. By J. B. Mozley, D.D., late Canon of Christ Church, and Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford. Fourth edition. London: Rivingtons. 1889.

their own despite from sin. "Equally opposed to His method is any system which proposes to preserve men from error by keeping them in the state of childhood." The next question, "Supposing Rome to be infallible, could we logically believe her to be so?" is one which would perhaps have been better omitted. Only, says Dr. Salmon, by arguing in a vicious circle. That is to say, Rome asserts "I am infallible because I always speak the truth." And if we ask, "How do we know that what you say is truth?" the answer is, "Because I am infallible." The reasoning in form is illogical; nevertheless the objection is futile. It proves too much, and might be urged with equal force against the Ten Commandments. Love always argues in a circle, and its conclusion always contains more than its premisses; and if "faith's venture" is barred by logic, so much the worse for the logic. The point to which the battering-ram may be applied with effect is that which Dr. Salmon treats last, "Is Rome as a matter of fact infallible?" Here he is on strong ground, of which he knows every inch. Till 1870 the Roman Church never officially claimed infallibility, and those who believed in her possession of the gift did not know in what organ the infallibility resided, whether in the Church at large, or in General Councils, or in the Pope. Her conduct has not been that of one who believed in her own infallibility. This point is elaborated with great fulness of detail, and is perhaps the most convincing part of the book. The rulers of the Roman Church have manifestly been guided merely by the tactical rules of a clever political leader, waiting always to see how the wind will blow, keeping silence in the heat of the conflict, and then claiming credit for the result. Another fatal sign is, that in the Roman Church, as in political factions, the head is swayed by the tail. An ambiguous patronage is extended to popular "developments," the spurious miracles of Lourdes, La Salette, and Knock, the crazy revelations of Gertrude, Marie Alacoque, Marie Taigi, and Lutgarde, the debased Mariolatry of Neapolitan lazzaroni. Intelligent Romanists look askance at such doings, and it is possible for a respectable priest to acknowledge that "there are many things in the Breviary which he does not believe." But woe to them if they express their scepticism too loudly, for what was yesterday a pious opinion may to-morrow be de fide. Still further, beyond this trimming to the popular blast, positive blunders can be brought home to the infallible guide. Dr. Salmon tells again with great power the old comedy of the Sixtine Vulgate, and the old tragedy of Galileo. The story of the progress of the Roman Supremacy, and of the astounding discovery that the personal infallibility of the Pope was not a mere "Protestant calumny," but an eternal truth, concludes the volume. Such a book by such an author, it need hardly be said, is far more than a mere polemical arsenal. The student will find light thrown upon numerous vexed questions in exegesis, Church history, and early Christian literature, while the casual reader will learn with interest why Mr. Pigott wore the scapular. The weakest part in the work is the treatment of Development, which is disjointed, one-sided, and imperfect. There is a truth in Cardinal Newman's contentions which has been misused, not only by Romanists, but also by certain German divines, and our students should be very carefully instructed to disentangle the truth from its misuse. It is a pity that their peaceful fructification should be interrupted by the sound of the cane, which Dr. Salmon wields so vigorously, and, after all, it would have been better if the flogging had been delegated to the porter, and administered outside the class-room door. Indeed, is the flogging any good? Nobody ever gave a reason for going over to Rome that could be put into a syllogism, and the only good reason ever given for coming back was that of a distinguished man who had performed the double journey, and justified his return by the statement that he had found Roman Catholics no better, if no worse, than other people.

Canon Cheyne, it will be remembered, read at the Manchester Church Congress a very able paper on the duty of the clergy to familiarize their congregations with the most assured results of modern criticism, especially with regard to the Hebrew Scriptures. His argument was open to three objections—first, that the pulpit is not the place for discussing difficult questions of scholarship, unless under exceptional circumstances; second, that the clergy, as a rule, are not qualified for handling such topics; and, third, that the critics themselves are not agreed what results can be regarded as assured. It would not be an edifying spectacle if all our curates took to lecturing on Kuenen and Wellhausen. There can, however, be no sort of objection to a man of Canon Cheyne's learning and piety illustrating his theory in practice. This is what he has undertaken to do in the present series of Sermons on the Life of Elijah. We may regard them either as sermons pure and simple or as illustrations of a theory. In the first point of view, they are admirable, charming, devout, and graphic. The author's rich learning is skilfully applied to bring out every feature in the narrative that can interest or instruct. It is perhaps unjust to represent the prophet as a rather dull man who did not exactly understand what he was doing, and the attempt to whitewash Ahab is not successful. Canon Cheyne speaks of his "noble death"; but Ahab is surely represented as trying to shirk his doom in rather a mean way by a device of the same kind as that of the Wild Boar of Ardennes or our own Richmond. Also the applications, though exceedingly good, are neither very obvious nor very inspiring. But as illustrations of a theory the sermons will not satisfy anybody. The "most assured result of criticism" appears to be the axiom that, whenever the reader of the Bible comes upon an event of the supernatural order, he may treat it in one of three ways—he may accept it, or he may deny it, or he may wrap it up in such language that nobody can tell whether he accepts it or whether he denies. Instances of all three methods of treatment will be found in this little book. But, if this is all criticism has to say, it appears to be of the nature of an impertinence. We do not want learned professors to tell us that we may take our choice.

Paul of Tarsus is another attempt to present the intelligent reader with the "results of criticism," but is certainly not the work of a learned professor. The style is that so much admired in Ouida, and the matter is drawn from the depths or shallows of the author's mind. At least, we do not know where else he, or she (can it be Ouida in masquerade?), learned that John the Baptist was a Buddhist, and that Our Lord had "chestnut locks and deep, dark eyes." People who can write or read this sort of stuff could believe anything, and might just as well be orthodox, if it were not for the fun of the thing.

Mr. Rendall's Epistle to the Hebrews comprises an English text (practically an original translation) and notes, with an appendix, formerly published as an independent volume, on the Theology of the Hebrew Christians. Mr. Rendall holds that the Epistle reflects the teaching of St. Peter; that it was written from Italy to the Churches of Palestine, but not to Jerusalem, at the time of the siege of the city by Titus, when Jewish Christians saw the old worship going to wreck, and were anxiously asking themselves what would be the result of the disasters of the time on their own position; and that the author was a Jew of Palestine, who had been carried prisoner to Rome by Vespasian. All these points are disputable, but Mr. Rendall defends his own view with much ability. The book has high merit. The scholarship is excellent, and the author has pondered well all that he says. But space forbids us to do more than point out what strike us as blemishes. In a work of so much learning Mr. Rendall should have referred more directly to the labours of his predecessors. To ignore their very names is hardly fair to his readers or to himself. It is a practice which fosters that tendency to eccentricity which is the bane of English scholarship. The translation is open to many exceptions. "Of the Son He saith" (i. 8) involves a departure from the text, and "complete" does not strike us as a good rendering of the difficult epithet applied to the sanctuary in ix. 1. May we venture to suggest "typical of the universe"? Philo thought that the Tabernacle was an image of the world. "While the first chamber is still holding a position which is a figure for the time being" (ix. 9) is, again, surely incorrect. There are, perhaps, a dozen other points in which Mr. Rendall may be thought to have gone astray. In the appendix, also, there is that which will not satisfy some of his readers. Self-sacrifice, Mr. Rendall urges, is the only true sacrifice. This is true, but not the whole or the deepest truth. The essence and vital principle of all sacrifice is its vicariousness. Where this is wanting we speak of devotion, but hardly in the proper sense of sacrifice. Many people, again, do not think it scriptural to speak of the Lord's life as of an integral part of His sacrifice. Can Mr. Rendall produce any passage where we are said to be saved by His life? But we do not wish to leave an unfavourable impression on our readers' minds. Rather we would warmly commend Mr. Rendall's edition to all thoughtful readers of this great Epistle.

We need not dwell at length upon Mr. Sadler's edition of the First and Second Epistles to the Corinthians. It is of a more popular character than the book just noticed, but none the less excellent on that account. Mr. Sadler's merits as a wise and practical commentator are well known, and his new volume will be welcome to many readers, especially among the country clergy.

The list of sermons includes Sermons for the Christian Year, by the late Dean Alford; The Faithful Departed, and other Sermons, by the Rev. C. P. Eden. Mr. Eden's name is fresh in the memory of all readers of Dean Burgon's Lives of Twelve Good Men, and of this volume also it may be said that it "deserves to be inquired after and diligently read"; The Light that Lighteth Every Man, by the late Dean of Adelaide, with a graceful in memoriam notice of Mr. Russell's life, character, and other works, by Dr. Plumptre; and The Worship of Heaven, another posthumous volume of sermons, by the late Vicar of Highgate, with an introduction by Bishop Alexander.

We have received also Our Catholic Inheritance in the Larger Hope, by the Rev. Alfred Gurney, a booklet the scope of which is pretty clearly indicated by its title; Christianity and Islam in Spain, by Mr. Haines, the Cambridge Kaye Prize Essay for 1888, which deserves the notice of historical experts; an anonymous translation of Renan's Apostles; a selection of passages from Chrysostom, translated by Mary H. Allies; A Manual for Holy Days, by F. C. Woodhouse; The Bible and the Papacy, by Rev. R. Belaney, and What are the Catholic Claims? by the Rev. Austin Richardson, who has apparently been summoned by the Rev. Luke Rivington to his aid against Mr. Gore; The Sternness of Christ's Teaching, by J. F. Bethune-Baker; The Lord of Humanity, by F. J. Gant, an interesting little volume, by one whose profession as a surgeon has familiarized him with sad sights, without dulling his sensibility; the second volume of Mr. Kettlewell's Inquiry into the Basis of True Christian Unity, and a new edition of Canon Mozley's well-known Lectures on the Old Testament.

THE BOOK OF THE FARM.*

THIS Division of The Book of the Farm is as interesting and is calculated to be as useful as the last which we reviewed in these columns; but here and there it is open to the charge of repetition. The subject of ploughing had been dealt with at great length in a former volume, and now a good deal of the old ground is gone over again. Then there is a long and excellent section on "Manures and Manuring," and this is followed by others on the "Rothamsted Experiments," "Aberdeen Experiments," and "Highland and Agricultural Society's Experiments," in which much the same matter is presented to the reader again and again. There is much repetition also in the descriptions of the treatment of sheep in England and Scotland, and in different places in each. Nevertheless, we should hesitate in giving any other book on farming the preference over this new edition of Stephens's Book of the Farm.

In the section on the management of cattle in spring, doubts are expressed as to whether the deleterious effects usually attributed to ergot do not, in the majority of cases, owe their origin to other causes. Farmers will do well to study the remarks upon this subject before condemning a pasture or a stack of hay in which traces of ergot have been found. Oil-cake is strongly recommended for calving-cows, both for a month before and a month after the birth of the calf. Every one who has talked to ill-educated farmers about cattle-cakes must know how apt they are to have a prejudice in favour of one kind for all occasions, to the exclusion of every other. Yet the difference in certain respects between decorticated cotton-cake and linseed oil-cake is almost greater than that between boiled rice and stewed prunes to human beings. Each is highly valuable at its proper time, although there are circumstances under which it would be absolutely pernicious. In case of meals, again, one farmer will invariably buy bean meal and another Indian meal, instead of getting each as circumstances may require. Exceedingly full details are given about calving, and a sensible suggestion is made that even smart farmers' daughters would not demean themselves by making themselves acquainted with such matters as the rearing of calves. English farmers are strongly urged to breed and to rear more calves, instead of buying stores. In the first place, they are told that they should usually breed one or two calves from every heifer intended as a store. "The calf or two will have done her little or no harm in the butcher's eye, if only she does not show the udder of a cow. This will not often arise when the calves suckle." A large salesman in the North of England stated that in his experience "two calves or so in no way spoiled the sale of a young heifer" under these conditions, and he added "that a lot of young heifers never came before him for sale but he regretted that so much valuable material was being wasted. Premature fattening of heifers is really killing the goose that lays the golden egg. In these times farmers cannot afford such waste as that." Secondly, it is stated that farmers do not, as a rule, breed long enough from their cows. They should "breed from all suitable cows as long as possible." In some modern books on cattle and dairy-farming, exactly the opposite theory is advanced, and their authors maintain that one decided source of loss to many farmers is their practice of persistently breeding from favourites, even when very old. The section on lambing in this Division of The Book of the Farm is as elaborate as that on calving, and few cow or sheep owners, who have not served a practical apprenticeship, will read either without finding something of which they were hitherto ignorant. We would recommend amateurs to study both of these sections, as they will then be enabled to appreciate the difficulties of the cowmen and shepherds whom they are so ready to blame if everything does not go quite smoothly.

There were days when manure was the symbol of the lowest form of bucolic stupidity; it has now become a science of distracting complexity. It might be supposed that, when a chemical analysis of a soil had been obtained, the farmer would only have to select the manure specially suited to supply its deficiencies; but in reality he cannot proceed so fast as that, or, if he does, it will be at considerable risk; indeed, it may be said that he never uses artificial manures without more or less risk. For, after the chemist has told him the exact quantity of what the author calls "any element in the soil or subsoil," he has yet to learn how much of that element exists in a form available to the plant, and how much of it is locked up in combinations which the weaker acids at the command of the plant are unable to break up. True, by diluting and weakening his acids and alkalies, so as to bring them as near as possible to the strength of the dissolving agents at the command of the plant, the chemist endeavours to estimate the amount of available plant food in a soil. In this way he is able to obtain information of undoubted value. Yet it is merely an estimate, and in practice has to be followed with caution.

In another place we are given an example of the untrustworthiness of such a chemical analysis as a guide to manuring. A soil was analysed and found to contain muriate of potash at the rate of 3 tons per acre within a foot of the surface. The same artificial manures were applied to two plots of this land, but on one of them 2 cwt. of muriate of potash was added per acre. The latter plot produced 54 bushels of barley to the acre, while upon the other the crop failed. "There was an abundance of potash in the soil, but it was not available to the barley. Hence, on this soil an application of potash was essential for profitable cropping, and no amount of other manures would succeed without it." After all the scientific research which has been made on the subject of manures, one fact becomes more and more certain, and it is thus summarized in this volume:—"Farmyard manure contains all the elements necessary for plant-growth, and is, therefore, a complete manure. If applied in sufficient quantity it will, without any extraneous aid, maintain fertility even under an intense system of cropping." On the other hand, it is in many cases a very expensive manure. It costs a great deal in cartage, and, in order to apply any one of the "elements of plant-growth," all have to be applied, if farmyard manure is used. Unfortunately, a large portion of those not required, instead of remaining in the soil for future crops, "escape through channels which were formerly unsuspected as means of loss," such as the washing away of nitrates in drainage water, evaporation as nitrogen gas, and the nitrification caused by countless myriads of bacteria. "In times past we have placed too much faith in the soil as the custodian of costly manure. While nourishing a growing crop the soil is commendably faithful to its trust, and does not then readily part with its available plant-food except to the crop itself. But the moment the crop is removed the soil loses retentive power," and loss sets in. This loss "may be reduced to a minimum by having the soil covered with vegetation throughout the entire year, or in cold northern districts by leaving it bare only in the winter months, when the temperature is usually too low for the formation of nitrates to proceed in the soil." For this purpose many farmers now sow some forage crop—such as rye—after removing a cereal crop. According to this theory, the loss through the old system of leaving land fallow must have been enormous. The most approved practice at present is to keep working the land unmercifully and to feed it unsparingly. It may be some comfort to landlords who have exhausted or badly-farmed land to let to learn that the author considers that soil which has been neglected and exhausted will respond to the application of artificial manure more readily than under any other conditions, since, "by repeated cropping without receiving an adequate return in the shape of manure," it has become "exhausted of certain elements of fertility; while, by the decay of the roots of the crops, other elements of plant-food are stored up in increasing quantity," and these are called into action when the land is well tilled and the deficiencies are supplied in the form of suitable manures.

The fossil manure of extinct animals and reptiles is used to an immense extent by modern farmers, although it may be that comparatively few of them are aware of it. Rendered soluble by sulphuric acid, in the form of superphosphate, over half a million tons of coprolite are placed on the markets of Great Britain every year. Fossil guano, again, is imported largely from the West Indian islands. But one of the most satisfactory as well as one of the most economical of artificial manures is what is known as Thomas Slag. We are told here that it was invented and patented by Messrs. Thomas and Gilchrist in 1879, but that it was only introduced into the market in 1886, and that now about 600,000 tons of it are produced annually in Europe. Everybody is familiar with the ugly heaps of slag which are to be seen adjoining iron-factories, and they were until lately considered, not only useless, but serious encumbrances. The slag may now be converted into a very valuable manure, instead of being thrown away as rubbish. "The method consists in mixing the molten iron with about twenty per cent. of lime. The converter, which is a large, pear-shaped vessel, is also lined with lime, instead of brick. The various impurities, such as manganese, silicon, phosphorus, and carbon, combine with the oxygen present in a stream of air which is forced through the molten mass, and either burns off or forms oxides with these substances. But on an increase of the already high temperature the phosphorus is converted into phosphoric acid, which combines with the lime, and the resultant product is the Thomas Slag, or phosphate of lime." The slag is then ground into a very fine powder, and passed over magnets of great power, which abstract a portion of the iron still left in it. Thomas Slag has the advantage of being a very soluble form of phosphatic manure, and perhaps its only drawback is that in some instances it contains too large a proportion of oxide of iron. The remarks about Thomas Slag in The Book of the Farm were corroborated a few weeks ago by an article upon agriculture in the Times, in which it was stated that "Thomas's basic phosphate (or basic cinder) is now the cheapest phosphate available, and it has this year more than borne out its character, and easily beaten its competitors." But it should be remembered that the season has undoubtedly been peculiarly favourable for this form of phosphate.

The section on Seed Time is full of interest, and the disputed merits of sowing one-hand, two-hand, hand-broadcast, machine-broadcast, and by drilling and dibbling, are discussed at great length. Every one may not know that, of an apparent volume of ploughed soil, about one-quarter consists of air, and air, as well as soil, water, and a certain temperature, is required to make a seed germinate—"what excites the vitality of seeds we do not know, perhaps never shall—it is a secret which nature has hitherto kept to herself; but we do know the circumstances in which seeds must be placed in order that they may begin to grow or germinate." The diagrams of the principal grasses are clear and simple. The greater number of the illustrations in the volume, however, as well as the eight plates of "animal portraits," are somewhat behind the times. We are not forgetting that Stephens's Book of the Farm is a reproduction of an old book, nor that in a new edition of a much-respected work it may be well that its character should be maintained as much as possible; but for all that we are inclined to think that when a book has been "in great part rewritten" the reviser need not hesitate to improve the illustrations as much as the letterpress.

* The Book of the Farm. By Henry Stephens, F.R.S.E. Fourth edition, revised, and in great part rewritten. By James Macdonald, of "The Farming World." In six divisions. Division III. Edinburgh and London: William Blackwood and Sons. 1889.

THREE GENERATIONS OF BOOKSELLERS.*

THE history of the Leipsic firm of K. F. Koehler, from 1789 to 1889, from its humble beginnings in the little shop in the Nikolai-strasze to its palatial importance in the fine building which covers sixty-eight mètres of the Stephan- and thirty-nine and thirty-seven mètres of the adjacent Sternwarten- and Seeburg-straszen, is told by Herr Rudolf Winkler with complacent elaboration of detail. Herr Winkler, a confidential member of Koehler's staff, dedicates this record to the friends of the firm on the occasion of its hundredth anniversary, with a touch of the magniloquent reverence with which an old soldier might have written of the house he had served his life long, and with all the gratitude which comes of faithful service in a worthy cause. If there are many among the uninitiate who will cavil at the formidable array of technicalities with which the work bristles, there are few who will withhold their sympathy from the success that crowns the indomitable perseverance of three generations, or their interest from the direct and simply-told narrative of the writer, who in his modest preface confesses to less experience in belles-lettres than in business-letters. In 1789 Karl Franz Gottlieb Koehler, son of Johann Koehler, "Korduaner"—i.e. descendant of a long line of workers in Cordovan leather, from the turned-up "Schnabelschuhe" of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries to the fine leather prepared for the more sober gear of the eighteenth, struck out a new line for himself. Having previously served his four years' apprenticeship under Paul Gottfried Kummer, he set up as a bookseller in the house in the Nikolai-strasze which his grandfather Simon had bought for 1,850 thalers, in 1702, of the heirs of a certain Bankmann, printer.

Karl Franz Koehler learnt his business thoroughly, and something else besides—namely, that it was ill trifling with a book-selling citizen of his native town in the year of grace 1780. He and his biographer appear to accept as a natural consequence of staying too long on the top of a ladder that the autocratic Kummer should have knocked him off it, to the detriment of one shoulder, which was ever afterwards higher than the other, a witness of his transgression. In 1790 the business established by Koehler had outgrown the paternal walls. He transplanted it to a larger dwelling in the Ritter-strasze, where it remained until 1839. The French Revolution, the crushing of the Fatherland under Napoleon's chariot-wheels, her reawakening to life and liberty, did not distract the founder of the firm from the chief aim of his life. "For there," during all those eventful years, "honest work was done, according to the good custom of German trade and of the Leipsic book-trade," avers his chronicler, with a retrospective equanimity not unworthy of Frau Buchholz. It is but ruffled for a moment by Herr Koehler's imprisonment in 1808 for the sale of a forbidden work on "Napoleon Bonaparte and the French People under his Rule." The shock of the week's imprisonment, followed by heavy fines and much vexation, brought on an illness which lasted several months. "But," adds Herr Winkler, "this episode gives to us, who come after him, the agreeable certainty that, amid the stress and din of foreign rule, Koehler felt, as a German, that he was far from fearing any one, and that in the most troublous times he went his way without exaggerated care for the morrow." This eulogy has, we must confess, been expressed with greater concision by those persons who declared Mr. Deadeye, "in spite of all temptations to belong to other nations," to have "remained an Englishman." In 1805, although Koehler's staff consisted but of one assistant and an errand-boy, he was the accredited Leipsic agent of many important firms, and dealt largely in educational works and works on jurisprudence and medicine. Despite a quaint circular, addressed, in 1822, "to his youthful colleagues," in which he begs them to desist from sending him "such perfectly useless novelties as works on philosophy, novels, and plays," he appears, during the preceding fifteen years, to have driven a brisk trade in the "sentimental works" ["empfindsame Romane"] of Schilling, Schulz (Laun), Kotzebue, Haken, Winkler (Th. Hell), Zschokke, and more especially the eighty and odd novels of August Lafontaine, a well-known Protestant preacher at Halle. These publications were "awaited with longing alike by librarians and their patrons"; while Schiller and Goethe appear to have ranked as comparatively profitless items. Karl Franz Koehler died in 1833; and his elder son Franz reigned in his stead.

He began his apprenticeship under Christian Horvath, of Potsdam, who, after attending the Easter book fair at Leipsic, packed his apprentice, with his other acquisitions, into his own travelling carriage, the better to instruct him in the duties that awaited him. The first of these, under a master who is described as "of the old sort and fibre," was the filling of the latter's pipe. A year later he was transferred to Heyer's, at Giessen, where, notwithstanding the indignity of being set daily, or rather nightly, "to clean the big lamp," and the total absence of Christmas presents, young Koehler became thoroughly grounded in the innermost mysteries of his trade. The lamp-cleaning was a subject of offence to his father, especially when he realized the profanation by "oil-spots" of his son's garments. "What was he paying Heyer eighty thalers a year for?" Yet with Heyer did young Koehler serve his full four years, and when he left him as a full-fledged bookseller's assistant, he counted his taskmaster among his friends for life. From 1824 to 1830, when his father's failing health necessitated his undertaking the management of the paternal business, young Koehler had served many masters, in Vienna, Aarau, Fribourg, Munich, and in Berlin. His employer in Berlin was a Herr Friedrich Laue, as to whom a Leipsic newspaper of the year 1839 gives the following information:—"Fr. Laue, formerly a bookseller of Berlin, commanded a detachment of the Turkish Artillery during the battle of Nisibin, and was instrumental in saving it from total destruction at the hands of the Egyptians." Herr Winkler gives this quotation as a proof "that nothing is impossible to a German bookseller," a statement which is qualified by the additional information that Herr Laue had been a soldier before he sold books and music. The elder Koehler's business had been destined for his second son, who, however, eventually declined the responsibility. When Franz put his shoulder to the wheel, taking the business from his father, and undertaking to provide for his family, he relinquished many cherished dreams of extended trade and travel, which had been deferred from time to time by want of capital—a fortunate want, remarks Herr Winkler, for the fortunes of the house.

The new head of the firm was ambitious of extending the publishing branch thereof, and in his endeavour overcame difficulties that would have been insuperable to any one but himself. But in 1846 the firm had so outgrown itself that Franz Koehler found it necessary to decide between publishing and bookselling. Publishing was more to his cultured and speculative taste; but book-selling, thanks to the many new agencies that had been thrust upon this commercial genius, was more remunerative. Adolph Winter, an employé of the firm, acquired the publishing branch of it, and Koehler removed to larger premises in the Post-strasze—an extensive building known as Volckmar's Hof, in any one corner of whose dingy magnitude the original little book store might have lost itself. Although the staff consisted at that epoch of not more than ten employés, Koehler's agents were to be met with all over the civilized world, especially in North and South America. The staff did wonders under the vigilant eye of the chief, who was never seen by any of them to sit at his desk, where he elected to stand (when not making his rounds of inspection) from nine till two, and from three to seven or eight. By an unwritten law, neither clerks, packers, nor porters ever left "Koehler's" while Herr Koehler stood at his desk. When any of them ventured to ask what was "closing hour," the imperturbable head of the firm would touchsafe no answer until he was ready to leave. Then, raising his hat, he would reply:—"Closing hour, gentlemen, is when the old man leaves." Work was Franz Koehler's dearest recreation, and after early service he devoted part of every Sunday to it. The year 1866 was one of sore trial to Koehler, for the war between Austria and Prussia paralysed trade. A friend was unable to pay him a large sum which he had guaranteed. Well for him that he had never been known to refuse his help to a friend in need, for at this critical juncture so many came forward to help the tottering firm that the hard times were tided over. In 1867 his eldest son Franz, who had been apprenticed in London and Paris, entered the business.

In 1869 Herr Koehler celebrated his Jubilee, in 1871 he had the joy of welcoming home his two soldier sons Otto and Hugo, after the Franco-German War, and in 1872 he died, full of years and such honours as his fellow-citizens could bestow on him. He was succeeded by his son Franz, to whose inherited energy of character and capacity for business was united a wide and varied experience. The present head of the firm had not only served his term in the great capitals of Europe, he had loved and cultivated study, had made many useful acquaintances in foreign lands, and—crowning glory of a German's youth—had been present at the bombardment and capitulation of Paris. Thus it came to pass that by 1881 several other great firms had been absorbed by Koehler's, to the satisfaction of all concerned. They were besides the accredited agents of between five and six hundred other firms, so that the vast edifice in the Stephan-strasze, completed on the 25th of September of that year, was none too vast for Koehler's army of "assistants, writers, volunteers, and apprentices," and for the prodigious stock of contemporary and ancient literature (the latter branch being designated "Antiquarium") with which they dealt. Yet even in 1881 "Koehler's" had apparently not reached its apogee. "Rast ist rost," quoth Herr Winkler, quoting Prince Bismarck. And it is beyond the power of any present or future Koehler (by which we and Herr Winkler mean the head of Koehler's firm) either to rest or rust. The mighty enterprise, that has lately attained its hundredth year, continues to grow and expand, and absorb, without annihilating, surrounding powers, like some beneficent monster by man created, yet man-compelling. May its shadow never be less! "Das walte Gott!" we echo, in the words of the pious historian.

* Das Buchhandlingshaus K. F. Koehler in Leipzig, 1789-1889. Rudolf Winkler. Leipsic: K. F. Koehler.

SÈVRES PORCELAIN.*

THE First Part of this splendid work has been published, and nine more parts are to follow; but, as the introductory essay of M. Garnier is in this issue, together with a sufficient number of plates, there is no difficulty in judging of the whole book from the specimen before us. As everybody knows who has "gone in" for old Sèvres, the soft paste was only made for about forty years, was enormously expensive, and is now correspondingly rare. The largest collection in this country is probably that formed by George IV., part of which is carefully stored at Buckingham Palace and part at Windsor Castle, where it forms the chief ornament of one of the drawing-rooms. M. Garnier, in writing his account of Sèvres soft paste, has had access to the Royal collection, and also to that of Sir Richard Wallace and that of the Rothschild family. The illustrations to the present instalment, except one piece belonging to Baron Alfred de Rothschild, are from the Carnavalet Museum and from private collections, such as those of the Marquis de Thuisy, M. Fournier, M. André, and others. M. Garnier has resorted to the reprehensible plan of printing the name of each object figured on the tissue paper over it, which is very inconvenient and may prove even hurtful. The drawings, done by M. Garnier himself, are wonderfully brilliant and the engravings in chromolithography, or some such process, well printed, and represent with extreme fidelity and minuteness the exquisite productions of the famous factory. It was first started at Vincennes in 1750. A certain Sieur de St.-Etienne is said to have discovered the art of making a paste which would passably imitate the Chinese kaolin, or hard paste, some time towards the end of the seventeenth century. He was a potter at Rouen, but appears to have been satisfied with the beautiful faïence or earthenware which he made, and to have handed on his discovery to some other manufacturer, and the first European porcelain was produced at Saint Cloud. The soft paste, it is well to remember, is only relatively soft—that is to say, its consistency is as hard as that of Chinese porcelain, but it will not bear so great a heat, and the surface glaze is easily scratched. When it was found that true kaolin existed in Europe the soft paste was no longer used; hence the rarity and value of this earliest French porcelain. Apart, too, from this, it was costly to make from the beginning, and we read that, when Louis XV. gave Princess Marie-Joseph of Saxony two little pieces, a cream-jug and a sugar-basin, they cost 28 louis. A single plate, from a service ordered by Catharine II. of Russia, lately fetched 6,400 francs, or more than 250*l*. The manufacture was carried on at Vincennes till 1756, so that many of the best examples now extant must be correctly described as "Vincennes ware" rather than "Sèvres," at which latter place it assumed its title of "Manufacture Royale de la Porcelaine de France," every piece being thenceforth marked with the King's cipher. The sales in 1756 and 1758, we are told, amounted respectively to the value of 210,000 and 274,000 livres. In 1759 the King became the sole proprietor, and for a time all went well. Efforts were constantly being made to discover the secret of the German hard paste, and workmen from Meissen were bribed to reveal it. No kaolin of good quality was, however, found in France until 1768, and during the interval the French artists were able to compete with the foreign hard paste only on account of the extreme beauty of the objects they produced in the inferior material. When the necessary beds of kaolin had been discovered near Limoges, hard paste was introduced, but the soft paste was in its highest perfection just at this time, and it was not finally abandoned till 1790. Meanwhile a dishonest manager had nearly ruined Sèvres, but Louis XVI. made a strong effort to keep it going, and the National Assembly included it in the Royal property. Even after the fall of royalty the Convention decided that the manufacture was creditable to the country, and entrusted the management to skilled hands. In May 1800 the famous chemist, Brongniart, undertook the management, and the soft paste from that time was abandoned, and the very secret of its composition has long since perished.

During its best period the colours used were of the most brilliant kind. The famous "rose du Barry" was invented by one Hellot; but its secret died with him, and no pieces of this colour seem to have been made since 1761. The name, as M. Garnier says, is an anachronism. Mme. du Barry was still in her cradle when the "rose" ceased to be used. The same Hellot invented the turquoise blue, and the bleu de Sèvres dates from the same period. The marks readily give the date of manufacture, but the artist's name is not always so easily found. M. Garnier gives very full and complete lists of these marks, some of which are initials and some other signs—as an ermine spot, a sun, a triangle, or a heart. In his last chapter M. Garnier warns his readers against the tricks of the trade, and enumerates some characteristics of the spurious ware, of which a large quantity is extant, even in good collections. The colours, the application of the gilding, and other points may be mentioned; but the greatest reliance is placed on the marks, and spurious pieces have sometimes been detected because the imitator had placed the monogram of a landscape-painter on a figure-piece, or vice versa.

* The Soft Porcelain of Sèvres. With an Historical Introduction by Édouard Garnier. Translated into English by H. F. Andresen. London: Nimmo. 1889.

TWO MEDICAL BOOKS.*

DR. GEORGE JOHNSON'S Essay on Asphyxia, like everything from his pen, is characterized by an almost painful earnestness, which clearly indicates the devotion of his whole intellectual power to the matter under consideration. He is probably somewhat deficient in a sense of humour; but to a man attempting to solve an abstruse scientific problem this quality is of little importance, though of great value in dealing with patients. In the first section of the essay the author describes very clearly the physiology of the circulation of the blood. We would venture to point out what appears to us an omission in this description. In speaking of the arteries he tells us of the large ones, consisting almost entirely of elastic fibre, and of the smallest ones, or muscular arterioles, which immediately precede the capillaries, and consist principally of muscular fibre. No mention is made of the arteries, intermediate in size, which have acquired much of the muscular coat which reaches its highest development in the terminal branches. This is not a trivial point, because the arteries of medium calibre as well as the arterioles help to impede the circulation of impure blood. Hence in uræmic and other conditions where the blood is poisoned we frequently have a pulse tense but small, and not full, as described by Dr. Johnson on p. 48. He is, of course, right in asserting that the capillaries have no muscular coat, and consequently can exert no stop-cock action. The second and longest section of the essay is devoted to defending the explanation of the phenomena of apnoea adopted by the older physiologists against a new one put forward recently by some of the younger workers in that branch of science. Put briefly, the theory of the former is that the final stoppage of the blood-current is brought about by the contraction of the terminal branches of the pulmonary artery, which first causes distension of this artery and of the right side of the heart, and then stagnation of blood in the systemic veins. The contention of the latter is that the result is due to the circulation of venous blood through the heart and coronary arteries, depriving its muscular tissue of the usual supply of oxygen, and, consequently, of the power of contraction. Dr. Johnson tells us that this is not really a new theory, but one propounded long ago by Bichat. For the arguments on this subject we must refer our readers to the essay itself—it would be as rational to endeavour to give an idea of a proposition of Euclid by short quotations from it as to attempt, by extracts, to set forth an outline of the author's close reasoning on this question, and want of space forbids our giving the whole of it. We may, however, say that to us it appears convincing. In the third section various pathological phenomena are compared with those of apnoea. We need hardly say that those of the collapse stage of cholera occupy the first and largest portion of this section. In a note early in the book Dr. Johnson points out the difference between the meanings of the terms asphyxia and apnoea, the former standing for pulselessness and the latter for breathlessness; they are, unfortunately, not infrequently used as though they were synonymous.

The authors of The Diseases of Children have had much experience in the treatment of diseased and the management of healthy children. We think that, for such a work, the idea of a dual authorship is a good one. The two great and legitimate divisions of disease—namely, medical and surgical—are each treated by one who has made it his special study; and yet it is a great advantage to the senior student and junior practitioner to have the whole subject of infantile morbid conditions described in one book. Any detailed criticism of the treatment of the necessarily very numerous subjects by Dr. Ashby and Mr. Wright would be out of place in this notice. It will be sufficient to say that the information contained in this work is of a thoroughly trustworthy character, and we should not hesitate to recommend it to the perusal of any young friend of our own who might be anxious to study this very important branch of professional knowledge.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE Count de Vaudreuil, though not a man of whom the average reader probably knows much, was a kind of type, and not a bad type, of the French emigrant noblesse, to whose conduct or misconduct more and more judges are coming to attribute the disastrousness of the Revolution to France. His good points were numerous. He was devoted in good fortune and bad alike to the Prince to whom he had attached himself—the Comte d'Artois. He was equally faithful to his mistress—perhaps his platonic mistress—Mme. de Polignac. He bore prosperity without insolence, and adversity without dejection. When he married late in life he was a very affectionate husband and father. He had a pretty taste in letters, and so good a one in art that he more than once saved himself from ruin by selling the pictures he had collected. Even such a wasp as Chamfort, his parasite for a time, had nothing serious to say against him; and, with extraordinary integrity, he once not only refused a "pot-of-wine" from Beaumarchais, but pleasantly informed that dramatic intriguer that, if he had not been in a particularly good temper that morning, he would have thrown him out of the window for daring to propose such a thing. Even in his emigration he refused to bear arms against France, though it may be admitted that the Devil's Advocate would not be at a loss in this instance. On the other hand, he was wildly extravagant; he seems to have regarded the Government as a mere milch cow on which to draw for places, pensions, gratifications, and the like; he saw nothing improper, unpatriotic, or disloyal in furthering the intrigues of one member of the Royal Family against others, and he ran away from his country not only without trying to fight the battles of his class, and of what he was bound to regard as the country itself, but without trying to deliver France from her tyrants. His correspondence (1) with the future Charles X. (including replies from that Prince and some letters of and to other persons) is very extensive, and covers the whole period from 1789 to 1815, though most of it is earlier than the Empire. A great deal of it is occupied with historical matters already well known, with rumours that subsequently turned out unfounded, and with private affairs of little interest; but there is also valuable new matter, and the whole is of importance as giving a continuous view of the events as they appeared to a man interested indeed and prejudiced, but of no inconsiderable ability, of excellent information, and not of a violent temper. It is also extremely well edited. M. Pingaud has not only subjoined the minute biographical and other annotation in which French editors excel, but has given us what we constantly demand but very seldom receive from editors either of that or of any other nation, by putting at the head of each letter and collecting in the "Contents" short notes of the subjects mentioned. It is no exaggeration to say that this proceeding, with very little trouble to the editor (for the most careless editor must read through his texts at least once, and can jot down the headings as he does so), quadruples the value of the book to the reader. It is illustrated with four good heliogravures from originals by Mme. Vigée-Lebrun, one of Vaudreuil, one of the Count d'Artois, and two of Mme. de Polignac.

* An Essay on Asphyxia (Apnoea). By George Johnson, M.D. Lond., F.R.C.P., F.R.S. London: J. & A. Churchill.

The Diseases of Children. By Henry Ashby, M.D. Lond., M.R.C.P., and G. A. Wright, B.A., M.B. Oxon., F.R.C.S. Eng. London: Longmans & Co.

M. Bertrand Robidou's "History of the Clergy during the Revolution" (2) is a disappointing book; or, rather, disappointing is not the right word, for the preface warns the experienced reader what is to come. When a man calls the dragon's-teeth-sowing of '89, the operation which has sterilized French political capacity for a full century, "la plus noble évolution politique qui se soit accomplie sur ce globe," all men know, or ought to know, what to expect. It is fair to say that M. Robidou is less blind to some of the faults of his very ugly idol than would seem probable from this exordium. But this merit is more than compensated in the wrong way by a profusion of rhetoric and of loose uncorroborated statement, an absence of historical precision, and a great want of that chapter-and-verse citation which may be overdone, but the underdoing of which is far worse than its excess. The book is a first volume and may improve; but only if the author makes his work much more exact than it is.

We have several times noticed, and always with welcome, M. Jouaust's charming issue of separate plays of Molière, with introduction and notes by M. Auguste Vitu, and an etched frontispiece by M. Leloir. The last (fourth) volume of this contains Sganarelle (3). This early, but extremely amusing, piece has, as M. Vitu well observes, a distinct "harlequinade" character which makes it interesting, and there can also be little hesitation in agreeing with the editor that the actor-author's extreme popularity in the title-part counted for something in that connexion of his name with a certain unpleasant status which ended in the gross and certainly unproved accusations against Armande Béjart. The frontispiece, representing Sganarelle in his panoply, with Lélie, Célie, and the Abigail in the background, is very good indeed.

M. Antoine Lévy's (4) method of teaching German would please Emeritus-Professor Blackie, for it consists of a large conversation-book, French and German in opposite columns. But how does "Qui a temps a vie" correspond to "Kommt Zeit, kommt Rath"? These things must be an allegory.

The stories in Mme. Henry Gréville's Louk Loukitch (5) are nearly all Russian and, as is generally the case with her Russian stories, good. The opening tale is a rather interesting illustration of the numerous veins of something like madness which pervade the Russian people, according to the testimony of their own writers, as well as others, sometimes producing skoptchi and similar things. Louk Loukitch is a retired captain of infantry, a family man fond of his wife, and an excellent fellow, but subject to fits of covetousness, which border on insanity. When the object is only a black mare too expensive for his means it does not much matter; but when it is a black-haired governess things naturally become more awkward. The tale menaces tragedy, and even reaches it, but ends happily after all. Is it true, by the way, that Russian law excuses a murderer, or attempter of murder, if his victim survives to attest forgiveness in open court? The provision is merciful and romantic, but perhaps doubtful as regards the public good. Another good story, not Russian this time, is entitled "Yanid," and tells how a little half-caste fiend tormented her amiable French stepmother. But we are sorry that Yanid died. She must have been an interesting specimen.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THERE must be, we fear, many people who have not read Thorndale, and not a few who have, to whom the title-page, The Story of William and Lucy Smith (Blackwood & Sons), will not reveal at a glance the purport of the volume of memoirs and letters of which Mr. George S. Merriam is editor. Yet was William Smith a man of note in the circle of the elect for whom Comte furnished in some sort the gospel, Emerson and George Eliot the poetry, and Mill the law and the prophets. Early did he pursue "earnest goodness," and perfectibility, and superiority, and other virtues which humble orthodox humanity despairs of in this world. His cheerful faith was nobly displayed when he commenced writing in the infant Athenæum, at the age of twenty, "of the main point for us being to 'live like immortals here.'" In Thorndale we have a "conflict of opinions" that leaves the biographer in great doubt as to what William Smith's real opinions were. Like Gravenhurst, this book may be regarded as the product of a soul that thrived on its own perplexities. It was probably after reading the former that G. H. Lewes reproached the philosopher with "the waste of his fine mind in metaphysical research." William Smith contributed much to Maga, a little to the Quarterly, and wrote several dramas, one of which, Athelwold, was played and obtained a succès d'estime, due possibly to the acting of Miss Helen Faucit and Macready. The drama is extremely dry reading. Athelwold and Dunstan prose very much as the dialoguers in Thorndale prose, and the play, though Talfourd praised it, is now of the ghostly company of Ion and the only tragedy that Parson Adams read. However, Landor may be right, and there may be a future for the writings of William Smith. "I know Mr. Smith," he is reported to have said to a friend, "and everything he has published. I have a great respect for him, sir. There are things in his works quite equal to anything that Shakspeare ever wrote." This is a little strong, even from Landor. Proh! Landor is all we can say of it. Mr. Merriam's labours are, at the most, merely supplementary to the letters and memoir of her husband written by Lucy Smith, which often reflect in an amusingly unconscious manner the pleasures of heterodoxy as they were manifested to one whose early training was rigidly evangelical. He does indeed discern self-portraiture in the confessions of the priggish youth Cyril in Thorndale, but he makes little or no use of this biographical key. There are minds to whom questioning and perpetual unrest are the purest joys and the very breath of life. They discuss world-old problems from which the angels shrink with a freshness of juvenility that suggests they were new-created for their solution. William Smith appears to have found delight in this form of mental dissipation, and those persons of like mind may certainly revel in Thorndale.

A book that appears at a fortunate moment is A Girl's Ride in Iceland, by Ethel B. Harley (Mrs. Alec Tweedie) (Griffith, Farran, & Co.) Now the tourist's season has set in and people are intent on new fields of travel, Mrs. Tweedie's lively account of a voyage to Iceland and its agreeable and entirely successful results ought to inspire adventurous ladies to follow her example. Mrs. Tweedie describes the wonders of the land with a keen appreciation, and has not forgotten to supply many useful hints for tourists; especially may we note her instructions concerning the right riding of Iceland ponies by ladies. The primitive fashion here is decidedly the better way for ladies who are determined to follow the natives, and care not to add a side-saddle to the burden of their luggage. Dr. Harley's additional chapter, "What is a Geyser?" is a very explicit exposition of the nature and action of hot springs, illustrated by a capital diagram.

The Old Pincushion, illustrated by Mrs. Adrian Hope (Griffith, Farran, & Co.), is one of Mrs. Molesworth's pleasantest stories for children. It deals with a romantic incident, which is, we believe, founded on fact—namely, the chance finding of a paper in a pincushion which leads to the discovery of a will believed to be lost. The new volume of Little Folks (Cassell & Co.) is full of the things that healthy children delight in—pretty pictures and bright stories and anecdotes. In Our British Soldiers (Dean & Son) we have resplendent chromos that must charm the eyes of children of all growths. There are spirited pictures of the 4th Hussars skirmishing, the Royal Horse Artillery galloping over a common, and other moving spectacles, all of them vastly gay and charming.

Mr. P. H. Ditchfield's Our English Villages (Methuen & Co.) is a rather discursive little book written with the excellent aim of fostering an interest in village antiquities among dwellers in the country. It touches on rural life under Saxon and Norman rule, village sports and customs, archaeology and folklore, in a light chatty style, which is well adapted to the author's purpose. The woodcuts are good, though the representation of Stonehenge—which, by the way, no one now connects with Druids or human sacrifices—is more creditable to the artist's fancy than to his accuracy.

(1) Correspondance intime du Comte de Vaudreuil et du Comte d'Artois. Par L. Pingaud. 2 tomes. Paris: Plon.

(2) Histoire du clergé pendant la Révolution française. Par B. Robidou. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(3) Molière—Sganarelle. Paris: Librairie des Bibliophiles.

(4) Méthode pratique de langue allemande. Par A. Lévy. Paris: Le Soudier.

(5) Louk Loukitch. Par Henry Gréville. Paris: Plon.

Various minor bards await us, the most ambitious being Mr. Luscombe Searelle, whose Dawn of Death (Trübner & Co.) sets forth in visionary form and stodgy blank verse the victory of a perplexed soul who held the error that "Mind was attribute of Matter." Spirit voices proclaim it to him, what time, as he puts it, "I saw my inmost soul creep slowly from my body," and he learned that "all Matter is a thing of nothingness," and "Solidity is but analogy"—whatever that may mean. The leading poem in Mr. Charles Dickinson's The Children; and other Verses (Sampson Low & Co.) has long enjoyed the distinction of being ascribed to the late Charles Dickens, though the matter was frequently set right in Household Words. It is a pretty poem, with a sweet sentiment, gracefully expressed; but it is not the best poetic wine of Mr. Dickinson's vintaging in this tuneful collection. Several of the pieces in Mr. Caillard's The Lost Life; and other Poems (Eyre & Spottiswoode)—the ballad of London "Stolen Flowers," for example—might effectively be introduced by reciters to vary their too-restricted programmes.

An appropriate exuberance, almost tropical in its fervour, is the mark of Poems of Passion, by Ella Wheeler (H. J. Drane). Not every dancer knows what is a "waltz-quadrille," which must be a fascinating measure, from the poet's account of it, with its intricate coils and "blithe chassé." Printers play strange pranks, turning the poet's "happiness" to "pappiness," as Hood says; but they do not often transpose so boldly as in "Through the Valley":—

As I came through the valley desolate,
As I came through the valley, like a billey
Of lurid lightning I beheld a gleam
Of Love's great eyes that now were full of hate.
Dear God! dear God! I could bear all but that;
But I fell down soul-stricken, dead thereat
As I came through the vaeam.

Mr. Tyerman's melodious lyrics, Day Dreams in a Devon Valley (Torquay: Iredale), reveal a judicious employment of local colour. The sonnets are often graceful, never pretentious, and "A Ballad at Brixton" is a stirring lay with the right patriotic ring in it.

In the dainty "Stott Library" we have the first volume of a Selection from De Quincey, edited by W. H. Bennett (David Stott), comprising "The Opium Eater" and "Suspiria." Coleridge's Poetical Works, edited by W. B. Scott, is the latest addition to "Routledge's Pocket Library." This is a genuine reprint, with the poet's own notes and prefaces in full. Altogether a charming little book, and an example for editors of other series of popular reprints too often trimmed by the abhorred shears.

The neat cloth bindings of the sixpenny issue of "Cassell's Universal Library" are infinitely preferable to the flimsy covers of the cheaper form which perishes in the using, be the reader ever so tender. There is abundant good literature and varied in the series; Hakluyt and Captain Parry, Sir Thomas More and Bacon, Shakspeare and Milton, the Diary of Pepys—these are before us, and printed in good, clear type.

We have also received a new edition of Charles Kingsley's Madam How and Lady Why (Macmillan); Margery (Gred), translated by Clara Bell from the German of Georg Ebers, "authorized edition," in two volumes (New York: Gottsberger; London: Trübner); Isaac Eller's Money, by Mrs. Andrew Dean (Fisher Unwin); and Suspicion, by Christian Lys (Ward & Downey).

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

ADVERTISEMENTS intended for the SATURDAY REVIEW should be addressed to the MANAGER of the ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT, at the OFFICE, 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON. A printed Scale of Charges can be obtained on application.

The SATURDAY REVIEW may be had every Saturday from Veuve J. BOYVEAU, 22 Rue de la Banque (near the Bourse),
Paris,
by whom also Subscriptions will be received.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW may likewise be obtained in Paris every Saturday of Messrs. GALIGNANI, 224 Rue de Rivoli.

Nearly all the back Numbers of the SATURDAY REVIEW may be obtained through any Bookseller, or of the Publisher, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

Now ready, VOLUME LXVII., bound in cloth, price 16s. Cloth Cases for Binding all the Volumes, price 2s. each. Also Reading Cases, price 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. each. May be had at the Office, or through any Bookseller.

For CONTENTS see page 88*

SUN LIFE OFFICE.

EXTRACTS FROM THE SOCIETY'S PROSPECTUS,

Dealing with all the most IMPORTANT POINTS necessary to be considered by Life Insurers.

- (1.) The AGE. This Society was ESTABLISHED in the year 1810.
- (2.) The FUNDS of the Society are AMPLE and WELL INVESTED.
- (3.) The ULTIMATE COST of Assurance in the "SUN."

The Bonus declared in January 1888 proves that a WITH PROFIT Policy, under Table A, opened with the Sun Life Office can be had at considerably LESS THAN COST PRICE—that is, can be eventually obtained for less than the UNLOADED NET PREMIUM.

- (4.) The LIBERALITY of the "SUN'S" CONTRACT and PRACTICAL FACILITIES for DEALING with its Policies.
- (5.) ECONOMY of Management in the "SUN."

EXTRAVAGANT and INJUDICIOUS Expenditure can NEVER produce LARGE BONUS Results to Policy-Holders; hence it is of the FIRST IMPORTANCE that ECONOMICS should be understood and practised.

The Expense Ratio on RENEWAL Premiums, after making due allowance for the large amount of new business transacted, was during the last financial year less than FOUR PER CENTUM of the Premiums.

- (6.) The BASIS of Valuation in the "SUN."

The Valuation, June 24, 1887, was made by the CARLISLE Table of Mortality, on the Basis of which the Premiums charged have long been calculated; a low rate of Interest has been assumed, viz., 3 PER CENT., and the NET PREMIUMS have only been dealt with, thus leaving FUTURE PROFITS entirely UNANTICIPATED.

- (7.) The TEST of Stability.

The Sun Life Assurance Society on the 24th June, 1887, had—(a) Over TWELVE Years' Premium Income in Hand; (b) Over £36 Cash invested against every £100 assured.

- (8.) The DISTRIBUTION of PROFITS in the "SUN."

Bonuses have been regularly declared since 1843, amounting in the aggregate to £1,857,452, and at the last Division, which was exceptionally large, £192,706 was apportioned, and resulted in an average

CASH RETURN OF £36 IN EVERY £100 PAID IN PREMIUMS.

Apply for the Society's Prospectus, at the CHIEF OFFICE, Threadneedle Street, London, E.C.

JOHN G. PRIESTLEY } Joint
HARRIS C. L. SAUNDERS } Actuaries.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 1,760, JULY 20, 1889:

Peace or War?

The Parnellite Protest. An Outbreak or an Outrage?
The Mobilization of the Fleet.
The Salvationist Nuisance. Elections and Electioneering.
The Mogul Company. The Goodness of Dr. Barnardo.
The Case against the General.
Two Unionist Speeches. Wrangling Workers.
The Recovery of Tithes. The Whitechapel Murder.
Mr. Stuart's Programme for London.

The Floral Parade.

Professional Tattle. Racing.
Free-Trade in Disease. How Not to Trace your own Pedigree.
Some Humours of Somerset House.
"Die Meistersinger" at Covent Garden.
The Great Picnic. The Theatres. The Bank Dividends.
"Otello," as Music and Drama. Recent Concerts.

The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam.

Novels. The Sagas of the Norse Kings.
Mr. Gretton's Recollections. Books on Ireland.
Patmore's Principle in Art. Books on Divinity.
The Book of the Farm. Three Generations of Booksellers.
Sevres Porcelain. Two Medical Books. French Literature.
New Books and Reprints.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE NEW GALLERY, REGENT STREET.—SUMMER
 EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. 9 till 7. Admission, One Shilling.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—GRAND FLORAL BALLET, "A
 GOLDEN DREAM," every Evening at 8.45, on Lawns, weather permitting.
 Invented and produced by Mr. Oscar Barrett, and arranged by Madame Katti Lanner.
 Gorgeous Illuminations of Park and Gardens. Music by the Company's Military Band.
 Bandmaster, Mr. C. Godfrey, jun. No extra charge. Lockhart's marvellous Elephants, and other great Free Entertainments daily.—Admission to Palace, 1s.

THE MAD DOG CRAZE.

SPONTANEOUS HYDROPHOBIA.

(From THE LANCET, May 16, 1885.)

"Last week Dr. Diplock, Coroner for West Middlesex, held an inquest on the body of a journeyman blacksmith, aged twenty-three, who died, according to Dr. Ferris of Uxbridge, with all the symptoms of hydrophobia. The history showed that there was a possible bite from a dog two years previously, but there seems to be some doubt on this point. If the case were one of rabies, the period of incubation was, even for rabies, rather long. Seeing that the case is not perfectly clear, it is allowable to speculate on its nature. Now, Dr. BROADBENT AND OTHERS HAVE PLACED ON RECORD CASES WHICH HAVE BEEN CHARACTERIZED BY ALL THE SYMPTOMS OF HYDROPHOBIA, WHICH WERE CERTAINLY NOT DUE TO THE USUAL CAUSE OF HYDROPHOBIA—i.e. THE BITE OF A RABID ANIMAL. In the cases in question there would seem to have been a decided history of terror, almost amounting to mania. This terror, or extreme fright, may have been an efficient cause in bringing about those nervous symptoms which are the chief features of rabies, or the terror may have been one of the symptoms of the nervous disease, however originated. The chief symptoms of rabies may be explained on the view of an extremely irritable state of the grey matter of the spinal cord, medulla oblongata, and adjacent parts. This irritable state of an important part of the cerebral nervous system need not always be due to the action of the virus of rabies. Other conditions may bring it about, and some authorities have asserted that acute poisoning by alcohol, and perhaps other substances, may give rise to the same condition. It is possible that the case on which the inquest was recently held was one of this abnormal class."

EDUCATIONAL.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, BRISTOL.
 THE SESSION 1889-90 WILL BEGIN ON OCTOBER 9.

The College supplies for persons of either sex, above the ordinary school age, the means of continuing their studies in Science, Languages, History, and Literature. The Chemical, Physical, Electrical, Engineering, Geological, and Biological Laboratories are open daily. The Engineering Department includes Civil, Mechanical, Electrical, and Mining Engineering and Surveying; and special arrangements for practical work have been made with various Engineers in and near Bristol. Information with regard to the lodging of Students may be obtained on application. Several SCHOLARSHIPS are tenable at the College.

ENGINEERING EDUCATION.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, BRISTOL.

Courses of Civil, Mechanical, Electrical, and Mining Engineering. Mineralogy and Applied Geology for Civil and Mining Engineering. Facilities are offered in the way of College Scholarships, Engineering Works' Scholarships, and special arrangements for entrance into professional life.

CALENDAR, containing full information, price 1s.; by post, 1s. 3d.

For Prospectus and further information apply to JAMES RAFTER, Secretary.

ST. CLARE COLLEGE, WALMER, KENT.

Head-Master—The Rev. E. D'AUQUIER, M.A. Clare College, Camb.
 One of the Examiners to the Irish Board of Intermediate Education, late Head-Master of South-Eastern College, Ramsgate, with a staff of Assistant Masters (Graduates).
 The College is situated in a delightful spot, close to the sea, and contains teaching and boarding accommodation, chapel, sanatorium, infirmary, playroom, laundry, gymnasium, tuckshop, workshop, &c., 14 acres of well-timbered and beautiful grounds, cycle path, cricket and football fields, tennis-courts, &c., sea-bathing and boating.
 The school year is divided into three terms; each term consists of about thirteen weeks.
 Inclusive fees, Eighty Guineas per annum. Exhibitions and Scholarships, of £10, £15, and £21, are annually thrown open for competition.
 For further information, apply to the HEAD-MASTER.

HEIDELBERG COLLEGE, Heidelberg.

Principals.

Dr. A. HOLZBERG, Ph.D., M.A. Heidelberg.

A. B. CATTY, M.A., Christ's Coll., Camb.

WALTER LAWRENCE, M.A., St. John's, Oxon.

Principal subjects, French and German. Preparation for Army and all other Exams. Separate house for Senior Pupils.

BRIGHTON COLLEGE.

Head-Master—Rev. T. HAYES BELCHER, M.A.

Head-Master of Civil and Military Department—E. A. A. SPENCER, Esq., M.A. late of Cheltenham College.

Head-Master of Junior Department—D. C. WICKHAM, Esq., M.A.

The School has a Classical Side on which Boys are prepared for the Universities, Indian Civil Service, &c. There is also a Civil and Military Department, the work in which is specially adapted for passing boys direct into Woolwich, Sandhurst, or Coopers Hill, or for business life. There is a Junior Department for Boys from eight to thirteen, with separate Boarding-house, school buildings, and staff of Masters.

ST. THOMAS'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL,
 ALBERT EMBANKMENT, LONDON, S.E.

TWO ENTRANCE SCIENCE SCHOLARSHIPS, of 125 guineas and £60 respectively open to all first-year Students, will be offered for competition in September 1889.

Special Classes are held throughout the year for the "PRELIMINARY SCIENTIFIC" and "INTERMEDIATE M.B." Examinations of the UNIVERSITY of LONDON, and may be joined at any time.

Entries may be made to Lectures or to Hospital Practice, and special arrangements are made for Students entering in their second or subsequent years; also for Dental Students and for Qualified Practitioners.

Prospectuses and all particulars may be obtained from the Medical Secretary, Mr. GEORGE RENDLE.

E. NETTLESHIP, Dean.

CRONDALL SCHOOL, FARNHAM, Surrey.—Invigorating country life, healthiest in England (see Registrar's Report). Preparation for Public Schools, Royal Navy, &c.; French and German guaranteed; school farm, cricket and football fields, tennis, carpenter's shop, riding ponies.—Address, PRINCIPAL.

CRYSTAL PALACE COMPANY'S SCHOOL of ART,
 SCIENCE, and LITERATURE.

LADIES' DIVISION. The THIRTIETH SESSION, 1889-90, will OPEN on Monday, September 30.

Water Colour Painting, Landscape, &c.—Edward A. Goodall, R.W.S.

Water-Colour Painting, Figure, Life, &c.—John Scott, R.I.

Painting in Oils from the Life, &c.—E. Wensley Russell.

Painting in Oils, Landscape—Edward A. Goodall.

Drawing, Figure, Antique, and from Life—A. G. Macgregor and H. Windsor Fry.

Modelling in Clay, &c.—A. G. Macgregor.

Artistic Wood Carving—G. A. Rogers.

Decoration and Design—B. A. Lillie.

Visitors in the Art School—E. J. Poynter, R.A., Edwin Long, R.A., and J. B. Burgess R.A.

English Literature and Composition—Rev. H. Russell Wakefield.

Elocution of Conversation and Reading—Miss E. Fogarty.

French Language and Literature—Henri Roche.

German Language and Literature—Dr. N. Heinemann, F.R.G.S.

Italian Language and Literature—Luigi Ricci, B.A.

Spanish Language and Literature—Mariano Vives.

Greek or Latin—J. H. Rose, M.A.

General History—Dr. G. G. Zerffi, F.R.Hist.S.

English History—H. E. Malden, M.A. F.R.Hist.S.

Geography—J. H. Rose, M.A.

Chemistry—W. Lapraik, F.I.C., F.C.S.

Arithmetic, Mathematics, &c.—W. B. Kemshead, M.A., Ph.D.

Pianoforte—Gustav Ernest, Arthur O'Leary, John Francis Barnett, A. J. Eyre, Raphaël Roche, Mde. Marie Periera, Miss Emma Tedder.

Pianoforte Ensemble—Arthur O'Leary.

Chamber Music, Duo and Trio—Otto Manns and Robert Reed.

Violin—Otto Manns.

Violoncello—Robert Reed.

Organ—A. J. Eyre.

Solo Singing—Henry Blower, Madame St. Germain, Herbert Sims Reeves, and Ragnar Grevillius.

Sight Singing and Ladies' Choir—A. J. Eyre.

Harmony, Counterpoint—Louis B. Prout.

Composition, Instrumentation, &c.—John Francis Barnett, Professor J. F. Bridge, Mus.Doc., Ebenezer Prout, B.A., and Louis B. Prout.

Explanatory Demonstrations of Higher Art of Pianoforte—Gustav Ernest.

Dancing, &c.—Louis d'Egville, Miss Louisa Pear.

The Junior Section of the School opens same date.

Prospectus and particulars of the undersigned, in the Library, Crystal Palace.

F. K. J. SHENTON, F.R.Hist.S.

Supt. Educational Department.

CITY and GUILDS of LONDON INSTITUTE for the ADVANCEMENT of TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

ENGINEERING.—The Course of TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION at the Central Institution of the City and Guilds of London Institute is adapted to the requirements of persons who are preparing to become Civil, Mechanical, Electrical, or Chemical Engineers, or to enter manufacturing works.

The next Session will commence on October 1, 1889. An Entrance Examination will be held on September 23 and the three following days.

JOHN WATNEY,
 WALTER S. PRIDEAUX, } Hon. Secs.

Programme and full particulars of Course of Instruction may be obtained on application at the Central Institution, Exhibition Road, S.W., or at the Office of the Institute, Gresham College, E.C.

THE Rev. W. ALMACK, M.A., BRUCE CASTLE, near

TOTTENHAM, prepares PUPILS wanting special help for the Universities, Army, Legal or Medical Preliminaries, or the ordinary requirements of business life.

Excellent house in Park of 20 acres, containing Cricket and Football grounds.

References, the Head-Masters of Charterhouse, Cheltenham, and Marlborough.

PRÉ SCILLA, LAUSANNE.—Miss WILLS, late Head-

Mistress of the Norwich High School, has a very comfortable English HOME for Elder GIRLS. Garden and full-sized Tennis-court. Numbers limited. Subjects taken:—French, German, Italian, Music, Singing, and Painting.

THE Misses S. and R. ALLEN-OLNEY (formerly Head-Mistresses respectively of Blackheath and South Hampstead High Schools), residing in the healthy suburb of Hampstead, receive a few YOUNG LADIES to board and educate.

The arrangements are those of a refined home. Large playground and full-sized tennis-court. Preparation for University examinations and degrees. Reference kindly permitted to parents of present and former pupils.—41 Belsize Park Gardens, London, N.W.

HILLSIDE, GODALMING, Surrey. (Close to Charterhouse.)

Preparatory for Charterhouse and other Public Schools. A. M. CURTEIS, M.A., late

Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford. G. GIDLEY ROBINSON, M.A., formerly Scholar of Exeter College, Oxford, and late Assistant-Master of Charterhouse.

CONTINENT.—ADVANTAGEOUS OFFER.—YOUNG

LADIES will be received into the home of English Clergyman (M.A. Oxon., nineteen years Incumbent) who, with wife and young daughters, will reside abroad. (Health.)

Winters—Villa, Florence. Summers—Switzerland, Lakes, &c. Well and widely connected, experienced in Foreign life, and of literary pursuits, they offer unusual social and educational advantages. Home comforts. Good Masters. Careful chaperonage. Liberal terms. Highest references.—Address, Mrs. M., J. Drew, Esq., Promenade Place, Cheltenham.

ILFRACOMBE.—ILFRACOMBE HOTEL. Thoroughly furnished, equipped, and decorated. 250 Rooms. Eight Lawn-Tennis Courts, Large Swimming Bath, Private Baths. Descriptive Tariff of Manager.

THE GREATEST of all PIANOFORTES.

THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES, New York & London.

Steinway Hall, LOWER SEYMOUR STREET, Portman Square, London, W.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS'

UPRIGHT IRON GRAND PIANOFORTES.

Prices from 40 Guineas upwards.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Pianoforte Makers by Special Appointment to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, 1889.—18, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W. Lists free.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, Strand, W.C.—The COUNCIL earnestly appeal for DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS.

£20,000 required for new Nursing Establishment, enlargement of Medical School, the Convalescent Home, and current expenses. Bankers: Messrs. Drummond.

ARTHUR E. READE, Secretary.

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH LAW
LIFE ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION (Established 1839).
12 Waterloo Place, London. 120 Princes Street, Edinburgh.
Whole Life Bonuses never less than £1 10s. per cent. per annum.
Annuities. Loans. Liberal Conditions.
ARTHUR JACKSON, General Manager } 12 Waterloo Place,
FRANCIS E. COLENSO, F.I.A., Actuary } London.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY,
Established 1836.
LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE.
INCOME and FUNDS (1888).
Fire Premiums £615,000
Life Premiums 203,000
Interest 149,000
Accumulated Funds £3,581,000

PHENIX FIRE OFFICE,
LOMBARD STREET and CHANCERY CROSS, LONDON.—Established 1782.
Moderate Rates. Absolute Security.
Liberal Loss Settlements. Prompt payment of Claims.
W. C. MACDONALD } Joint Secretaries.
F. B. MACDONALD }
Losses paid over £17,000,000.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.
Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 22 PALL MALL, S.W.
Subscribed Capital, £1,200,000. Paid-up, £300,000. Total Invested Funds, over £1,600,000.
E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

LOAN and LIFE INSURANCE AGENCY.
£100 to £2,000 at Five per Cent., on Insurance Policies, Reversions, &c.—Apply by letter to SECRETARY, Clergy Insurance Agency, 17 Bonverie Street, Fleet Street, E.C.
N.B.—Unqualified references are given of this bona fide Agency if desired.

THE BANK of SOUTH AUSTRALIA, Limited.
ESTABLISHED 1841.
PRINCIPAL BRANCHES, ADELAIDE and MELBOURNE.
CAPITAL, £800,000. RESERVE FUND, £100,000. RESERVE LIABILITY, £800,000.
LETTERS OF CREDIT and BILLS on demand are issued on the Bank's Branches and Agents throughout the Australian Colonies. Telegraphic transfers made. Bills negotiated and sent for collection. DEPOSITS received for fixed periods, at rates which can be ascertained on application.
31 Lombard Street, E.C. JAMES ANDERSON, General Manager.

BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.
ESTABLISHED 1851.
THREE per CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables; the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars,
post free on application. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

P. and O. MAIL STEAMERS FROM LONDON TO
BOMBAY, GIBRALTAR, MALTA, BRINDISI,
EGYPT, ADEN, and MADRAS via BOMBAY every week.
CALCUTTA, COLOMBO, CHINA, STRAITS and JAPAN,
AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND and TASMANIA, and every alternate week.
ALEXANDRIA.....
CHEAP RETURN TICKETS.
For particulars apply at the Company's Offices, 122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., and 25 Cockspur Street, London, S.W.

SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK.
ISSUE of £371,320.
(Authorized by the Sheffield Corporation Acts, 1883 and 1889.)
The CORPORATION of SHEFFIELD give NOTICE that they are prepared to receive applications for the above sum of SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK.
Minimum price of Issue £100 per cent.
Interest payable half-yearly, on March 1 and September 1, at the Sheffield and Hallamshire Bank, Sheffield, or by their London Agents, Messrs. GLYN, MILLS, CURRIE, & CO., 67 Lombard Street.
No sum less than £50 of Stock will be allotted, and any amount in excess of that sum must be a multiple of £10.
Forms of Prospectus, &c., and all information required, will be supplied by Borough Accountant's Office, W. FISHER TASKER, Registrar.
Bridge Street, Sheffield,
June 13, 1889.

SCHWEITZER'S
COCOATINA.

GUARANTEED PURE SOLUBLE COCOA.

This Old-established Article retains its position as "the finest Cocoa in the market." It is unequalled in purity and flavour, bears the strictest Chemical test, and keeps in all climates.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS AND ECONOMICAL.

VAN
HOUTEN'S
COCOA.

PURE—SOLUBLE.
BEST & GOES FARTHEST.
EASILY DIGESTED.
MADE INSTANTLY.

"Once used, always used—its PURITY is beyond question."
Health.

"It is admirable—flavour perfect—and so PURE."
British Medical Journal.

C. J. VAN HOUTEN & ZOON,
WEESP, HOLLAND.

BRAIN FAG, SHATTERED NERVES,
Sleeplessness, Nervous Exhaustion, Rheumatism, Gout, Torpid Liver, Nervous
Dyspepsia, &c. yield like magic to the healing influence of mild continuous currents of Electricity, generated, without any shock or discomfort whatever, by wearing

HARNESS' ELECTROPATHIC BATTERY BELT.

This world-famed guaranteed genuine Electric appliance has cured thousands of sufferers,
and should be worn by all in search of HEALTH, STRENGTH, and VITAL ENERGY.
Write for descriptive pamphlet, containing copies of hundreds of unsolicited testimonials, or call, if possible, and personally consult Mr. C. B. HARNESS, Consulting Medical Electrician
(President of the British Association of Medical Electricians), 59 Oxford Street, London,
W. (corner of Rathbone Place). Advice free, personally or by letter.

First produced and designated CORN FLOUR
by BROWN & POLSON in 1856.

BROWN & POLSON'S
CORN FLOUR

Was in the Field some time before any other was anywhere heard of, and no other has now an Equal Claim to the Public Confidence.

FRY'S

J. WYBRANTS OLPHERTS, M.D., says: "I find it the most agreeable beverage of the kind I have ever tasted, delicious both in flavour and odour."

PURE CONCENTRATED

COCOA.

E. BUCKNILL, M.D., says: "Your Pure
Concentrated Cocoa is so extremely nice that
I have ordered it for family use."

AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

Dr. PAGET,
SURGEON-DENTIST,
445 STRAND, W.C.
(Facing Charing Cross Station.)

ARTIFICIAL TEETH,
without plates. Perfect imitations
of the natural teeth. Artistic, painless, and perfect. Most moderate fees. Consultations free daily.
Illustrated pamphlet post free.

THE DIAMOND MARK.

To secure the best Hungarian Aperient Water,
DEMAND THE DIAMOND MARK,
And insist upon receiving the Hungarian Aperient Water sold by the
APOLLINARIS COMPANY, LIMITED, LONDON.
Of all Druggists and Mineral Water Dealers.

DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA.

This pure Solution is the best remedy
for Acidity of the Stomach, Heartburn,
Headache, Gout, and Indigestion.

DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA.

The safest and most gentle Aperient
for delicate constitutions, Ladies,
Children, and Infants.

180 Bond Street, London; and all Chemists.

BOOKS, &c.

H. SOTHERAN & CO.

BOOKSELLERS, BOOKBINDERS, AND PUBLISHERS.
GENERAL AGENTS FOR PRIVATE BOOKBUYERS & PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS
IN AMERICA, INDIA, THE COLONIES, AND FOREIGN PARTS.
A MONTHLY CATALOGUE of SECOND-HAND BOOKS, published over forty years; Specimen No. gratis and post-free.
Telegraphic Address: BOOKMEN, LONDON. Established 1816.
136 STRAND, W.C. AND 36 PICCADILLY, W.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW.—The following NUMBERS
of THE SATURDAY REVIEW are required, for which 1s. each will be given, viz.:
1, 2, 15, 25, 56, 59, 73, 75, 99, 112, 130, 132, 138, 174, 452, and 1627 (clean copies)—at the Office,
38 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates
per annum, paid in advance:

Any part of the United Kingdom	£1	8	2
India and China	1	12	6
Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America	1	10	6

STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

BOOKS.—A PENNY WEEKLY JOURNAL. Published every Thursday. Best medium for the Purchase and Sale of Second-hand Books.
Weekly Prize Competitions.
88 Chancery Lane, W.C.

Now ready, crown 8vo. cloth lettered, 6s.

PRÆNOMINA; or, the Etymology of the Principal Christian
Names of Great Britain and Ireland. By Dr. CHARNOCK, F.S.A.
London: TRÜBNER & CO., 37 & 59 Ludgate Hill.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW, No. CCCXXXVII. is published THIS DAY.

CONTENTS:

1. CANADA: ITS DEVELOPMENT AND DESTINY.
2. SHAKSPEARE AND VENICE.
3. OLD AGE.
4. DIARY AND LETTERS OF GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.
5. VIRGIL.
6. THE AGE OF STEEL.
7. ANCIENT INDIA.
8. DUELLING.
9. 1789 AND 1889.
10. THE AMERICAN COMMONWEALTH AND ITS LESSONS.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LIMITED,

30 TO 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.;
241 BROMPTON ROAD, SOUTH KENSINGTON, S.W.;
AND 2 KING STREET, CHEAPSIDE, E.C.

I FOR THE CIRCULATION OF BOOKS.

SUBSCRIPTION from £1 1s. per annum.
Prospectuses and Monthly Lists Gratis.

II FOR THE SALE OF BOOKS.

Second-hand Copies of all the best Books of past Seasons,
at greatly Reduced Prices.
Lists with Prices Gratis.

III FOR THE BINDING OF BOOKS.

On the Premises by the best Workmen.
List of Bound Books Gratis.

N.B.—All Lists and Prospectuses Gratis and
Postage Free to any Address.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY,

30 TO 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

A SHEAF OF SONNETS.

By J. M. W. SCHWARTZ,
Author of "Nivalis: a Tragedy" &c.

"To our mind these noble poems are quite up to Rossetti's mark.....This beautiful little book reminds us once more of the masses of waste ability which are to be found in our country." Vanity Fair. "A poet of no mean degree. Perfect gems. Should be read by all who love refreshing pure poetry."—Northern Whig. "A book in which those of poetic temperament will delight. Grand thoughts, nobly and gracefully expressed."—Liverpool Post. "Dignity, power, and felicitousness of expression characterise his verse."—Graphic. "Admirably constructed, gracefully written, these sonnets contain a wealth of poetic thoughts." Liverpool Courier.

REMINGTON & CO., HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

A TALE OF THE SECTS.

At all Libraries and Booksellers', 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 12s.

GIRALDI;

Or, THE CURSE OF LOVE.

By ROSS GEORGE DERING.

Saturday Review.—"Mr. Dering is happy in the first impression he makes in his novel. 'Giraldi' is undeniably a clever book: satirical, humorous, and amusing; full of consistent sketching of character.....It is an original and readable novel."
Manchester Examiner.—"A very readable and entertaining novel."
Lincolnshire Herald.—"Will be read with a good deal of pleasure, and the reader must be very hard to please who finds it disappointing."
Scotsman.—"There is more vigour and substance in it than in half-a-dozen ordinary circulating library novels."
Glasgow Herald.—"Full of cleverness, and the conversations are managed with great skill."
Scots Observer.—" 'Giraldi' is one of the good novels of the season."

LONDON: TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL.

STAMMERERS and STUTTERERS should read a book by a gentleman who cured himself after suffering nearly forty years.

Post free for 13 stamps, from
Mr. B. BEASLEY, Sherwood, Willesden Lane, Brondesbury, London; or Green Bank House, Hall Green (near Birmingham).

THOUGHTS for ENTHUSIASTS at BAYREUTH. By the Honourable Mrs. BURRELL.

PART I. A Literary and Historical Guide to Bayreuth, tracing the Connection of the Hohenzollern Family with the Principality, containing the Tradition of their "White Lady" and Facsimiles of Old Prints, notably the original Plan of L'Ermitage, mentioned by the Margravine of Bayreuth in her celebrated Memoirs (II. 257), but never hitherto published with them. Imperial 8vo. vellum, only 100 copies, choicely printed in old style by C. Whittingham, on the best handmade Van Gelder Paper, each copy numbered, with numerous Facsimiles of Prints, &c. Price 21s. net.

PICKERING & CHATTO, 66 Haymarket, London, S.W.

Now ready, with Portrait and Map of the Stanley Route, price 2s. 6d.
ONE MAN'S POWER.

EMIN PASHA: his Life and Work in Equatorial Africa. By the Rev. HENRY W. LITTLE, Author of "Madagascar: its History and People."

London: J. S. VIRTUE & Co., LIMITED, 26 Ivy Lane, E.C.

THE GOSPEL of WEALTH. By ANDREW CARNEGIE, the American Millionaire.

Published at the special request of Mr. GLADSTONE.

Under the above title is published in THE PALL MALL BUDGET of Thursday, July 18, a remarkable Article by Mr. Andrew Carnegie, the well-known Pittsburg iron-master and millionaire.

The Article has attracted the notice of Mr. Gladstone, who has spoken in the highest terms with regard to it, and strongly urged its publication in this country. Mr. Gladstone writes: "I have asked Mr. Lloyd Bryce ('North American Review') kindly to allow the republication in this country of the extremely interesting article on 'Wealth,' by Mr. Andrew Carnegie, which has just appeared in America."

THE PALL MALL BUDGET,

"The most readable paper in England." Price Fourpence. May be obtained of all News-agents and at all Railway Bookstalls, or of the Publisher, post free, price Fourpence-halfpenny.
PALL MALL BUDGET OFFICE,
2 Northumberland Street, Strand, London, W.C.

HURST & BLACKETT'S NEW NOVELS.

A CROOKED PATH. By Mrs. ALEXANDER,
Author of "The Wooing o't," "The Freres," &c. 3 vols.

A POOR GENTLEMAN. By Mrs. OLIPHANT,
Author of "It was a Lover and his Lass," "Agnes," &c. 3 vols.

HILARY ST. JOHN. By Mrs. A. PRICE,
Author of "A Rustic Maid," "A Wilful Young Woman," &c. 2 vols.

WITH EVERYTHING AGAINST HER.
By Colonel CUTHBERT LARKING, Author of "Bandobast and Khabar" &c. 3 vols.

IRIS DACRE. By ALICE MANGOLD DIEHL,
Author of "The Garden of Eden" &c. 2 vols.

DEVERIL'S DIAMOND. By ADELINE SERGEANT
Author of "Jacobi's Wife," "No Saint," &c. 3 vols.

LONDON: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED,
13 GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

NOVELS AT ALL CIRCULATING LIBRARIES.

LADY CLAUD. By Mrs. ALEXANDER FRASER, Author of "Daughters of Belgravia," "The Last Drawing-Room," &c. 2 vols.

OFF WITH the OLD LOVE. By N. F. B. 2 vols.

THAT OTHER WOMAN. By ANNIE THOMAS (Mrs. Pender Cudlip), Author of "Her Success," "Ailerton Towers," &c. 3 vols.

CLARE STRONG. By G. BERESFORD FITZGERALD, Author of
"Lillian" &c. 2 vols.

THE QUEEN ANNE'S GATE MYSTERY. By RICHARD
ARKWRIGHT, Author of "Driven Home" &c. 2 vols.

ON CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE. By FLORENCE
MARRYAT, Author of "My Sister the Actress," "Facing the Footlights," &c. 3 vols.

LANDING a PRIZE. By Mrs. EDWARD KENNARD, Author of
"The Girl in the Brown Habit," "Killed in the Open," "A Crack County," &c. 3 vols.

LONG ODDS. By HAWLEY SMART, Author of "The Outsider," "Cleverly Won," "The Pride of the Paddock," &c. 3 vols.

SEVERED TIES. By Mrs. HENRY WYLDE. 3 vols.

MISS KATE: or, Confessions of a Caretaker. By "RITA,"
Author of "Dame Durden," "A Vagabond Lover," &c. 1 vol. 6s. [At all Booksellers']

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS' AND BOOKSTALLS.

A LITTLE FOOL. By JOHN STRANGE WINTER, Author of
"Bootes' Baby" &c. Second Edition. Paper cover, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

THE PICCADILLY PUZZLE. By FERGUS HUME, Author of
"The Mystery of a Hansom Cab" &c. Paper cover, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d. [Immediately.]

A DEVOUT LOVER. By Mrs. H. LOVETT CAMERON, Author of "In a Grass Country" &c. Picture boards, 2s. [Immediately.]

DAUGHTERS of BELGRAVIA. By Mrs. ALEXANDER FRASER.
1 vol. cloth, 2s. 6d. [Immediately.]

F. V. WHITE & CO., 31 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND.

BOOKS FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

Illustrated by the best Artists and bound in cloth.

HENTY'S HISTORICAL TALES.

THE LION OF ST. MARK: a Tale of Venice in the Fourteenth Century. 6s.

BONNIE PRINCE CHARLEY: a Tale of Fontenoy and Culloden. 6s.

FOR THE TEMPLE: a Tale of the Fall of Jerusalem. 6s.

THE YOUNG CARTHAGINIAN: a Story of the Times of Hannibal. 6s.

WITH WOLFE IN CANADA; or, the Winning of a Continent. 6s.

THE LION OF THE NORTH: a Tale of Gustavus Adolphus and the Wars of Religion. 6s.

THROUGH THE FRAY: a Story of the Luddite Riots. 6s.

TRUE TO THE OLD FLAG: a Tale of the American War of Independence. 6s.

WITH CLIVE IN INDIA; or, the Beginnings of an Empire. 6s.

IN FREEDOM'S CAUSE: a Story of
Wallace and Bruce. 6s.

UNDER DRAKE'S FLAG: a Tale of the Spanish Main. 6s.

THE CAT OF BUSABTES: a Story of Ancient Egypt. 5s.

IN THE REIGN OF TERROR: the Adventures of a Westminster Boy during the French Revolution. 5s.

ORANGE AND GREEN: a Tale of the Boyne and Limerick. 5s.

THE BRAVEST OF THE BRAVE; or,
with Peterborough in Spain. 5s.

FOR NAME AND FAME; or, Through Afghan Passes. 5s.

THE DRAGON AND THE RAVEN; or,
the Days of King Alfred. 5s.

ST. GEORGE FOR ENGLAND: a Tale of Cressy and Poitiers. 5s.

BY SHEER PLUCK: a Tale of the Ashanti
War. 5s.

GEORGE MAC DONALD'S STORY BOOKS.

AT THE BACK OF THE NORTH WIND.
5s.

RANALD BANNERMAN'S BOYHOOD.
5s.

THE PRINCESS AND THE GOBLIN.
3s. 6d.

THE PRINCESS AND CURDIE. 3s. 6d.

GUTTA-PERCHA WILLIE, THE WORKING GENIUS. 2s. 6d.

MANVILLE FENN'S STORIES OF ADVENTURE.

DICK O' THE FENS: a Romance of the Great East Swamp. 6s.

QUICKSILVER; or, a Boy with no Skid to his Wheel. 6s.

DEVON BOYS: a Tale of the North Shore.
6s.

BROWNSMITH'S BOY: a Romance in a Garden. 6s.

BUNYIP LAND: the Story of a Wild
Journey in New Guinea. 6s.

THE GOLDEN MAGNET: a Tale of the Land of the Incas. 6s.

IN THE KING'S NAME; or, the Cruise of the "Kestrel." 6s.

MOTHER CAREY'S CHICKEN; her
Voyage to the Unknown Isle. 5s.

YUSSUF THE GUIDE: being the Strange
Story of Travels in Asia Minor. 5s.

MENHARDOC: a Story of Cornish Nets and Mines. 5s.

PATIENCE WINS; or, War in the Works.
5s.

NAT THE NATURALIST: a Boy's Adventure in the Eastern Seas. 5s.

LONDON: BLACKIE & SON, 49 AND 50 OLD BAILEY.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly,
London. All the New and Standard Books, Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c.
Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

NEW BOOK BY H. RIDER HAGGARD.

CLEOPATRA: being an Account of the Fall and Vengeance of Harmachis, the Royal Egyptian, as set forth by his own hand. By H. RIDER HAGGARD. With 29 Full-page Illustrations by M. Greiffenhagen and R. Caton Woodville. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.
Fifty Large-Paper Copies have been printed on Dickinson's Fine Art Paper. Price can be obtained through all Booksellers.

JUDGE LYNCH: a Tale of the California Vineyards. By GEORGE H. JESSOP. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN WESTACOTT."
BY THE WESTERN SEA: a Summer Idyl. By JAMES BAKER, Author of "John Westacott" &c. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

NATURAL RELIGION. The Gifford Lectures delivered before the University of Glasgow, in 1888. By F. MAX MÜLLER, K.M., Foreign Member of the French Institute. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

UNSPOKEN SERMONS. By GEORGE MACDONALD, LL.D. Third Series. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

SWISS TRAVEL and SWISS GUIDE-BOOKS. By W. A. B. COOLIDGE, Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, and Editor of the "Alpine Journal." Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

STRENGTH: How to get Strong and keep Strong, with Chapters on Rowing and Swimming, Fat, Age, and the Waist. By RICHARD A. PROCTOR. With 9 Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 2s.

The PHILOSOPHY of NECESSITY; or, Law in Mind as in Matter. By CHARLES BRAY. Third Edition, Revised and Abridged. With Portrait. Crown 8vo. 5s.

The EDINBURGH REVIEW, No. 347.

CONTENTS:

1. CHARLES, EARL GREY.
2. THE RAILWAYS OF ENGLAND.
3. VILLARI'S LIFE OF SAVONAROLA.
4. THE ROLL OF BATTLE ABBEY.
5. THE LAND OF MANFRED.
6. MARIA THERESA, EMPRESS.
7. THE DUKE OF COBURG'S MEMOIRS.
8. GARDINER'S HISTORY OF THE CIVIL WAR.
9. IMPERIAL FEDERATION.
10. THE HAMILTON MANUSCRIPTS.
11. HER MAJESTY'S OPPOSITION.

The ENGLISH HISTORICAL REVIEW.

Edited by the Rev. MANDELL CREIGHTON, M.A. LL.D.

No. 15, JULY. Royal 8vo. price 5s.

1. Articles.

CONTENTS:

- THE WAR OF 1870-1: AFTER SEDAN. By His Honour Judge WILLIAM O'CONNOR MORRIS.
RECENT CRITICISM UPON THE LIFE OF SAVONAROLA. By E. ARMSTRONG.
THE BATTLE OF TOWTON. (With a Plan.) By Prof. CYRIL RANSOME.
THE LORDS OF CHIOS. By J. THEODORE BENT.
THE REPUBLIC OF GERSAU. By the Rev. W. A. B. COOLIDGE.
2. Notes and Documents—The Introduction of English Law into Ireland: by Professor F. W. MAITLAND—Project for Taxation presented to Edward I.: by C. V. LANGLOIS—Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper and the Relief of Taunton: by Samuel R. GARDINER, LL.D.—Cromwell and the Insurrection of 1655, Part III.: by C. H. FIRTH—The Plunket Manuscripts: by Miss Mary Hickson—Letters of the Rev. William Ayerst, 1706-1721 (concluded): Edited by C. E. DOBLE.
3. Reviews of Books.
4. List of Historical Books recently published.
5. Contents of Periodical Publications.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.

EDWARD STANFORD'S NEW CATALOGUES,

Post-free on application.

CATALOGUE of MAPS, ATLASES, and other GEOGRAPHICAL PUBLICATIONS, published or sold by EDWARD STANFORD. 92 pp., in wrapper.

CATALOGUE of MAPS and BOOKS for TOURISTS, published or sold by EDWARD STANFORD. 56 pp. in wrapper, with Index Maps of the Government Surveys of England, France, and Switzerland.

METHODS of MAP MOUNTING, with Illustrations, giving hints as to the best methods of Mounting Maps for the Library, Hall, Schoolroom, &c.

LONDON: EDWARD STANFORD,

26 AND 27 COCKSPUR STREET, CHARING CROSS, S.W.

Sole Agent for the sale of the Ordnance and Geological Survey Maps in England and Wales.

NEW NOVEL, now ready at all Libraries and Booksellers', cloth bound, 5s.

THE MILROYS: a Tale of Woman's Work. By NOMAD. Dedicated, by special permission, to Mr. Walter Besant. MAYSON BRETON, 39 and 40 Bedford Street, Covent Garden.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

FATHER DAMIEN: a Journey from Cashmere to his Home in Hawaii. By EDWARD CLIFFORD. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

EDWARD FITZGERALD.

LETTERS and LITERARY REMAINS of EDWARD FITZGERALD. Edited by W. ALDIS WRIGHT, M.A., Vice-Master of Trinity College, Cambridge. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

Vol. I. Letters—Vol. II. Euphranor, Six Dramas from Calderon, The Bird Parliament, The Two Generals—Vol. III. Dramas from Calderon, Greek Dramas, Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, &c.

THE OXFORD MOVEMENT.

WILLIAM GEORGE WARD, and the OXFORD MOVEMENT. By WILFRID WARD. With Portrait. 8vo. 14s.

BY MR. PHILIP GILBERT HAMERTON.

FRENCH and ENGLISH: a Comparison. By PHILIP GILBERT HAMERTON, Author of "Etching and Etchers," "Thoughts about Art," "Human Intercourse," &c. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d. Among the subjects dealt with by Mr. Hamerton are:—Education, Patriotism, Politics, Religion, Virtues, Custom, Society, Success, Variety.

NOW READY, PART II.

THE PLEASURES of LIFE. By Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, F.R.S., D.C.L., LL.D. Part II. Third Edit. Globe 8vo. 3s. 6d. Part I. (Forty-seventh Thousand), POPULAR EDITION, sewed, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d. LIBRARY EDITION, uniform with Part II. Cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

AFTERTHOUGHTS: Poems. By JOSEPH TRUMAN. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

BY THE RIGHT REV. THE BISHOP OF DURHAM.

ESSAYS on the Work entitled

"SUPERNATURAL RELIGION." By the Right Rev. J. B. LIGHTFOOT, D.D., D.C.L., LL.D., Bishop of Durham, &c. Reprinted from the "Contemporary Review." 8vo. 10s. 6d.

NEW AND THOROUGHLY REVISED EDITION.

A HISTORY of the BOOK of COMMON PRAYER; with a Rationale of its Offices. By the Rev. FRANCIS PROCTER, M.A. Eighteenth Edition, Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

ELEMENTARY THEOLOGICAL CLASS-BOOKS.—NEW VOLUME.

AN INTRODUCTION to THE CREEDS. By the Rev. G. F. MACLEAR, D.D., Hon. Canon of Canterbury, Warden of St. Augustine's College, Canterbury, and late Head Master of King's College School, London; Author of "A Class Book of Old Testament History," "A Class Book of New Testament History," &c. 18mo. 2s. 6d.

FELLOWSHIP: Letters addressed to my Sister-Mourners. By Lady EASTLAKE. Third Edition, Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

THE HISTORIES of POLYBIUS. Translated from the Text of F. HULTSCH. By EVELYN S. SHUCKBURGH, M.A., late Fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 24s.

PHYSICS of the EARTH'S CRUST. By the Rev. OSMOND FISHER, M.A., F.G.S., Rector of Harlton, Hon. Fellow of King's College, London, and late Fellow and Tutor of Jesus College, Cambridge. Second Edition, Altered and Enlarged, 8vo. 12s.

"NATURE" SERIES.—New Volumes.

MODERN VIEWS of ELECTRICITY. By OLIVER J. LODGE, LL.D., D.Sc., F.R.S., Professor of Experimental Physics in University College, Liverpool. Illustrated, Crown 8vo. 6s. 6d.

TIMBER and some of its DISEASES. By H. MARSHALL WARD, M.A., F.R.S., F.L.S., late Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge, Professor of Botany at the Royal Engineering College, Cooper's Hill. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 6s.

BOOKS FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

MACMILLAN'S THREE SHILLING AND SIXPENNY NOVELS.

ROBBERY UNDER ARMS: a Story of Life and Adventure in the Bush and in the Gold Fields of Australia. By ROLF BOLDREWOOD. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

SCHWARTZ. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

NEIGHBOURS on the GREEN. By Mrs. OLIPHANT. 3s. 6d.

THE WEAKER VESSEL. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY. 3s. 6d.

JOYCE. By Mrs. OLIPHANT. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

CRESSY. By BRET HARTE. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

WESSEX TALES; Strange, Lively, and Commonplace. By THOMAS HARDY, Author of "The Woodlanders" &c. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

A LONDON LIFE. By HENRY JAMES. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

MISS BRETHERTON. By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD, Author of "Robert Elsmere." Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

REUBEN SACHS. By AMY LEVY. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Other Volumes to follow.

New and Cheaper Edition, with an additional Chapter.

TALES of the BIRDS. By W. WARDE FOWLER, M.A., Sub-Rector of Lincoln College, Oxford, Author of "A Year with the Birds." With Illustrations by Bryan Hook. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

The Guardian says:—"Mr. Fowler has produced a charming book, which none are too old and few too young to appreciate. He possesses the rare art of telling a story..... Apart from the interest of the stories themselves, the pages are brimful of minute observation of the ways and habits of bird-life."

MACMILLAN & CO., BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

BOOKS FOR COUNTRY AND SEASIDE READING.

Each work can be had separately, price 6s. of all Booksellers in Town or Country.

BENTLEY'S FAVOURITE NOVELS.

* * "QUEENIE'S WHIM," by ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY, and "THE ROGUE," by W. E. NORRIS, are just added to the Series.

By W. E. NORRIS.

Thirlby Hall.
A Bachelor's Blunder.
Major and Minor.
The Rogue.

By RHODA BROUGHTON.

Cometh up as a Flower.
Good-bye, Sweetheart!
Joan. | Nancy.
Not Wisely, but Too Well.
Red as a Rose is She.
Second Thoughts.
Belinda.
"Doctor Cupid."

By Mrs. ALEXANDER.

The Wooing o't.
Her Dearest Foe.
Look Before You Leap.
The Admiral's Ward.
The Executor.
The Freres.
Which Shall it Be?

By ROSA N. CAREY.

Nellie's Memories.
Barbara Heathcote's Trial.
Not Like Other Girls.
Only the Governess.
Queenie's Whim.
Robert Ord's Atonement.
Uncle Max.
Wee Wife.
Wooded and Married.

By ANTHONY TROLLOPE.

The Three Clerks.

By Mrs. ANNIE EDWARDES.

Leah: a Woman of Fashion.
Ought We to Visit Her?
A Ball-room Repentance.
A Girton Girl.

By MARIE CORELLI.

A Romance of Two Worlds.
Vendetta.
Thelma.

By J. SHERIDAN LE FANU.

Uncle Silas.
In a Glass Darkly.
The House by the Churchyard.

By FLORENCE MONTGOMERY.

Misunderstood.
Seaforth.
Thrown Together.

By E. WERNER.

No Surrender.
Success: and how he won it.
Under a Charm.
Fickle Fortune.

By CHARLES READE.

A Perilous Secret.

By Hon. LEWIS WINGFIELD.

Lady Grizel.

By MARCUS CLARKE.

For the Term of his Natural Life.

By HAWLEY SMART.

Breezie Langton.

By HECTOR MALOT.

No Relations. With Illustrations.

By Mrs. AUGUSTUS CRAVEN.

A Sister's Story. Reprinting.

By Mrs. NOTLEY.

Olive Varcoe.

By FRANCES M. PEARD.

Near Neighbours.

By JESSIE FOTHERGILL.

The "First Violin."
Borderland.
Healey.
Kith and Kin.
Probation.
The Wellfields.

By HELEN MATHERS.

Comin' thro' the Rye.
Sam's Sweetheart.

By Mrs. PARR.

Adam and Eve.
Dorothy Fox.

By Lady G. FULLERTON.

Ellen Middleton.
Ladybird.
Too Strange not to be True.

By Baroness TAUTPHÆUS.

The Initials.
Quits!

By Mrs. RIDDELL.

George Geith of Fen Court.
Susan Drummond.
Berna Boyle.

By JANE AUSTEN.

(The only complete Edition, besides the Steventon Edition upon hand-made paper.)

Emma.
Lady Susan, and The Watsons.
Mansfield Park.
Northanger Abbey, and Persuasion.
Pride and Prejudice.
Sense and Sensibility.

ANONYMOUS.

The Last of the Cavaliers.

LONDON: RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET,
PUBLISHERS IN ORDINARY TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW
OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,761, Vol. 68.

July 27, 1889.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

EGYPT.

WAD-EL-NJUMI and his so-called Dervishes (the protest against the use of the name is well founded enough, but they may as well be called Dervishes as anything else) remain comparatively stationary and inactive between Wady Halfa and Assouan, in the neighbourhood of the famous Temple of Abou Simbel or Ipsamboul. They are met with occasionally, and always routed with loss; but this loss produces no effect on the main body, and it is uncertain whether this main body may not be largely increased soon by reinforcements. When those reinforcements arrive a battle seems likely, and the course of such battles has been too chequered to make it safe to talk lightly of the result. The unyielding attitude and high pretensions of the leader are quite in keeping with the general spirit of the Mahdist movement, and, indeed, explain its strength. There is about modern Mahommedanism, at least of the military type, nothing of the uncertainty and shillyshally with which modern Christianity is sometimes reproached. The Prophet understood the natural man of Asiatic and African races perfectly well, and his mode of procedure is still fully justified with them. He did not, like some unwiser fanatics, promise universal victory, invulnerableness, or anything of the kind. The followers of the KHALIFA are quite aware that they may be collectively defeated and individually killed. But that does not interfere either with their certainty of the ultimate success of their cause, with their sense of the duty of offering conversion, tribute, or the sword, or with their enjoyment of the comfortable prospects of the martyred believer. To come to sublunary matters, it is clear that, whatever inconveniences the want of water may have subjected them to, these inconveniences have not been of such a character as to make living impossible; while, unluckily, the English and Egyptian strength on the spot has been only enough to inflict occasional raps on the knuckles, and not a crushing defeat. The forces at the disposal of the General in command should be now sufficient to make any great advance on WAD-EL-NJUMI's part impracticable; but they are, perhaps, barely sufficient for a vigorous offensive, and to make them what they are the lower country has been swept nearly, and perhaps dangerously, clean.

The worst of it is that, even if the offensive be taken with the best results, and the immediate invaders be driven back to Sarras or Dongola, the good done will be anything but considerable, and still less final. Sir SAMUEL BAKER and the almost equally well-known "TWENTY YEARS' RESIDENT" have once more valiantly taken pen in hand to prove to the British Government and the British public that two and two invariably make four, or at least have such a habit of doing so that it is not businesslike to reckon on their making three or five. Sir SAMUEL has urged that at least Berber and Dongola must be held if similar raids are not to continue chronic, and the "TWENTY YEARS' RESIDENT" has worked out clearly enough the parallel or analogy (which has been more than once made in these columns) between the Nile raiders and the Nile floods. The Nile floods are welcomed and prayed for; but, if they happened to be destructive instead of beneficial, no man in his senses would dream of building dams at the First and Second Cataract; he would go to the Blue and White Niles, if not to the Lakes themselves, in order to start operations. In the same way, if "Dervishes" are to be prevented from raiding Egypt, it will certainly not be done by a chain of posts ending at Wady Halfa, much less by repeating the folly already committed and removing the posts, as some wiseacres would have us do, even further north. We very much doubt ourselves whether anything short of the resumption of the command of the river up to Khartoum will be really effectual.

But the occupations of Dongola and Berber might be tried, if half-measures, stopgaps, and the attempt to compromise and conciliate are too dear to British governing man to be given up at once. Neither of these, as Sir SAMUEL BAKER points out, need involve any large or costly expedition, while the holding of Berber would (as Sir SAMUEL doubtless means) have a very considerable effect in relieving Souakim as well as the Egyptian frontier. If something of the kind is not done we shall have the same trouble over again and worse. The present raid is more serious than its immediate forerunners, and the next may, and probably would, be more serious still. It will never do to trust in playing Senoussists against Mahdists. Even if the latter were to succumb, of which there is no present sign, their conquerors will experience, and will probably yield to, the same temptations. This kind of restless dashing against the civilized circumference of a great uncivilized inner space has been unknown in Europe for centuries and in Asia for some considerable time. But there is a kind of epidemic of it in Africa now from the Second Cataract to Lake Nyassa; and our conduct in the outlying regions, formerly subject to the Egyptian Pashas and Khedives, could not even with the greatest skill have been arranged so as to suit it better. Our duty to Egypt, and the need of sparing English soldiers and Egyptian soldiers, as well as Egyptian non-combatants, this perpetual nuisance, demands that something should be done to extirpate the disease or keep it afar off, instead of being merely satisfied with palliating its accessions.

If, however, our conduct towards Egypt in this respect is doubtful, we can at least give ourselves the comfort of thinking that the conduct of our competitor for the control and sometime partner in it is not doubtful at all. It is of very little importance whether the recent attitude of France in this matter is due, as has been asserted, to M. FRANCIS CHARMES or to any other individual person. Everybody who has occasion to examine French books and newspapers knows that almost the whole of the powerful class of journalist-politicians in France is furious at the supposed loss of French prestige, as well as at the railing off of the Egyptian pagoda-tree from the merry shakings which Frenchmen used to give it. But we cannot agree with those who think that the second application of the Egyptian Government itself to France for permission to economize by paying or lessening its debts was undignified. The application was, as might have been foreseen, ineffectual, but it has put France even more hopelessly in the wrong than before. The French Government, in words which look so like those of a petulant person of the other sex that one is almost tempted to think them apocryphal, says that it "entirely holds" that the conversion is "of vital importance to Egypt," but regrets that, as the political situation remains unchanged, it cannot give its consent. That is to say, one of those nations which pride themselves most on "culture," on generosity, and so forth, deliberately, by the mouth of its responsible Government, declines to perform a duty with which it is charged because it is dissatisfied with something accidentally and remotely connected with the result of discharging that duty. Financially the conversion is, France acknowledges, of vital importance to Egypt; but, if Egypt were to prosper, it would prosper under the hated political influence of England, and France is determined that, if she can help it, Egypt shall not be allowed so to prosper. The naïve shamelessness of this avowal is very agreeable. It is not easy to parallel it by any incident in private life, though it is not entirely devoid of connexion with the celebrated conduct of the dog in the manger. To forbid the conversion will not do France one penny of good, for the slight loss which might accrue to a few Frenchmen from having, in effect, the money they have lent paid back to them would be more than balanced by the increased value of Egyptian credit in which other or the same Frenchmen are largely interested. It will not do England any harm, for obvious reasons. It will only injure Egypt, and it is only a confession that France is, if not a fraudulent, yet a dishonourable, trustee, or rather guardian, who prevents his ward's estate from being economically managed because he has a grudge against another guardian in whom the law has vested the infant's immediate control. That, as has been urged, Frenchmen had a very large and a very profitable share in building this debt up is not a matter of much importance, for details of that kind can hardly be taken into consideration in deciding national policy. But that the French, by their own confession, are misusing a financial trust in order to obtain for themselves a political gain is a very interesting thing indeed, and we cannot have it too distinctly attested under France's hand and seal.

O'BRIEN v. THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY.

AFTER all, it is still possible for an Irishman, even an Irishman infected with the black stain of Nationalism, to exhibit decided traces of what has been deplored as extinct under the title of Irish humour. The martyr of Tullamore is certainly the last person, except perhaps Mr. PARNELL, whom one would have expected to become the channel of so happy a revival, and the personal element of unexpectedness makes his having done so all the more pleasing. After all that has been written and said by and of the Parnellites, and particularly by and of the editor of our chaste contemporary United Ireland, it was a piece of genuine facetiousness on the part of Mr. O'BRIEN to sue the PRIME MINISTER for slander for having said that Mr. O'BRIEN had recommended an audience in Co. Tipperary to promote the cause of Irish Nationalism by murder and other crimes of violence. It may be that the action was part of a dark and deliberate design to make evidence of the alleged partiality of English judges and jurymen. It may be, on the other hand, that Mr. O'BRIEN, bewildered at the calm credulity with which Englishmen have recently listened, or seemed to listen, to various sworn and unsworn statements of his own and his allies, determined to follow his luck to the uttermost, and see whether there was any conceivable degree of audacious Parnellite assertion which Englishmen would not stand. If the latter explanation be the true one, Mr. O'BRIEN may be a little disappointed; but he cannot actually be surprised that a British jury should have unhesitatingly endorsed Lord SALISBURY's very moderate, and, indeed, rather commonplace, description of Mr. O'BRIEN's burning utterances at Ballyneale.

Most likely the main question which the jury felt called upon to decide was what Lord SALISBURY had really said—that is, what was the natural meaning of the words he undoubtedly used. It is worth noticing on this point that a feeble effort has been made by some people to suggest that Lord SALISBURY showed a mean want of spirit or of straightforwardness in not putting aside the business of the country in general, and the Foreign Office in particular, in order to go down to Manchester and give the company there the pleasure of seeing him in the witness-box. It is urged, with a sort of verbal plausibility, that no one could tell what Lord SALISBURY meant so well as Lord SALISBURY himself. But the question at issue was, not what idea Lord SALISBURY wanted to convey to his audience, but what idea he did convey to them; and on this point he was not in the least a more valuable witness than any one else. What he said, in the course of a long speech, which was itself an incident in a long controversy, was that Mr. O'BRIEN practically advised certain people to commit certain crimes. Everybody with brains in his skull who read the speech—let alone following the controversy—could see that the proposition he conveyed to his hearers by these words, when set out at length, was as follows:—Mr. O'BRIEN advised his hearers to boycott landgrabbers: the boycotting of landgrabbers necessarily involves the commission of crime; therefore Mr. O'BRIEN practically advised the commission of crime. Nobody who heard or read Lord SALISBURY's speech could suppose that he wanted it to be believed that Mr. O'BRIEN said in so many words:—"Shoot landgrabbers; burn their houses; mutilate their cattle; devastate their farms." If he had been able to quote from Mr. O'BRIEN any express words to that effect, he would of course have done so; but everybody who knows anything of politics knows that Mr. O'BRIEN is not fool enough to use such words as these in public. It is quite clear that the effect, as well as the intention, of Lord SALISBURY's words was to convey in a compressed form the criticism upon Mr. O'BRIEN's speech which is expanded above, that the jury thought so, and were of opinion that in that obvious sense what Lord SALISBURY said was substantially true, or at the very least a fair comment on a matter of public importance. It is true that Mr. O'BRIEN endeavoured to maintain in the witness-box that it was possible to carry on boycotting without crime or the fear of crime, and that all he really recommended was an imitation of the conduct of persons who deal with the blue grocer and not with the buff grocer. The suggestion is an insult to the common sense of any one who has ever seen anything of boycotting in Ireland, or has ever taken the slightest trouble to find out anything about the aims and character of its procedure. There never was a boycotted man yet who would have suffered any serious inconvenience if people had not been afraid to deal with him, nor are people afraid to carry on their business for the ordinary considerations unless there is some ground of personal apprehension.

MR. BENZON'S HORSE.

THE division of a ship into a number of imaginary parts for purposes of ownership and investment is practically known to many persons whose acquaintance with maritime affairs has otherwise been strictly theoretical. The ship of the desert has not yet become the subject of Western speculation. But the ship of the racecourse has been divided by art, roughly following the lines of nature, into four parts. Mr. ERNEST BENZON, known to fame as the Jubilee Plunger, consoled a friend for some temporary disappointment by the encouraging remark, "Never mind, BILLY my boy, you shall have a quarter of Kilworth." Kilworth is a steeple-chaser of some renown, and the value of the quarter was 156*l.* 19*s.* The Jubilee Plunger, who, whatever else may be said of him, is a man of honour, was as good as his word, and Lord Justice LOPES has declared Mr. MOORE entitled to the money. SOLOMON would perhaps have tested the validity of the rival claims to this interesting animal by directing that he should be cut up, and his parts distributed as per alleged agreement. Lord Justice LOPES, having the fear of Mr. COLAM before his eyes and a number of legal precedents in his head, was content to determine that Mr. BENZON had intended to make the present he promised, and that the conditions of the gift were such as to render it a valid one. The case was an interpleader, the money being in the hands of Messrs. TATTERSALL, who desired directions as to which of two claimants was entitled to it. One, as we have indicated, was Mr. MOORE, who has succeeded in the suit. The other was Mr. COCHRANE, who, as Lord Justice LOPES puts it, "carries on a trade with which most people have little sympathy." Money-lenders, however, have, as the Lord Justice kindly admitted, their rights; and perhaps, if it became impossible to-morrow for anybody to borrow anything except by overdrawing his account with his bankers, the world would not be much the happier or much the more prosperous. Mr. BENZON cannot be congratulated on his particular experience of the money-lending fraternity, unless, indeed, he really desired to run through his fortune in a year, and exorbitant interest helped him in his task. The slight and imperfect record of his transactions in this line which Lord Justice LOPES incorporated in his judgment may be of some advantage to ingenuous youth who do not study the maxims of POLONIUS. One TURNER, then, charged Mr. BENZON two thousand pounds for the loan of five thousand during two months, while COCHRANE, the plaintiff, required five hundred pounds for the accommodation of three thousand pounds, payable in one month. Nosse omnia hæc, as TERENCE and Mr. DISRAELI would say, salus est adolescentulis.

Lord Justice LOPES had two questions to decide, though his answer to the first made it strictly unnecessary to consider the second. But, adopting the principle for which Mr. Justice MANISTY was so unfairly attacked in the case of ADAMS v. COLERIDGE, the Lord Justice gave his decision upon the facts, in case he should be overruled upon the law. COCHRANE's claim was founded on a bill of sale, which Lord Justice LOPES decided to be invalid, as having been obtained by fraud. But, according to Mr. MOORE, on whose behalf Mr. BENZON gave evidence, there was a valid donation of a quarter of the horse before the bill of sale was granted, and, therefore, even if the bill had been good, the prior gift would have prevailed. It was argued that there could not be a valid gift of an individual part of a chattel; and on this pleasing point, in which Mr. WEMMICK would have delighted, there seems, oddly enough, to be no authority. "In the present case," says Lord Justice LOPES, with almost more than judicial gravity, "there was not, and could not be, actual delivery." Certainly there could not, in the lifetime of the horse, whose interest in the proceedings as a fourth party would have begun with any attempt to "deliver" this fraction of portable property. But it seems that presents may be made and, we presume, debts paid, or prices estimated, in terms of horse as well as in terms of gold. This ought to furnish the bimetallists with a new grievance, since only very small sums can be legally liquidated in the silver they love so well. It has further been found by the Court that the bill of sale produced by COCHRANE to prove his right to the whole horse was obtained by false representations, Mr. BENZON being told that it was a mortgage, and would not be registered. In plain English, the Lord Justice accepted Mr. BENZON's story and disbelieved COCHRANE on his oath. Now money-lending is not to most men an attractive calling. If people really had, as in the Platonic myth, to choose their own lives periodically, few would select that particular one. But there is no reason in the nature of things why a money-lender should not be honest. The abolition of the usury laws was supported by the most enlightened politicians of the day, on the express ground that bad security must, and always would, whatever Acts of Parliament might provide, mean a high rate of interest. But it is a little surprising that an individual money-lender should have cared to fight the case of COCHRANE v. MOORE.

CRETE.

IT would appear that the machinations which have been going on in Crete for some time have been at last successful; and that actual armed insurrection has broken out in the island. The necessities of Mr. GLADSTONE no longer requiring horror at "atrocities," but a languid interest has been taken in the doings of the brutal Turk lately by Gladstonians. But even the measureless credulity and the audacious falsification of a dozen years ago could make nothing particularly atrocious out of the present state of Crete. The island has autonomy in a very large degree, the Christian inhabitants are more numerous than their Mahomedan compatriots, are of the same race (whatever that race may be called), are quite capable in every respect of taking care of themselves. The disturbances, so far as they have any real cause, are partly mere faction fights, partly a struggle for place and office, by no means un-Irish in its general character, partly the result of a desire, perhaps genuine in origin, but certainly stimulated by artificial means, to get rid of the name of Turkish rule and the fact of Mahomedan "ascendency." Turkey, on the other hand, is not understood to be at all desperately set on retaining a possession which is now very little good to her, and a constant source of trouble. No one seems to think of Cretan independence, and it may be admitted that there would be some chance of the island becoming a Mediterranean Hayti, even if its valuable harbours did not tempt some of the Mediterranean Powers to take liberties with them. No one of these Powers would acquiesce in an arrangement for its possession by any other, and though many Cretans would like an English protectorate, though the island would be useful to England, and though English rule would certainly be a blessing to it, the curious pusillanimity which seems to have come over our nation (fortunately it has come over it at intervals before and has disappeared) almost unanimously cries out upon the idea. It may be observed, however, that the precedent of the Ionian Islands, instead of being against the scheme, is in favour of it. The fault in that case was not in the taking, but in the giving up; the benefits received by Corfu and its sister islands during the protectorate are undenied, and it is unanimously admitted that they have distinctly receded under their union with Greece.

But England being too poor-spirited to take it, and all other claimants being out of the question, it appears to be thought that in this way or that Crete must become Greek. Why it should become Greek is not much more obvious than why it should become Kamtschatkan. Every scholar knows that the original connexion between island and mainland in the days when Greece was Greece, and not a heterogeneous medley of races, mostly, if not wholly, barbarian in origin, was of the loosest description. In the half-century and more which has passed since Greece was reconstituted by diplomatists no very clear signs of her being able to manage dependencies and outlying provinces have been given, and the exploits of the Greeks in the abortive squabble which tried to break out a year or two ago between her and Turkey did not show any great capacity of managing a possibly rebellious minority. But the doctrine that if a population only behaves itself sufficiently badly something must be done for it, appears to have obtained a firm hold on the mind of the persons who are now called statesmen. The conduct of Turkey has not been, and is not, wholly wise; for the Porte seems to have got more and more into the suicidal habit of trying to play off its enemies against its friends. But it cannot be too clearly understood that for urging "persecution" of any kind on the part of the nominally ruling Power there is in the present instance not a rag of pretence. Whatever happens in Crete, nothing can happen which will reasonably further that restoration of the Cross on St. Sophia for which some of our Philhellenes and Slavophiles (the Hellene proper would not have relished his modern friends' promiscuity of taste) declare that they would gladly consent to see Dr. PARKER in the Cathedral of Canterbury. A naturally turbulent population, with a Government not very strong and afraid to use what strength it has, has for some time been "spoiling for a fight," and has now indulged itself.

REPORTING IN THE LORDS.

IN the summer of 1880 a rash spirit of innovation seized upon the Peerage of the United Kingdom. The House of Commons had just undergone one of its periodical vicissitudes, and the Lords seemed to be afraid that, if they remained as they were much longer, the curse would come upon them, as it came upon the Lady of Shalott. So they looked about for something handy, and their eyes fell upon the reporters. Surely the reporters were too far off, or too high up, or too much inclined to take refuge in the excuse that "the noble Lord's remarks were inaudible in the gallery." Attempts were made to plant the reporters out in various parts of the sacred edifice—we mean the gilded Chamber. Little structures appeared on either side of the House, bearing no very remote resemblance to those temporary erections on which murderers pay the last penalty of the law. Some irreverent persons suggested the top of the Throne as a convenient watch-tower for the picturesque "descriptionist," and that staunch Conservative, the late Lord REDESDALE, was currently reported to have drafted an amendment that the reporters should be placed upon the top of the House that day six months. But all these ingenious schemes fell through, and the innate Conservatism of the Upper House prevailed. It was discovered that the side galleries were not pretty, and that the reports in the daily papers were no fuller than they had been before. The amateur scaffolds went the way of all wood, and the Peers fell back upon the old principle, that what the public really demand those who cater for the public are sure to provide. Nine years have passed, and again the world is reminded of the spretæ injuria vocis. By a curious coincidence, which of course disproves the humble theory we have just enunciated, the Duke of ARGYLL regards the reports as full enough, while Lord DENMAN finds them far too meagre. We are inclined to regret that Lord DENMAN has been fully reported only twice in five-and-thirty years. We should not have liked to miss the story of how he bought up all the copies of the English Illustrated Magazine. The world is not too full of harmless amusement, and Lord DENMAN's speeches are not long. There was one, if we remember rightly, about riding across country against any Peer of his own weight, followed by a reference to pugilistic encounters, and to 50*l.*, which ought not to have been either partly or partially withheld. On the other hand, we cannot help sympathizing with Lord MORLEY, when the Chairman of Committees says that a full and literal report would add a new terror to addressing what the PRIME MINISTER describes as the most formidable audience in the world. The young Peers who are supposed to be deterred from speaking by thoughts of the chilly silence with which their speeches would be received might find the presence of an official stenographer even more trying than the absence of cheers.

The Duke of ARGYLL is probably alone in his opinion that the acoustic properties of the House of Lords are good. What he means by calling them "too good" we have not the slightest idea—unless, indeed, they induce him to drop his voice at the ends of his sentences, whereby some of his monitory eloquence is lost. Very few peers are habitually audible. The Duke himself is, with the recent exception above indicated, one of them. Lord SALISBURY is another, and Lord ROSEBURY is a third. Yet it is not long since a commonplace question and answer exchanged across the table by the two last-named peers was transformed by an ingenious gentleman sitting upstairs into a brilliant epigram, followed by a still more dazzling retort. It was at the time when Sir HENRY WOLFF was Envoy Extraordinary at Constantinople, and was preparing to leave unless the SULTAN signed the Egyptian Convention. "Is Sir HENRY," Lord ROSEBURY was made to ask, "in a state of suspended animation?" "I should rather say in a condition of animated expectancy" were the words put into the mouth of HER MAJESTY'S SECRETARY OF STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS. What actually passed was that Lord ROSEBURY put some question about Sir HENRY WOLFF's future movements, and Lord SALISBURY replied, in the language of ordinary life, "I will telegraph and ask him, if you like." The debate or conversation of Tuesday last, rendered for ever memorable by the fact that Lord DERBY made a joke, arose out of the strange conduct of Lord MAR. Lord MAR, whose life is embittered by the contemporaneous existence of the Earl of MAR and KELLIE, has recently communicated to HANSARD a speech which so far resembles the Second Philippic that a good deal of it was never spoken. Attention being drawn to this circumstance, the representatives of "HANSARD" naturally reply that they cannot be responsible unless their reporters hear every word which is said, and that for that purpose they must have seats on the floor. Lord SALISBURY's interesting and important speech, in which he pointed out that this country had been committed, and foreign Powers misled, by incorrect reports of Ministerial answers, deserves serious notice. In the House of Commons Ministers read their answers, and, if they are of special consequence, send them up to the Reporters' Gallery.

THE QUEEN v. BRIDGE.

THOSE persons to whom claptrap is nearly, if not quite, the most hateful thing in this world have too many sorrows and not enough joys nowadays. But on the morning of Tuesday last they must, if their souls be grateful, have thanked Providence, and, under Providence, the Queen's Bench Division. Every one remembers the squabble—but for certain circumstances it might have been called the trumpery squabble—between a journalist named SIMMS and the Duke of CAMBRIDGE on that memorable occasion when the wisdom of the London County Council in general, and of Colonel HOWARD VINCENT in particular, resulted in the mobbing of the PRINCE and PRINCESS OF WALES. The Duke thought—wrongfully, it seems—that Mr. SIMMS was a rioter. Mr. SIMMS thought the Duke was violent. Mr. SIMMS ran against the Duke, and the Duke rejected Mr. SIMMS—with the actions, and perhaps with the expressions, natural to an elderly military person who is being run against by hatless unknowns. Probably, if Mr. SIMMS had quietly explained, and said he was sorry for running against the Duke, the Duke would have said he was sorry for collaring Mr. SIMMS. But Mr. SIMMS lives in a day when journalism, or a certain kind of journalism, thinks itself (as, indeed, in the French language it calls itself) a sacerdoce, and he proceeded against the profane Duke who had touched the ark and its priest. After trying Mr. SHEIL and Mr. VAUGHAN in vain, Mr. SIMMS got his application for a summons heard and dismissed by Mr. BRIDGE. Then, still in the sacerdotal frame of mind, he applied for a rule nisi, and it was granted, only to be now discharged. With Mr. SIMMS there is no reason for being angry. He was no doubt roughly treated, and persons who think they have a sacerdoce are apt to magnify their office. But when the rule nisi was originally granted, a judge, holding almost the most distinguished of judicial positions, took occasion to make remarks about all the QUEEN'S subjects being equal before the law. This could only mean, if it meant anything, that Mr. SIMMS's advocates had reason in suggesting that the Duke of CAMBRIDGE's rank had exercised, or might be thought to have exercised, an improper influence over the magistrate's mind. Mr. Justice DAY, refusing the mandamus, remarked, in simple and excellent words, that "in his opinion there was not a particle of foundation for such an imputation, and it ought not to have been made." He and his colleague also laid down the clear law that a magistrate's decision is not subject to review in this manner, though, if he has declined to decide, he may be made to do so by the Queen's Bench.

The fact is, as every one who has his right judgment knows, that if there is any inequality between the QUEEN'S subjects at the present day, it is an inequality of an exactly opposite kind to that which Mr. SIMMS's injudicious friends suggested, and which Lord COLERIDGE, by his manner of deprecation, seemed indirectly to recognize. We have changed many things, but in few is the change so remarkable as here. Under the influence of cant, that which is a choleric word in the soldier has become flat blasphemy in the captain. We should stone AHAB now if he declined to make NABOTH an allotment out of the palace gardens. We (that is to say, not we, but other people) solemnly question the political status of the House of Lords, because some youthful peer plays baccarat at three o'clock in the morning, though it has not been, that we know of, suggested that clerks or shopkeepers who gamble should be deprived of their political rights. When a man of the lower class insults a woman, he gets his few months' imprisonment, and comes out to resume his business not a penny the worse; but if the offender is of the upper, we break off his professional career, inflict a huge pecuniary fine on him, and let him have no place of repentance, though he seek it with exemplary conduct and the most heroic deeds. In every case the presumption of popular opinion, and even the operation of the ordinary law, is against the "person of quality," and in favour of the person of no quality. Perhaps this turn of the whirligig of time is as just as it is certainly in a sense comical. But, at any rate, "no preachee and floggee too" is sound sense; and it is rather hard that the Duke of CAMBRIDGE should not only be worried by legal proceedings of which had he been a nobody he would not have been in the least danger, but be innuendoed as a proud privileged prince as well.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

AMONG the many railing accusations which have been drawn from the Gladstonians by the success of the Primrose League, even they have never been able to charge it with showing a tendency to any of the maladies which often beset prosperous political organizations. There have been no splits in its ranks, no cabals, no intrigues, none even of those private envies and jealousies which weaken the power of associations, even if they are not serious enough to dissolve them. The unity, the harmony of the Primrose League, and indeed of the Unionist party at large, is perfect, and there could not be a better time than the present for such a demonstration as that held at the Crystal Palace last Wednesday night. Mr. BALFOUR, who accompanied Lady SALISBURY to the evening fête and reception given in her honour, might well contrast those evidences of a united party with "the disorganization and disintegration" of their opponents. That state of things in the Gladstonian camp was never more conspicuous than at the moment when Mr. BALFOUR was speaking—a moment when Radicals and official Liberals were at hopeless loggerheads; when we were hearing of "pressure" here and "pressure" there to induce men who are obstinately bent on breaking the line to "dress up"; and when gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench were wavering in miserable mental uneasiness between the decencies of their places in the House and their fears for their popularity. The Gladstonians, as Mr. BALFOUR said, "belong by tradition to different parties; they hold different opinions; they obey different leaders; they work through different organizations." Nothing, in short, has hitherto kept them together except the bond of a confederated attack upon law and order in Ireland; and now that they feel that their repulse and rout can no longer be disguised, and that it is vain to renew the assault, they are breaking up like a defeated rebel army into little lawless bands, each fighting for its own hand, owning "no common leader, obeying no common word of command, and neither formidable in attack nor powerful in defence."

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT's simultaneous observations on the internal condition of his party are not calculated to weaken the effect of Mr. BALFOUR's damaging criticisms. The fact is indeed that, while the earlier part of Sir WILLIAM's speech at Hereford was an endeavour to rebut the charge of confusion and despondency by a display of forced jocularity which sat particularly ill upon a speaker who generally amuses himself, if he does not tickle other people, the concluding portion of it was a virtual admission of the unhappy state of things in the Gladstonian ranks and a recital of its causes. Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT's account of the dealings of the Government with the Royal Grants as "an unstatesmanlike muddle" is exactly one of those sallies which reveal the fact which he strives to hide. For this unstatesmanlike muddle is exactly the arrangement of which Sir WILLIAM's revered leader was just about to express his almost unqualified approval—an approval of it, we may say, on every point except one which, as Mr. GLADSTONE admits, is a pure point of form. And it is just because Mr. GLADSTONE's late Chancellor of the Exchequer thinks it a muddle and his late Chief Secretary regards it as a trap, and nobody knows exactly what his other Front Bench colleagues think about it, or how they are going to vote on it—it is for these reasons, if Sir WILLIAM pleases, that people are just now saying that the great Liberal party is not precisely a happy family. Perhaps, too, he might find, if he looked a little closer into matters, that there are other questions not quite so prominently before the English public on which the union of the party even inside, and certainly outside, the House of Commons is not quite so complete as he would like to believe. We do not propose to go back, at least in any detail, upon the proceedings at Edinburgh last Saturday, and on Mr. PARNELL's brazen attacks upon a tribunal by which he has been treated with a scrupulous fairness that would have reduced any one but an Irish agitator to ashamed silence. We only refer to the subject, first, in order to take note of an ex-Solicitor-General's declaration that the country had no occasion to wait for the Report of the Commission, that it had stopped the case, and was quite prepared to give its verdict, which was not likely to be altered by the Report of the Commission; and, secondly, in order to suggest to Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT that the whole of the Edinburgh proceedings of last week are matters on which he would be well advised to say as little as possible; inasmuch as the particular stroke of sharp practice which the central SCHNADHORSTS and the local WALCOTS have succeeded in bringing off is now more and more clearly proving itself to have been one of those clever blunders which the SCHNADHORSTS and WALCOTS of the world are always committing, and by which they will in this case lose much more in the real bitterness they have created than in the sham enthusiasm they have worked up.

Within a day or two of Mr. PARNELL's elevation to the citizenship of Edinburgh the programme of the "New Irish Defence League" was given to the world. Its language, we may at once admit, is such as need give no alarm even to that scrupulous Bailie, Mr. LEGALITY WALCOT himself. The object of the League, says the second paragraph of this document, is to counteract by "legal means" "all combinations of landlords used to exact excessive rents, to extort unjust arrears, or to impose inequitable terms of purchase, to stimulate eviction, or in any way to destroy or imperil the security of tenants in their holdings." It is, perhaps, doubtful whether the Tenants' League will wait for "combinations of landlords" to take action before commencing operations of their own; but that is a little matter on which we need not insist. If the promoters of the Plan of Campaign had confined themselves to counteracting by "legal means" the efforts of landlords to obtain their rent (a process which would have included advice to the tenants to refrain under any circumstances from resisting the execution of the decrees of the law), their assumption of the initiative and the offensive would have been readily enough condoned. The salient point in the programme, and the one which appears to have impressed itself most deeply on certain innocent English critics, is the strict propriety of the aims which the League have set before themselves. Mr. PARNELL has been complimented on "re-entering" the paths of loyalty; and in terms which really almost seem to imply that his eulogists had been looking for another No Rent Manifesto, or had expected him to put into a document intended largely for English readers the same sort of language of which Mr. O'BRIEN delivers himself on the eve and the scene of an Irish eviction. It is, of course, quite unnecessary to spend much time over the precise wording of the Rules and Regulations of the "New Irish Defence League"; and it is most foolish to enlarge admiringly on the fact that the agrarian struggle in Ireland, if it be actually and exclusively fought out on the tenant's side upon the lines of this programme, will actually for the first time assimilate itself to the orderly and lawful process of a strike of English workmen. Of course it will—if it be actually and exclusively fought out on the lines in question. But who believes that it is going to be? Or who can believe this without also believing (which, of course, may possibly be the case) that the campaign against landlordism is about to be dropped altogether, and that the programme is only designed to put a good face on the retreat? One thing we may regard as absolutely certain, that if Mr. O'BRIEN and his friends do really intend to continue the prosecution of that campaign in earnest, they will not confine themselves within the limits of the programme. They will not confine themselves to advising tenants threatened with eviction, and assisting tenants who have already been evicted. They will, as before, encourage tenants to resist eviction, and they will do their utmost to get up eviction "scenes." If they do not do this, it will simply mean, as we have said, that the campaign is no longer to be prosecuted in earnest, but that the engineers of the movement see their way to making use of it as a pretext for raising the wind. The money that they can collect from the tenants for this purpose will come in very usefully for political objects, and it may be these objects which Mr. PARNELL, who has long ceased his direct connexion with agrarian agitation, has in view.

THE MODERN VOTER.

WE are not particularly enamoured of the Tithe Bill which Ministers have introduced and on which they seem to be strangely set; although, as we pointed out last week, the opposition to it commends itself to us even less than the Bill. It is, by confession of its champions, a small and partial measure, and it is by no means certain that it will not tend to stamp in and aggravate the perfectly erroneous impression, so long traded on by demagogues and Dissenters, that the occupier and not the owner pays tithe. The facts, of course, are entirely the other way; the real state of the case being that the owner of land not tithe-free is really the owner of but nine-tenths of his nominal estate, and that the tenant has in reality two landlords, to one of whom he pays nine-tenths and the other the remaining tenth of the sum due from him. If the subject is meddled with at all, the commutation and redemption of tithe, once for all, would seem to be the best plan.

But the action of Mr. W. T. TWIDELL, of Mays Farm, Wallingford, which has given great joy to some Liberationists, has a bearing which is far more extensive and important than its bearing on this mere question of tithes. Mr. TWIDELL, it seems, wrote to Mr. PARKER, the member for his division of Oxfordshire, informing him that he personally should at the next election "use whatever influence he possesses in the district against any candidate who may have supported such a one-sided measure without taking into consideration the question of the re-settlement of the tithe, and also the redemption of the same." The rest of the correspondence affects the matter hardly at all. Mr. PARKER was probably right in pointing out that the tithe-payer as such—that is to say, the man who pays his just debts, and not the man who refuses to pay them—will be no worse off. The interesting thing is that Mr. TWIDELL thinks that he will—thinks also that, instead of being worse off, he ought to be better, and tells Mr. PARKER, in effect, that he, Mr. TWIDELL, will vote against him, Mr. PARKER, and make others so vote, if Mr. PARKER does not oblige with his vote in Parliament. There is, of course, nothing new in this; it is what is done by almost all classes of voters, and it constitutes the main difficulty in the way of honest and independent discharge of the duties of a member of Parliament. But it is very seldom that the threat is made in such a naïve and open fashion. It is, in fact, no doubt quite as much a breach of the trust imposed by the possession of a vote to use it, as many faddists do, for furthering their fads. But they have at least a specious pretext (with which they duly cover themselves) of believing that these fads are for the national benefit. The temperance faddist says that he believes, and in some cases of abnormal folly perhaps does believe, that England will never be merry England till it is impossible for a thirsty man to get a glass of beer. The faddist in loathsome diseases in the same way believes, or pretends to believe, that something dreadful will happen to "the conscience of the country" if some thousands of reckless boys are not permitted to ruin their own health and that of generations unborn by contracting easily preventible maladies. Even the Home Ruler can sometimes disclaim any personal interest in Home Rule. But Mr. TWIDELL, though he pays to virtue the homage of talking about "the interests of British agriculture," has the merit of quite openly and honestly regarding his influence, including apparently his vote, as an engine by which he can secure the payment of less money to the tithe-owner and the retention of more by the tithe-payer. Even he, perhaps, does not see that his actual words and his threatened action mean this, and nothing else—that he wants to pay, say, twenty pounds instead of twenty-five, and is afraid of being made to pay twenty-five pounds instead of twenty. And if any one were to say to him—This is exactly the same as if you said to Mr. PARKER "Give me a five-pound note, or I will use my influence against you," Mr. TWIDELL would, no doubt, be intensely and sincerely indignant. If Mr. PARKER in his turn offered him the five-pound note, Mr. TWIDELL would doubtless, if he wears the top-boots of a British farmer, apply those articles to his respected member's person. Yet, if Mr. TWIDELL or any one else can tell us the difference between the two things, we shall be most heartily obliged.

"THE MYSTERIOUS ALBUM": IN ONE VOLUME.

A "COMMEMORATIVE ALBUM" is a gift with which even the oldest and grandest of grand old statesmen is not presented every day; and, when the donors of that gift are the great undivided and fragmentary Liberal party, it is natural that they should wish to show that, like TODGERSES, "they can do it when they choose, mind that." But just as the glories of the Shield of ACHILLES were eclipsed by the verse of the poet who sang of them, so the wonders of the Commemorative Album seem tame and commonplace beside the marvellous piece of prose in which they have been celebrated by the descriptive reporter of the Daily News. The first page of the Album, says this inspired writer, is "a general rehearsal, by the medium of a scroll taking the form of a capital G, of the works in which Mr. GLADSTONE, the foremost statesman of the age, has taken part." That, it will be admitted, is pretty good for a first page. Not content with being "a general rehearsal" simpliciter, it has aspired, and successfully aspired, to the even more difficult function of being "a general rehearsal by the medium of a scroll." And this is how the scroll, or the general rehearsal—it is not clear which—proceeds to conduct itself. In the first place, it sets up "a parent stem," around which wreaths "give the names of the distinguished couple for whom this work of art has been made ready." Then leaves sprout from this parent stem, and lo! "on the midrib of the leaves of the scroll" are found "reminders of the Income-tax, Budget, and Succession Duties Act." Having dwelt awhile on the tender recollections which these names inspire, we follow the midrib further; but it has little more to remind us of, for "at Free-trade this particular branch stops." Another, however, "tends in a different direction, arriving at the Oxford University Act (with the Arms of Oxford), and the French Treaty (with the Lion and Eagle)." This branch, however, of the leaves of the scroll is a better stayer than the midrib of the general rehearsal. It takes us to "the Abolition of the Paper-duties (symbolized by the People's Edition of Sir WALTER SCOTT, Mr. GLADSTONE's favourite author), the Ballot Act, Abolition of Purchase, Alabama Arbitration (with a ship symbolical of that notorious ocean incendiary), Educational Agricultural Holdings, Employers' Liability, Corrupt Practices (introducing the famous axe), and Franchise Acts." There is plenty for the subscribers' money here, and those who have done admiring the "Educational Agricultural Holdings," and that notorious ocean incendiary the Alabama Arbitration, will find fresh scope for their faculty of wonder in the introduction of the famous Corrupt Practices axe.

The second page of the Commemorative Album is a more excellent song than the first. Here "Home Rule is accentuated by the Irish Harp, crowned with her cap of Liberty." This accent, which is also a "symbolic scroll," starts "with the tender green of youth"—emblematic, perhaps, of the infant sprouts of Separatist conviction which began to "push" in Gladstonian breasts when their leader found salvation—"and proceeds onward through a gradation of colour to the rich russet of autumn." The next page presents "a fine drawing of Hawarden Castle, with a good deal of young bracken in the foreground"; and the artist who has taken possession of the next has managed to indicate, by "delightful allegory, the debt laid upon Mr. GLADSTONE by the study of HOMER and DANTE, and the manner in which some portion of the debt has been paid by his exertions on behalf of modern Greece and Italy." This delightful allegory, which, in less imaginative hands (the writer's style is catching), might perhaps have taken the shape of an illuminated I.O.U., accompanied by a decorative receipt on account, consists of "emblematic figures," "surrounded by a vast amount of miniature detail that makes one think of an old Italian missal." But it is unquestionably page 5 which deserves, as this poet would say, to be crowned with the cake. It contains a "series of sketches illustrating the distresses of Ireland"—not those represented in the eighty odd portraits which appeared in the illustrated papers at the opening of the PARNELL Commission, but others alleged to be even more baneful. "In the upper part of the design is a figure of the right hon. gentleman as St. GEORGE fighting the ugly dragon of Oppression with the axe of Home Rule. Every coil of the reptile's body"—let the reader prepare himself—"reveals a fact"; and these facts are "Tyranny, Rack-rents, Evictions, Battering-rams, Bayonets, Castle Government, Coercion, Police Brutality, Prosecutions, Prisons." In the grip of this ideal, and at the same time matter-of-fact, dragon, "Erin, green-robed, writhes in her agony, stretching out her arms in supplication to her defender." On the right and left, "figures of Irish peasants support a shields," recording the dates of beneficent Gladstonian measures, while at the bottom England and Ireland clasp hands, while a "red-capped god of love" makes the union of hands also a union of hearts. And here we will leave them. Words would spoil the image. Let us muse in silence on the green-robed Erin, and Mr. GLADSTONE at war with facts, on CUPID in a Phrygian cap, and the Irish peasant supporting a shields. But we should like to tell that dragon, with his coils of "facts," that, much as he may pride himself on their involutions, the right hon. St. GEORGE could teach him a thing or two in the art of twisting them.

SUNDAY TRAINS.

EVEN when one is opposing nonsense it is advisable to be discreet in using it oneself, though occasionally it has a solid value. All that was said by the shareholders who attended the meeting of the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway on Wednesday for the purpose of voting against Mr. ALLEN did not justify its utterance. Mr. ALLEN did an unwise thing when he tried to stop Sunday excursion trains. He supported his unwise motion by many foolish remarks, and when he went on to speculate as to the death-bed thoughts of the Chairman, he became distinctly offensive in the greasy way characteristic of some religious people. Still it was no answer to his folly to shout "Shut up!" "That's enough! we thought so!" (an inane remark at all times), and so forth. Neither do we see much point in the criticism that only about 1,300 out of some 10,000 servants are engaged in Sunday work; for, if the thing is wrong in itself, it is as wrong for one as for 10,000. When also the Company gravely announces that not for 60,000*l.* a year would it employ its men on Sunday if it really believed the work was bad for their brains and nerves, the tongue of the sceptical hearer is almost irresistibly impelled to nestle in his cheek. The hands of the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway are well treated, no doubt—partly because the Directors, like most English gentlemen, are not fiends, but much more because there are judges scattered up and down the country, and because good railway servants are not so easy to get but that they can make terms for themselves. Those of Mr. ALLEN's hearers who talked about men worshipping God in the green fields, or swarming into pot-houses if they were not allowed to go in excursion trains, descended to his own intellectual level. A man does not go for a day's outing in order to pray, and a painful experience has taught that there is no natural incompatibility between the excursionist and the pothouse.

The one solid reason why Sunday travelling should not be put a stop to is that a great many persons wish to travel on a Sunday. They go for various reasons—some from necessity, others for business, others to church (in the neighbourhood of London very commonly), others, again, because they want a walk or a pull on the river. There are people who hold that none of these reasons justify the use of a train on a Sunday. It is an opinion like another. For the present it does not happen to be the opinion of the majority, that is all. The common illogical kind of Sabbatarian holds that some form of conveyance may be used, but not others; some form of exercise taken, but not others. With him or her it is idle to argue. The only judicious course is to abstain from discussion, and be tender of his or her prejudices whenever they do not impose excessive annoyance on yourself. The use of Sunday excursion trains is due to the fact (which we now reveal for the first time) that many people who like to have a day in the country cannot conveniently go on any other. As they have not yet been persuaded that the act is sinful, or have even thoughtlessly stopped short at the consideration that it is pleasant, they go on doing it. As long as they remain of this mind, the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway may be expected to serve them, since, in fact, it is a common carrier and not a censor of morals. We have not yet heard that Mr. ALLEN wants to stop the omnibuses on a Sunday; and we fail to see what moral difference there is between taking a 'bus to Barnes and walking to Richmond, or taking a train to Brighton and walking on the Downs. One argument there is for stopping Sunday excursion trains which has a certain force. It is based on the annoyance felt by those who live in the train's place of destination when they are invaded by a crowd of town people, generally depressed, sometimes noisy, and occasionally drunken. But we cannot recommend the argument for common use. It sounds ill in these days: and, after all, our fellow-subjects may be depressed if they like; it is idle to hope that some of them will ever give up being noisy; and, as long as they do not commit assault and battery, it does not greatly signify if they are drunk. The remedy is to take a train out, or a boat, when they are expected. There is small fear that the ordinary excursionist will wander far from the neighbourhood of his provisions.

THE BISHOP OF LINCOLN'S CASE.

IT is to be hoped that few people will be tempted (though the temptation is rather in the way of the average Englishman dealing with what he does not understand) to see in the proceedings which during the present week have occupied the curiously constituted Court that is trying Bishop KING anything like an attempt to evade the issue. Those modest persons who are content with authority may perhaps be satisfied with the announcement that the Bishop of SALISBURY (than whom no member of the Court is better qualified, and only one qualified as well) approved the contention of Sir WALTER PHILLIMORE that a bishop officiating in his own diocese is not merely a "minister" under the terms of various Acts. Moreover, it is to be remembered that the prosecution itself relies wholly and solely on mauvaises chicanes. It would appear that the ARCHBISHOP, "inaugurating" (as they say now) a new procedure for what is practically a new Court, is going to depend chiefly on common sense. That may or may not be a dangerous innovation; but it is hardly the Church Association which has most reason to rejoice at it. It is not common sense which in recent times has decreed that "shall be retained, and be in use," means "shall not be retained, and if used shall impose imprisonment and other penalties on the user," or which declares that when a man speaks of "side" he means "end." When prosecutors indulge in quilllets of the law after this fashion, it is more than permissible to meet them with their own weapons; but the end of these things will not be yet.

If it were possible to hope for any eirenicon in a matter where there is much of the densest stupidity on one side, and we fear we must say no small amount of feather-headedness on the other, some opportunity might be given by a letter from (quod minime reris, to complete a quotation of his own) the Dean of PETERBOROUGH to the Guardian of this week. Dr. PEROWNE has undoubtedly proposed the best modus vivendi that has yet been thought of, or rather has put into definite form the practice or the aspiration of the most intelligent Churchmen, by his suggestion that the Ornaments Rubric shall be formally admitted by Convocation (and, we suppose, by Parliament) as a permissible maximum of ritual, it being, with equal formality, understood (it will have to be formulated too) that surplice, hood, and stole shall be a permissible minimum. This is so entirely in the spirit of the Church of England, and so entirely in unison with the practice of her best sons, that it is impossible to imagine any objection to it that is worth taking into consideration. Such objections, indeed, can only come from three classes of persons, no one of which has a real locus standi in the joint forum of intellect and conscience. There may be "Ritualists" who are not satisfied with the Ornaments Rubric, and who wish for "fancy franchises" in ritual of this and that origin. If there be such, they may be abandoned by any intelligent Churchman to the tender mercies of Lord GRIMTHORPE—which are cruel. There may be some who, as it has been suggested, would fain compel every incumbent of a Simeon Trustees' living to wear a chasuble—in which case they are guilty of exactly the same fault which is now chargeable on their adversaries. There are unluckily and notoriously many—the Church Association being their mouthpiece—who, from a combination of ignorance, fanaticism, and folly, will object to, will certainly object to, the enlargement of the maximum, just as we have admitted that some will possibly object to the contraction of the minimum. But the proposed arrangement would at once meet the view of the highest Churchman and of the lowest Churchman who is in each case a rational being, with a knowledge of history, a sense of loyalty to the Church, and a desire for liberty of conscience and not liberty of persecution. If objection to it comes from any quarter, it will probably come from that quarter which knows that its own pretensions, unless sustained by common informers and legal quibbles, must decrease and be destroyed. It is not there that Churchmen, in the proper sense of the word, are to be found, any more than they are to be found in the other quarter which demands license to indulge in a pseudo-Catholic will-worship according to each man's fancy.

PROVIDENT SOCIETIES.

WHEN, in the course of the brief conversation on Mr. BRADLAUGH's motion last Tuesday for a Committee of inquiry into the management of Friendly Societies, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER expressed his hope that "there would be no panic on this important point," he indicated a real and serious danger. For there is undoubtedly some risk of a panic, and it is beyond all question that a panic would do great mischief. Since the failure of the Cardiff Bank there has been a series of scandals of the same kind, ending in the business of the Yorkshire Provident Insurance Company, which has just been brought before the House. As it has been handed over to the Public Prosecutor it is not a fit subject for comment. But even without this one example there is evidence enough to show that these Building, Friendly, and Provident Societies, established to promote thrift, are particularly liable to suffer from fraud and mismanagement. Many were set up under charitable amateur guidance, and what that means when the first flash of enthusiasm is over we know from the history of the Cardiff Bank.

Undoubtedly there is enough known to make a panic possible, and even excusable. It is also undeniable that Parliament has to some extent made itself responsible for these concerns by special legislation and encouragement. For that reason, if for no other, it would only be doing its duty by taking further steps to see that they are kept solvent by honest and intelligent management. It would even do good service by saving small investors from still worse loss by proving that these enterprises are doomed to failure by the conditions of business, if that is the disagreeable truth. At the same time, the case requires wary going, as Mr. GOSCHEN reminded Mr. BRADLAUGH. Well-intentioned haste might only aggravate the mischief. The appointment of a Committee on Provident Insurance Societies might only bring on a panic, in which quite solvent concerns might be ruined. Mr. BRADLAUGH cannot want such a thing to happen. The course which the Ministry has decided to take is probably the wisest it could have selected. Legal proceedings will be taken in one flagrant case, and Government will wait for the report of the Committee on Friendly Societies before going further. In the meantime it will listen to whatever

Mr. BRADLAUGH has to say. By following this course it will avoid the danger of promoting panic and will not stop inquiry. It is at least fair to refuse to take it for granted that the Provident Insurance Societies deserve all the severe things said of them by the member for Northampton. Sooner or later, however, whether in consequence of the Report by the Committee already sitting or on some other impulse, by this Ministry or another, the whole question of people's savings banks and other institutions for the promotion of thrift will require to be overhauled. It is only too certain that a great many of them, whether founded with charitable intentions and allowed to drift into the hands of scamps, or started by volunteers with no sufficient knowledge, or set going by astute persons with more knowledge of a certain kind than is good for their clients, are in a bad financial condition. There seems to be too much reason to believe that others which may not be unsound make mean profits by trading on the ignorance of their clients. The existence of such bodies is no benefit to the country in any way, and assuredly does no good to the cause of thrift. Mr. BRADLAUGH was quite justified in pointing out that the ordinary legal remedies are in most of these cases rendered illusory by the ignorance and poverty of the victims. But this consideration does not make the course of the Ministry any the smoother. It cannot well propose to make all provident insurance for the poor Government concerns, and yet it is responsible for them as it is not for ordinary banking. If Mr. GOSCHEN gives his mind to the question in the recess, he may find in it the materials for a financial measure not less important than his Budgets. Not the worst result of the fears and inquiries would be the extension in England of People's Banks on the SCHULZE-DELITZSCH system which are now being recommended. They at least have been tried and have stood the test.

BOULANGISM.

BOULANGISM, so the Correspondents write, was denounced here and also there this week. Several parts of France had the advantage of hearing the sinful thing told its fact. This piece of information may be believed on evidence less good than the word of English newspaper Correspondents. Denunciations of Boulangism are likely to be stock incidents in the French political comedy for some months to come—possibly for some years. For the present it will be denounced in more ways than one. The speechmaking way is not the only resource of the General's enemies for the present. It is not, however, to be neglected, and so, while taking active measures of another description, MM. ROUVIER and FLOQUET have begun, the first at Grasse, near Cannes, and the second in the Aisne, to explain to the electors what Boulangism is, and what a fatal mistake they will make if they vote for it. There is, we presume, no particular need to repeat the opinions of these gentlemen as to the merits of Boulangism. All the world is by this time familiar with the truth that a movement which can only succeed by obtaining the support of a majority of voters is an outrage on free institutions. Neither do we learn for the first time that Boulangism, being interpreted, means Caesarism, and its inevitable result disastrous war. The efficacy of these two arguments will depend on whether the peasantry have or have not come to the conclusion that some form of Caesarism, as the Parliamentary Republicans call it, would not be preferable to prolonged maladministration by Parliamentary persons working with the Radical goad in their backs. Everything will depend on the peasantry, and nobody can tell how they will decide. What evidence there is goes to show that not a few of them, at least, are thoroughly disgusted with such government as they have had of late years, and are inclined to believe that any change would be a change for the better. They may learn, too, if they did not know it before, from his speech that M. FLOQUET is as much in favour of a policy of adventure as the brave General himself. He began by arguing that Revision was needed, just as the common Boulangist does. It is possible that those by whose authority the Revision will at least nominally be made may not think it necessary that the general overturn should be conducted exactly on the lines approved by M. FLOQUET.

Methods of denunciation other than speeches, and more immediately effective, are not wanting. Government can dismiss officials whose cards and letters of congratulation have been found in the Boulangist archives seized by the police. The ultimate effect of this measure, vigorous as it looks, will depend on several considerations. It is beyond question that Government officials who lend active electioneering help or give information to political enemies of their chiefs must expect to be dismissed when detected. No doubt also, if there is a Civil servant in France who was so foolish as to send a letter to the brave General beginning with the words "Ave CÆSAR, Imperator!" the Minister may be excused for proving to him that he might as well have added the remainder of the tag—in an official sense. But it is not proved as yet that all the purged Government clerks were guilty of such plain misconduct or folly as this. We have yet to learn the date of their letters of congratulation, and on that a good deal depends. If, for instance, they were written when the General had just been appointed to the Clermont-Ferrand command, in what sense can they be said to constitute an offence? The question will be still more pertinent if any of them are found to be dated during the period in which the Radical leaders were themselves the General's friends. Moreover, there is this inconvenience in these "epurations," that it is notoriously so difficult to stop them. When a feast of this kind is on the board, the appetite of a Government's unofficial supporters is apt to come with eating. The purge which began by being a disciplinary measure may, under pressure from volunteer advisers, be the means of giving the sorely tried administrative machinery of France yet another shock. Fresh indictments keep pace with epurations, and M. QUESNAY DE BEAUREPAIRE is as busy as ever in the preparation of further charges of peculation. This, again, is an effective method of denunciation up to a certain point, and in favourable circumstances. It will do if there are good proofs at the back of it, and if they are promptly produced. It will serve without proofs if there is a strong predisposition to believe M. QUESNAY DE BEAUREPAIRE. Of the existence of this disposition there is, however, no evidence, and beyond all doubt the Ministry has shown no great haste in bringing its accusation to the test in court. The General, as a matter of course, defends himself with his usual weapons, which are counter-charges and candidatures. To the Procureur-General, who brings sweeping charges, he answers sweepingly that the said Procureur is a pitiful rogue, and that his employers are even as he. It has been complained that the General has not answered the charges of peculation in detail; but as yet they are not themselves supported by evidence, and deserve no more than a round denial. To judge from the line taken by the Boulangist press, it would appear that the only charge the party is afraid of is that one which accuses the General of misuse of the treasury of the War Office. They explain that he only used his official discretion in spending the fund for public purposes. It will, of course, be the duty of M. QUESNAY DE BEAUREPAIRE to prove that he did not use his discretion, but did make a definite misuse of the nation's money. When the evidence appears we shall know which side is right. As for that part of the General's defence which consists of candidature for eighty seats in the Departmental Councils, it is easy to show how absurd it is. If he wishes to test his popularity fairly, he should stand for eighty seats taken at random, and not for just the four-score which he can pick with confidence. His election will prove nothing, though his defeat would be a bad sign for him. But to all these criticisms it is enough to answer that the General's popularity is not a matter of reason and logic, but of passion and semi-rebellion. It has answered well with him to be elected, re-elected, and elected yet again already, and he may well conclude that it will continue to serve him. His return will make a demonstration, which is precisely what he wants.

The time is at hand when the issue must be tried. Within three months at the furthest, perhaps within a few weeks, we shall know whether France has elected for another adventure or for a continuance of the late and present welter. There is also this subdivision of the main question—if the decision is for the adventure, will it be the Radical or the Boulangist one—the Revision according to M. FLOQUET or the Revision according to M. BOULANGER? In either case the outlook is utterly uncertain and the alternative is dismal. One piece of evidence there is to indicate, if not how the election will go, at least in what spirit it will be conducted. In every part of France Royalist opposition candidates are retiring in favour of Boulangists and Bonapartists. They show that they think themselves bound by the terms of the alliance arranged by Baron MACKAU to give way wherever they are not already in possession—and sometimes even when they are apparently. This abnegation and self-sacrifice, as it is called, in the somewhat inflated style of French political discussion, is a matter of lamentation to the Gazette de France, and a text for many taunts in the Republican press. If the Royalists answer quite frankly, they will probably tell the Gazette de France that the severe regard for principles, consistency, and character which it recommends is very pretty, no doubt, on paper, but that in practice it has spelt impotence for the Royalists for a half-century, and that they are tired of impotence. They can only make their influence felt in politics by holding a candle to the Boulangist devil or the Radical; and of the two they prefer the first. To the Republicans they answer that, when a dog has to be beaten, and there is only one available stick, it must be bought at the market price. They want to beat the Republican dog, and will pay whatever is asked for the Boulangist stick. To jeer at this line of conduct is easy, but futile; for, if the course of the Royalists is not heroic or dignified, at least it is business. It means that all sections of the Opposition intend to “go in solid for le brav’ Général,” and that, again, may well mean a bad beating or very narrow majority for the Republicans. For the rest, this eclipse of the Royalists is eminently characteristic of French politics. In all countries, when the fight becomes hot, respectable people are apt to fall a little behind your root-and-branch men—the fanatic who goes in head down, or the reckless and too often blasphemous fellow who goes in for the fun and the purse. But in no country in the world is the respectable man so summarily pushed aside by this well-matched couple as in France. The Royalists are intensely respectable, and so, of course, they give way.

THE ROYAL GRANTS DEBATE.

IT is impossible not to condole with Mr. LABOUCHERE—and to congratulate ourselves—on the hard fate which has given him a coadjutor in Mr. STOREY. Had his evil genius personally interested himself in the selection of a seconder for the motion of the member for Northampton last Thursday night, he could not possibly have found one better fitted to expose the pretentious hollowness of the cause which the leader of the Radical party, as we suppose, has made his own, or to place the motives which actuate the opponents of the Royal Grants in a more odious and contemptible light. For Mr. STOREY is simply the caricature of Mr. LABOUCHERE in his serious—that is to say, in his most effectively caricaturable—mood. In his lighter and more humorous moments Mr. LABOUCHERE is not easily imitable, and by Mr. STOREY he is not imitable at all. But these moments unfortunately become every Session fewer and further between; and whereas even his assumptions of gravity are redeemed from the utterly absurd by a certain air of latent cynicism, as of a man who sees through his own affectations even when they deceive other people, this is precisely the characteristic in his leader which a man like Mr. STOREY is hopelessly incapable of catching. His performance of last Thursday night—which, for bad taste, vulgarity, pomposity, and inflated self-conceit has eclipsed any previous exploit on the Radical benches—was one on which every sensible supporter of the Monarchy has the best reason to congratulate himself. A few more such speeches as that of Mr. STOREY, and many a Radical, who can still lay claim to that character of “English gentleman” on which Mr. STOREY descanted with such strange irrelevance, will be ashamed to remain associated with a party which can apparently find no better representative.

Mr. GLADSTONE, replying to Mr. LABOUCHERE and Mr. STOREY, was a curious and, for one reason, at any rate, an irritating sight. It is many years, alas! since he has delivered any speech so well worthy in tone and spirit, no less than in substance, of his early reputation; and we confess that, as we so rarely nowadays get the benefit of his oratorical powers, we could have wished that they had been employed against adversaries of more importance. On the bare point in dispute his tone was, of course, anticipated. He had no difficulty in showing, against the insinuations of Mr. MORLEY, backed by the highly imaginative arithmetic of Mr. STOREY, that, “compact” and arrangement apart, there is no solid ground whatever for the assumption that HER MAJESTY is pecuniarily in a position to provide, not only for that numerous and still increasing body of grandchildren out of the direct line of succession for whom she has undertaken to provide, but for the children of the Heir-Apparent as well. And it was as obvious to anticipate the stress which Mr. GLADSTONE laid on the eminently favourable terms which Parliament obtain through HER MAJESTY’S express renunciation of all future claims in respect of the first-mentioned class of her descendants. What made Mr. GLADSTONE’S speech valuable was not only his specific arguments, which could be easily foreseen, but his general exposition of the principles which govern the dealings of Parliament with the Crown—an exposition which was as sound and sagacious in substance as it was admirably expressed. And what made the subsequent debate interesting was the speech in which Mr. MORLEY set himself to explain—what, perhaps, he will more fully elucidate next Monday—the causes of his separating himself from his leader at the final stage of the proceedings of the Committee. We will say no more at present on that point than this, that possibly Mr. MORLEY may succeed on Monday. What Mr. GLADSTONE had said on the subject before his lieutenant rose was perfectly plain and intelligible. He had wished for a certain form of declaration as to the right of the Crown in the matter of grants; the Committee adopted another form, which Mr. GLADSTONE rejected, and still rejects. But he is of opinion, as with perfect consistency he may be, that all the practical objects which he sought to secure by the form of declaration which he proposed are, in fact, assured to Parliament and the country by the terms of HER MAJESTY’S waiver of her rights. That being so, Mr. GLADSTONE is naturally an assentient to the Report. For Mr. MORLEY to justify his own dissent he has to show that this view of Mr. GLADSTONE’S is unsound; and on Thursday night he endeavoured to do so. He may, as we have said, succeed on Monday.

AMONG THE BADAWIN.

MANY years ago, about the time that Sheikh Farhān was made a Pasha by the Osmanlis, he built himself a fort of stone on the summit of the great mound of Kalāat Sherghāt, which towers over the west bank of the Tigris about half-way between Nineveh and Baghdad. He laid the foundations of his square enclosure with many a strangely-sculptured block dug out of the ruins of old Ashur; there, perched on the massive terrace of brick that had weathered the storms of thirty centuries, the little, wiry, insignificant-looking Arab tried hard to wear his honours with becoming dignity; but the blood of Ishmael was in his veins, and the spell of the boundless desert was in his heart, so he soon gave back his fort of stone to the ancient desolation, and betook himself again to his black hair tent where he had been a free desert-born chief before the Turks tried to make him a Pasha and a tool. Some years ago, when the fertile plain between the Tigris and the bluffs, just below Sherghāt, was black with the tents of his tribe, he had bidden the traveller welcome and had pledged himself, Arab fashion, to a lasting friendship. But now the great plain was silent and desolate, and the tribe had struck their tents and moved away into the distant Sinjar.

Suddenly, four Arabs came swiftly dashing through the scrub, brandishing their spears and making a great display of horsemanship—your true Arab is the vainest fellow on horseback—and the leader, after many salutations, proceeded to demand toll in Farhān’s name. They were nothing loth to comply with a very humbly expressed request that they would first visit a large encampment of Jabburs hard by. Once among the friendly Jabburs, their rollicking swagger sadly fell off when they found themselves the victims of a misplaced confidence, and knew that Farhān was likely to hear of this abuse of his name and fame. The Jabbur Sheikh swore roundly at them for villains and robbers—when they were gone. There is this to be said for the Arabs; when their little schemes go wrong they never sulk. The Shammars went off as empty-handed as they came, and apparently as light-hearted, quite restored to cheerfulness by the promise that Farhān should not be told of their little game.

A ride northwards over the great Mesopotamian plains followed, and eight days later Nineveh and the Tigris lay behind. The Sinjar range towers in front, and the green and trackless desert round its base is the summer home of the dreaded Shammars; no fellah dare scratch the soil and no mukāri graze his beast within its limits except by sufferance and after due acknowledgment paid to the sons of the desert. The day before the camp had been at Hugna. Weary with the long night march, painfully struggling with the drowsiness that made the sky and the desert close in and press like a heavy pall over body and soul and spirit, until the burden of the whole dim universe seemed to be crushing one into unconsciousness and darkness, the travellers saw at last the great mounds looming across the grey desert; and, just as the rising sun behind touched their summits, rode through the low, black tents in the hollow at their feet, where some twenty or thirty families of nondescript Philistines—half Arab, half Kurd—live by the contemptuous sufferance of the rightful lords of the soil, and scratch a bare subsistence out of the ground on the very last verge of cultivation by the shore of the great desert of Jazirah. Men and women are abject, uncouth, and the most arrant thieves. Ali went foraging for supplies, and was soon heard lifting his voice in bitter taunts and reproaches on themselves and their families to the third and fourth generation, and eventually returned with a scanty supply of watery leben and the remark that he had unwittingly strayed into the rankest corner of Jahannum. He took counsel with the mukāri, and for the remainder of the day woe betide the unlucky wight whose predatory instincts brought him prowling round the camp. "See, this noble merchant of scarified leben approaches. Hullo, my noble friend with the camel's nose, has your excellency come to thrust the said ornament of your most villanous countenance into every dog's platter?"

Later in the afternoon Ali sat beside his master on the blackened ground by the "Sheikh's" fire of camel-dung and passed round his master's coffee and tobacco in a more condescending mood. It was found that the poor fellows had refrained from the rites of hospitality literally because they had nothing to offer. The Shammars were in the habit of paying sudden visits to "collect the rent," in the shape of anything eatable or portable that appeared worth the taking; and, being so neighbourly disposed, objected to their friends striking camp for the present. Ali and the muleteer shuddered, and, in the presence of a common danger, quite relented towards these simple folk. A passing gleam or ghost of a smile flitted across the Sheikh's gaunt and haggard face when he told them that he would charge himself with the duty of sending the most gratifying accounts of their courage and generosity to their sorrowing friends in Baghdad should the Shammars devour them and the deserts yield them up no more.

The next morning found the party descending the rolling downs to the level of a flat and boundless plain. One object alone broke the level monotony. Far away through the misty shimmer Tel Hawwa rose out of the flat—a solitary, cone-shaped mound; and the little cluster of black spots at its base were the tents of the Shammars Badawin. At last we were among the true-blooded sons of the deserts. Already the slopes of the low foot-hills at the base of the Sinjar range to the left were black with droves of grazing camels; five thousand was the lowest computation made of their numbers, which was afterwards found to be within the mark. A little company of Arab men and boys rose in startled surprise at the apparition of an Englishman coming suddenly into view on the crest of a low mound. The men seized their spears, and the lads armed themselves with a supply of the loose stones lying round, and advanced with threatening gesture, vociferating loudly. Just at that moment Ali dashed up, calling out, "Sadik, Sadik!" ("A friend, a friend!"); but the youngsters held their stones in readiness, and the men looked on uncertain. Ali's voluble expostulations brought out the reason of this sudden amaze. The Beg's eyes shone with terrible glare, like the eyes of a spectral jinn, and the sudden apparition struck a chill into their livers. "He has shining things like Turkish liras in his eyes," said one youngster; and the Beg's eyes twinkled merrily through his gold-rimmed spectacles, and brought out a broad grin on the faces of the abashed Arabs. From them it was learned that Farhān was away on some marauding expedition, and the encampment ahead was in charge of Sheikh Madjwal, his eldest son. A double disappointment, as the travellers should miss Farhān's cheery greeting, and were not at all sure what sort of reception they should meet with from the morose and capricious Madjwal. It is curious to see how the sins of the fathers are visited upon the children among these Ishmaelites, whose hand is against every man and every man's hand against them. When Farhān was but a youth his father's tyranny had driven a large part of the tribe into open revolt. They chose one of Farhān's blood for Sheikh, and Farhān joined him against his own father. For years the tribal feud went on; small mercy was given or expected on either side. At last the hereditary instinct of the tribal Arab and the right of birth of the old Sheikh prevailed; the rebel Sheikh became a proscribed fugitive, with a price set upon his head. Farhān, out of sheer Badawin obstinacy, stuck to the fugitive, and the old man saw in his son's faithfulness his own opportunity. Negotiations were opened, and Farhān was persuaded to bring in his friend on his father's safe-conduct. No sooner was Farhān admitted into his father's tent, leading the now humbled rebel Sheikh by the hand, than the old man rose, and with one thrust of his heavy spear laid his fallen foe dead at his feet. Farhān cursed his father for this cruel wrong done to the honour of his tribe and of himself, and never after, till the old man's death, would he own him as father of his. Now Farhān is chief; and his own eldest son Madjwal is a thorn in his eyes and like smoke in his nostrils. Farhān, in spite of his empty title of Pasha, which has cost him dear, is still a rich man, and the vice of old age—avarice—has him in its grasp. Madjwal, even in the presence of the elders of the tribe, has more than once drawn his sword on his father in furious rage, demanding money—more money—and has gone away at last unsatisfied, muttering threats which have frozen the old man's heart as he remembers the old bad days of his own youth. There have been whispers, too, of intrigues and abominations connected with Farhān's hareem that have given Madjwal a bad name in the tribe. He is dreaded and disliked, and bad days are in store for the tribe when Farhān's controlling hand and dauntless heart shall be still. Madjwal has a young hopeful of his own, who is more than likely to keep up on his own account the traditions of the family.

As one toils wearily over the slimy plain—there had been rain, and the black and sodden soil was of the consistency of glue, filthy, malodorous, and sticky—Tel Hawwa is reached at last. The first thing to be done is to visit Madjwal in his tent. Some Badawin women filling skins at the scanty pool of green and stagnant water, unveiled, unabashed, and uncomely, pointed out the tent at the rear of the encampment, conspicuous for its size.

The Badawin tents lay widely scattered over the plain—there must have been nearly a hundred of them—and in front of every tent was a spear stuck in the ground, head upwards. Wherever a Badu alights, you may know him by his spear; his title-deed, while it stands to the strip of desert, he claims for his own. As it was in the days of Abu't Tayyib ul Mutanabbi, whose boasting verse is the delight of every true Badu, so it is now:—

And when at last we lighted, our spear we propped on high,
A sign that none our generous heart, our lofty soul, deny;
That all in Misr and Irāk and Khorasān who dwell,
May know me as the Hero, might of my prowess tell!

The sight of those spears recalled many a tale heard round desert watch-fires of the prowess of the Shammars who laughs at the matchlocks and even at the rifles of his foes. The numerous and powerful tribe of the Dthalems, half fellahs, half nomads, encroached on what the Shammars considered their territory. The Dthalems, being well armed and numerous, resolved to stand their ground. Down came the Shammars like a whirlwind—a wild, impetuous rush of mounted spearmen. The Dthalems, after an ineffectual volley, turned and fled; and when the Shammars rested from the pursuit, seven hundred Dthalems lay dead on the desert, and seven Shammars. But more terrible still in its record of overwhelming disaster and death is the fate that befell the horde of plundering Circassians which the Turks marched out of Anatolia in the days before the Russian war, and settled in the Jazirah desert, about Rās-ul-Ain, on the head-waters of the Khābour. The Shammars strongly resented this invasion of their territory; they were ever on the watch, lying in wait, and cutting off the unfortunate Circassians in detail whenever they caught them outside the walls of Rās-ul-Ain. Many of the Circassians went off to help the Turks against the Russians; and after the war the Turks, for reasons of their own (not far to seek), armed the Circassians with breechloading rifles. The consequence (probably calculated upon by the wily Osmanlis) was a pitched battle before the walls of Rās-ul-Ain. The Circassians sallied forth with their rifles to exterminate their foes. The Shammars met them on horseback, armed with the spear. For one long summer's day the Arabs wheeled and charged and wheeled again, came on with whoop and yell, to dash off again in feigned retreat, until the last cartridge of the doomed Circassians had sped its bootless errand. Then the Arabs charged home, and not one of that ill-fated band of Circassians escaped the unerring spear. The gun may miss its mark, is the boast of the true Arab, which you may hear in many a desert tent, but the spear never. Of twenty thousand Circassians, including women and children, transplanted into Arab territory, there remains to-day a miserable remnant of less than a hundred men—a gang of desperate, starving, ferocious bandits, to be heard of in the deserts north of Rās-ul-Ain.

Madjwal stood in front of his tent—a small, spare man, like his father, the deep melancholy of his sallow face, intensified by the restless, hungry expression in his deep-set eyes, that spoke the character he was reputed to bear. The silent desert, its vast and lonely solitudes, has stamped the brow of the Badawin with its own grave sadness, and few who have lived with them in their desert tents but have caught and reflected the same expression of prevailing melancholy. Out of the ring of haggard faces Madjwal gleamed a sad and transient smile of welcome; then he gravely led the way under the black awning and placed his guest on his right hand, the seat of honour being a battered camel-saddle. A crowd of dingily-clad Badawin filled the spacious tent and squatted round the fire of camels'-dung, staring solemnly at the stranger. The Sheikh courteously repeated his salutation, which each man took up, repeating in chorus, "Sabahkum Allāh bil Khair"—"Your morning may God prosper." Smoke, and discussion of war, politics, and theology followed; a negro slave, black as night, presiding at the hearth. A blue-eyed, fair-haired lad of about fifteen, Madjwal's son and heir, roamed about the tent petted by everybody. A troop of whinnying colts came sniffing about the squatting Arabs, who played with them and called them endearing names; they finally scampered off into the plain in front where the mares were quietly grazing. Presently a huge platter, heaped with somewhat mouldy dates, the whole surmounted by a handful of fresh butter, was handed out from behind the purdah that shut off the women's portion of the tent, and the invitation was given to fall to. No one who has not sat the live-long day in a Badawin tent with thirty or forty desert Arabs, with all their desert dirt and desert smells clinging to their unwashed garments, huddled together round the ashes of a smoky fire, staring with haggard eyes out of gaunt and wasted faces, and breaking forth at sudden intervals into shrill and utterly irrelevant Arabic, can realize the deadly fatigue and monotony of the whole proceedings as the day wears away—nor the wild desire to plunge into the free and open desert that spreads itself around and be at rest and at peace on its bosom once more. At last was gained the shelter and privacy of the little tent—that white speck on the grey expanse of desert is now truly home, and the Englishman's castle—and six feet of rug on the desert-floor bore the rare and priceless luxuries of fragrant tea from sultry Ind, and biscuits white and clean from dear and distant Albion; and there the voyagers at ease reclined, revelled and exulted in the glorious abandonment of a well-earned repose. But, alas! a clatter of galloping hoofs, a sudden irruption of barbarian hordes, a crowd of rudely civil Arabs filled to bursting the narrow limits of the refuge. Peace for ever fled, and with her the feast that was spread in her praise and glory and honour; for the fair-haired, blue-eyed young savage, aided and abetted by his attendants, drank the tea and ate the sugar and the biscuits. How came that strain of Saxon blood to mingle with the veins of the swarthy Semites of Arabian deserts? The desert should teach one patience, and so the compliments of a return visit being paid and graciously received, the hospitable hosts of an hour before were free to bully and cajole the confiding Englishman out of as much plunder as would pass by way of toll paid for his right of way through no man's land. But a bargain is a bargain, especially among Arabs, so preliminary negotiations ended in the offer of a few Turkish dollars to the young barbarian with blue eyes, just as a small token of intense gratification at his visit. The young savage then demanded firearms. Now no man who knows the Arabs will, if he is wise, venture himself alone into desert solitudes with these toys. If he can afford to travel, and likes to travel, with a troop of picturesque armed ruffians in his train, and feels safer that way, that is his affair. But the man who travels alone had better leave his revolver at home. It is only a temptation to the first Arab who sets eyes on it, and should he lose his nerve and "draw" on a too demonstrative Badu, the chances are that, whatever happens to the Badu, his own bones will be left bleaching on the desert. But it was vain to protest to the persistent Badawin that revolver nor gun formed part of the scanty equipment. The critical moment had come at last. Each dark face growing darker, the deep-set eyes gleaming with the rising excitement, angry and disappointed, the Arabs rose to their feet and made for the baggage. It is trying to stand by and watch a horde of rude and hungry Arabs scattering the contents of your mule-trunks over the face of the desert, and bad for the nerves to hear the wild whoop and yell that spoke the rising passion of plunder, once roused not easily quelled. There was danger in the slightest sign or betrayal of irresolution or fear. Having made an offer, the only thing was to stick to it, and put on as stern and unyielding a demeanour as circumstances would allow. Before the astonished Arabs knew what was to happen next we were galloping across the plain in the direction of the Sheikh's tent to see what Madjwal had to say to this treatment of his guests. Then there was a rush to horse; and the fleetest dashed alongside to implore and beseech, with many a protestation of remorse and shame, that they should not be handed over into Madjwal's relentless hands, and the humbled and terrified Arabs, with much abject kissing of the hand that now held the whip, vowed that the whole proceeding was a feeble joke, and vowed friendship and brotherhood—if only they might not be delivered over to Madjwal's wrath. But first Ali must give them a full quittance for every article missing from the plundered trunks, and then let them take the money refused before and go in the name of Allah.

Madjwal was seen again that night and persuaded to give one of his Arabs as a visible sign and token to all whom it may concern that the party were henceforth under his protection. And, not caring to linger in the neighbourhood, they departed from Tel Hawwa and rode five weary hours through the dark until they found another pool filled with stagnant rain-water, where they unburdened the beasts and laid themselves down on the desert for the sleep that they had lusted for. Four days the Arab guide abode with them; all the party were mounted, but this little, wiry Badu trudged along on foot, unwearied, patient, uncomplaining. When roaming bands of mounted Shammar came out of space across the desert to hail the little caravan, at sight of the guide the levelled spear was raised to the shoulder again, and the men rode up with greetings and friendly, intrusive, questionings. On the fourth day when the travellers reached the utmost border of the Shammar country they filled the faithful fellow's hands with what was left to them of their hoarded store of bread, and paid him in a coin (not a large one) of which he had never possessed the like before. He spoke his few and simple words of thanks and farewell, was bidden in Arab fashion "May God go with you," and, gathering his coarse blanket round his meagre body, he strode away into silence and solitude.

MILITARY GENIUS.

THE popular belief that great commanders, like poets, are born and not made, is one that has taken a particularly strong hold on general opinion, and, like some other similar fallacies, seems to defy the analysis of the student or historian. The very mention of war and battle, charges and sieges, has a tendency to inflame the imagination, and engenders ideas of rapidity and suddenness that are suggestive of inspiration and strokes of genius, and have little to do with methodical calculation or slowly developed combinations. Historians wishing to present their readers with vivid and striking pictures are prone to lay stress on the more brilliant features of a campaign, and in their anxiety to arrest attention unduly enhance the dramatic incidents of their story. Such terms as prescience and divination are freely used. The leader is frequently heaven-born, and his actions are often represented as having been conceived and carried out on the spur of the moment. The very vocabulary of fighting has the same ring. Squadrons are usually hurled on the enemy. He is invariably crushed (or perhaps only hammered) with artillery, if, indeed, he has not already succumbed to the storm of bullets or withering fire that has been poured upon him. The foe is too often routed. The pursuit is launched after him like a torrent, by which he is inundated, if he has not already found a watery grave by being driven into the sea in his rear, or the deep river on his flank. Even practical soldiers, who should know better, have recently indulged in such highly-coloured language as to speak of "lead being pumped" on people several thousand yards away, and "the deadly hail of the machine-gun" has figured "with damnable iteration" in recent military literature. Yet we need hardly be reminded that what seems like divination is simply the necessary outcome of a long-prepared and judiciously-conceived plan, and events come about with striking suddenness and ease just because they were calculated on and foreseen by the eye of experience or knowledge. Genius will, of course, unmistakably assert itself in overcoming the chance difficulties of the moment and in dealing with unexpected contingencies or misfortunes. But it is the greatest genius who leaves nothing, or as little as possible, to fortune, and success has usually been rendered more than probable by genius, even if chance has something to do with the final mode in which it is brought about. To no leader of men, ancient or modern, have sudden inspirations been more persistently attributed than to the great Napoleon. He is pre-eminently the heaven-born leader, and he, if any one ever was, may be credited with instinct and intuition in the realm of war. His meteor-like career dazzled and awed mankind, while his imaginative addresses and semi-prophetic words gave an additional glamour to his name. Yet it needed not, and was not due to, prescience that the sun of Austerlitz saw all he said it would. An intrepid leader who had noted and read aright the Austrian preparations, who remembered the history of Rossbach, could tolerably clearly anticipate the result of the struggle, and cast the horoscope of the morrow. As a matter of fact, Napoleon's calculations were in many instances amiss, and his genius was shown as often in remedying on the moment his own deficiencies as in detecting and utilizing those of his adversaries. His first campaign in Italy, when as a young man of only twenty-seven years of age he at once leaped into the position of the first leader in Europe, is by many considered the most brilliant of his achievements, and is certainly the one that at the time gained him the greatest reputation. Yet it is concerning this very campaign that we have now the most conclusive evidence of previous study. A writer in one of the German military periodicals has lately shown that there is more than a chance resemblance between Napoleon's scheme and conduct of the campaign of 1796 and that adopted by the comparatively forgotten French Marshal Maillebois in 1745-46. It appears that a remarkably detailed and lucid history by the Marquis de Pezay of the campaigns of this Marshal made its appearance in 1775, and there is likewise hardly a doubt that this work accompanied Napoleon to Italy in 1796. He is shown to have applied to the Minister of War to be supplied with it and the accompanying maps on his taking the field, and from the way he mentions it, it is evident that he had already studied its contents. The assent of the War Minister to his request is still extant, and it may, therefore, be looked upon as practically certain that Napoleon had it with him during his campaign. At the time referred to Marshal Maillebois (it is somewhat curious that he received the bâton for the capture of Corsica in 1741) was opposing the Sardinian and Austrian armies in concert with a Spanish force under the Infant and Count Gage. Without entering into any detailed account of the campaign, we may point out the close analogy between the way matters stood at its commencement and the situation in 1796.

The Piedmontese were in alliance with the Austrians at the former as they were at the latter date. The positions occupied by the Spanish troops in 1745 on the Riviera were almost identical with those subsequently held there by the French. In both cases French reinforcements were on the march along the Riviera to the seat of war, while in each case the anxiety of the Piedmontese was for Turin and of the Austrians for Milan. In both campaigns the object of the French leader was to fall with superior numbers on the troops of the King of Sardinia; to compel him, if possible, to enter on a separate treaty of peace; and then, again in superior force, to turn on the Austrians and drive them back to the mountains of the Tyrol. Napoleon made use of the same passes through the Maritime Alps as did his predecessor, and both made their start across the hills from the neighbourhood of Savona. The object of both was to first seize Ceva, to utilize it as a pivot for their further movements and a rallying-point for their forces. It was expected by both generals that the Sardinians could thus be cut off from their allies, and that a separate peace could be easily enough extorted from them. This would leave the remainder of the French troops free to move with superior strength on Milan, sever the Austrian communications, and make themselves masters of Austrian Lombardy. In both cases the scheme for dividing the allies succeeded, and the Sardinians were first badly beaten in detail.

The ultimate success of his strategical dispositions was not reaped, however, by Maillebois as subsequently by Napoleon. The Spaniards were directed by the Court of Spain to move on Parma and Piacenza, and Maillebois could no longer count on their immediate co-operation. Peace between Frederick and Maria Theresa was likewise concluded just then at Dresden, and the Austrians were reinforced from home. The Sardinians accordingly plucked up heart, and again took the offensive. The Austrians hemmed in the Spaniards round Piacenza; and eventually they had to evacuate Lombardy. Widely different was the end of the campaign of 1796, but there is nevertheless a striking similarity between the leading features of the two; and the fact that we know that Napoleon had Maillebois's Mémoires with him, and was probably well acquainted with them, makes the resemblance doubly significant. It shows that his conception of the campaign was no sudden inspiration, nor even perfectly original; but only another instance of genius utilizing and improving on the experience of former workers in the same field. It is an example of how even the failures of a previous generation have their share in bringing about the triumphs of later years, and of how honest and conscientious work, though it fail at the time to effect great results, is seldom or never thrown away. The knowledge of the country that guided Maillebois in his decisions (he had been campaigning there thirteen years before) was utilized and turned to account by his successor, who recognized the soundness of his views, and did not hesitate to adopt them.

Success here, at any rate, was not due to any heaven-born inspiration or sudden impulse, but was the result of careful thought and study of the experiences of a man whom the world has never thought of crediting with any extraordinary talent. Genius found the schemes of intelligent mediocrity ready to hand, and made brilliant use of them; but they were none the less originally the conceptions of a very ordinary mortal. We have thus again an illustration of the adage that genius means the capacity of taking infinite pains, and that before a man proceeds to execution he must have knowledge to go upon. Even then it needs genius to turn such knowledge to the best account, and the leap from knowing to doing is undoubtedly a wide one. To accomplish it, however, does not need so great an effort as to spring from ignorance to success.

LONDON MONEY-LENDERS.

THE recent case of Cochrane v. Moore, in which Lord Justice Lopes's judgment will have been to most minds eminently satisfactory, has let a flood of light upon the habits and customs of the London money-lender of the present day, and the various wiles which the person in question is accustomed to practise in the pursuit of his art.

Of course there are money-lenders and money-lenders. But however much these gentry may differ—and they do differ in many remarkable ways—there is one point in their proceedings in which they exhibit a striking unanimity. They always charge 60 per cent. for the accommodation they afford, and as much more as they can get. Money-lenders may roughly be divided into four classes:—

- a. The leading West-End bill-discounters; or Kings of the Usurers.
- b. The smaller bill-discounters.
- c. The bona-fide Bills-of-salemen.
- d. The bogus Bills-of-salemen.

It is our intention to deal briefly in this article with these four main sections of the money-lending community.

Princes of the tribe always, or nearly always, live at the West End. Cork Street, Burlington Gardens, and Jermyn Street, and Sackville Street, Piccadilly, and St. James's Street, are the localities in which, as a rule, they pitch their tents. Their offices are very handsomely, and indeed elaborately, furnished. There is a plentiful supply of jewelry upon the premises with which to entrap the unwary. In the old days the West-End usurer was perfectly content if he could palm off a few dozens of inferior port or Hamburg sherry upon his customer. The usurer of to-day flies at higher game, and in a big transaction often manages to dispose of 2,000*l.* or 3,000*l.* worth of jewelry, needless to say at an uncommonly remunerative price. The West-End money-lender has always in his service a remarkably astute gentleman, who in some ways corresponds to a solicitor's managing clerk. This trusty lieutenant knows all his master's customers, and, if occasion requires, exactly what lie to tell them without consulting his principal. Then, too, there is generally a tame solicitor on the premises, or at all events round the corner, who is ready at a moment's notice to prepare any necessary documents, or take a declaration from the victim as to his circumstances, prospects, and general indebtedness, if it be thought desirable to possess such a lever in case of non-payment. Money-lenders of this description for the most part employ an army of touts—men who are occupied from morning to night in bringing flies to the spider's web. These touts belong to a great variety of walks in life; some of them are members of the best clubs, others may be jewellers', or tailors', or hosiers' assistants, who have managed to get on terms of familiarity with the customers at their master's establishment. Many of these touts earn a large income, and this is scarcely to be wondered at, for, as a rule, they receive a commission from the money-lender as well as a substantial percentage from the borrower upon the amount of the advance made to him. The interest charged by money-lenders, such as those we are at present describing, varies from 40 or 50 to 100 per cent. It generally is fixed at 20*l.* per 100*l.* for three months (i.e. at 80 per cent.) The first transaction generally takes the form of a bill at three months, carrying interest after it becomes due at the rate of 1*s.* in the pound per calendar month (i.e. 60 per cent.) until payment. Then for the most part follow "renewals," or fresh transactions, in which interest is heaped upon interest, with the inevitable result that the position of the borrower is ten times worse than it was when he first entered the den. Of course money-lenders may occasionally be of great service to people who require a sum of money at a moment's notice, and have no other means of obtaining it than by applying to a usurer. There is a good deal of truth in the famous "Mr. Benoni Crabbe's" remark when he says:—"The question for my clients to ask themselves is not the amount of interest I demand, but what my money is worth to them. I do not hunt them up; they come to me, and often in ghastly trouble. I have saved officers of unblemished repute—men with the Victoria Cross and the Ribbon of the Bath—from being hooted out of their ships and regiments; not always by their own fault, but sometimes through mishap or evil fortune. My money has been often more than gold; it has been life and honour. I have known a surgeon take a thousand guineas for saving a man's leg. I have saved men from blowing out their own brains by lending them fifty pounds at a moment's notice." Still, on the whole, we are inclined to think that Lord Justice Lopes's remarks upon money-lenders as a profession were in no sense too severe.

As for the smaller bill-discounters, they carry on a precisely similar business, only, of course, on a much more modest scale. They have, for the most part, a humble office at the West-End where they negotiate small loans at a rate of interest positively appalling. When, by means of advertisement or otherwise, a victim to whose wants, through lack of capital, they are unable to minister is hooked, they march him off to one of their richer brethren, who gives them a liberal commission for the introduction and a share of the profit when the unlucky borrower has been sufficiently bled. During the last few years it has been shown, in many cases that have come before the law courts, that among this section of bill-discounters there are a considerable number of "bill-stealers," who have a playful way of extracting an acceptance for a considerable amount from the intending borrower upon the plea of getting it discounted for him, handing it to a friend who afterwards poses as the "innocent holder for value," and dividing the proceeds with their fellow-conspirator after their dupe has been made to pay.

We next come to the man who advances money upon bills of sale. Now the bona-fide bill-of-saleman does not, as a rule, advertise. His customers for the most part are introduced to him by the shadier kind of solicitors, and sometimes, indeed, by sheriff's officers and their assistants. When an execution has been levied, the "man in possession" left by Mr. Ezekiel or Mr. Aaron makes a point of suggesting to the distracted mistress that the "governor" has a friend who desires nothing better than to "pay it out." And, if the proffered services are accepted, the result inevitably takes the shape of a bill of sale, with something very like 150 per cent. interest tacked on to it. The interest charged by the bill-of-saleman is enormous; and, if a single instalment be a couple of days in arrear, he has a habit of sending down a large furniture van, accompanied by a dozen men, and clearing his customer's house in the most light-hearted manner possible. We are thankful to say that the last Bills of Sales Act has proved a great stumbling-block to these people. In order that a bill of sale should be valid and regular, the provisions of this Act have to be most rigidly followed, and Shylock has been bowled over again and again, and his bill of sale declared absolutely void, because he has not been content with what the law has in its wisdom seen fit to allow him, but has thought proper to prepare a bill of sale upon his own model, and to suit his own plans. We have painted the West-End usurers in their true colours, and can scarcely be accused of exaggerating their merits; but, when all is said and done, these worthies are, at their worst, men of honour, courtesy, and even kindness compared with those who employ that legal instrument of torture, the bill of sale, in the various stages from its preparation and signature down to the almost inevitable conclusion of wreck, pillage, and too often downright theft.

Lastly, there is the bogus bill-of-saleman. This individual advertises that he will lend money at 5 per cent. upon furniture, or farming stock, or any other available security. The loan is to be made without publicity, and will be carried through free of all expense. But the applicant soon finds out how much of this little fairy-tale is true. In the first place, he is asked to pay as large an "inquiry fee" as the so-called money-lender thinks can be wrung from him; and, when he has parted with this, he is called upon for a further sum in connexion with the expenses of carrying out the loan; and is finally told that, the inquiries relative to himself having proved unsatisfactory, the lender greatly regrets that he is unable to make the advance. These gentry live almost entirely upon the inquiry fees paid them by their victims. Some of them, as was shown at a recent trial at the Central Criminal Court, never make an advance at all. Others, perhaps, may do so to one out of fifty applicants who have paid inquiry fees, and then, of course, at an enormous rate of interest. Indeed, the "5 per cent." generally swells into 500. It is to be regretted that the unhappy victims do not more often put the criminal law in force when they have found themselves cheated in the way we have described. But of course it is easy to see why they should shrink from publicity and prefer to allow themselves to be cheated rather than publish their impecuniosity to the world. And thus the foulest inmate of this foul nest carries on his nefarious calling with comparative impunity.

POETS AS LANDSCAPE-PAINTERS.

POETS are a fortunate race. The art of rhyming was till lately so far beyond the power of most people that the few who possessed it were looked on with awe, and allowed to commit all sorts of crimes unmolested. Breaches of the decalogue might be urged on the reader, and he only smiled as he murmured "poetical license." High treason and sedition might be taught, but as long as they were taught in verse nobody cared. It is time, however, that moralists and teachers of the exact sciences made a stand at the false statements of poets as landscape-painters. How many of us have had our minds fatally corrupted by the astonishing description in Campbell's stirring poem of "Thy wild and stormy steep, Elsinore"! The imaginative infant instantly figures to itself bare beetling crags stretching far into a sea that is for ever swirling at its base, the foam mingling with the white wings of the circling sea-birds; and the picture remains long after he has become aware of the actual facts—that at Elsinore great beech-trees slope gently down, and sweep their branches almost into the Sound itself—that there is no cliff, no sea-gulls, no nothing. To the end of its life the child harbours a sense of injury towards the inoffensive Elsinore; he feels towards it as grown people feel towards the original of a very flattering portrait; as if the sitter was in some way responsible, and that they would like to be revenged on him if they only got the chance. If the child is conscientious, and of a truthful nature, his whole future will be poisoned by Campbell's rash statement concerning Elsinore. He will dread to visit Rome lest the Tiber, instead of "tossing his tawny mane," should turn out a blue and tranquil stream. He will shun Mont Blanc for fear that the Arve and Arvéron, instead of "raging" at his "base," may prove to be in some distant valley. Cashmere will be a sealed book to him; for who is to know if the roses really are bright by the calm Bendemeer, or if it is merely the convolvulus or cowslip which flourishes by those waters? Wordsworth is certainly a more trustworthy guide in this important question than most of his rivals, and has less inaccuracy on his conscience. The very qualities which made him a faithful chronicler of Betty Foy and her afflicted offspring led him to be careful and accurate in his descriptions of scenery, and if the "plough and harrow" are not precisely the first images suggested by the mention of "pleasant Teviotdale," but rather the echo of the baaing of many lambs, both plough and harrow are implements by no means unknown to the inhabitants.

In his description of the notorious swan on still St. Mary's Loch, Wordsworth is deserving of all praise. Think what a temptation to create (as Scott did) a herd of swans arching their graceful necks and gazing complacently at their reflections in the limpid waters. But no. He was proof against all the blandishments of the Muse, and confined himself strictly to the truth, which was that there was one swan, and no more, on the loch. Why there should be only one swan, and if it is always the same, and when it first came there, are questions which the student of natural history may be able to answer. To the uninitiated they are as darkly mysterious as the origin of Prester John; but this swan goes about killing young ducks.

In proportion as Wordsworth is to be commended for the retenue and dignity of his attitude towards the swan of St. Mary's Loch we must severely condemn Scott for his account of the home—whether permanent or temporary—of that interesting bird. Even in Scotland many people have no idea of the existence of such a spot as St. Mary's; while in England it is quite safe to assert that it would never have been heard of at all had it not been "honourably mentioned" by these two poets. But the "children of larger growth" who are impelled by Scott's majestic lines to drive eighteen miles from Selkirk, or nearly as many from Moffat, to visit "St. Mary's silent lake," will be rather bewildered when, book in hand, they compare the reality with the description in Marmion:—

Thou know'st it well; nor fen, nor sedge,
Pollutes the pure lake's crystal edge;
Abrupt and sheer, the mountains sink
At once upon the level brink;
And just a trace of silver sand
Marks where the water meets the land.
Far in the mirror bright and blue
Each hill's huge outline you may view,
Shaggy with heath, but lonely, bare.

There is not a single statement in these nine lines which is not open to criticism, or even contradiction. St. Mary's Loch is a more fortunate Hendon; it has the same want of an imposing shore, the same air of a reservoir which has casually burst into a green valley, and has settled down and made itself at home. A few reeds or sedges would do something to mitigate this impression; but the numerous and pretty water weeds keep themselves well below the surface, serving the double purpose of shelter for the fish and traps for the lines of the fishermen. The "mountains," so far from being "abrupt and sheer," are round, pudding-shaped lumps of no great height, and perfectly easy of ascent from any part of the shore if the traveller has the mountaineering mania strong upon him. The "silver sand" turns out to be a streak of whinstones, only visible when a dry summer has left the shores bare, otherwise the water comes right up to the edge of the grass. As to the "brightness and blueness" of the mirror, that is a matter of the luck of the particular tourist, though certainly the poet was so far right when he spoke of the reflections. Whether the water be grey or blue, the reflections are equally firm and clear, and no dog could be accounted a fool for mistaking here the shadow for the substance. But when the conscientious explorer turns to look for the "huge outline" of the objects reflected he snorts with indignation. The tallest of them does not seem above six hundred feet, and its outline would not disgrace an apple-dumpling or a dish-cover. Three false statements in as many lines naturally make the humble student of poetry and nature suspicious as to the rest; but he bounds with rage when he is next asked to look upon the hills as "shaggy with heath." This is the crowning insult to his understanding; for, however long his sight and keen his eyes, he may sweep the horizon to the end of his life without being able to detect more than one dumpy hill with heather on it. This is the great drawback to the hills of the South of Scotland. Their shapes are often fine, but their eternal green becomes monotonous except for the brief space in the autumn when the bracken changes into gold. After this nothing matters. The "thousand rills" which flow into the lake (the country—for Scotland—is curiously destitute of them), and the "solitude" which is profaned by a horse's hoofs, though not apparently by the baaing of the endless sheep, may pass unnoticed. But our faith is shaken. It may be true that on occasions known to the poet the lake "heaves her broad billows to the shore," and that eagles scream around Loch Skene. But perhaps the strangest part of the whole is, that these assertions should be quoted in all the local guide-books as if they were literally true. Yet even a landlord of an inn can see that they are purely fanciful, and that St. Mary's and Loch Skene are no more like Scott's pictures than the ladies who sit to Mee, R.A., resemble his charming portraits.

RACING.

THE week between the Newmarket July Meeting and the Liverpool Summer Meeting used to be one of the quietest in the racing world. It has now become one of the most eventful.

A dozen two-year-olds came out for the Zetland Stakes of 1,500*l.* on the first day at Leicester, and Lord Calthorpe's Heresy, with 4 lbs. extra, was made the favourite; but she only ran a bad third to Mr. M. Dawson's The Whaup, who had an allowance of 8 lbs., and Lord Penrhyn's Far Niente, who had one of 5 lbs. Far Niente was only beaten by a neck, so that, at the weights, he ran as well as The Whaup, and some good judges considered that he lost ground in the last stride or two by trying to "savage" his opponent. Others thought that he failed to "stay the course" over the severe ascent. The Whaup has very fine shoulders and both size and power, but Far Niente was, upon the whole, most admired of the pair, although this was his fifth successive defeat, and his exhibition of temper in the race just described was far from encouraging. If the finish for the Zetland Stakes was rendered unsatisfactory by Far Niente's ill conduct, that for the Midland Derby, a race of equal value, for which the new mile-and-a-half course was used for the first time, was spoilt by the breakdown of the favourite, Mr. Rose's Gulliver, the winner of a Biennial and the Hardwicke Stakes at Ascot. Even under these unfortunate circumstances he was only beaten by half a length by Lord Zetland's Pinzon, to whom he was giving 4 lbs. This was a great piece of luck for Pinzon, for at Ascot he had finished very many lengths behind Gulliver at even weights, and he had lost, altogether, thirteen races out of fourteen.

The Portland Stakes of 6,000*l.*, which was run on the 6th of April last year, was this season put off until the 17th of July—a far better date, as the earlier one tended to encourage trainers to force their two-year-olds during the winter. Although there were only half a dozen starters, the race excited a great deal of interest. The public form of the competitors was pretty clear. The Duke of Portland's Semolina had beaten Surefoot by a head at Ascot, and Surefoot at the same meeting had beaten Baron Rothschild's Heaume, who was now to run against Semolina, by a length. Within the week, again, Heaume had beaten Mr. H. Milner's Riviera by a length at Newmarket. On paper, therefore, Semolina was bound to beat Heaume by at least a length, while Heaume would beat Riviera by about the same distance. Mr. J. Houldsworth's Alloway had run within half a length of Signorina when receiving 4 lbs., instead of giving her the usual 3 lbs. for sex; but, as Semolina and Signorina had never met, it was a mere matter of conjecture whether he would or would not be able to beat Semolina. Lord Dudley's Formidable had won all the three races for which she had hitherto started. Lord Penrhyn's Sweet Ellen, on the other hand, had been unplaced in her only race, although she had cost 2,500 guineas as a yearling. The six starters got off almost in a line, Riviera, if anything, having a trifle the best of it, and she at once took the lead, accompanied by Formidable. At the foot of the hill the jockeys of Heaume, Semolina, and Alloway were beginning to ride their horses rather more than their backers quite liked, and Sweet Ellen was already "tailed off." On ascending the hill Alloway was the first to drop back beaten, and halfway up it the hitherto infallible Semolina, for the first time in her life, showed unmistakable symptoms of defeat. Just as she collapsed, Formidable almost collared Riviera, and Heaume was seen rapidly making his way to the front. A very interesting race followed. It was obviously a close affair between Riviera and Formidable, ridden by T. Loates and G. Barrett; yet danger was threatened to both by F. Barrett on Heaume, who was steadily gaining on the pair. Just before reaching the winning-post, all three seemed on an equality; but Riviera won by a neck from Heaume, who was only a head in front of Formidable. This was a reversal of Riviera's form of the week before with Heaume by about 7 lbs., and of Heaume's indirect Ascot form with Semolina by fully a stone. As a rule, what we may term a double reversal of public form looks like untrue running, and a sudden change of positions to the extent of something like 21 lbs. is rarely to be trusted. It must be admitted that the hill at Leicester is trying; but so also is that at Ascot. After the Portland Stakes, Riviera was the richest two-year-old winner of her year, with 7,105*l.* to her credit. Puzzling as was the form shown for the Portland Stakes, it would be unfair to complain of it, as the running among the best class of two-year-olds had hitherto this season been exceptionally consistent, and if public form were to be absolutely unvarying, there would be little interest in racing. It will be convenient to notice here the race for the National Breeders' Produce Stakes of Saturday last at Sandown, as it had an important bearing upon the form of Heaume and Riviera. Loup was only beaten by a head by Rathbeal, to whom he was giving 13 lbs., and he had behind him a field of thirteen horses, to all of which he was giving from 9 to 16 lbs. For the Chesterfield Stakes at Newmarket he had finished three-quarters of a length behind Heaume and a neck in front of Riviera.

Great interest was taken on the Thursday at Leicester in the first appearance on a racecourse of Baron Rothschild's Le Nord, a grand two-year-old colt by the famous Tristan. Like his sire and his dam's sire, Wellingtonia, he is a chestnut. It was the general opinion that he showed something of Wellingtonia's high-set quarters and Tristan's strength of loin, with great depth of girth, and plenty of bone below the knee. He won the Knighton Plate in a canter from a somewhat moderate field. The Leicestershire Handicap was won by Mr. J. Lowther's King Monmouth, who had won the same race last year and now started at 10 to 1. For the Salford Borough Handicap he had beaten Fullerton over the same distance by three-quarters of a length when receiving a stone; now, when only receiving 7 lbs., he beat him by many lengths. St. Helen, on the strength of her victory in the Hare Park Handicap at Newmarket in the preceding week, was made first favourite; but even her allowance of 30 lbs. did not enable her to get within two lengths of King Monmouth.

The Eclipse Stakes, which was run for at Sandown on the 19th of July, was the tamest that had yet been contested. It had to some extent been "discounted" by the Kempton Park Royal Stakes in May. For that race the Duke of Portland's Ayrshire, the winner of last year's Derby, had beaten Lord Calthorpe's Seabreeze, his conqueror in the St. Leger, by three-quarters of a length. Since then Seabreeze had been beaten half a length by Mr. D. Baird's El Dorado. As she was now to give him 3 lbs. less than she did on that occasion, there did not seem to be much to choose between the chances of the pair; but both seemed to be held safe by Ayrshire, and it was generally understood that Seabreeze "made a noise." Mr. H. Milner's Seclusion had won the Coronation Stakes of 2,250*l.* at Ascot; but she had been beaten for both the Oaks and the One Thousand, and on her public form it was impossible to recommend her as a candidate for the Eclipse Stakes. Prince Soltykoff's Gold had been unplaced for all the five races for which he had run this season; so his hopes of victory appeared far from brilliant. The Duke of Beaufort's Benburb, although a colt of great power, seemed out-classed among his opponents. If the race was not likely to be exciting, the weather was everything that could be desired, and it was the first really fine day on which an Eclipse Stakes had been run for, as there were heavy showers in the morning last year, although the afternoon was beautiful; and on the first occasion it had been exceedingly wet. A little excitement was raised early in the afternoon of the late Eclipse Stakes by rumours to the effect that all was not well with the favourite. The day before the race 2 to 1 had been laid upon him, and, when people first arrived on the course on the day itself, bookmakers refused to take less than 5 to 2; but immediately after the first race it was said that he was tender on one of his fore-legs; there was some talk about a splint, and it was even whispered that he was lame. The Ring gradually lowered their demands, and even money was gladly laid against him at one time. When the numbers went up, and Ayrshire's appeared, odds of 6 to 4 were again demanded; but when he cantered on the course he went so "short" that 5 to 4 was readily taken. Seabreeze, who had been second favourite on the previous day, was not approved of, for she was considered wanting in muscle. El Dorado, therefore, was made second favourite in her stead, although many good judges thought him too thick-set for his height. Seclusion's beautiful shoulders were much admired, but her middle-piece was the subject of adverse criticism.

Down went the flag at the first attempt at a start, and the little field went off with Seabreeze in front. After running for about a hundred yards Robinson steadied her, and Mornington Cannon made the running on Gold, with Watts on Benburb in close attendance. Thus they proceeded along the side of the railway until reaching the footpath from the station across the course, where Mornington Cannon increased his lead with Gold. His father, on the contrary, was at the tail of the field on El Dorado. As they came round the turn from the railway into the straight Gold was leading by about five lengths. As soon as they were fairly in the straight, both Benburb and Ayrshire drew up to Gold, and just before they entered the rails he retired from the front with Benburb to keep him company. Seclusion and Seabreeze now came forward, but the effort was too much for the latter, and she began to slacken her pace just as she had made her way into a good position. At the same time El Dorado was passing his opponents one by one, and he rushed on until he had collared Seclusion. In the meantime Ayrshire had got very near the winning-post, and F. Barrett had no difficulty whatever in winning with him by a couple of lengths. When Seclusion and El Dorado, who were fighting out a hard race for the 500*l.* to be given to the second, passed the post, El Dorado was a head in advance. Ayrshire walked very tenderly after the race.

Ayrshire has only run twice in public this season, and in those two races he has won 20,000*l.* in stakes—a performance which, it is almost needless to say, has never been equalled. His total winnings now amount to 35,240*l.*, surpassing those of Ormonde by nearly 7,000*l.*; but Donovan, his stable companion, who has been a shorter time on the Turf by a year, has already beaten him with 39,762*l.* Ayrshire has lost four races, and Seabreeze, who has been behind him in both his races this year, had beaten him as often as he has beaten her. The Duke of Portland's winnings, of nearly 80,000*l.* in stakes in about a year and a half, have never been approached in the whole history of the Turf, and it really seems as if what one of our contemporaries usually calls the "Frankenstein Monsters" might have been instituted for his especial benefit. Unquestionably a stud such as his must cost, from first to last, a very large sum indeed; but if he were to choose to sell only three of his horses—Ayrshire, Donovan, and Semolina—an amount would be realized which would go a long way towards "covering expenses."

PEOPLE'S BANKS.

ON Monday evening Mr. Maclean asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer a question to which, in the nature of things, only a very cautious answer could be given. Mr. Maclean stated that Mr. A. Egmont-Hake, Chairman of the Free Trade in Capital League, proposes to introduce in this country a system of people's banks, similar to that which has been so successful in Germany and Italy; that it is intended to make use of a new medium of exchange, to be called cash credit certificates; and that the Bank of England has intimated its intention to raise no objection to these certificates. Therefore he wished to know whether Her Majesty's Government would also raise no objection, provided the circulation of the certificates be strictly limited to the locality of the bank by which they are issued. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his reply, pointed out that all the Bank of England had done was to say that it would not willingly place considerations of its own interest in the way of any proposal which was clearly shown to be for the public advantage. But Mr. Goschen went on to observe that this is not a question merely between the Bank of England and the proposed new banks. It vitally affects our whole system of paper currency, and cannot be decided without a most careful examination of its bearing on the security of that system. This is so obviously true that we presume Mr. Maclean cannot have expected any other answer. But in the meantime, as the matter is of great public interest, it is desirable that it should be very fully and impartially discussed. Our existing banks, we need hardly remind our readers, are in practice available to any material extent only by the capitalist classes. The funds with which the banks work are mainly the deposits and current accounts—that is to say, borrowed money. And, though the capital proper is likewise employed, it forms usually but a small proportion of the total funds of the banks, and, indeed, is little more than a guarantee of the safety of the deposits. But the deposits are not merely borrowed money, they are repayable on demand; and therefore, if a bank is to be safe, it must employ its deposits only on security which is perfectly safe, and readily realizable. This being so, it is evident that the only safe customers of a bank are the capitalist classes; not necessarily, of course, wealthy men, but men who can give security which amply covers advances made, and for which there is a ready market. In effect, therefore, our present banking system does not meet the requirements of the very small traders, and of poor men with intelligence, skill, and industry, but without the capital necessary to enable them to take full advantage of their abilities. The system of people's banks started in Germany about forty years ago, by Dr. Schulze Delitzsch, was intended to do for the non-capitalist class with integrity and enterprise, and for the very small traders, what the English banks so successfully have done for the commercial classes generally. It is quite true, of course, that even now banking is less developed in Germany than in England, and that development was far more backward forty years ago. Consequently, it must not be forgotten that the experience of Germany is not quite conclusive when we apply it to this country. Nevertheless, the great success of the people's banks in the country where they were first established, and more recently in Italy, is so decided, and the advantages they have conferred are so unquestionable, that their history and constitution are full of instruction for us.

The great difficulty, of course, was to find capital for starting the banks. If Dr. Schulze Delitzsch had appealed to the ordinary investing public he might have induced some of them, from philanthropic motives, to provide the money, and he might have been able, for a while, to keep to his original scheme. But, sooner or later, the banks would be diverted to ordinary banking business. He decided, therefore, that he would not appeal to the classes within whose reach banking accommodation already was. Further, he foresaw that, if his banks proved successful, they might be bought up by capitalists, and diverted from their original purpose; and, therefore, he determined that no member should be allowed to hold more than one share. But, if the ordinary investing public were not to be appealed to, it followed that the capital must be provided by those for whom the banks were intended—that is to say, for people not absolutely without means, but yet with very little means. How was he to induce those to subscribe? The first inducement put forward was that loans should be made only to members. Every one, therefore, who desired to have banking facilities, and could not obtain the facilities from existing banks, had a motive for subscribing to the new banks, especially as loans would be granted to members, at least to the amount of the money paid by them for their shares. But, however strong the motive, the means might not be there to enable them to do so, unless the method of subscription was made as easy as possible. Accordingly, Dr. Schulze Delitzsch decided that the members should be allowed to pay for their shares in instalments, weekly, fortnightly, monthly, or so on, as the case might be. In the beginning the banks were started on a very humble scale, and the periodical subscriptions were very small. Thus, membership was made possible even for working-men, thrift was encouraged, since as soon as a single subscription was paid there was a strong motive for not failing in the payment of the succeeding subscriptions, and, when once the bank was established, banking accommodation was brought within the reach even of the poor. But it was easy to foresee that the capital subscribed in this way would be too small to enable the banks to do a considerable business, and, indeed, to make any impression upon the economic condition of the country. It was, therefore, necessary that deposits should be attracted; but how were they to be attracted to banks of this kind? Only, Dr. Schulze Delitzsch came to the conclusion, by making the liabilities of the members unlimited. Each could hold only one share, and he might pay for that share in a single payment or by instalments. But each, nevertheless, in becoming a member, assumed unlimited liability for the debts of the bank. Nevertheless, no member can be sued for the debts of the bank until the whole business has been wound up in the manner provided for by law. When all the assets are exhausted, if any liabilities remain, the members, whether their shares are fully paid or not, are equally responsible for the amount. The plan has succeeded marvellously. Deposits have been attracted from the outside public as well as from members. The number of banks in Germany within forty years has grown to over 2,200, and they have prospered exceedingly. So successful, indeed, have they been that they have been imitated in Italy upon a large scale, and there also they have taken root and flourished. There is no doubt at all that they have contributed powerfully to the rapid progress recently made by Germany and Italy. They have been availed of more or less by every class, and there is no kind of banking business in which they do not engage. Many of them have added a savings-bank branch to the other kinds, and some are agricultural as well as ordinary banks.

There seems no reason why similar banks could not be successfully established in this country, provided the German system were not too slavishly copied, but that well-considered modifications were introduced for better adapting them to English notions and habits. Those who have originated and managed trade-unions, friendly and benefit societies, and the like, would surely be able to properly conduct people's banks. And there can be no two opinions that the bringing of banking accommodation within the reach of those who are now shut out from it, and yet have the probity, the intelligence, industry, and enterprise to use it well, would be an immense advantage to the community at large as well as to those persons themselves. There will be more doubt as to the advisability of introducing a new medium of exchange. The idea is for each of these proposed banks to issue what are called cash credit certificates, which are to run as follows:—"The People's Bank of — grant you the cash credit of £—." In plain language, the certificate is neither more nor less than a banknote, only in form it purports to be an advance instead of a promise to pay. As the certificates will circulate only amongst the poor, and as the Bank of England issues no notes of less than the 5*l.* denomination, it does not seem that the certificates would affect the Bank of England note circulation. It is different, however, with the note circulation of Ireland and Scotland and the Post-Office postal orders. However, the question for the general public is not whether existing banks or a Government department might suffer some loss of profit if these new banks were allowed to compete with them, but whether it would be decidedly advantageous to the public generally that the certificates should be allowed to circulate. Clearly it would benefit the proposed banks immensely, assuming that they were taken up by the working classes generally and by struggling tradesmen, that they were well managed, and that they got into good credit. It is clear that after awhile the banks would be able to issue a very considerable amount of these certificates. In the immediate neighbourhood the certificates would probably be freely accepted in payment by those who cater for the working classes. They would thus enable the banks to dispense with the use of cash to a very large extent, and at the same time they would displace a certain amount of cash in the general circulation. The right of note issue, then, there can be no reasonable doubt, would be a great boon to the proposed banks. But whether they would be of general advantage would depend upon whether the management of the banks was good or bad. If the certificates were issued only to those who obtained loans from the banks, and if only members of the banks were given loans, it is obvious that the first note-holders, at any rate, would be the shareholders of the bank—that is to say, the very persons who would be liable in case the bank failed. Of course the certificates would be of no use to a borrower if they were not freely accepted by his creditors. Rapidly, therefore, the certificates would pass from the hands of the shareholders into those of the shareholders' creditors. Provided always that loans were not made in excess of what the borrowers could repay, it is clear, therefore, that no public injury could be done even if the bank failed, since the borrowers would remain liable for the debts of the bank. The question resolves itself, then, into another—how to secure really good management?

A DEGRADED ARTISAN.

[“The English workmen are degraded by the pipe, the Bible, beer, and admiration for the upper classes.”—Mr. Cunningham Graham at the Marxist Congress in Paris.]

WELL! blow me, if that ain't a pretty story
For to pitch before a lot of Parley-voos—
Why, I'm bothered if there's any bloomin' Tory
Who would care to be a-standin' in his shoes.

The millenny—what d'ye call it, 's at a distance,
So it seems, for any British working-man,
For I never in the course of my existence
Can have met an “undegraded” artisan.

I could say per'aps without the risk of libel
That I did once 'ave a mate of sech a type
As were not a-reading daily of his Bible—
But he was rather partial to his pipe.

I have known a few who 'ates the upper classes,
And who generally 'olds with Labbycheer,
But then, agen, they're used to take their glasses,
And have never got to 'ate a drop of beer.

Though you cut the 'bacca-shop where once there was tick,
It ain't enough to drop your bit of smoke;
You must slate the bloated nobs and turn a Nostic
To satisfy this harbitrary bloke.

And there ain't a bit of virtue in denouncin'
Of the classes in the parlour of a pub;
You must raise yourself by givin' 'em a trouncin'
Over lemonide and corfy at the club.

Anti-'bacca and teetotaller persuaded,
And a cove as lets the uppers 'ave it 'ot,
And a infidel atop; and you're “degraded”
Unless you somehow answer to the lot.

Well, thank yer, Mr. Cunningham McGraham,
In the name of British workmen not a few,
And I'll tell yer, now you've told us how you weigh 'em,
What a certain British workman thinks of you.

Self-improvement's all the go; I wouldn't shirk it,
I should like to undegrade myself, I say,
And to teach my fellow-workmen how to work it,
But I'm blowed if I can say I see my way.

I could bring myself to do with nothin' stronger
Than a cup of tea, and drop my pint of “four”;
I could cease to read my Bible any longer,
And I wouldn't blow my 'bacca any more.

But I couldn't—no, I couldn't—never ask me—
Make the other change you seem to recommend;
Such a heffort would completely overtask me,
So I'll have to go degraded to the end.

For, whatever other games they have to show you,
There will always be one workman who admires
Upper classes as can manage for to grow you
Such a lovely thing in silly Scottish squires.

REVIEWS.

COLONEL MALLESON'S LORD WELLESLEY.*

THAT there should be a demand for a series of sketches of the lives and doings of Statesmen, accurate, short, and graphic, is a healthy sign. In a democratic age it is good for all of us to be reminded of the important part taken by individuals in moulding and controlling the destinies of empires. Nations are not fashioned by a blind and fortuitous combination of circumstances and atoms, and nowhere have the force and feebleness of personal character been more manifest than in the growth of our Indian Empire. Our supremacy is mainly the result of personal qualities acting vigorously at critical times on the Oriental mind. Amongst the actors in the Anglo-Oriental drama no name is more conspicuous than that of Richard Colley Wellesley, and few writers are better qualified to describe his character and administration than Colonel Malleison. He himself tells us that he had once contemplated writing a Life of Lord Wellesley on a larger scale. And it is not in any disparagement that we congratulate him on having been able to compress his materials into little more than two hundred pages. Biographies of bishops, missionaries, authors, and political personages by no means of the first rank, have in recent years been spun out to a length which warrants the taunt of Macaulay that they might possibly have been light reading before the Deluge, in the days of Hilpa and Shalum. This volume is a proof that redundancy of facts and fluidity of diction need not be inevitable ingredients in the biography of a real Statesman.

To the general reader as to the painstaking student, Wellesley's Indian Administration will always be more attractive than his place in the English Cabinet, his mission to Portugal, and his Viceroyalty of Ireland. There he is confronted and mixed up with others. In India he stands out as a grand central figure, with his brother conquering in "the Wild Maratha Battle" and his devoted school of politicals and agents, all men of great capacity and talent, ready to go anywhere and to do anything which the "glorious little man" wished. The Indian portion of this work naturally divides itself, or is divided by Colonel Malleison, into three portions. The first part covers the last campaign against Tippoo and the arrangements with other States at its close. On his leisurely voyage out to India, Wellesley, not persecuted by silly telegrams and not hampered by senseless restrictions, had plenty of time to master all the difficulties of the situation, and when he touched at the Cape he fell in with an able soldier who had been Resident at Hyderabad, and who was well qualified to explain the wants, wishes, and proclivities of the native princes. The policy of Sir John Shore, Lord Wellesley's immediate predecessor, had been to keep clear of entanglements, as they were thought, and to allow Rajas and Nawabs to intrigue and plot against each other. Wellesley gave prominence to that doctrine about one Paramount Power which sends such a chill to the heart of the latter-day Radical. While still running before the trade winds or becalmed under the Line, the new Governor-General had sketched with distinctness and precision the correct line of action, and on landing he at once proceeded to act. In three years' time Seringapatam, which had cost Lord Cornwallis two campaigns, had been stormed. A representative of the ancient Hindu dynasty, ousted by Hyder Ali, was replaced on the throne of Mysore. French aggression was effectually checked. We obtained complete possession of the seaboard. The Nizam was restored to the position which he had lost under the ascendancy of the Marathas. It is a strong proof of Wellesley's sagacity and forecast that his policy with regard to Mysore and Hyderabad has stood the test of ninety years, and is still, in the main, the policy of Lord Dufferin and Lord Lansdowne. Though our relations with those States before and after the Mutiny have frequently been discussed and modified, the substantial position of their rulers remains to this day very much as it was laid down in 1799. The adopted son of the Prince whom the Wellesleys took by the hand and seated on the throne is now governing at Bangalore. At Hyderabad, where we have a British Resident and a Native Contingent officered by Englishmen, the Nizam, under certain restrictions, bears rule over a population of which ninety per cent. are Hindus. But from the beginning of this century, as Colonel Malleison well says, the predominance of the British Government in South-Eastern and South-Western India was permanently secured. Equally permanent and sound were the measures affecting other native States. A tyrant of the genuine Oriental type was deprived of the misgovernment of Tanjore. Opportunity was taken of the failure of heirs at Surat, once hardly inferior in importance to Bombay itself, to transfer the city and its dependencies to the East India Company. The Nawab of the Carnatic was detected in carrying on a treasonable correspondence with Tippoo, and his successor was pensioned off. A treaty was concluded with the Nawab Vizir of Oudh, by which we obtained the Doab of Hindostan, while the Nawabi, as the natives term it still, was handed over to maladministration for a period of fifty years. Amidst all these transfers and changes, involving toil, expense, and operations which led to war or to something very like it, Lord Wellesley was able to despatch five thousand troops with the object of expelling the French from Egypt. We may now think as little of the wild projects of Tippoo for an alliance with the French as we do of the union between "the implacable foe of the British" and a Northern Power. But it was not so at that epoch; and between the campaign in the South and the defeat of Maratha armies there was a lull, during which Lord Wellesley found time to attend to divers much-needed internal reforms.

This is the second period of the Indian career. To the Anglo-Indian official of the present day suffering from a sort of remittent fever in the transmission to England of any savings at a ruinous rate of exchange, rupees, each worth half-a-crown, and Government Loans bearing interest at eight, ten, and sometimes twelve per cent., must appear as a financial fairy dream. Lord Wellesley had to beg for subscriptions at these terrible rates, and he was lucky if he could close or commute the loans in two years' time. Yet when hard pressed for cash he managed to reform the army, to abolish an institution called the Regimental Committee which was subversive of all discipline, to revise the public establishments, to make the Commissariat efficient for active service, and to follow up decisive victories in the field by substantial victories on paper. But his noblest conception was the College of Fort William for the instruction of the members of the Civil Service in Oriental languages, classical and vernacular, political economy, jurisprudence, and ancient and modern laws. Warren Hastings had begun to convert factors and merchants into pro-consuls and prefects. Lord Cornwallis made their position and their salaries commensurate with their arduous duties. But Wellesley wished for a service educated, without cramming, to a very high standard. The minute in which he expanded his views with precision, ample detail, and suitable dignity of language, proved too much for the Court of Directors. They sent out a despatch abolishing the college; but, owing to the forcible protests of its founder, the scheme, somewhat shorn of its proportions, had a fair trial. For a good fifteen years after Wellesley's day there were annual exhibitions, when prizes and medals were conferred, and when the most successful students proceeded, in elegant Persian or polished Urdu, to discuss such political questions as the immorality of Suttee, the tyranny of caste, and the comparison of English with indigenous rule. At no period were higher distinctions gained, nor were more skilful linguists sent forth for the public service; men who could record their judicial decisions in the vernacular of the province where they served, or turn the manifestoes of the Governor-General into the polished language of the Durbar. There was, in fact, nothing diminutive about Wellesley except his stature. Government House at Calcutta, in its position and command of the Esplanade, illustrates the maxim of its founder that India should be governed from a palace and not from a counting-house; with the ideas of a prince, and not with the maxims of a retail dealer in muslins and indigo. Bishop Heber, who discerned a resemblance between Calcutta and St. Petersburg, admitted that the Government House of Wellesley was very near being a noble edifice. It is to be regretted that, owing to financial and other considerations, Wellesley was prevented from carrying out his plan of a broad road, lined with trees, which was to have gone right through the heart of the native town, and to have linked the country house at Barrackpore to the palace on the Maidan.

Fortunately for India Wellesley did not resign his office, as he had thought of doing, somewhere about the end of 1802. Colonel Malleison makes rather too much of differences of opinion between the Governor-General and his masters. Wellesley saw men and events through a telescope. The Court of Directors looked at them through a microscope. Hasty expressions of irritation and discontent not unfrequently fall from the pen of the most exalted personages who have to work under a hot wind or a deluge of warm water. In one or two of their remonstrances the Directors were strictly within their rights; notably when they objected to the deputation of Henry Wellesley, afterwards Lord Cowley, to the Nawab Vizir of Oudh. It is satisfactory to know that, when time had effaced all captiousness and pettiness on one hand and all irritation on the other, the splendid services of Wellesley were fittingly acknowledged by the Court. Long after his retirement the Directors voted him a statue, and made him a handsome gift of money; and such men as the late Mr. G. Lyall and the late Mr. W. B. Bayley, representing the mercantile and the official element respectively, acknowledged the force of his statesmanship in language admitted by Colonel Malleison to be adequate to the occasion. Attacks made on the Marquess in Parliament, after his return to England, by some obscure adventurers, need now only be dismissed in terms of quiet contempt.

The Maratha campaigns, with the failure of Lake at Bhurtpore and of Monson in the retreat from Holkar, are touched on by the author with due conciseness and point. There was, after all, a fitting close to an administration which lasted seven years; and, if we were inclined to a literary parody, we should say that Brougham's famous peroration about Law Reform, mutatis mutandis, would exactly express the difference between the India which Wellesley found and the India which he left. We make no doubt, too, that the statesman who had put down the sacrifice of children at Saugor Island and other places on the banks of the Ganges would very soon have directed his attention to the rite of Suttee. But though he called for reports on this very subject, he left India before anything could be done, and cremation of the living with the dead was allowed to flourish and increase under British protection between 1814 and 1829. Wellesley, after planning campaigns and negotiating treaties, still found means to pass some very useful laws for the establishment and improvement of the courts of justice, the easier realization of rents by landholders, the punishment of gang robbery, the retrenchment of some of the absurdities in the Mohammedan Criminal Code, which then and long afterwards was the law administered by English magistrates, and divers other departmental, agricultural, and commercial matters. These would require a whole chapter to themselves. He was the first Governor-General to legislate against female infanticide amongst the Rajputs, as well as against the practice known as Dhurna; an improvement on boycotting, under which Brahmans and Fakirs squat at the gates of rich men, and threaten them with the wrath of the gods if some outrageous request is not at once conceded.

* Statesmen Series—Life of the Marquess Wellesley, K.G. By Colonel G. B. Malleison, C.S.I. London: W. H. Allen & Co. 1889.

The subsequent career of Lord Wellesley is spoken of by Colonel Malleon as if it were bitterness and disappointment. It may be conceded that on his Peninsular mission or as member of an English Ministry he was a different person from the Governor-General who had only to take Malcolm or Metcalfe into his confidence and show them what he wanted to be done. Very possibly, too, he may have chafed at finding that the promises made by Spanish diplomatists were not one whit more trustworthy than the professions of good faith and friendship in the mouths of Holkar or Tippoo. But, after all, Wellesley did become Foreign Minister at an eventful period, and he really guided British policy in the Peninsula. He was Viceroy of Ireland between 1822 and 1827, and once again in 1830, when he put down insurrection, fed thousands of starving peasantry, and endeavoured to grapple with the evil of secret societies. In his views on Catholic Emancipation he was much in advance of his colleagues. We are not always accustomed to think of him as an orator, yet it seems quite certain that his style of speaking was effective, and that in the House of Peers he must have been listened to with attention. Colonel Malleon gives prominence to the anecdote that Wellesley remained silent in 1810 when the question of the Regency was discussed, and when, from his previous demeanour in the Cabinet, every one was expecting a great oration. We think it must have been on this occasion, though Colonel Malleon does not mention it, that a witty peer accounted for this reticence by saying that Wellesley had abandoned Cicero and had betaken himself to Tacitus. The allusion, of course, is to the diction of the Marquess, which, whether in speech or in minutes, was always ornate and diffuse. The story of his last seven years of retirement is gracefully told in the final chapter. But why, in quoting some Latin prose in a dedication to Lord Brougham and some Latin elegiacs, are some of the neatest couplets omitted? For instance, Etona Mater is thus addressed:—

Si quis in hoc vitæ decursu gloria nomen
Auxerit, aut si quis nobilitarit honos,
Muneris, Alma, tui est; alitrix da terra sepulcrum,
Supremam lacrymam da, memoremque mei.

Hexameters and pentameters are out of fashion now, and it has been observed recently that in Parliament one-half of the members does not quote Latin because the other half would not understand it. We may notice one slight error about Wellesley's statue in Calcutta. Colonel Malleon says that it is the only one under cover, all the others being exposed in the open air to dust and rain, and, it may be added, to serve as perches for adjutants and kites. Now, not to say that the statue of the Marquess of Hastings in Dalhousie Square has or had a shelter over it, those of Cornwallis and of Warren Hastings adorn the Town Hall. Wellesley himself is to be seen in one of the large rooms of Government House, and facing him there used to be the successor who most resembles Wellesley in the breadth of his foreign policy, in his enforcement of the only safe rule for all India—the ascendancy of England as the Paramount Power—and who from larger opportunities certainly surpassed Wellesley in the depth, extent, and variety of his internal reforms.

NOVELS.*

MR. FRANK BARRETT, author, amongst other clever books, of The Admirable Lady Biddy Fane, lets his readers down with rather a sharp run in Under a Strange Mask. Neither in conception nor execution is the last work to be compared to the former. In point of fact the plot of Under a Strange Mask seems to have got hold of Mr. Barrett rather than Mr. Barrett of it. The notion of a trickster attempting to pass himself off as a man more than double his age by making his face and figure up as an old beau trying to look young is ingenious. Lestranger, the rogue in question, has been an actor; and when the idea occurs to him of impersonating old Mr. Sylvester, and possessing himself of the defunct gentleman's estate, he conceives he can best do it by painting and enamelling his countenance so as to resemble an old man of eighty trying to look forty. These artificial embellishments and his simulations of senility generally have further the effect of making his friends and relations desire to be as little in the venerable gentleman's society as possible, which is convenient for the impostor. Under this plan lies another deeper. Lestranger adopts an old exploded suspicion of crime directed against Mr. Sylvester, and, whether believing in it or not, uses it to terrify his supposed granddaughter. This is all worked out with the ability Mr. Barrett possesses, but with too much haste and carelessness to get the full effect. The mysterious crime took place in 1828, the story is written in 1888; but the phrase "fifty years ago" is used again and again to tiresomeness, besides muddling Mr. Sylvester's age hopelessly. The family lawyer addresses his client, Lord Redlands, as "Sir" and "My Lord" alternately, and the ancestor of that "peer of the realm" is sometimes spoken of as Lord Redlands, and sometimes as Lord Gordon Redlands. Against these and other defects must be put the sweetness and sense of Marian Sylvester, a delightful young woman, of whom we see too little. Mr. Barrett draws girls well, and Miss Sylvester is one of his brightest and best.

The robustness of the imaginative machinery displayed in Mrs. G. Lewis Leeds's novel, The Master of Rylands, may possibly make up for its deficiencies in originality and subtlety. All good solid crime and horror here; no feeble supernatural effects or analytic delicacies. You have your villain, and your maniac, and your deformed dwarf, and your brutal keeper, and your lovely, defenceless girl, and your Spanish poisoner, and all of them good solid work too. Mrs. Leeds begins with a prologue which a timid author might have feared as tending to an anti-climax somewhat as the late Mrs. Procter's friends feared the motto she wished to place on the title-page of her Carlyle pamphlet, "He's, like a liar, gone to burning hell," might do. A horrible murder by a husband of his beautiful young wife, in a low drinking saloon in San Francisco, is the earliest scene. Then we pass on some nine or ten years, and find the maniac-murderer shut up in his ancestral home in Yorkshire, bullied by his groom-keeper, tyrannized by his Spanish mother-in-law (the poisoner), preyed upon by his villain brother-in-law, and in no wise comforted by the presence of his deformed dwarf boy. After this the tale is taken up and told by Miss Vera Langford, and we are bound to say the young lady is equal to the demands on her inventive and descriptive powers, and keeps the pace well up to the finish. Her brief residence at Rylands Court, of which the maniac-murderer was the "master," furnished sufficient excitement for the rest of a life, which, we add for the benefit of those who like a story to end well, is arranged in the future very happily.

An ancient abbey, acres of dark vaults underneath, unexplored passages of gloom and silence, vague exits on the beach, and entrances in glens, dead bodies in the ice cellar, smugglers in the wine vaults, coffins full of black lace, and murderers around generally, this is The Gargrave Mystery. It would be very thrilling, especially as there is a fine spirited girl and a good sort of fellow as a lover, and two detectives, amateur and professional, who are rather amusing, only Mr. Davidson, the author, has not been careful to hide from us that he is doing it all on purpose. The mystery is drawn out intentionally, cut neatly into chapters, patted into the proper shape, deftly arranged, and all in our sight. Vain is any attempt to take a bird in that way. It is too plainly a puzzle and too little of a mystery. But the story is brightly written, and if the author would give us a book about the coast, which he describes well, and the fisherfolk and rustics, whom he understands, without any frozen corpses or lunatic surgeons, it might be very good.

His name was John Stuart. He was, "as his name may lead some to suspect, a Scotchman, though neither his appearance nor his speech betrayed the fact." This unconsciously Johnsonian sentence introduces us to the hero of His Fatal Success, and most astonishing are the events which follow. Mr. Malcolm Bell, the "editor" of this remarkable work, is, as certain internal evidence leads us to "suspect," also a native of the North, and he tells the story, somewhat clumsily, of his friend John Stuart, whom we keep constantly expecting him to call Mill. He might, indeed, have called him anything; for by a process too tedious to repeat John Stuart has acquired the power of making his fleshly part disappear, and his spirit, no longer apparently under his own control, enters a body which had lived three hundred years ago in the days of Queen Elizabeth. At this point Mr. Bell's sense of humour is too much for him. The idea of making a spirit in some other vasty deep summon by mysterious arts a soul dwelling on this little globe of ours who is at the same moment making frantic efforts to raise him presents itself in a comic light which cannot be resisted, and the interview between the two, each insisting that the other is the genuine spook, is really amusing. The donnée is altered. All that was serious and solemn in John Stuart's uncanny efforts after the unseen changes to the absurd, and we never get back to the impressive tone of the introduction. The notion of depicting a spirit of to-day, transferred to a body of three hundred years ago, remembering his life here, and able to compare the two states, is one that might have been worked into something better; but the author seems to have hardly done his best with it. He is carried away by the fun of the situation, and can never resist a chance of making John Stuart's modern brusquerie contrast with the stilted Elizabethan style. All the

* Under a Strange Mask. By Frank Barrett. London, Paris, New York, and Melbourne: Cassell & Co. 1889.

The Master of Rylands. By Mrs. G. Lewis Leeds. London: Ward & Downey. 1889.

The Gargrave Mystery. By Hugh Coleman Davidson. London and New York: Warne & Co. 1889.

His Fatal Success. By Malcolm Bell. "Lovell Library." London: Henry J. Drane.

The Queen of Bedlam: a Story of Frontier Army Life. By Captain Charles King. London: Warne & Co. 1889.

melodramatic scenes of piracy, rebellion, and Popish-plot business John Stuart goes through before his return to his natural body are but perfunctory and so much stage scenery.

The Queen of Bedlam, described further on the title-page as "a story of frontier army life," suggests at any rate variety of interest, but the novel fails to support the promise. "Bedlam" is the name given to a ramshackle building occupied by bachelor officers and accidental guests, while Miss Forrest is only its "queen" by the right the prettiest girl in any place has to reign over it. As to the "frontier army life" which passes on the borders of the North American Indian territory, there is but little of it seen in these pages. There is a thief in the Laramie military station; dollars and diamonds, amethysts and cigar cases vanish, and the "queen" is suspected. Two hundred and eighty-four pages are given to the elucidation of the mystery and to the record of feminine gossip and camp scandals, and though at the close the reader knows something he did not know at the beginning, his intellectual or moral gain is nil.

ART IN THE MODERN STATE.*

FRANCE, which has so often made political experiments for the benefit of the world rather than herself, never made one more costly, or in the end more disastrous, than when she pressed all her artistic resources into the service of the State. The experiment had not even the merit of being either a fair or a final one; for the State was not France, but the King of France, and the result does not show that it is not for the benefit of a nation that the best talent of it should be at the disposal of the Government, and should be fostered by public education and endowment, but only that, under exceptional circumstances not very likely to recur precisely in the history of the world, it is not good for art, nor good for a country, that the whole of its taste and invention should be forced to swell the pomp and pander to the extravagance of an absolute monarch. Lady Dilke rightly views this chapter in the history of France as the development of the policy of Richelieu, the natural and inevitable result of his schemes to knit together the scattered forces of the kingdom into a great political engine, and she gives full credit to the great Cardinal for the patriotic idea which was at the root of all his virtues and all his crimes. She points out how he was the first of modern statesmen to conceive the idea of making not only the material, but the intellectual, power of a people the servants and creatures of the State, by extending its control to the literature, and even to the language itself. Passing over the period of Mazarin and the Fronde, when the plans of Richelieu were temporarily checked—at least in appearance—she shows how Colbert completed the work which Richelieu had so nearly finished, and harnessed Art also to the great chariot of the French Government. Unfortunately that Government was not the glorious representative of France which Richelieu contemplated in his dreams, but—Louis XIV.

If in course of time Louis XIV. became France, so also in due course Le Brun became French art. The nation became a Court, its art a courtier. As to the fitness of Le Brun for his position there can be not the smallest doubt; he seems to have been made on purpose for it. When we try to analyse our impression of the "Grand Siècle" it is difficult to say how much is Louis XIV., how much Le Brun. Together they carried out the theory that the King is the State and that the former is the full and sufficient representative of the latter in all things, Art included—this theory they carried out to its logical absurdity. That Le Brun did not represent the best artistic taste at the disposal of the monarch was nothing as long as he represented the taste of the monarch, and this he did as no one else could have done. If his invention was not of the highest quality, it was fertile and versatile to a quite extraordinary degree; if his taste was not of the purest, it was balanced and magnificent; if he had no strong individuality or originality, these were precisely the qualities which were of the least importance for his position; if there were greater sculptors and painters and decorators than he, there was none so learned in all the arts; if amongst the great army of artists gathered together under the standard of Louis XIV. there were men of greater and rarer genius, there was none so fitted to take command. It was an army of which any general might be proud—one which, when we regard its numbers, its discipline, and its trained skill, must be acknowledged as the most wonderful body of organized artistic power which has ever been formed. And Le Brun had two qualities indispensable in a great organizer and commander; he knew how to accommodate his plans to the will and pleasure of his master, and how to make the labours of others subserve his own ideas. If the unity was forced, it was effected; if his music was not of the noblest, it was grand and in tune; if his style was not pure, it was strong and distinct. Whether for good or for evil, this great artistic general formed an army which was powerful enough, not only to maintain supremacy at home, but also to march abroad and conquer the whole of Europe.

No doubt he found much material ready-made to his hands. Vouet had been before him, and Fouquet before his master. Art as a luxury and a privilege of the great, the expenditure of enormous sums in palaces and gardens and waterworks, were no inventions of Le Brun or Louis XIV. The employment in the King's service of large bodies of the best artists of all kinds had been commenced by Henri IV., though from much higher motives than self-aggrandizement, and the ideals of many artists only needed a touch to bring them into line with the grandiose conceptions of Le Brun; some, like that of Le Nôtre, the famous architecte jardinier, did not need even this. But Le Brun's tact was not shown more in the way he handled these manageable materials than in keeping out of the sphere of his influence and patronage those men who had sufficient independence of artistic thought to be inconvenient. The repression of individuality was necessary to his autocracy, as it was to Richelieu's. It cannot quite be said of Le Brun's collaborateurs, as Lady Dilke says of the original members of the Académie Française, that the list does not contain a single name of note; but the reputations of even the best of them—of Baptiste de Champagne, the Coypels and the Boullognes, De la Fosse and Houasse, Andran and Jouvenet—exist only as those of satellites to the great star of Le Brun. Here and there, but especially among the purely decorative artists or the ébénistes, you find a name like that of Boulle, distinguished for invention and fine workmanship, or one like Berain, whose taste is seen in designs excelling those of Le Brun in refinement and grace; but how many persons know the name of Berain, and still a few years ago how many even of those who are proud of their "Buhl" cabinets knew why they were so called? The lesson taught by Le Brun is that, if you want to form a style which shall be absolute as the State, the thing can be done, provided you pour out money like water, and get a first-rate manager like Le Brun; but you must not expect much variety or the development of originality, or that your style shall represent the highest and noblest of the nation's genius. There is no room for your Poussins and Claudes and your Pugets, nor even for your Le Sueurs and Le Nains, in the "coach and six" of a Louis XIV. or a Le Brun.

The question remains whether, after you have got your style so strong and distinct and so well organized that it not only rules the taste of the nation which produces it, but also of those that surround it, its effect is wholesome for art or wholesome for the State. If we judge solely by the experiment of the "Grand Siècle," there can be little doubt as to the answer. In the hands of Louis XIV. it became mainly an instrument for personal aggrandizement, and of extravagance so colossal that it sapped the credit of the country, and it imposed not only on France, but on Europe, an art from which the highest aims and sentiments were excluded, and in which the right relations between the different branches of art were turned almost topsy-turvy. Speaking generally, it may be stated that a system was established in which the architecture became inferior in quality to the decoration, the sculpture to the painting, the painting to the engraving; under which, if we seek for real masterpieces of art in their kind, we must go to the tapestry-weaver and the cabinet-maker, to the gilder and the engraver, and perhaps it may be not far from the truth if we say that real honours of this huge and potent art-movement remain, not with the artist, but with the artisan, and that what it has left to us most worthy of imitation is not its beauty and nobleness of design, but its thoroughness and skill of execution.

Lady Dilke does not indulge us with her views as to the proper function of "Art in the Modern State." Her rôle is that rather of the chronicler than the teacher, and what may be called the argument of both books is that the art of Louis XIV. was the logical consequence of the statesmanship of Richelieu, the aim of which was to create "the modern State" on "the crumbling ruins of feudalism," by organizing the patriotism of France in its reaction against the disintegrating effect of the Renaissance, and that the consequent absolutism produced that democratic reaction which, commencing at the French Revolution, is still active both in art and politics. The whole volume has the sober air of a political treatise, untouched by enthusiasm. It is a serene and lucid arrangement of facts, designed rather as a contribution to our knowledge than as an appeal to our taste or emotion. Indeed, the interest of this particular chapter in the history of modern art is more scientific than æsthetic, more intellectual than spiritual. We are out of touch with the sentiment, out of sympathy with the ideal of the time which produced the glories of Versailles and Marly. Never, perhaps, did art contrive a more splendid show; but it was but a show, a passing pageant, which, once passed, was over for ever, leaving little behind but a sense of gorgeousness and the sound of trumpets and big drums. To write the history of this pageant, to describe the genesis and progress of the "splendid scheme inaugurated by Colbert and Le Brun," is a task which would not be attractive to many; but it is one that is not without its value, not only as a lesson in history, but for the light which it throws upon French character and French art, a light indispensable to anything like a true or just appreciation of the latter, and we may be glad that it has been taken up by one so competent as Lady Dilke. It needed some one whose interest in the time was not entirely artistic; for, as the author owns, "to those who care for no work in which they cannot find evidence of the continuous ripening of some deep passion and purpose, the magnificent productions of the age of Louis XIV. can bring little but disgust," and it is evident that, if Lady Dilke found pleasure in writing her book, it was because she looked upon these productions with the eyes of a political historian rather than a critic. Speaking of the suppression of individuality and other sacrifices necessary to establish the scheme of Colbert, she writes :—

* Art in the Modern State. By Lady Dilke. London: Chapman & Hall, Limited.

The end imposed the means ; the enormous influence over the whole field of national industry which the Academy acquired could not have been obtained at a lesser price. To judge the work done for France by these men and their chief we must look, in the first place, to the political importance of the enterprise, to the splendour and magnificence of the whole conception, and to the perfect finish of every detail. Everywhere we see signs of a marvellous promptitude of purpose and certainty in the calculation of desired effect, the outcome of a training exactly adapted to its ends. If on close inspection the "sublime style," which leaves its imprint on things great and small, seems, like that of Bossuet's funeral discourses, to have a nobler show than substance ; if, as Michelet wittily remarks, the "trumpet appears to have become the national instrument," it was at least an instrument most appropriate to the ceremonial of an ostentatious Court. Stage effects were the object of every artist, and to his contemporaries Le Brun appeared as he did to Lépicié, "Our great poet in painting."

Nevertheless, though capable of viewing the whole subject from such a comprehensive point of view, it is beyond Lady Dilke's power to infuse much interest into its details, especially where works of art are concerned. When she is describing the intrigues of Colbert in the formation of the Academy, the struggle of that body with the maitrise, or the extravagance of Louis XIV., she has no difficulty in sustaining our interest ; but it somewhat sinks during her description of the works at Versailles and the different parts taken therein by a number of now almost indistinguishable artists. This part of her work is to be praised for the care with which it has been done and the labour and research to which it testifies ; but there will be few who care to go so minutely over the same ground, even with the assistance of so learned a guide. To do this, not a political, but an artistic, enthusiasm is necessary, and this will not be possessed by many of her readers. It is evidently not possessed by the writer herself, although she favourably contrasts the spirit of Le Brun's art with that of his successors. "Brilliant indeed," she says, "were many of these men ; all too fascinating the idylls of their theatrical Arcadia, the powdered charms of their voluptuous nymphs ; and surely the names of Watteau and Chardin shall ever be counted as an honour to France. Yet, looking back, we see the elder days were other. 'Soyez galant,' cries Boucher ; but Le Brun said 'Soyez noble.'" The epigram is just ; but the nobleness was not artistically so interesting as the gallantry, and the heroics of Le Brun were as false as the Arcadia of Boucher.

But the writer's and our own interests are again more warmly engaged when she deals with the engravers like Claude Mellan and Edelinck and Callot ; for then we come upon work that is first-rate of its kind, and in the case of Callot we encounter an original and unique genius. It is impossible not to feel as we read Lady Dilke's admirable criticisms on such worthy work that a writer so capable of appreciating it with such discrimination must have enjoyed this part of her task in an unusual degree, and looked upon it as something like a reward for her patient labour in compiling facts about the featureless collaborateurs of Le Brun. And in the case of Callot she has had the additional fortune of being able to publish for the first time some notes from some documents relating to his stay and work in Florence, which are preserved in the archives of that city. From these it appears that for the space of a year (probably from July 1619 to July 1620) Callot was on the list of the Grand Duke's household, "without salary, but in the enjoyment of all the privileges conceded to those in the receipt of salaries." Two facsimiles are given of receipts signed by Callot, which show that he was commissioned by the Grand Duke to etch thirty-two views of the most noteworthy spots in Jerusalem ; and other documents prove that Callot had a shop in the Galleria di Corte in 1619 and 1620. No more cruel commentary could have been given by Lady Dilke on the art of the "Grand Siècle" than by the publication of these few trifling notes upon Callot ; for they are probably of more interest to lovers of art than any possible discovery about the lives and works of Le Brun or any of his collaborateurs.

STORIES.*

THERE are five stories in Miss Lawless's volume, and though they widely differ in merit, every one is interesting and creditable. The author of Hurish, though she is not always very careful about the construction of her sentences, is lifted above the tribe of gentlewomen who scribble with ease by the fact that she can write. In the volume before us she is discovered alternately true to her first and best inspiration, and

* Plain Frances Mowbray, and other Tales. By the Hon. Emily Lawless. London : John Murray.

Passe Rose. By Arthur Sherburne Hardy. London : Sampson Low & Co.

That Frenchman ! By Archibald Clavering Gunter. London : Routledge & Sons.

Red Ruin : a Tale of West African River Life. By A. N. Homer. London : Ward & Downey.

Audrey Ferris. A Novel. By Francis A. Gerard. London : Ward & Downey.

Heathcote. A Novel. By Ella MacMahon. 2 vols. London : Ward & Downey.

A Lost Wife. A Novel. By Mrs. H. Lovett Cameron. 2 vols. London : White & Co.

Dragon's Teeth. A Novel. Translated by Miss Mary Serrano from the Portuguese. Boston : Ticknor & Co.

yielding to a desire to emulate Mr. Henry James in his own field. The story called "A Ligurian Episode" is the least satisfactory specimen of the second condition of mind. The cautious gentleman of middle life, enjoying some property, and suffering from no personal or professional ties, who steps out of Italian trains at wayside stations for the mere freak of the thing, and then finds countrymen of his own in whimsical conjunctions, this gentleman belongs to Mr. Henry James, and Miss Lawless should not attempt, by making this personage actually do something, to oblige us to believe that he does not. Her conversations will never be so smart and so real as Mr. James's, and as this class of short story subsists upon conversation, her bright touches of description and action are not enough to secure her success. The same is, in a measure, true of the more satisfactory Venetian tale or novelette, called "Plain Frances Mowbray," which has some very charming character-painting in it, and a mild suffusion of humour. But this, again, gives the reader a painful sense of deliberate competition with Mr. James. We greatly prefer those stories in which Miss Lawless is wholly herself, "Quin Lough" and "Namesakes," little fantastic modern romances of life in the West of Ireland. Miss Lawless has written nothing more picturesque than the account of how Judge Quin came to the round tower, like Childe Roland, and how amazingly he was received in that romantic locality. The funny domestic mystery, which the reader discovers the secret of a little sooner than the author intends, is not only very charming in itself, but it has an emblematic meaning at once humorous and pathetic. Castle Quin will never be a residence very desirable or very intelligible to the reasonable Saxon. The exasperated Nationalist carman who drives the Judge to Quin Lough is one of the happiest creations of the author. If "Quin Lough" presents us with the humour and oddity of West Irish life, we get the fancy and melancholy charm in "Namesakes," a slight, almost too slight sketch of a Kerry episode, very delicately given. We hope that Miss Lawless will resign the ambition of vying with Mr. Henry James in Ligurian and Venetian studies of small talk, and will take us oftener with her when she re-visits County Clare.

Mr. A. S. Hardy, whose merits would be more generally acknowledged, perhaps, if he had not the misfortune to bear a name which seems to be the property of a greater man, has achieved a certain distinction by two carefully written, although somewhat over-strained and over-ornamented, stories ; but those who know him only by But Yet a Woman and The Wind of Destiny will find little to remind them of those books in Passe Rose. The style is the same, a little chastened ; but the scene is laid at the end of the eighth century, a period with which novelists have hitherto been shy of meddling. The action proceeds partly in the town of Maestricht, and partly in the imperial city of Aix-la-Chapelle, the glories of which, under Charlemagne, are described with considerable lusciousness. So far as we can make out, the story occupies the two years from 799 to 801, although there is not a date from the first page to the last. The mediæval character of the life described has been studied with a great deal of care ; and, on the whole, the impression, though rather operatic—as notably in the scene in which Passe Rose emerges from the wood, and sits under the terrace where the Queen's maidens are waiting for Gui de Tours—is vivid and persuasive. It is inevitable, we suppose, to the exigencies of a modern novel that ideas should be attributed to the humbler characters of the story which are essentially modern and sentimental. The relations of Passe Rose, the little foundling, and of Friedgis, the Saxon porter, are an example of this. The opening scene, in which the gigantic Friedgis takes Passe Rose roughly in his arms and throws her bodily out of the enclosure of the monastery, while she scratches him like a mad cat, is exceedingly lifelike ; but Mr. Hardy wants his big Saxon and his little gipsy to be sympathetic novel-figures, and they never do anything rude or violent again, in that natural way, to the end of the story. Costume, architecture, geography, all the sciences, are summoned to give an air of realism ; but the people are hopelessly modern, in spite of the superficial violence of their passions. Nevertheless, Passe Rose is a conscientious and an interesting book, and will increase the reputation of its author.

There seems to us to be nothing for it but to say that That Frenchman ! is a shockingly bad book. The British public is so inscrutable that it may possibly take this new work by the author of Mr. Barnes of New York under its protection, and buy it in thousands. It may buy it in millions, if it will, without persuading us that the novel has any right whatever to exist. That Frenchman ! is supposed to be a study, in the manner of Gaboriau (alack !), of life in Paris at the close of the Second Empire. A ludicrous plot against the life of the Prince Imperial is the central point round which the incidents are supposed to revolve. There is no truth in the life, in the characters, in the sentiments, or even in the bric-à-brac. The pages are plentifully larded with French phrases, although the author knows the French language so imperfectly as to talk of le deux Aquardo and la diable (p. 30), and as to call a man a petite crevé. The hero is a perfectly impossible character, an effeminate marquis of enormous courage and physical strength, utterly idle and mysteriously omniscient, who is in the habit of wrestling in public masqued. The author, lost in rapturous admiration of this gentleman, as he appears "in pearl-silk tights so delicate in texture that they glow with the colour of the gleaming flesh that strains beneath them," asks the hero himself this remarkable conundrum :—"My jack o' dandy, my Court pet, my woman-charmer, are you a mountebank or are you a colossus?" Intellectually speaking, we are afraid we cannot say that Mr. Gunter is a colossus.

It is an uncomfortable story of crime and vulgar violence which Mr. Homer has told in Red Ruin. The scene is laid at a station on a West African river, and the moral of the tale is the reward which a brute named McMullin finally reaps for his tactless insolence and tyranny to the blacks. There is a sympathetic heroine, one Joyce, a fine and good girl. But the book is sketchy, and does not bring up before us a very real or vivid picture of the scenes described. The portrait of the chief Magunda is rather well drawn.

There is very little to be said about Audrey Ferris or about Heathcote. They belong to the large class of modern story in which the lives of very commonplace people are shown to circle entirely around the adventures of one or two pairs of good-looking lovers. We have noticed before the extraordinary absence of any sort of business, or even rational daily interest, in life which characterizes the persons in most English novels of the third class. From anything that appears, no one who is mentioned has any employment, makes any income, indulges any hobby, or exercises any intellectual or even political influence. We meet with an amusing instance of this in Heathcote (which, nevertheless, is the better written of the two), where the Dean of the Cathedral city in which the incidents take place has to be mentioned. The Dean of a prominent diocese is more likely than not to be a man of remarkable attainments and striking character. One remembers what Anthony Trollope or Mrs. Oliphant could make of a Dean. To the third-rate lady-novelist, however, a Dean who is not in love (and it is improbable that he should be), and has no daughters or nieces, is a person without importance of any kind, a useless pawn in this absorbing game of amorosity. Accordingly the author of Heathcote makes the pleasing remark:—

It must be confessed that the Dean was an unattractive old man. He is interesting, however, in that he was destined—quite unknowingly to himself—to be the means of bringing great joy into Heathcote's life.

Heathcote being the fatuous first lover, a lowly, lovely youth, all fire and tenderness, and, so far as we discover, with no means whatever of securing a livelihood. We hope it is not unkind to advise Miss Ella MacMahon and Miss Frances Gerard to make no further experiments in the thankless fields of fiction.

Mrs. Lovett Cameron is by no means in the same category. Her new novel forms a smart sensational story of none of the worst kind, easily leading the reader on from one improbable incident to another. Each of its volumes is sufficiently complete to exist alone. A Lost Wife would form a good short story for publication, by instalments, in a newspaper. It is brisk, scrappy, and rapid; introduces new characters, defines them in something like short-hand, makes them grapple with hero or heroine, knocks them over, carries them off and buries them before the reader has time to gasp. The "lost wife" has been lost by the artifice of a vigilant (or Vigilance) sister, who, believing her not to be really married to the gentleman of her choice, carries her off that, "if her life and her health have been wrecked by him, he shall not at all events be able to pollute her soul." But, unfortunately, the marriage had been a perfectly valid one, and there was no pollution in the matter. The disconsolate bridegroom learns to love another, and this other goes (by a pure coincidence) to be companion to the shattered, but still unpolluted, "lost wife." The gentleman follows them, discovers them, and makes a fine to-do. It all turns out right at the end, and A Lost Wife, in its own deciduous kind, is not a bad story.

After so much work, in which the highest aim, and that seldom reached, is talent, it is refreshing to come across a book, even in the tarnished mirror of a translation, which is by a man of genius. Dragon's Teeth is the name given by Miss Mary Serrano to her version of O Primo Bazilio, a novel which many critics have not hesitated to describe as the masterpiece of Eça de Queiros, the first Portuguese writer of our generation. It is a tragic social story of the Lisbon life of to-day, full of colour, rich in picturesque detail, and displaying a power of realizing, with humour as well as a little cynical asperity, the shifting incidents of modern life, not surpassed by M. Guy de Maupassant, the writer with whom it seems most natural to compare Eça de Queiros. We believe that this is the first opportunity which English readers have enjoyed of appreciating the great Portuguese novelist. Miss Serrano's translation is, on the whole, graceful and exact, and we hope she will proceed to give us other standard works from Portugal.

OUR FRIENDS IN THE HUNTING-FIELD.*

WHEN each chapter in a light book is complete in itself, the reviewer is tempted to suspect that at least a considerable portion of the work may have done duty before in the form of articles for some journal, and we confess that we looked for an acknowledgment of "kind permission" to reprint among the first few leaves of Our Friends in the Hunting-Field. As nothing of the kind appears, the whole of its matter, without doubt, is now published for the first time; but, for all that, the book labours under some of the disadvantages of a collection of reprints. For this reason it is not best suited for continuous reading, yet it has the counterbalancing advantage of being useful and convenient for spare moments, and it might have been written for the express purpose of amusing husbands while their wives are keeping them waiting.

There are only three portraits of women—the popular woman, the dangerous woman, the jealous woman—and neither of them meets with any mercy at the hands of the author. The men represented are the melancholy man, the man who blows his own trumpet, the sporting horse-dealer, the man who goes first, the venerable dandy, the farmer, the funk-stick, the good Samaritan, the hospitable man, the bore, and the man who has lost his nerve. These are just the sorts of subjects which suit Mrs. Edward Kennard best, and she has dealt with them admirably. We fully sympathize with her in her antipathy to "a wild and a dangerous female" in the hunting-field, and we agree with her in thinking that, although there is a charm in seeing a fine horse-woman sailing along over a difficult country, there is something exceedingly repulsive in the spectacle of a woman "bundling over a fence," as well as in the awkward attitudes of a bad lady-rider, who "bumps and rolls over the trying ridge and furrow, forcibly reminding one of an ornamental jelly, that quivers and shakes preparatory to a most tremendous downfall."

If Mrs. Edward Kennard is rather hard upon her own sex, it must not be supposed that she allows the other to go scot-free. She never lets an opportunity slip of remarking upon the greediness and selfishness of men. Both Landing a Prize and Our Friends in the Hunting-Field, her two latest works, are preached chiefly upon this edifying text. We men, it seems, are never really happy unless we have been heavily fed, or, as some of us in our "own expressive language" term it, "'well done.' And to be 'well done' is the first secret of gaining that refined, delicate, fine-fibred thing, a man's heart." This is a graceful compliment. Women, of course, never care for luncheons, teas, ices, dinners, suppers, champagne, or any vanities of that kind! A little cold mutton and a glass of beer is obviously all that they ever wish for. As far as we can gather, the only perfect man is the husband of the popular woman who allows his wife to do exactly what she likes, and is "content to play second fiddle." The account of the melancholy man is a sad one. "He hunts, shoots, races, fishes, and swears, but from none of these things—not even the latter—does he derive more than very temporary satisfaction." This reminds us that, next to eating and drinking, swearing seems, from the author's account, to be of all things the most necessary to man. The chief reason of men's dislike to being knocked over by hard-riding women is that they have not in such cases "the gratification of expressing their sentiments in forcible language, and" of allowing "wounded feeling a natural outlet." Eight chapters further on, again, in referring to the jealous woman who usurps men's places "at every fence they come to," the author says:—"Being a woman they have not even the satisfaction of swearing at her, which adds insult to injury." On the other hand, the man who has lost his nerve, according to the author, finds consolation in calling his groom "a d—d fool." We infer from all this that it does not much matter what happens to a man, provided he can swear at it. Mrs. Edward Kennard's writing is so good that we should like to see her make it even better by giving up her wearisome habit of repetition. To illustrate our meaning, we will take the rather appropriate chapter on the bore. "The subject of conversation he chooses is nearly always himself or his immediate belongings." On the next page we read that "the bore always works back to himself and his ideas and utterly refuses to listen to yours," and on the next that "he runs on and won't hearken to you when you try to put in a small word in return and try to relate your experiences." A little further on we find him "steadily adhering to his own pet subjects of conversation and entirely ignoring yours. Such egotism is disgusting." In the next paragraph "he is always full of himself," and a little later he "is as egotistical as he is tiresome." And so, as she herself would say, "on and on!"

Mrs. Edward Kennard makes some very true remarks about a fine physique having nothing to do with nerve. "You see some great, big, healthy man, with rosy cheeks, the limbs of a giant, and the digestion of an ostrich;" yet he "rarely jumps except under disagreeably high pressure." "He hunts to amuse himself, and not to commit suicide in a delicate fashion which shall afford his friends no apprehension as to the state of his immortal soul." "On the other hand, some long, lank, frail-looking individual whose appearance certainly leads you to suppose that he has already one foot in the grave, goes like a demon, and repeatedly charges impossible fences which no living horse can clear." Who is so hardened as to be untouched with the author's description of the funk-stick?—the man whose "heart goes thump, thump, thump against his ribs," "torturing fears disturbing it," while "his nerves quiver and his teeth chatter, but not from cold alone." The pages devoted to the farmers are very true and to the point. Indeed, on the subject of wire the author argues the non-hunting farmer's case strongly. Altogether, Our Friends in the Hunting-Field is a capital little book of its kind, and our best wish to its able author is that none of her "friends in the hunting-field" may recognize their own portraits. Heaven help her if they do!

* Our Friends in the Hunting-Field. By Mrs. Edward Kennard. 1 vol. London: F. V. White. 1889.

DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY.—VOL. XIX.*

FORTY Fitzgeralds, there or thereabouts, good, bad, and indifferent, and no word of Thomas Judkin-Fitzgerald, whose doings as High Sheriff of Tipperary in 1798 have so recently been brought up by Mr. Gladstone as a new argument against the Union. From one point of view it is, no doubt, much to be wished that the deeds alike of Judkin-Fitzgerald and of everybody else in '98 should pass out of memory. Politically, the sooner the darkness of oblivion descends upon them the better. But as a fact of history "Flogging Fitzgerald" seems to have as much claim to a place in the Dictionary of National Biography as his namesake "Fighting Fitzgerald," to whom a notice has been given—though not an exhaustive one, for it does not touch upon the story, true or false, that the renowned duellist encased himself in a chain-shirt.

Even with the omission of the High Sheriff of Tipperary, the articles on the Fitzgeralds make up a substantial contribution to Irish history. First in chronological, though not in alphabetical, order comes Maurice Fitzgerald, "an English conqueror of Ireland"—ethnologically of Norman-Welsh blood, his mother being the daughter of the King of South Wales. Personally, Maurice Fitzgerald seems (according to Giraldus) to have been one of the most estimable of men, though he did England the ill service of meddling (by Irish invitation) in Irish affairs, and thereby was at least part cause of woes unnumbered. From him sprang the Fitzgeralds or Geraldines, who for many centuries played a great part in the troublous history of the distressful country. About one of the later members of the clan, Lord Edward Fitzgerald, the would-be rebel of 1798, there still hangs something of a halo of romance, due to his euphonious name, his youth, his folly, his death, and the mystery that attaches to his beautiful young wife Pamela, the reputed daughter of Égalité Orleans. Lord Edward and his wife both find a biographer in Mr. Alger, from whose account it appears that certainty upon the vexed, but not very important, question of Pamela's parentage is not attainable. Pamela did not, as, with a proper consideration for romance, she should have done, remain an inconsolable widow. She married Pitcairn, the American Consul at Hamburg, separated from him after the birth of a daughter, and led a wandering sort of life, in the course of which she got rid of a good deal of money, so that at her death Louis Philippe had to be drawn upon to provide her funeral. Another lady who seems to have been rather the object of romance than romantic in herself is "the Fair Geraldine," more prosaically Lady Elizabeth Fitzgerald, whose historical fortune has been made by Surrey's poetical and, as it would seem, perfectly harmless and conventional passion for her. If the conjectural date—1528—of her birth is accurate, she was about twelve years old when Surrey, a married man of five or six years' standing, began to declare his love à la Petrarch in song and sonnet. It is a sad fact that, probably under pressure of family poverty, the fair Geraldine was married off at fifteen to a sexagenarian widower, Sir Anthony Browne. He died in 1548, the year after that in which Surrey's head had fallen on the scaffold. About 1552 she became the third wife of the Earl of Lincoln, seems to have got on well with her husband, but ill with her stepchildren, and died a childless widow at the age of sixty-one. To the imagination of an Elizabethan novelist appear to be due the stories of Surrey's vision of his fair Geraldine in Cornelius Agrippa's magic mirror, and his challenge to all comers to dispute her beauty with him in chivalric combat—stories which were turned to poetical account by Drayton and by Sir Walter Scott. The date 1578 here assigned by Mr. Lee to the publication of Drayton's "Heroicall Epistle" is clearly a slip. Mr. Bullen's article on Drayton gives 1597 as the date of the first edition and 1598 of the second edition of the Heroicall Epistles; and the date of 1578, besides making Drayton only fifteen at the time of publication, is inconsistent with Mr. Lee's own belief that the magic mirror story originated with Nashe in 1594. Yet another female Fitzgerald of fame is that "frisky old girl," the centenarian Countess of Desmond—Katherine Fitzgerald, second wife of the twelfth Earl of Desmond. The stories that the venerable dame came to her end by a fall from a cherry, apple, or walnut tree "may be dismissed as fictions," and with them the imputation of excessive friskiness. Old she certainly was, though the precise tale of her years is unascertained. Tradition carries it as high as "about" 140, or even 160, years. Sir John Harington, in a passage evidently referring to, though not actually naming, her, puts it "above 120"; and her present biographer, the Rev. W. D. Macray, concludes from ascertained data that she "can hardly have been less than 104 years old at the time of her decease" in 1604, and may have been ten years more. It is to be feared that tradition errs in placing her wedding in the reign of Edward IV.—i.e. in or before 1483—and making her dance with the future Richard III. Even if we throw back the date of her birth to a sufficient distance, the evidence is strong that she could not have been married to the Earl of Desmond till, at the earliest, 1506, twenty years after the death of Richard III. The story may be true of Desmond's first wife, the Countess Sheela; and tradition is quite capable of rolling two Ladies Desmond into one.

Among minor Fitzgeralds we must not pass over William

Thomas, "versifier," upon whom Byron and the Rejected Addresses have conferred a ludicrous immortality. Fitzgerald had many merits; his sentiments were admirably loyal and patriotic; he never gave the authorities any trouble (which is more than can be said of all Fitzgeralds); and, judging from the account of his behaviour towards one of his parodists, either James or Horace Smith, he must have had a temper of Christian sweetness. But even his biographer (Mr. Marzials) has to own that Fitzgerald's "Tyrtaean compositions" (as the Annual Register for 1803 terms them in all seriousness) "are very bad."

Of other Fitzes, mediæval and modern, legitimate and illegitimate, there are infinite varieties, ranging from Fitzailwin and Fitzalan to Fitzwarine and Fitzwilliam. Under the family name of Fitzgibbon we find the Earl of Clare, Lord Chancellor of Ireland from 1789 to 1802, to whom the passing of the Act of Union was mainly due. His biographer, Mr. Macdonell, steers a middle course between the Grattan view of Clare as the basest of men, without one redeeming virtue, and that of Mr. Froude, who has made him out an unsullied patriot, thinking only of his country's good. Here, also, to set off against Clare, is the man whose "appointment [in Mr. Gladstone's words] seemed to open for Ireland the gates of Paradise"—Earl Fitzwilliam, Lord-Lieutenant for a few months of 1794-5. Among Fitzherberts we notice Maria Anne, née Smythe, who is uncompromisingly described by her biographer Mr. Kebbel as "wife of George IV." More edifying are the associations with the sainted William Fitzherbert, Archbishop of York, in the twelfth century, and the object of a cult which never became more than local. His history is painstakingly dealt with by Professor T. F. Tout. Thomas Becket's friend and biographer Fitzstephen and his murderer Fitzurse both find places at no great distance from each other. Fitzurse, who by the double-edged working of the clerical immunities was not amenable to lay jurisdiction, was with his comrades ordered by the Pope to the Holy Land, and is said by Hoveden to have died while doing penance in the "Black Mountain" ("in Monte Nigro")—an unexplained name, which the present biographer, Mr. Hunt, thinks "was evidently intended to indicate some place, probably a religious house, near Jerusalem." One legend, however, puts him off upon Ireland, and connects him with "the wild Irish, and rebellious family of M'Mahunde," as Spelman reports in the History of Sacrilege.

There are twenty-two Finches and Finch-Hattons, and twenty-four Fishers, chief among them Henry VIII.'s victim, the Bishop of Rochester, who is the subject of an interesting article by Mr. Bass Mullinger. We think that the date of Fisher's formal beatification by the Roman Catholic Church should have been given. The names of Fleming, Flemming, and Flemyng muster twenty-six entries among them, including a notice by the editor in, for him, an unusually effusive spirit, of that fascinating child-phenomenon, the "Pet Margarie" (Margaret Fleming) dear to Sir Walter Scott. Fletcher is also a strongly represented name. The history of Fletcher the dramatist's works—for of him personally there is but little to tell—is treated thoroughly and critically by Mr. Bullen. With regard to the play of the Two Noble Kinsmen, he holds that there is no ground for supposing that Shakspeare and Fletcher worked together upon it. His view is that some passages written by Shakspeare for a revival of an old play on the same theme came after Shakspeare's death into the hands of Fletcher and Massinger, and were used by them in the Two Noble Kinsmen. Henry VIII. he considers to be also a joint production of Fletcher and Massinger, with some Shakspearian passages incorporated. Andrew Fletcher of Saltoun, who, it may be noted, was a Scottish Nationalist and anti-Unionist, finds a careful biographer in Mr. Espinasse; and Fletcher or De la Flechere, the saintly Methodist vicar of Madely, is appreciatively treated by Canon Overton. We are surprised that Fletcher's wife, Mary Bosanquet, has not been thought worthy of more than a few passing words. Long before she married Fletcher she was an active worker and preacher for the Methodists; the memoirs compiled from her journal form an interesting piece of religious biography, and are valuable for the pictures they give of early Methodism; and altogether she was to the full as deserving of a biography as Ruth Follows, the preaching Quakeress who is commemorated in this volume.

Under Forbes there are thirty-eight entries, perhaps one of the most interesting being Edward Forbes the naturalist, by Mr. G. T. Bettany. Of Ford or Forde there are twenty, including Ford the dramatist, who is treated of by Mr. Bullen. We must not forget to mention Miss Clerke's interesting article on Flamsteed, the first Astronomer-Royal; Professor Laughton's account of Flinders, the discoverer and hydrographer, to whom Australia owes its name; and Mr. Sidney Colvin's life of Flaxman the sculptor. Mr. Archer's article on the evil counsellor of William Rufus, Ranulf, or (as here spelt) Rannulf, Flambard, and Mr. Firth's on Cromwell's son-in-law, Charles Fleetwood, also merit notice; and we must not pass over Mr. Garnett's pleasantly-written accounts of Finlay, the historian of Greece, and of Albany Fonblanque, a mighty name in "journalism" in the thirties. The Rev. Alexander Gordon gives an interesting account of Fludd or Flud, the Rosicrucian physician, together with a long and careful list of his principal works; while Mr. Lee tells the history of the very disreputable astrologer and quack Simon Forman, who was mixed up in the Essex-Overbury scandals of King James I.'s Court. Mr. Lee also supplies the biography of Mary Fitton, who occupied but did not adorn the position of maid of honour to Queen Elizabeth, and who has risen suddenly into fame by reason of the theory identifying her as "the dark lady" of Shakspeare's sonnets—an ingenious theory, says Mr. Lee, but one which, in "the present state of the evidence," cannot be definitely accepted. No doubt it is interesting to know "who's who." But, after all, it is no great joy to have the image of Mary Fitton—"popular [as her biographer says] with the young men at court"—involved in commonplace intrigues with the Earl of Pembroke and Sir Richard Leveson, married to Captain Polwhele and Captain Lougher, and perhaps to a third husband unknown—to have this image of common clay presented to us as an equivalent for the mysterious visionary figure of Shakspeare's pale, dark-eyed temptress.

* Dictionary of National Biography. Edited by Leslie Stephen. Vol. XIX. Finch—Forman. London: Smith, Elder, & Co. 1889.

DIABETES.*

THIS book is a typical example of too many that come from the medical press of all countries, and especially from the pens of those who practise at the innumerable spas and so-called health-resorts. Based on flimsy assumptions, the arguments, if such they can be called, proceed to the attractive inference that a disease hitherto, strictly speaking, incurable has been "assuredly healed" by the writer, and "will be healed again in the future." The author conveniently disposes of the recoveries reported by others by alleging that the cases were not diabetes; and, while glibly denying the truth of all past and current theories of the causation of this disease, endeavours to make plausible his own plan of cure by dogmatically asserting, with scarcely a show of evidence, that, in effect, diabetes is always the result of syphilis, inherited or acquired. There is no trace of original observation or reasoning in this brochure—a deficiency which is not likely to be observed by those whom the title of the book may allure to its perusal. As to the successful treatment vaunted by the author, there does not appear to be anything new in it, either as regards diet or drugs, the most remarkable point under this heading being the author's advice to sufferers to spend the summer at a German resort where he practises himself, and for an "after-cure," whatever that may mean, to go to "the superbly-situated" Hotel —, where there is a prospect that they will find all those appliances which are required for the treatment suggested by himself.

SOME ATLASES.†

TO the conscientious critic (for he exists) nothing is more difficult than the reviewing of atlases, dictionaries, and all the other works of reference which are among the most useful, not to say indispensable, burdens of the library shelves, and which are of all others, useful and useless, the most puzzling to discuss except in the briefest possible space or at enormous length. Nevertheless, he tries to do his duty.

Some very good things, with one important thing by no means so good, may be said of Messrs. Longmans' New Atlas, in which Mr. Edward Stanford is responsible for the engraving and lithographing, while Mr. Chisholm does the editing, and divers specialists have contributed special details. Some particulars in the design (it should be noted that the book can be had either in imperial 8vo., with the maps folded for convenience of shelving, or in quarto, with the maps flat, which is infinitely the better for all purposes except shelving) strike us as new. Thus there is as frontispiece a plate representing the comparative size of the different scales on which the maps are drawn—a thing on which we have known considerable haziness present in the minds of intelligent persons much older than the schoolboys for whom this atlas is primarily, though not exclusively, intended. The maps themselves are between fifty and sixty in number, not a few of them having (according to an excellent custom of which, we think, the famous atlas of Spruner set the chief example, if it did not actually originate the practice), "insets" or smaller maps of special districts. Added to these are certain plates (sixteen in number, but each containing divers separate cuts) of subjects relating to and connected with geography, such as landscape, architecture, physical types, scenes of manners, vegetable products, and what not. These last seem to us better suited for wall diagrams in colour than for black and white printing on a small scale in an atlas; but they meet a modern fad. The book also has a side arrangement of the useful kind which betrays by thumb manchettes the whereabouts of an individual map, and a good index. The maps themselves are, however, the most important thing, and these are in many ways excellent. More of them than, if we had ourselves been consulted, we should have advised are devoted to those diagrams rather than maps which are another modern craze—diagrams of mountains and waters, of religions and races, of density of population and "area of visibility of the Aurora Borealis." What in the name of Krashi-bashi is the good of a diagram of the area of visibility of the Aurora Borealis? The maps proper, when we get to them, would be impeccable but for one principle which Mr. Chisholm has observed, and which seems to us utterly wrong. Because the maps of the last generation too often represented a bewildering crowd of interlaced place-names with no physical features except a river or two and a rare mountain, we are, it seems, now to hold, as he does, that the fewer names in a school map the better. This seems to us, we confess, a kind of madness, and it accounts for the profound ignorance of the really useful part of geography which the modern schoolboy often displays. We take, for instance, the map of England and Wales because it is most useful for comparison, though as a matter of fact the nomenclature here is generous compared with others. Without trying to find unlikely places, we look in Kent and we cannot (speaking under correction) find Lydd, Ashford, or Sevenoaks; in Sussex, where Horsham and East Grinstead are lacking; in Hampshire, without discovering Romsey, Lyndhurst, Lymington, Christchurch, or Andover; in Dorsetshire, where Sherborne, Wimborne, Blandford have vanished; and along the Devon and Cornish coasts, where Sidmouth, Budleigh Salterton, Dawlish, Kingsbridge, Looe, Fowey, and Helston, with many more, fail to answer to the longing eye. Every one of these, with dozens more, we find, not in the least crowded, in the scarcely larger maps of another atlas further down on our list. Now this, we cannot help thinking, is a very gross mistake, and we hope that Messrs. Longmans will see their way (for you can add anything in a plate) to correcting it. It prevents us from recommending, as we otherwise should, and as in some respects it deserves, this atlas as a great advance on all others. The silliest of all possible mistakes is for B to run into one extreme because A has run into the other. And it cannot be too often repeated that, while the scientific details which make up physical geography are very good things in their way, it is political geography which is the key to history, literature, and business alike.

Mr. Trelawny Saunders's very handsome Atlas of India is constructed on a somewhat similar system, but it is not open to similar censure, because its purpose is totally different. It consists of twelve maps on a magnificent scale to begin with, and in some folded instances (in which they are very properly mounted on squares of thin linen) on a scale more magnificent still. The first gives the mountain systems of India, handsomely extended to the Pamir, the desert of Gobi, and the upper waters of the Hoang-Ho. The second, with an equal extension, gives the rivers. The third, enlarged on linen as above noted, gives the civil divisions according to administrative arrangements of both British and native States. The fourth is a population map; the fifth one of languages and dialects; the sixth of railways and other means of communication; the seventh a military map with the divisional and district commands; the eighth a tabular view of the areas of the great famines during the present century. The ninth is meteorological; the tenth gives the locality and acreage of the chief crops; and the eleventh the distribution of forest trees; while the twelfth is an index-map to revenue and topographical surveys. There is letterpress to correspond to all of these. It will thus be seen that this splendid atlas is less an atlas in the ordinary sense than a tabular arrangement of a great number of scientific and statistical details—of immense service, no doubt, occasionally to the politician or the journalist who has to do with India, but not particularly succulent for the general public.

The General Atlas of Modern Geography is a straightforward collection of maps of the older kind, though by no means destitute of diagrams and plans of the newer. The Hemispheres, the "World on Mercator's Projection," and the other useful and well-known charts, in regular order, meet the undazzled eye with something of a sense of relief. The maps are clear and good, with sufficient, but not excessive, physical details, and the districts of more recent political interest are very well marked, though in some instances events have gone too fast for Messrs. Bacon, as in Amatonga Land, which in any case should not have been coloured Portuguese, and the Bechuanaland, or rather Matabele Land Protectorate. But this colouring differs in different maps, as it could not well fail to do, and it is well to say that in the general map of Africa the Portuguese coast districts on each side and the German "sphere of influence" northward of Tanganyika are properly limited. The Central Asian map is also good and well worked up to date.

The Unrivalled Atlas, which is smaller and cheaper, is Messrs. Johnston's, and it is therefore almost, if not quite, superfluous to praise it. Besides, it is an old acquaintance. Here, too, things have been well worked up, and, probably in consequence of a somewhat later date of publication, Matabele Land is duly coloured red.

Another edition has appeared of the atlas which, derived originally from the old Useful Knowledge Society's publications, used to be published by Messrs. Letts, and still bears their name. The present publishers, Messrs. Mason & Payne, detail various alterations and improvements in this second issue. There is a frontispiece of flags of all nations, from the Union Jack to the scissiors of Morocco and the peacock of Burmah. We have on former occasions given some account of the extraordinary wealth of maps, plans, and diagrams distinguishing a volume which is

* Diabetes; its Cause and Permanent Cure, &c. By Emil Schnée, M.D. London: H. K. Lewis. 1889.

† Longmans' New Atlas. London: Longmans & Co. 1889.

An Atlas of India. By Trelawny Saunders. London: Stanford. 1889.

General Atlas of Modern Geography. London: Bacon. 1889.

The Unrivalled Atlas. New edition. London and Edinburgh: W. & A. K. Johnston. 1889.

Letts' Popular Atlas. Second edition. London: Mason & Payne; Hutchinson & Co. 1889.

Physical Geography. New York: Appleton; London: W. Allen.

still certainly the most elaborate and detailed collection of maps published in England, and which the publishers seem to be taking pains to make one of the most exact. The plans of great towns alone would make the book an almost indispensable adjunct to every well-furnished library.

The last book on our list is not exactly an atlas, but is published in atlas form, contains many maps, and deals with matter closely akin to the subjects of the publications we have been discussing. It is elaborately provided with diagrams, and contains a great deal of information about its title-subject, with astronomical, geological, botanical, and other appendages. There is much reason, we are told, to believe that the first living inhabitants of the earth made their home in hot water; and, alas! it cannot be said that the present living inhabitants have entirely got free of that accident of residence. If the hot water of those times "equaled," as Messrs. Appleton print it, the present occasional temperature of this fluid, we are not sorry that we did not live then. Intermixed with this information and its accompanying diagrams are, as we have said, real maps adjusted to the purposes of the book; which may be pronounced altogether a well-arranged, well-printed (though not well spelt), and full encyclopædia of miscellaneous information, in a remarkably compact form.

TWO BOOKS ABOUT RAILWAYS.*

THERE are few Englishmen, if we except those whose business or interest connects them too closely with rival lines, who are not more or less proud of the London and North-Western Railway. Other railways may be longer or may run their trains a trifle faster—the Great Western has now some six hundred more miles of road, we believe, than its Northern neighbour, and there is nothing in the ordinary train service of the North-Western quite equal in speed to the best expresses of the Great Northern—but in general excellence of organization and equipment the North-Western is our pattern railway. It is an immense machine, and it works with amazing smoothness; its way, its plant, its staff, and its system are alike admirable. Mr. Findlay's long experience as manager of this best managed of railways forms the highest possible qualification for the task he has undertaken, of writing a book on railway management and working. He has naturally chosen his own railway as a text, and has done his work extremely well, contriving to condense into a small volume of 270 pages a vast amount of information, both as to general matters and as to points of executive and constructive detail. The book is well arranged, clear, concise, and readable, and it need scarcely be said that every page bears the stamp of mature knowledge. Mr. Findlay opens with a short retrospective sketch of the beginnings of railways, and tells how the London and North-Western system was founded and welded into the homogeneous whole which now comprises 1,800 miles of railway and 650 stations, earns a revenue of 10,160,000*l.* on a capital of 108,000,000*l.*, and gives employment to an army of more than 55,000 men. The next chapter, on "Management," tells how the administration of the line is carried on. It describes the functions of various committees of the Board of Directors, and those of the various permanent officials to which the executive is entrusted. What the author calls the chain of responsibility—the carefully arranged system of devolution—is well exhibited. The conferences are described, which bring the country officers up to headquarters once a month and keep the outlying parts of the system in touch with one another and with the centre, as well as the periodical inspections which are made by the chief officials from time to time. Other interesting parts of this chapter deal with the system of financial control, and the plan by which the time-tables are drawn up; and the author concludes it by giving a number of managerial hints, drawn from his own experience, as to how a man placed at the head of a great office may save his time and brain-power and use them to the best purpose. The staff, with its various superannuation and insurance funds, is the subject of another chapter; and another treats of the permanent way, giving in narrow compass a remarkable number of engineering details. The working of signals is then described, and excellent illustrations are added to explain the elaborate arrangement of semaphores at stations and junctions, and how they are interlocked with the "points." An account of the block system follows, and rolling-stock is then treated in two chapters which deal respectively with engines and brakes and with carriages and waggons. Under this head come descriptions of Mr. Webb's compound engines, and of the Company's locomotive works at Crewe, and their carriage and waggon works at Wolverton and Earlestown. The working of the trains, the shunting and marshalling of goods trains (on "gridirons" at Edgehill and elsewhere), and the working of goods stations form the subjects of three very interesting chapters, with a good deal in them that has not been published before as to what goes on behind the scenes in railway management. Passing on to speak of rates and fares, Mr. Findlay refers to the work of the late Mr. Grierson, of the Great Western Railway, as having exhausted that subject, and contents himself with a short account of the conferences by which the competitive rates between most places in Great Britain are settled, and of the methods by which revenue resulting from through traffic is divided among the Companies concerned. The principal machinery for that purpose is the Railway Clearing House. From a very humble beginning, about forty years ago, the Clearing House has grown till it now has a staff of some two thousand persons, who deal with a part of the revenue of every British line, and arrange the division of receipts amounting to 16,500,000*l.* The ticket of every "through" passenger is sent to the Clearing House; every station makes a return to it daily of all passengers or parcels booked through, and of carriages and waggons received and despatched; and scattered all over the country, at every junction of two railways, are agents of the Clearing House, who report the number and description of every vehicle that passes from one to another Company's line; "and thus," says Mr. Findlay, "with enormous labour, but with the most marvellous accuracy, the accounts are made up and the balances declared." The Clearing House is also a convenient neutral ground where conferences of managers and others are held to settle questions of rates and to arrange matters of general railway policy. Mr. Findlay discusses shortly the relation of the State to railways and the question of State purchase, making out, as one might expect, a strong case against that. He gives an exposition of railway law as between the Company and the public, and concludes with a short essay on railways as a means of defence. Considering its small size, his book is remarkably comprehensive, and deserves to rank as an authoritative text-book of the subject of which it treats.

Messrs. Foxwell and Farrer's book on Express Trains, English and Foreign, is a collection of statistics of mileages, times, and speeds relating to all the fast trains which run on British, or American, or Continental railways. This does not sound very interesting; but the statistics are set forth in so lively a fashion, with a running accompaniment of so much shrewd and amusing comment, that the book is by no means unreadable. On the contrary, there is a great deal in it that will interest any reader, and a good deal, we should say, that is worth the serious consideration of the railway Companies whose doings are criticized. If a corporation has no conscience there is this compensation, that you may speak your mind about it very freely, and the authors take full advantage of this license. The "habitual sloppiness" of one southern railway, the "chronic block within sight of port" upon another, the "cheery stoicism" of a certain South-western terminus, where trains arrive at their own (not the time-table's) time and place, are things that call for plain speaking, and Messrs. Foxwell and Farrer are exceedingly ready to answer the call. Now and then there is a tendency to strain after smartness. But they are as willing to praise as to blame, and even the Southern lines come in for a fair share of compliment in respect of their electric-lighting, their Sunday service, and the plucky way in which they carry on their traffic during dense fogs—a thing which implies a strain upon the staff such as no one unacquainted with railway working has any idea of. The authors temper some of their sharpest strokes by the use of a little humorous exaggeration:—

On the platform of the Waverley Station at Edinburgh may be witnessed every evening, in summer, a scene of confusion so chaotic that a sober description of it is incredible to those who have not themselves survived it. Trains of caravan length come in portentously late from Perth, so that each is mistaken for its successor: these have to be broken up and re-made on insufficient sidings, while bewildered crowds of tourists sway up and down amongst equally bewildered porters on the narrow village platform reserved for these most important expresses; the higher officials stand lost in subtle thought, returning now and then to repeated inquiries some masterpiece of reply couched in the cautious conditional, while the hands of the clock with a humorous air survey the abandoned sight, till at length, without any obvious reason, and with sudden stealth, the shame-stricken driver hurries his packed passengers off into the dark.

After this it is reassuring to learn that "over every station the flag of Hope waves bright."

As to the statistics, it appears that the Great Northern stands first in the matter of speed, with its 53 miles per hour from King's Cross to Grantham, and its (very nearly) 9,000 train-miles of expresses, with an average running speed of 47 miles per hour. In the great race to Edinburgh last year the Great Northern (with its allies of the East Coast route) broke its own and everybody else's record, by running, on August 31st, from King's Cross to Edinburgh at the average speed of 57½ miles per hour, excluding station stoppages, or nearly 53 miles per hour including them. On that occasion four successive miles were done in 188¾ seconds—a rate equivalent to over 76¼ miles an hour. As everybody knows, the London and North-Western ran almost neck and neck with the East Coast while the racing fury lasted; but in ordinary times it does not seek what its manager calls "the doubtful distinction of running the fastest trains in the world." The quantity of its expresses, however, is enormous. Defining an express as a train with a speed, including stops, of at least 40 miles per hour, the authors credit the London and North-Western system with 14,436 express-train miles, the average running speed of which is 44½ miles per hour. "This one English railway gives us an amount of speed exceeding 40 miles per hour greater than that contributed by the entire Continent of Europe or the whole of the United States."

On the Continent, indeed, the speed, as a rule, is so low that a much lower standard (29 miles per hour, including stoppages) is

* The Working and Management of an English Railway. By George Findlay, Lieut.-Col. Engineer and Railway Volunteer Staff Corps; Assoc. Inst. C.E.; General Manager of the London and North-Western Railway. London: Whittaker & Co. 1889.

Express Trains, English and Foreign: being a Statistical Account of all the Express Trains of the World; with Railway Maps of Great Britain and Europe. By E. Foxwell and T. C. Farrer. London: Smith, Elder, & Co. 1889.

taken for the definition of an "express." A very few French expresses exceed 40 miles per hour; the train de luxe from Paris to Bordeaux and the 11.15 (Nord) train from Paris to Calais, which are the fastest long-distance expresses on the Continent, run at a speed (excluding stops) of 44 miles per hour. But such cases are rare, the ordinary express speeds being from 33 to 39 miles per hour in France, a little lower in Germany and Austria, and only 31 miles per hour in Italy and Russia. In the United States the best trains nearly reach, but do not pass, the English record; the fastest running is from Baltimore to Washington at 53½ miles per hour, and the general average is 41½ miles per hour (including stops) for a grand total of 14,000 express-train miles.

GEOFFREY GAIMAR.—VOL. II.*

THIS volume completes the Rolls edition of Geoffrey Gaimar's L'Estorie des Engles, begun some years ago by the late Sir Thomas Hardy. Mr. Trice Martin discusses in his preface the few facts which his author tells us about himself, and suggests that he may have derived his name from a small district in Caen called Waimara, the present Rue de Gémare. From what, then, are we to derive the place-name? His attempt to identify Ralf FitzGilbert, the husband of the Lady Constance, for whom Gaimar wrote, is ingenious; and, though the matter does not admit of proof, it is certainly worth noting that the Ralf on whom he has fixed had a chaplain named Geoffrey. He describes the principal sources from which Gaimar obtained his information, and exhibits the more important passages where he has deviated from them. The footnotes to the translation strike us as decidedly feeble. Some of them contain remarks which are entirely superfluous as far as scholars are concerned, and yet are scarcely full enough for the use of beginners. The note to l. 5405 implies that Eadnoth the Staller beat off from Bristol a force led by one of the sons of Harold. This is a mistake, and is not, it is almost needless to say, to be found in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, to which a reference is given. The three sons of Harold had, as Mr. Martin will see if he consults the Chronicle (Worcester version), been forced by the townsmen to give up their attempt on Bristol, had taken to their ships, and had landed again on the coast of Somerset before Eadnoth met them and fought the battle in which he was slain. A perfectly needless correction of Gaimar will be found in the note to l. 5420; his statement that the Danes took York is accurate as far as it goes. It is happily unusual to find in a volume of the Rolls Series such a reference as "Wright, p. 227," given in a note to l. 6489. To which of Thomas Wright's works does this apply? The subject of the note is the history of Queen Adeliza of Louvain; is there no earlier authority for her marriages than Mr. Wright? We do not know where he found that she died in 1151; it may have been so, but, as far as we are aware, the date of her death has not been ascertained. Gaimar's poem is of little direct historical value. Historically its chief interest lies in the picture which it presents of what people in the middle of the twelfth century believed and thought about the events of English history. It has another importance as a remarkable specimen of literature, and it would have been well if the work of editing and translating it had been committed to some one who had a thorough knowledge of the language in which it is written. A severe condemnation of this edition as a whole has been pronounced by that eminent scholar Professor Paul Meyer in the current number of Romania. Now Professor Meyer is rather of that class of specialists who regard other specialists in the same domain as trespassers; and many of his strictures are on the construction of the text, with which we are not at present concerned, and for which Mr. Martin is not responsible. But he also quotes several instances of mistranslation as proofs that Mr. Martin has no special qualification for the work which he has attempted, and we regret to say that his quotations justify his opinion.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS AND TRADE DEPRESSION.†

ALL the ills that flesh is heir to can be charmed away by the magic wand of the doctrinaire, if the people will but listen to the voice of the charmer. There is a this-world salvation army of prophets, who will point out the way to be saved from the miseries of this vale of tears and put the pessimists to shame. But, like the other Salvation Army, they teach in vain, and the world wags on in its old way, not to be turned out of its course by any power.

Mr. Tallerman's magic wand, assuming the shape of this book, as a magic wand can assume any form it pleases, is a very ambitious and portentous instrument, ready to teach every man his own business, and, as usual in such cases, to effect a social revolution with the simple and easy means common to magic wands in general. To effect a revolution thoroughly, it is not only needful to point out the new way, but to smash and pulverize the old way; for, as we are 37,000,000, mostly fools, some of us are sure to be treading the old paths in our old silly way unless they are made impassable. Farmers, it appears, have a goodly share in the "mostly fools" part of the 37,000,000, as the following extracts will show, which will serve at the same time as good examples of the style of the book:—

In the preparation of their meat crop home farmers treat their beasts in their characteristic haphazard way; little or no thought appears to be given to the important considerations as to how an animal shall yield the greatest amount of meat of the best quality in the shortest time and at the least expense.—P. 62.

The utter want of consideration which British farmers have for their own interests is strikingly exhibited by the grossly careless manner in which all perishable home-grown food produce is sold by them.—P. 125.

In every direction and with all kinds of food produce the course of procedure is of the same reckless nature—viz. to send it somewhere for sale, without any consideration as to the possible or probable ultimate results that might be otherwise obtainable. Home farmers realize only the minimum value of their produce, which they blindly thrust into competition with that imported from abroad.—P. 132.

Home farmers, on the contrary, do everything simply because their fathers, grandfathers, and their predecessors have done the same from time immemorial.—P. 261.

An inspection of the forms (of his system of bookkeeping) by agricultural or industrial minds is calculated to lead to a feeling of bewilderment; but the commercial mind will grasp the simplicity of the whole matter at a glance.—P. 232.

"Reduce our rent, abolish our tithes, diminish local taxation, put five shillings a quarter on all wheat that arrives in the country," implores the British farmer, while he sullenly stands idle and looks on, while farmers from all parts of the world . . . enter his markets.—P. 329.

It is a remarkable feature in the social life of the people that in a country claiming to be the leading commercial nation of the world that [sic] all the simplest rudiments of commercial life should be so utterly ignored by its producers in every branch of agricultural practice.—P. 425.

Our farmers suffer from the illusion that they know how to manage their business. This is a great mistake.—P. 448.

The bulk of the farmers of the country appear to be so wrapt up in their own conceit and vanity as to be utterly unable to realize that some useful information and experience is to be gathered outside the fences of their own farms.—P. 543.

Let it not be supposed that the British farmer is the only person who comes in for this slashing sort of correction. It appears that there is a grand distinction between the agricultural mind and the commercial mind; but the commercial mind also has much to learn, and to unlearn too. The food produce supplied by the agricultural mind is the best in the world; but the worst of it is this mind does not know what to do with it when it has produced it. There are some few words that should accompany the waving of this magic wand, of which "agricultural," "commercial," "mechanical," should be constantly uttered. But the potent charm is conveyed in the words "combination," "refrigeration," and "evaporation," the mystic meaning of which the book itself must divulge.

Not only meat, but the whole food supply—bread, vegetables, and fruit included—is dealt with, and the only true way pointed out to all. But Mr. Tallerman is always harking back to bullocks and beef. There is repetition enough and to spare in the book to engraft both on the agricultural and on the commercial mind the valuable precepts it contains for ever and a day. Bullocks and beef recur again and again, sheep and mutton being "understood." The agricultural and commercial mind, especially if the commercial mind belongs to a dealer in beef, can doubtless stand the ordeal well; but the ordinary common mind might be sickened with the repeated details of slaughter, blood, bones, and offal. Mr. Tallerman is a great dealer in figures, and throws his millions at the heads of his readers like thunderbolts. It does not seem to occur to him that millions of themselves are nothing if not relative.

It is very consoling to know from the preface "To the Reader," that "whatever your political views may be, the contents of the following pages will accord with them. If perused in a critical spirit, kindly bear in mind that I claim no pretension to literary ability," which takes a load off one's mind. The volume is divided into four books. Book I. consists of twenty-six chapters on twenty-two anomalies, and is called a Book of Anomalies. These constitute the destructive elements of the work, and are designed to clear the way for the constructive parts, though the destroying spirit is never wholly absent. And there is an appendix of "Practical Remedies," besides. Chapter xix., Anomaly Fifteen, expounds and corrects the prevailing errors respecting wheat, flour, millers, and bakers, from Mr. Tallerman's point of view. He says, p. 163, the idiotic wish for white flour causes a waste of fully one-fourth of our food supply. He bases his argument on English wheat, weighing 63 lbs. a bushel, making no allowance for variations in soil and climate, or for wet seasons; and lays stress unduly on fraudulent materials used by bakers. He knows something about bullocks and beef, but his ignorance and random assertions when he treats of wheat, flour, and bread betray his real qualifications as a teacher of mankind. The contradictions in his arguments are many, of which he seems to be quite unconscious. The English are the finest race in the world, whether they are endowed with the agricultural or commercial mind, but are everywhere beaten out of the field by foreigners and colonists. The only true way is co-operation; but Chapter xxvi., Anomaly Twenty-two, treats of co-operation in this style:—"While all friends of social progress cannot but rejoice at the establishment and marvellous development of the system of industrial co-operation in distribution that has taken place during the last forty-five years, they must feel a bitter pang of regret at the extreme thoughtless or selfish trait that has been made apparent in the character of those who control the movement," and then he proceeds to show the only true method. The railway Companies are also censured, for they run a suicidal course, and are both short-sighted and cruel. Chapter xl. is on simple bookkeeping, and teaches farmers, dealers, and bookkeepers that branch of their business. In this simple system of "explicit bookkeeping" there are no less than eighteen forms to be used, all headed "Tallerman's Improved System of Meat Distribution," and a set of thirteen books. There are also "Tallerman's Model Rules," forty-one in number, p. 518, for the benefit of farmers. If this is simple, what an appalling affair a complicated system must be! Mr. Tallerman apparently has utterly neglected the dismal science, possibly deterred by that Carlylese expression; but a teacher of man should know other teachers, if it be only to see where their errors lie and where the truth may be sought for. If he had known a little of the current theories of political economy he would have avoided some of the most glaring mistakes into which he has fallen. He says, p. 470, of home-grown meat:—"The general impression is that meat is in short supply and dear; the actual facts are that meat is abundant and cheap"; and he seeks to prove that, as there is an ample supply at home, no importations of meat, or of any food for that matter, are required. He re-propounds the old effete commercial doctrine that in paying for importations money goes out of the country.

* L'estorie des Engles solum la translacion Maistre Geffrei Gaimar. Edited by the late Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy, D.C.L., Deputy Keeper of the Public Records; and Charles Trice Martin, B.A., F.S.A. Vol. II. Translation. London: printed for Her Majesty's Stationery Office. 1889.

† Agricultural Distress and Trade Depression. By D. Tallerman. London: The Commercial and Agricultural Co-operative Society (Limited).

It is only fair to great fault-finders to turn the tables upon them. But as there are sermons in stones, and good in everything, so there is much good, though not of an agreeable kind, in the fault-finder. He may fire his shots at random, but they hit something; and they at least put the world on its guard. Many of Mr. Tallerman's shots may tell well, and his work contains a great deal that is good. He is well up in dead bullocks and beef, and tells us that a carcase (there is too much in the book about carcases to make it pleasant reading) weighs about 800 lbs. of dressed meat, without the offal—which he declares ought to be good eating if properly prepared. Of this 800 lbs., 452 lbs. are of the first grade, worth in the retail market 9d. a lb.; 188 lbs. of the second grade, worth 6d. a lb.; and 160 lbs. of the third grade, worth 3d. a lb. Then there are 465 lbs. of offal, 167 lbs. of which are worth 2l. os. 3d., 19 lbs. worth 9s. 6d., and 279 lbs. worth 10s. 3d., making the whole bullock worth 26l. 13s. Bones are one-fifth of a carcase. It is needless to say that Mr. Tallerman would change all this, and to effect a revolution in half a dozen trades is as nothing to him, the good and worthy end always being that farmers would get more and consumers give less for their food. "The efforts generally made to get a little more than the thing is worth on the one side, and to buy it somewhat cheaper than its value on the other, is the great mistake by which both classes suffer" (p. 273). A muck is run against the middleman, as might be expected, who will possibly survive the assault. "The salesmasters, the infamous usurious class of middlemen" (p. 60).

There is very good advice on the subject of cooking for the million, and the rather bold assertion is made that all parts of a bullock are of equal nutritive value; it is only a question of preparation and cooking. It requires a reader of some discrimination to sort out the good from the speculative, to use no harsher word, in this work, and the modesty usually so marked and so engaging in great writers is conspicuous by its absence in this adventurous volume on the remedies for agricultural distress and trade depression.

Among the illustrations is a useful diagram of a bullock, with the joints and their weight and value marked out, not an uncommon thing to see; but the others do not call for notice.

—
GEOFFREY LE BAKER.*

IN this handsome volume Dr. Maunde Thompson has rescued an historical work of considerable interest and importance from comparative oblivion. Geoffrey le Baker's chronicle was indeed printed—we will not say edited—by Dr. Giles in 1847; but the book is somewhat scarce, and is, besides, a most slovenly performance. The text is wretched; it seems to have been simply taken from a transcript made by or for the late Mr. Petrie from the Bodley MS., and it is exceedingly doubtful whether Dr. Giles ever compared it with the original. Part of Baker's work, however, has long been widely known. The Vita et Mors Edwardi Secundi was printed by Camden, was used and described by Stow, and has lately been edited by Bishop Stubbs in his Chronicles of the Reigns of Edward I. and Edward II. (Rolls series). Dr. Thompson, who shows that there is reason to believe that the Vita et Mors was regarded as a separate work, prints it here, and with it Baker's longer Chronicle of the reign of Edward III. down to the battle of Poitiers, and his Chroniculum, a bare summary of events, and only valuable as affording proof that Baker was the author of the Chronicle. His edition gives us all that the most exacting scholar can demand—an appropriate preface, a thoroughly satisfactory text derived from the Bodley MS. 761, which he has collated with the only other known copy of the Chronicle, the fragmentary Cotton MS. Appendix LII., a large body of notes, and a good index. Many of his notes consist of long extracts from Stow's Annales and other printed books. They are well chosen, and it is interesting to see what Stow drew from our author, and how he translated him. At the same time these extracts increase the size and, we suppose, the cost of the volume rather needlessly. As far as Stow is concerned, one or two specimens of his translations with references to other passages would have been sufficient, while Hemingburgh, Knyghton, and the Eulogium are pretty sure to be on the shelves of every one who is likely to read Baker. In several of the notes, however, we have original matter and extracts from unprinted sources. Some of these we shall notice later on. Some contain passages from the English Brute, a work on which we have some valuable observations. The prose Brute, which exists in both an English and a French version, has, Dr. Thompson considers, been undeservedly neglected. The English version is a translation from the second edition of the French, which goes down to the battle of Halidon Hill, and to this translation several additions have been made; it is generally known as the Cronicles of Englonde, printed by Caxton in 1480. It is, Dr. Thompson says, none other than the authority quoted by Joshua Barnes in his Life of Edward III. as "MS. Vet. Angl. in C.C.C. Cantab." Barnes, who had not seen the Cronicles, found a manuscript of the English Brute, and referred to it as unprinted, and later writers have accepted his quotation without discovering that it referred to Caxton's text. A special interest may, perhaps, attach to the edition of the French Brute from which the English version is derived, for Dr. Thompson sees reason to believe that it was the "Cronique yn French," by "Sir Wylliam de Pakington, Clerk and Tresorer of Prince Edwardes, sunne to Edwarde the 3, householde yn Gascoyne," from an Epitome of which Leland gives a series of extracts in his Collectanea, v. i. pp. 454, sqq. Dr. Thompson differs from Bishop Stubbs in holding that the passage in the Morset Vita in which Baker speaks of Sir Thomas de la More's French work refers only to an account which More had written of the visit of the Bishops to the King, and that there is no reason for supposing that any French original of the book as a whole ever existed. While the question can hardly be decided except by the discovery of the Life which Bishop Stubbs, in common with all earlier writers on the subject, attributes to More, we do not agree with Dr. Thompson's view that it is "straining" the words "hec vidisti et in Gallico scripsisti, cuius ego sum talis qualis interpres" to take them as referring to a much larger debt on Baker's part than his latest editor is willing to allow.

As the Vita et Mors is well known, we will not dwell on its contents, and pass at once to the Chronicle of Edward III.'s reign. Here, as in his earlier work, Baker largely uses the chronicle of Adam Murimuth. Many passages are, however, original, and among these are his story of the trick by which the Earl of Kent was induced to believe that the late King was still alive, and his account of the Black Death, which "has formed the chief basis of all later notices, through the medium of Stow's Annales." He also gives a curious version of the death of Charles of Valois:—"Propter reverenciam sanguinis regalis non fuit suspensus nec decapitatus, set sine femoralibus nudo marmoris aquis frigidis resperso insedit, ubi frigore finivit inveteracionem dierum malorum." As his editor suggests, he probably confused some act of self-inflicted penance with a capital punishment; for Charles died of disease after a long illness. The special value of Baker's work, however, lies in his reports of military and naval affairs. These he evidently derived from eyewitnesses, and though here and there he gets into some confusion, for he did not write his work from year to year—he refers, for example, to the battle of Poitiers under 1346—and occasionally mixes up his information, he gives us several picturesque incidents, such as the combat between Sir Robert Benhale and the Scottish champion and his dog, and throws light on many events which, apart from his narrative, are somewhat obscure. One or two of the details which he gives of the battle of Sluys are peculiar to his Chronicle, and are rejected by Sir Harris Nicolas because he thought that they rested solely on Stow's authority. In an interesting note on this battle, Dr. Thompson contends that Nicolas was wrong in maintaining that the "heure de nonne a la tyde" of the King's letter must mean that the fleets engaged about midday; he argues that the battle must have begun at noon, or between 2 and 3 p.m., when the tide was ebbing down Channel, and Edward, who attacked the enemy from the north-west, would have had the "impetum fluminis" in his favour, and the sun "drawing away behind him." Baker traces Edward's march across the north of France in 1346 with considerable minuteness, though without supplying dates, and Dr. Thompson has supplemented his narrative by giving the stages from the "Kitchen Journal," printed in Archæologia, xxxii., and from a Cotton MS., and by forming an itinerary based on the two accounts and illustrated by a map. The account of the battle of Crécy seems to be based, as he suggests, on the relation of some soldier of Prince Edward's division. It tells us that the English archers were drawn up on the flanks of the main body, and not, as Froissart has it, "à manière d'une herce," with the men-at-arms "ou fons de leur bataille." In support of this statement we are reminded that Baker, when writing about the battle of Bannockburn, notes the introduction of this plan of array. We also find that the English dug small holes in front of their first line in order to overthrow the French horse, and we have a notice of the valour and peril of the Prince of Wales, who, when borne down by the sheer weight of the enemy pressing against him, fought upon his knees, an incident also preserved by the Bourgeois de Valenciennes, and by an Abbeville chronicle quoted by Louandre. The itinerary of the Prince's raid from Bordeaux to Narbonne and back in 1355 is very full, and, as Dr. Thompson gives it in one of his notes, where he identifies nearly all the places, is remarkably clear. It differs in some important particulars from the route sketched by Froissart.

* Chronicon Galfridi le Baker de Swinebroke. Edited, with Notes, by Edward Maunde Thompson, Hon. LL.D. St. Andrews, Hon. D.C.L. Durham, F.S.A., Principal Librarian of the British Museum. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 1889.

The most interesting part of Baker's Chronicle is his account of the battle of Poitiers. It is admirably treated by Dr. Thompson, who remarks that "it is seldom that one meets with so clear a description of a battle in the chronicles of the middle ages." Contrary to the opinion of M. St. Hypolite (Mémoires de la Société des Antiquaires de l'Ouest, 1844), he maintains that the French did not advance direct from Poitiers, but attacked from the north, advancing from the road between Poitiers and Chauvigny. He also points out that the common mistake of representing the battle as "a mere struggle in a deep lane" arises from a false idea as to the gap in the hedge in front of the third division of the English army. This gap was made by a wagon-track—"in superiori parte sepi, a declivo bene remota, fuit temesis quedam patula vel hyatus, quem bigarii fecerunt in autumpno"—and, as will be seen both from Baker's story and by a comparison of Froissart's earlier text with the Amiens version of his Chronicles, there is no reason to believe that this road ran between hedges. The archers were stationed behind a long hedge which covered the English front, and was broken in one place by a wagon-track. Dr. Thompson's account of the battle is exceedingly vivid and well worked out, and the volume as a whole is certainly not unworthy either of the editor's position or of the Press from which it is issued.

CLASSICAL BOOKS.*

OF the letters which passed between Pliny and Trajan, now edited by Mr. Hardy, the most famous are those which relate to the treatment of the Christians in Bithynia—a matter upon which Mr. Hardy has the misfortune to differ upon some essential but highly controversial points with so eminent an authority as the present Bishop of Durham. The dispute is not properly threshed out, inasmuch as it is directly dealt with only in an appendix, since Dr. Lightfoot's views (we are told) were only brought to Mr. Hardy's notice after this book had passed through the press. Dr. Lightfoot agrees that Trajan did not in this case definitely sanction a policy of persecution, and was animated, in his famous Rescript to Pliny, more by political than by religious considerations. On the other hand, Dr. Lightfoot does regard this as a distinct persecution, and one of the most severe which the Christians underwent in the course of the first two centuries, and he attributes to Poppæa's influence with Nero the dissipation of the once general ignorance at Rome which regarded the Christians merely as a sect of Jews. Mr. Hardy, on the other hand, doubts whether Poppæa herself understood the distinction, whether her influence was so powerful as some of the "ecclesiastical critics" believe, and, finally, if she did possess such knowledge and such influence as she is credited with, whether she could have made Nero understand and act upon a distinction which would have seemed unimportant to a Roman of this period. Having stated some of the points at issue, we must leave the dispute for scholars and theologians to settle between them, merely remarking that the two classes are not necessarily distinct one from the other, as is shown in the person of Dr. Lightfoot himself. But Mr. Hardy's analysis of the points brought out in the letters interchanged between Pliny and Trajan leaves nothing to be desired in candour and clearness; certainly he proves once again, what is sometimes forgotten, that there was at this period no official animus against the Christians as Christians, only an extreme nervousness against secret associations which might be turned to purposes of political conspiracy.

* C. Plinii Cæciliæ Secundi Epistolæ ad Trajanum Imperatorem cum ejusdem Responsis. Edited, with Notes and Introductory Essays, by E. G. Hardy, M.A., late Fellow of Jesus College, Oxford, and formerly Head-Master of Grantham School. London: Macmillan & Co.

T. Lucreti Cari de Rerum Natura liber quintus. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by T. D. Duff, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Cambridge: University Press.

Selections from Lucretius; being a Golden Treasury of his Poem De Rerum Natura. With Notes by Thomas J. Dymes, B.A., late Scholar of Lincoln College, Oxford, and formerly Assistant-Master at Cheltenham College; with an Introduction by Alfred J. Church, M.A., Professor of Latin in University College, London. London: Rivingtons.

M. Tullii Ciceronis Brutus de Claris Oratoribus. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by Martin Kellogg, Professor of the Latin Language and Literature in the University of California. Ginn & Co.

Selections from the Latin Poets. Part I.—Catullus. Edited by E. P. Crowell, Moore Professor of Latin in Amherst College. Ginn & Co.

A Grammar of the Latin Language for the Use of Schools and Colleges. By E. A. Andrews and S. Stoddard. Revised by Henry Preble, Assistant-Professor of Greek and Latin at Harvard University. Houghton, Mifflin, & Co.

Sermo Latinus: a Short Guide to Latin Prose Composition. Part I.—Introduction. Part II.—Selected Passages for Translation. By J. P. Postgate, M.A., Litt.D., Fellow and Classical Lecturer of Trinity College, Cambridge, Professor of Comparative Philology in University College, London, Editor of the "New Latin Primer" &c. London: Macmillan & Co.

Witness Trajan's refusal to accept Pliny's tentative suggestion that a society of fabri should be formed at Nicomedeia to deal with the frequent and dangerous conflagrations against which the people had no effective means of precaution or remedy. No, says Trajan, solicitous as he was for the welfare of all his provinces, "no, let other means be adopted. We must remember that the province has been troubled with conspiracies." "Quodcumque nomen ex quacumque causa dederimus iis qui in idem contracti fuerint . . . hætariæ † æque † brevi fient." If Ireland were a Crown colony so might an imperial administrator receive orders to suppress the innocent Gaelic associations for the promotion of rustic sports and pastimes. Mr. Hardy tells us that his edition is "not primarily intended for school use," yet it would be a valuable book for a good Sixth Form to read under an efficient master—"if it is not to remain a law of the Medes and Persians that for school purposes Roman history should end with Augustus," just at the point where it becomes most deeply interesting, just when it comes into contact with modern civilization, and just when it is most suggestive for young men beginning to be politicians. Mommsen has done much to counteract the scholastic superstition about the virtues of the old Roman Republic; but it may be well for young students to be reminded, as in Mr. Hardy's learned and attractive introduction, that "to transfer a province from the Senate to the Emperor was considered a sufficient answer to complaints of debt and distress." Of the notes which Mr. Hardy has appended to the text, full and clear and never shirking a difficulty, we can only say that we have found them to be correct in every case where we have tested them, and have never appealed in vain for the explanation or information which ought to have been supplied. On points of archæology, of Roman history and usages, Mr. Hardy has already earned a high reputation, which he has not diminished by anything contained in this valuable selection from Pliny's letters, throwing, as they do, an amiable, if somewhat homely, light upon the character of a conscientious administrator doing his best at a difficult period, trusted by his friend and master, but never permitted, and indeed never wishing, to have a free hand in settling questions which might become matters of imperial concern. Small matters Trajan left to Pliny, because he had confidence in him, and of personal favours he was profuse; but in doubt or difficulty he gave his own orders, and expected them to be carried out.

Mr. Duff's edition of the Fifth Book of Lucretius is intended, he says, to explain one part of the whole work for the benefit of beginners and to smooth the way for the comprehension of other and more difficult passages. In these humble but certainly useful objects Mr. Duff has been fairly successful, and he has not attempted any more arduous undertaking. His text and his commentary are in substance the text and commentary of Munro, the latter compressed and curtailed for the use of schools. The biography of Lucretius and the exposition of some doctrines of Epicurus are clear, sufficient, and unattractive. For the astronomical section he tells us that he is indebted to Mr. Callendar, of Trinity College, Cambridge. It is very justly remarked in the preface that "the astronomical theories of Lucretius are simple enough so long as they are purely fanciful, and difficult only when they approximate to the truth." With Munro for a guide it would not be easy for an editor who did not take a perverse delight in the ingenuities of distortion to write notes upon Lucretius which were not sound; and Mr. Duff is evidently a good scholar, if not an original one. We shall not find in his book any, or at least not many, of those elementary errors which somehow or other creep into the commentaries of an editor who is working on virgin or fallow soil; and the main fault which can properly be urged against Mr. Duff's school-book is that he has frequently given assistance where, for the sake of teacher and taught, a judicious editor would have said nothing at all. An instance may be found at the very first line:—"potis is an indeclinable adjective; quid potis est, l. 560; pote, which also occurs, is not the neuter but a weakened form, as mage is of magis, amabere of amaberis." So, again (as passim), at line 47, superbiâ spurcitia, where we are told that the a is left short before sp. If a boy cannot observe such a thing for himself, it is time that his faculties were enlivened by the resources of scholastic discipline. On lines 210-212 he commits himself (by oversight, we suppose) to a statement at once universal and incorrect; on si cimus—nequeant he remarks:—"An irregular form of condition, the rule in Latin requiring the same mood, as well as tense, in protasis and apodosis." But Mr. Duff's syntax is generally sound, though occasionally just a trifle hypercritical; as at p. 454, where he says (rightly) that efficerent is the consecutive subjunctive because Lucretius would not admit anything like design in the creation of the world, and, consequently, the final subjunctive would be inappropriate. Mr. Duff should remember that the distinction between the final and consecutive aspects of the mood often comes into existence by translation. To the Latin reader of the Latin language the one aspect is confused with the other, and is practically identical with it. As a caution to the translator the note was well enough, as criticism on the text it is simply a mistake.

There is more excuse in the case of Lucretius than of any other Latin poet for making out of his remains a book of elegant extracts. As Professor Church says in his introduction to Mr. Dymes's little book, taken as a whole the De Rerum Natura will be an uncongenial study to a young reader, and the "beauties" can be so easily detached from the argumentative or philosophical context that they seem to have been introduced wholly or mainly "to relieve the weariness of abstruse or technical reasoning." Mr. Dymes has made his selections from all the six books impartially, and succeeds in giving us a very good idea what a poet Lucretius might have been if he had not spoiled himself by taking to philosophy. The notes are generally correct, although they are sometimes loosely expressed, and occasionally, but not often, deceptive, as on ii. 1151:—

Jamque adeo fracta est ætas effetaque tellus
Vix animalia parva creat κ.τ.λ.

Here Mr. Dymes remarks "creat for the ordinary ut creet after adeo." He is careful to notice unusual forms—e.g. aliæ as the genitive of alius—and to point out any metrical or prosodical peculiarity. But some of his notes—perhaps a third of them—might as well have been struck out, not because they are wrong or superfluous, but because they call attention to matters which even an inefficient teacher would hardly overlook.

Professor Kellogg has turned out a business-like school-book in his edition of the Brutus, the least read of Cicero's rhetorical treatises, although it is the most suitable to those "young scholars" who rule the classical market. Perhaps it was to consult their convenience that Professor Kellogg has followed the absurd custom of separating in his commentary the notes relating to textual criticism from the notes upon other matters in the text, making the former inaccessible and the latter incomplete. The introductory remarks about the Dialogue itself and the persons who take part in it are useful and necessary, although we confess that we do not care much about Professor Kellogg's remarks upon "the Grecizing influence in Roman oratory," Atticism, Asianism, and all the rest of it. We trust that we are not doing Professor Kellogg an injustice if we hint that his criticism appears to be derived from a second-hand knowledge, and he drags in a quotation from Professor Jebb which is almost unintelligible as and where it stands. The text has been based, of course, on that of Baiter and Kayser, but certain variations have been introduced which are duly noted in an appendix. A little more courage of innovation would have been an excusable failing, as e.g. at 34, 129, where luculentus is retained, although patronus of the MSS. is replaced by accusator. The grammatical notes seem to be complete and careful, erring only in an amiable diffuseness and in a tendency to reproduce illustrations which must be stale even to the most forgetful of Young Scholars. The historical, literary, and archæological allusions are clearly explained, and it is in this respect, and in its admirable indices, that Professor Kellogg's book deserves the highest praise.

It is not certain that Catullus in Selections is a good book for little boys to read; but if we may judge by the notes which Mr. Crowell has appended to the text it is for little boys that he has made his little book. We have no fault to find with the notes; they are short and sufficient, and do not contain too many translations of easy passages. Each poem has a few explanatory remarks, generally by another hand. Of the welcome to Veranius (c. 9), Professor Sellar is allowed to say, "the language of affection could not be uttered with more cordiality, simplicity, and grace," &c. Book-making? well, perhaps it is. But at least it is honest book-making. Not content with annotating certain parts of Catullus, Mr. Crowell imagined that he could increase the usefulness of his book by making certain "Selections for Reading at Sight," and amongst them he has included a poem bristling with difficulties and refined into subtleties like the famous Acme and Septimius! To stand by while a class of unimaginative young rascals mangled the tenderest love poem in the Latin language would drive a sentimental young scholar out of his senses.

If there is any demand in the United States for another elaborate and substantial grammar of the Latin language, it is likely that Mr. Preble has made a good use of his time in editing, enlarging, and revising the once standard work of Andrews and Stoddard, although he has certainly given himself quite as much trouble as if he had written on his own account a grammar which he might have called original. He has done his task carefully and, within certain limits, accurately. We have detected no mistake or oversight in the parts which we have examined. But, on the other hand, we have been impressed with no remarkable excellence, and see little trace of that lucidity in thought and language which would alone justify the production of another new Latin grammar. Mr. Preble talks about "the obscurity which envelops the subjunctive mood," and flatters himself that he has rendered it "as slightly opaque as possible." To bear out this marvellous expression, what has he done? He divides the usages of the subjunctive mood in independent sentences into four classes, which he calls Hortatory, Optative, Potential, and Substantive, and in each of them, "more or less distinctly traceable," he detects "a notion of indeterminate futurity." Mr. Preble can state a rule, but he is not skilful in explaining it, and generally he does not try. What we used to call the Accusative-and-Infinitive he calls Indirect Discourse; but does not show why the subject is put in the accusative, or why the main verb is put in the infinitive and the subordinate verbs in the subjunctive mood. Even less adequate is the account which he gives of the use of the accusative case with certain verbs, "seemingly dependent on passive, but really remnants of a middle voice." Without striking merits or glaring faults, Mr. Preble's grammar is a complete and useful, unscientific but unpretentious, book of reference for a fairly advanced scholar.

It is only what might have been expected that Dr. Postgate should write an admirable book about Latin Prose, the way of doing it, and the way of teaching it. The Second Part of this little treatise consists of a selection of English passages, specially suitable for translation into Latin, of which we may say that more than two or three of them are already familiar in the schools. The First Part contains, with much that is sound and much that is valuable and suggestive, a few propositions which are fairly debateable. On the difficult art of correcting an exercise, Dr. Postgate warns an inexperienced teacher not to trust too implicitly to "the cry of linguistic feeling"; he must not disregard it, but, on the other hand, must not regard it as infallible. If he points to a phrase, and says that it won't do, he may find that "the careful pupil" has armed himself beforehand with an awkward justification. A judicious Chiron will ask his young Achilles, "What authority have you for this expression?" Dr. Postgate goes too far, as many others before him have gone too far, when he says that metaphors are bolder in English than in Latin; but he corrects the misapprehension which he might have caused by showing that what he means is that very often the English metaphor cannot be literally translated, and by showing that Latin has metaphors of its own, "fresh from the mint of the senses, vivid and realistic." Again, he follows the scholastic fashion in too broadly denouncing the use of abstract Latin nouns; the fact is that, dangerous as they are in the hands of a schoolboy, they are quite freely used by the best writers of Latin prose, English or Latin. But they must be used with judgment, and until the judgment is mature they are best avoided; but a too prolonged timidity is one reason why some of the most orthodox Latin prose done by good modern hands on sound modern principles has a certain rigidity and formality which show that the writer is not using his own language. On the other hand, we think that Dr. Postgate lays excessive stress on the dangers of using a "fair copy." He says (what sounds plausible) that "the compositions of modern writers may be good Latin, but that those of Cicero and Livy must be," and further, that "we learn Latin prose, like other things; by doing it rather than by seeing how it should be done." First as to the latter point; in throwing a fly, in riding at a fence, and in translating a piece of English into Latin, the shortest way to be rid of a bad trick and to acquire the proper knack is to narrowly watch a more accomplished performer, provided that we have acquired sufficient technical knowledge to appreciate and account for his technical superiority. And for purposes of instruction the English is a better model than the Latin writer of Latin, because the former has dealt with the difficulties which we have to face ourselves; he is managing two languages, not a single one. To return to our trout-stream illustration, we shall never learn to handle our cast by watching the gyrations of the living flies on the water; we must copy the manœuvres of the fisherman who has a rod and line between himself and his lure. There are several other points which we should like to argue with Dr. Postgate did our space permit us; but we must be content to recommend his little book to everybody who wishes to learn for himself or to impart to others the beautiful and (we believe) the useful art of turning an English sentence inside out until you reach the very heart of its meaning—the one indispensable preliminary for putting it into Latin, a process which often makes it impossible to adequately translate many plausible passages in modern literature, and especially in modern oratory. Burke survives the test, so does Mr. Bright, but not Mr. Gladstone. A fallacy which is a fallacy of continuous but self-consistent thought can be put into good Latin; not so a fallacy which is only disguised by the decent ambiguities of a loose-fitting language.

FOX-TERRIERS.*

THAT the fox-terrier, in spite of its many and often formidable rivals in the affections of the public, certainly holds its own with undefeated vigour at every succeeding show, cannot be denied; and in that large collection of dog-lore which increases every year, Mr. Rawdon Lee's book deserves an important place. It is one of the most complete and comprehensive monographs on dogs which has appeared. As the author justly says in his preface, twenty years ago a volume devoted to one particular variety of terrier would have been considered altogether superfluous. In this year of grace, however, when the fox-terrier is possessed of a distinct status in canine society, when he has not only a monthly journal (The Fox-Terrier Chronicle) devoted solely to his interests, but also no less than eleven clubs enrolled under his name to do him honour, a volume describing his history and doughty deeds by flood and field and on the exhibition bench can hardly be considered any longer superfluous.

Of all the dogs that are most prominent in the favour of the public at present, the fox-terrier may perhaps claim the longest and most distinct pedigree. That charming old lady Dame Juliana Berners, the sporting Abbess of Sopewell, mentions "teroures" in her famous Boke of St. Albans, published in 1486; and before her day, in an early fourteenth-century manuscript, quoted by Strutt in his Sports and Pastimes, terriers are not only mentioned, but their use in unearthing a fox is exemplified in an illustration. In 1576 the learned Dr. Caius, a man "exceeding skilled and sagacious in the investigation of recondite matters," wrote A Treatise of Englishe Dogges, the original being in Latin and printed by Rychard Johnes in black letter. The translation by Abraham Fleming preserves much of the quaint flavour of the original, and amongst other dogs Dr. Caius gives a minute description of "a dogge called terrar, Latin Terrarius—which hunteth the Fox and the Badger or Greye onely, whom we call Terrars, because they (after the manner and custome of ferrets in searching for Connyes) creep into the ground, and by that meanes make afraide, nyppe and bite the Foxe and the Badger in such sorte that eyther they teare them in pieces with their teeth, beyng in the bosome of the earth, or else hayle and pull them perforce out of theyr lurking angles, darke dongeons, and close caues; or at the least through cocened feare drive them out of their hollow harbours, in so much that they are compelled to prepare speedie flyte, and, being desirous of the next (albeit not the safest) refuge, are otherwise taken and intrapped with snayres and nettes layde over holes to the same purpose." No more accurate description of the duties of a fox-terrier could be written in the present day, though nineteenth-century ideas would hardly endorse the "snayres and nettes"; and, therefore, though their colour and markings may not have been the same as the white beauties of the hour, it is certain that a distinct race of fox-terriers existed when Dr. Caius wrote in 1576. In the Cynographia Britannica, published in 1800, the writer, Sydenham Edwards, describes the terrier at great length, and says that "the most distinct varieties are the crooked-legged and straight-legged; their colours generally black, with tanned legs and muzzles; a spot of the same colour over each eye; though they are sometimes reddish fallow or white and pied. The white kind have been in request of late years. The ears are short, some erect, others pendulous—these and part of the tail are usually cut off—some rough, and some smooth-haired. Many sportsmen prefer the wire-haired, supposing them to be the harder biters; but this is not always the case." As to the prevalence of this latter idea regarding the rough-haired terrier, the Sporting Dictionary of 1803 says that, though the smooth-coated dogs are "not much deficient in courage" to their wiry cousins, "the rough breed must be acknowledged the most severe and invincible biter of the two." This notion, however, may be said to have died a natural death long ago; and, though many people still prefer the rough-haired fox-terriers, it is more a matter of individual preference than of separate characteristics. It is clear from the above-quoted description of the terrier of 1800 by Sydenham Edwards that the dogs he wrote about must have been the parents of the various breeds of terrier which are now classified under different headings, the red or fawn ones being now known as Irish terriers; the black, with tan faces and paws, as Welsh; and the white or white and pied as the ordinary fox-terrier.

* A History and Description, with Reminiscences, of the Fox-Terrier. By Rawdon B. Lee, Kennel Editor of "The Field." London: Horace Cox. 1889.

To all real lovers of these delightful little dogs Mr. Lee's book will be a treasure; for he not only gives, as will be seen, their history from early ages, but he also describes with loving care all the famous terriers that have made their mark since the exhibition at the Islington Agricultural Hall in June 1862, which was the first occasion when a separate class and prizes was granted to fox-terriers. Since that date the popularity of the fox-terrier has increased every year, and still shows no sign of diminishing. On the breeding, rearing, and training of puppies Mr. Lee has many wise ideas to impart, and what he says about the advantage of teaching a dog to look upon the chain with pleasure instead of aversion will be appreciated by all those who know how often a dog spoils his chances in the judging-ring by his sullen behaviour as soon as he is led out on a chain. The illustrations by Mr. Arthur Wardle are excellent, both portraits and vignettes being admirably lifelike and characteristic.

NEW MUSIC.

MESSRS. NOVELLO & CO. have sent us a series of short and easy anthems for use as introits and suitable to the different Church seasons. They are successful compositions in what is generally considered almost the only original school of English music, and are introduced by a preface pointing out the wish to employ passages from Scripture as much as possible which have not been set as anthems before. This is the chief thing we should cavil at, for it necessitates the employment of modern composers only, whereas in a series of this kind excerpts from the old masters would add immensely to the collection. No. 1, "God who is rich in mercy," by G. M. Garrett, starts the series well; it is effective, and not difficult. We wish space had allowed the passage in imitation which accompanies the words "hath quickened us together in Christ" to be more fully worked out. The ending of it by a unison passage in the key of C, returning immediately to the original key of A flat through the note G, common to both scales, is very fine. No. 2, "When my soul fainted within me," by J. Frederick Bridge, opens with a striking, though short, bass solo. Throughout this anthem we can trace the hand of a master of harmony and counterpoint, but it hardly answers to the descriptive title of the series, for we fear many choirs would find it far from easy. At first sight No. 3, "Praised be the Lord daily," by J. Baptiste Calkin, might strike a casual observer as open to the same objection, owing to the array of sharps and double sharps; but in reality the harmonies are quite simple. It is a melodious work, perhaps not very original. No. 4, "The great day of the Lord is near," by George C. Martin, is very dramatic. We admire much the contrast to the forte bass passage for the choir by which it begins, given by the words "Sing ye the Lord" sung piano in unaccompanied harmony tutti; then the bass motive comes in again in the accompaniment at the end, the whole choir singing in the meanwhile the dominant of the pedal note played on the organ. We wish the passage were rather longer. No. 6, "Who are we, O Lord," by Charles H. Loyd, is perhaps the best suited of the series for an introit. It does not attempt too much matter for the space allotted, and the melody and harmonies are charmingly simple and taking. No. 7, "Our soul on God with patience waits," by G. M. Garrett, is melodious, but does not impress us as so original as No. 1 of the series by the same composer. No. 8, "I will magnify Thee," by R. Luard Selby, is clever; the elaborate, but short, bit of symphony for the organ at the beginning, and again repeated in the middle, is decidedly out of place, as it would tax the powers of many non-proficients on the organ; in fact, the whole work errs on the side of difficulty. No. 9, "Blessed is He," also by R. Luard Selby, has the same fault in a minor degree of being too elaborate for its purpose, although parts of it are very charming. No. 10, "Blessed now are we," by E. H. Thorne, is the shortest of the series, but none the worse for that. The music is well adapted to the words, and full of pathos. No. 11, "Grant, we beseech Thee," by J. Booth, is also very simple, but very suitable to its purpose. In the heading it is especially mentioned as adapted for Lent; this intention is carried out well, as it avoids the lugubrious exaggeration so prevalent in many hymns and anthems written for that season. No. 12, "The pillars of the earth are the Lord's," by Berthold Tours, brings the series worthily to an end. If we may use such an expression in Church music, there is always a go and a knowledge of the means of producing the effect wanted which makes Berthold Tours's ecclesiastical music so attractive, although it is perhaps wanting in depth. Altogether we congratulate Messrs. Novello & Co. on this series, and it will be a valuable addition to our Church music. They also send us two specimens of longer and more elaborate anthems, belonging to the "Novello's Octavo Anthems" series. "In the fear of the Lord," by J. Varley Roberts, is a quiet and beautiful work, well harmonized, with no straining after ambitious and eccentric effects. It begins in the form of an air for tenor solo, the choir taking it up and singing the same subject in harmony; it is very lovely. "So Summer comes again," by Sir John Stainer, another of this series, is much more elaborated. It evidently is chiefly written for a harvest festival, for it would be much too long for general use. It ends with a fine and spirited free fugue to the words "Bid men and angels share." Three examples of Novello's Tonic Sol-fa series are sent for our inspection. Two of them are anthems—"Vital Spark of Heavenly Flame," composed by Harwood, and "The Lord is King," by Josiah Pitman. They are simple and effective, and well adapted to the needs of a village choir. A four-part song, "Crocuses and Snowdrops," by Henry Smart, without being anything out of the way, shows the composer's usual good qualities and knowledge of what he is writing. From the same publishers we have three part-songs, by Franz Abt, called respectively "Evening Song," "The Rover's Joy," and "The Flowers' Review." They are taking songs likely to prove popular for choral unions, although not rising above the commonplace. A "Solemn March" for organ, by B. Luard Selby, is a fine, massive work, without too much technical difficulty.

Messrs. Woolhouse & Co. send us a series of three songs, vocal trios for female voices, entitled "Fairy Land," composed by T. A. de Orellana. We are at once predisposed to like them before looking at the music, from the excellent choice of words. But, apart from this merit, the music is well adapted to the words, and is really very quaint and charming.

SOME GERMAN BOOKS.

PROFESSOR FRIEDRICH PAULSEN is already favourably known as the author of a study on the Development of Kant's Theory of Knowledge; and now, after an interval of, we believe, some fifteen years, he has come forward with a more important work on Ethics (1). It is not purely a theoretical work, either as System or Kritik. The first volume—or first part, as he prefers to call it—is divided between History and Criticism. It is a sketch of the development of ethics from Aristotelian days down to our own, accompanied by a continual stream of criticism. The second part is devoted to what may be described as applied ethic, ethic applied to the problems of political and social economy (or oeconomia). The final chapters, on Socialism and the functions of the State, may be read with special interest. But as Pessimism undoubtedly at the present moment "holds the field" among contemporary systems of philosophy or ethics, it is probably to the chapters on pessimism and its allied systems that the reader of Herr Paulsen's book will most eagerly turn. The chapter on Pessimism itself is preceded by one on Hedonism. "Even Pessimism," says Herr Paulsen, "belongs to the school of Hedonism, since its argument is that life has no value, on the ground that the pains of life preponderate over its pleasures." Our author asks, "How can you show that Pleasure is the measure of the value of Life?" You can only do so by showing that to employ this standard of value belongs to the essence of human nature. "It would be absurd to say, Pleasure is not the standard by which we measure the value of life, but it ought to be." Not so absurd as the author seems to suppose. Like almost all modern philosophers writing under the shadow of Evolutionism, he is apt to confuse the origin of our feelings, ethical and other, with the reasonable justification of these feelings. Our author himself takes what we may call Activity (Thätigkeit, Entwicklung, &c.) as the measure of the value of existence; and, in fact, this Thätigkeit is practically the same as Schopenhauer's Wille. But to say that, because one or the other is the cause of the greater part of human action, and not any direct expectation of pleasure nor fear of pain, is not to show that they afford a reasonable justification for human actions, or even for human life itself. In fact, Schopenhauer, as we know, declares in the most emphatic way that they do not, and that the only reasonable thing to do is to cease to exist. We believe that every one who will examine his own consciousness will admit that, if the element of Hope were abstracted therefrom, the mere Thätigkeit or Activity of Life, the mere constant pressing onward to no goal, would not afford a reasonable justification for existence. Herr Paulsen, so far as the argument from experience goes, seems to exclude this element. He seems to admit that there is no evidence that mankind, as it develops, does advance either in virtue or in happiness. There are more extremes, he thinks—that is all. To use his own simile, the swing of the pendulum is wider, but the central point is still zero. Of course this apparently pessimistic standpoint does not exclude transcendental sanctions for hope. These the author rather suggests than formulates. His philosophy is perfectly consistent with a Calvinistic creed. For our own part, we believe that a much more optimistic theory of life might be supported merely upon experience, to say nothing of those transcendental sanctions to hope to which we have referred. We have no space to argue the matter here. But let the reader take one example only—the relation of the sexes, as it can be traced in the course of human development—and he will, we think, perceive that there is no negative arc in the swing of the pendulum at all commensurate with its positive curve. If animalism looks more animal to-day than it does in the noble savage, it is only through the effect of contrast, not through any intrinsic deterioration.

(1) System der Ethik, mit einem Umriss der Staats- und Gesellschaftslehre. Von Friedrich Paulsen. Berlin: Wilhelm Hertz. 1889.

Herr Heinrich Bulthaupt publishes a third and much enlarged edition of his Dramaturgie der Classiker (2). The apology, by the way, which he makes for his use of the word "classical" is surely at this time of day unnecessary; nobody now employs the word in the purely schoolboy sense which Herr Bulthaupt complains of. The first edition of this book appeared some time ago, when want of space prevented our noticing it. The general plan of this edition is identical with that of the previous ones. The first volume deals with German classical dramas; the second is devoted exclusively to Shakspeare—a fact which shows that, immense as is the volume of extant German criticism on Shakspeare, the last word has not, in the opinion of Herr Bulthaupt, yet been said. The author does not confine his attention to the literary qualities of the plays he is reviewing, but has in every instance a word or two to say upon their acting capabilities. Our English poets have left us an enormous body of unacted and perhaps unactable dramas. Sometimes a "Society," such as the Browning Society or the Shelley Society, takes one or other of these plays in hand and gives a representation to a few select spirits who are deemed capable of appreciating them. The tale of these unrepresented dramas is much less in Germany than here, not, we believe, because their composition adapts itself better to the stage, but because the stage, thanks to its munificent patrons, from the days of Duchess Amalia to those of the present Duke of Saxe-Meiningen, has been able and willing to adapt itself more readily to the caprices of the poets. When we consider that the Second Part of Faust has been thus presented, we see that this kind of complaisance could not go much further. It is owing to the exertions of the Meiningen company that Kleist's Friedrich von Homburg (certainly not an acting play as we understand those words) has been rendered familiar to the boards. Another revival of comparatively recent years has been Lessing's Miss Sara Sampson. It is a play which an Englishman could hardly follow seriously, with its Sir Sampson, with the fantastic "Mellefont" and "Marwood," and its "Miss Sara," to say nothing of the extraordinary action of the piece in and out among the rooms of a small roadside inn. But for the sake of its undoubtedly fine writing it is patiently followed in the Fatherland. On the more strictly literary side of his study Herr Bulthaupt is a good critic. His style, though occasionally marred by the superlativeness of the German critical writing, is on the whole eminently readable, and there is scarcely one of these essays which does not contain some pregnant remark. It is well said, for example, that the "Prolog in Himmel" of Faust ought never to be given or considered as the prologue to the First Part alone, as it would be impossible that the wager between Der Herr and Mephistopheles could be decided by the "Her zu mir" with which Faust, Part I., concludes. Of Macbeth he says it is the most modern in spirit of all Shakspeare's plays, as it is the only one in which we see a character in the process of development, or, at any rate, the only instance of a downward progress. Herr Bulthaupt's discussion of the character of Lady Macbeth is moderate and sensible. She is not the virago of what is called here the Siddons type; "she is and remains a woman who had loved and borne children." But it does not follow from this that she is the delicate and æsthetic lady who at present treads the boards of the Lyceum.

Von Banana zum Kiamwo (3) is the account of a German expedition in West Africa between the Congo and the K'Anvo. The party was under the command of First-Lieutenant Schulze, who unfortunately died of fever in the course of it. Dr. Willy Wolff, who writes this account, was the medical officer, and the zoologist and anthropologist of the expedition. Their adventures seem to have chiefly consisted in the difficulty of finding bearers, and they had occasionally to separate and forage in different directions in the hopes of obtaining them. A rather monotonous narrative is relieved by occasional pictures of the village life of the natives which are of value to the anthropologist.

The increased interest in archæological study and the greater facilities for travelling which make all the classical countries, but especially Greece, so much more accessible than they used to be, create a demand for guide-books of the superior order, like this of Dr. Franz Baumgarten to Athens (4). This book, however, is not meant to be used merely by travellers on the spot, but also as an aid in reading the classics at home. A two years' residence in Athens from 1881 to 1883, has given Dr. Baumgarten the opportunity of studying intimately the topography of Athens, and for discoveries of a more recent date he has had the assistance of such distinguished archæologists as Professor Michaelis and Dr. Dorpfeld. The descriptions are admirably clear and complete without being pedantically so, and the maps and plans, of which there are ten, are excellent.

An issue of Hauff's Das Bild des Kaisers (5), edited by Dr. Karl Breul, forms a volume of the Cambridge Pitt Press Series. It seems to us to be distinguished by much the same merits and defects which have often been noted in similar and better known issues of the Clarendon Press. Great pains are spent upon all the notes dealing with philological questions, many of which are of a kind adapted to students much more advanced than the probable users of these little volumes. We do not see, indeed, why a boy at school should even be expected to know by intuition the meaning of the letters O.H.G., M.H.G., and N.H.G. In order to make the story the clearer, the editor has prefixed a short life of Napoleon. But, while giving many details which have not the slightest bearing on the story, he entirely omits to mention the confiscation by the conqueror of the lands of the free knights of the Empire, though upon this much of the story rests. "Du hast mir mein Kleid, meinen Hut und meine Börse zurückgegeben," exclaims the old Freiherr, turning to the picture of the Emperor, "um mich nachher mein Alles zu rauben." The only note on the word Freiherr, by the way, is that the word means "free lord."

We have received, in addition, a thick book of German Exercises (6), by G. J. R. Glüncke, which seem well arranged to lead the pupil from the simpler to the more difficult stages of German composition; a German Accidence (7), in the "Parallel Grammar Series," by no less a person than Professor Kuno Meyer; and a book of German Dialogues (8), by A. an der Halden. On p. 168 of this last work we notice a rather startling statement. Says the Master, speaking of the results of philology, "This relationship of languages indicates that not only all languages, but also all mankind, have descended from one primary race." Pupil: "What name is given in philology to this primary race of nations and languages?" Master: "It is called the Indo-Germanic (Aryan) family!"

FRENCH LITERATURE.

OF the many books which the Centenary and the Exhibition have produced in and about Paris, we cannot think of one which is more agreeable than M. Albert Babeau's Paris en 1789 (1). Brought out in the best manner of the famous house which publishes it as regards print, paper, and illustrations, and pleasantly wrapped in that leather paper imitative of old morocco which has become rather fashionable in France of late, and which deserves preservation underneath true binding, it is a very handsome volume, possessing the additional advantage of being, unlike too many handsome volumes, quite manageable. But its soul is fully as good as its body. M. Babeau has left all political matter—all contentious matter, indeed, of every kind—entirely on one side, and contents himself with giving from various sources (from Mercier, of course, first of all, but also from many others) a remarkably compact and closely stowed, (3) Von Banana zum Kiamwo. Von Dr. Med. Willy Wolff. Oldenburg and Leipzig: A. Schwartz.

(4) Ein Rundgang durch die Ruinen Athens. Von Dr. Fritz Baumgarten. Leipzig: Hirzel.

(5) Das Bild des Kaisers. Von W. Hauff. Edited by Karl Breul. Cambridge Pitt Press Series.

(6) German Exercises. By G. J. R. Glüncke. London: Rivingtons. 1889.

(7) Parallel Grammar Series—German Grammar Accidence. By Kuno Meyer, Ph.D. London: Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 1889.

(8) Progressive German Dialogues. By A. an der Halden. London: Rivingtons. 1889.

(1) Paris en 1789. Par Albert Babeau. Paris: Firmin Didot.

(2) Dramaturgie der Classiker. Von Heinrich Bulthaupt. Oldenburg and Leipzig: A. Schwartz. 1889.

but also quite readable, sketch of the material sights and sounds of Paris at the time—its streets and its buildings, its costumes and its cries, its trades and its conveyances, its ways by day and by night. To aid him in this (and here we come to the unique attraction of the book), he has got together a great number of admirable cuts, exclusively reproduced from originals of the time. Thus we escape altogether that mixture of old and new, of the exact and the conjectural, which usually distinguishes illustrated books of the kind. A few of these—such, for instance, as the well-known and very pretty engraving of a sturdy, bare-legged porter carrying a furbelowed girl with a wonderful hat pick-a-back through the black waves of the Parisian gutter—will be familiar to tolerably widely-read people; but the great majority will be new except to specialists and print-collectors. We must mention a few—not that such a mention can do justice, but that it is fair to give specimens. Such a specimen may be found in the striking and well-executed plate of the demolition of the houses on the Pont Notre Dame in 1786, with the washerwomen in front and a remarkable vista of bridges in the background. The famous old Château of the Tournelles is another; to which may be noted as a contrast, Ledoux's singular and very hideous "Barrière des Champs Elysées," a good example of probably the ugliest architectural device known to man, the composition of columns by alternate round and square sections. The cut exhibiting a "chanteur de cantiques" is so astonishingly Hogarthian that the artist must pretty certainly have been acquainted with the English master. The "Wisky," on p. 75, is assuredly, as the text calls it, a "voiture de fantaisie," which, painted in a nice quiet taste, "avec des roues sang-de-bœuf et des moyeux clinquantés couleur aurore," must have been something to see. The "sworn crier of wine and interments" in a sort of short tabard and a Louis XIV. wig is as wondrous a personage as his odd combination of functions would seem to call for. But the book is full of pleasant things of this kind.

M. Paul Stapfer is, or ought to be, known to Englishmen by his excellent studies on Shakspeare; and he has done much other literature independently of his professorial work, first at Grenoble and then at Bordeaux. His present volume on Rabelais (2), however, is, we think, the most considerable attempt that he has yet made on any subject of French literature. Most assuredly there was room for it. The completest book in French hitherto, the long study of M. Jean Fleury, has many merits, but it is not acutely critical, and it has the special drawbacks which always attend a running commentary or abstract without the text. Such a thing is nearly always unsatisfactory to those who know that text, while it is far from being anything like a substitute for it to those who do not. On the other hand, though there are many critical essays, short and long, on the subject, no one of them is quite satisfactory; even Sainte-Beuve being rather below himself on this (for a Frenchman) most difficult subject. For M. Stapfer wisely and truly admits that, intensely French as Rabelais is, and keenly as the best, or some of the best, Frenchmen have always enjoyed him, a certain constraint has always weighed on the French critical estimate of him. This is probably, if not certainly, due to the inveterate tendency to make schemes and systems which is involved in Gallic esprit de suite, and to the French inability to comprehend humour ranging at will. From this defect M. Stapfer himself is quite free. That he discards the "Rabelais legend" goes without saying, though he still attaches more weight than we do to the late and quite unsupported tradition of personal enmity between Ronsard and Rabelais—a tradition which, almost without doubt, grew out of Ronsard's not very kindly, but purely conventional, epitaph. What is more important is that he equally refuses to adopt the apostolic, philosophic, militant Rabelais of the other side. In sketching the real man as he conceives him and the real work as he understands it he has laid himself open to no charge, except perhaps (from his countrymen chiefly) to one of rather wilful desultoriness. But desultoriness is so much of the nature of the subject himself that it could hardly and ought hardly to have been avoided. It is only a question of terminology that M. Stapfer calls Rabelais a "great poet" (explaining duly that he means creator); while we should say that, with rare exceptions, there is no shadow of poetry in him, his resolutely and magnificently prosaic character being his strong point; and the remarks on his style are excellent. Finally, let us thank M. Stapfer for a little fling at "scientific criticism" in his preface. The professorial mind is but too apt to embrace pseudo-sciences instead of scouting them.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

IN the new volume, the sixth, of the Henry Irving Shakspeare (Blackie & Son), which comprises the four dramas Othello, Antony and Cleopatra, Coriolanus, and King Lear, there are several changes to be noted in the editorial field, owing, we regret to learn, to the illness of Mr. Frank Marshall. To the three last-named plays Mr. Joseph Knight contributes the summaries of stage history that are a characteristic of this edition. The notes and introduction to Coriolanus are from the pen of the Rev. H. C. Beeching, while Mr. Arthur Symons and Mr. Wilson Verity are charged with similar work in connexion with Antony and Cleopatra and King Lear. In the pictorial field, also, there is change. Mr. Gordon Browne no longer bears alone the too vast enterprise of illustrating the works of Shakspeare, but has supporters in Mr. Margetson and Mr. Maynard Brown. It is odd, by the way, to recall how extremely popular illustrated Shakspeares have always been, although no one, unless it be the commentator, has ever succeeded in illustrating Shakspeare. The merits of the Henry Irving Shakspeare need no further indication at this date. The annotation fairly reflects the research of the older editors of Johnson's age and the modern and more audacious school of critics. Mr. Marshall's introduction to Othello is sound and well proportioned. Without subscribing to Mr. Beeching's rather superfine conclusion—"Tragedy is the confessional of great spirits; a public confessional for the good of the world"—we may acknowledge the propriety and brevity of his comments on Coriolanus. It is interesting to know through Mr. Symons that Cleopatra is "the most wonderful of Shakspeare's women," and "perhaps the most wonderful of women," though these and similar ingenuous observations are scarcely entitled to be considered "Critical remarks." Mr. Knight's "stage histories" are admirable compilations, and may save the general reader much troublesome consultation of Genest and other chroniclers of the theatre.

A happy idea is successfully realized in Characters and Episodes of the Great Rebellion, a selection from Clarendon, with notes, by the Very Rev. G. D. Boyle, M.A. (Oxford: Clarendon Press). Clarendon's skill in portraiture is very forcibly illustrated by the gallery of notable portraits here collected by the Dean of Salisbury from the historian's works. The episodes given, though the wealth of material is indeed embarrassing, include many of the finest examples of Clarendon's narrative style, and form a thoroughly representative selection. Altogether, Mr. Boyle's volume is work well done, and may, perhaps, speed the coming of the new annotated edition of Clarendon which Scott once contemplated and many readers of history would gladly welcome.

The Imitation of Christ, by Thomas à Kempis, "now for the first time set forth in rhythmic sentences, according to the original intention of the author," with a preface by Canon Liddon (Elliot Stock), is a curious reminder of the vanity of translation to all who possess previous English versions, whether in prose or metre. "The present translator," says Canon Liddon, "has wisely taken advantage of the admirable Latin version of the Imitation which was published by C. Hirsche at Berlin in 1874," and the result is that we now have the book "in its original form" for the first time in English. Its rhythmical character may be tested by the following section, taken on a chance opening of the translation:—

Turn on yourself your eyes,
Beware of judging others' deeds,
We toil in vain in passing sentence upon men;
We often make mistakes,
Sin easily;
But if we judge ourselves and look within ourselves we always work with profit to the soul.

Now this does not appear to us to represent the melody and rhythm of the original, which critics praise so highly in the 1441 Codex upon which the translation and Dr. Hirsche's edition are based. The form may be more impressive, and may be more readily retained in the memory of the reader than other versions, but it can hardly be said to possess those qualities which in the original have been compared to the Psalms or the Proverbs.

In a little book of some two hundred pages—A Brief History of the English Church (Parker & Co.)—the Rev. Alfred Cecil Smith undertakes a vast survey of ecclesiastical history from the martyrdom of St. Alban and the conversion of Saxon England unto the days of the Salvation Army, which is oddly described as a "form of dissent" which draws from the Church "men who are not well grounded in their belief." Mr. Smith's book is altogether of too liberal comprehension. There is scarcely room and verge enough in it for a brief history of the Church of England.

Essays on Men and Books (Trübner & Co.) is the first volume of a selection of Macaulay's "Essays" in the attractive "Lotos Series." It comprises the Clive, Chatham, Milton, and Byron essays, with an introduction by Dr. Alexander Japp, who has revised what Macaulay left unrevised, and omitted some "few pages of general criticism." In doing this Dr. Japp thinks he has "not taken too great a liberty." Perhaps not, though it would be interesting to know how any editor, even Dr. Japp, can possibly be "quite certain" as to what passages Macaulay "would not have allowed to stand."

From Messrs. Boussod, Valadon, & Co. we have received an Illustrated Catalogue of the seventeen paintings of old and modern masters, formerly in the Secrétan collection, and recently sold by Messrs. Christie.

The new half-yearly volume of The Antiquary (Elliot Stock) fully holds its own as a record of current archaeological research and a miscellany of original articles on ancient customs, folklore, myths, and the wide field of antiquarian study.

"The Fielding Library" (Michael Barstow) makes a promising start with Joseph Andrews, in good type, neat cloth binding, embellished with Hogarth's medallion portrait as a frontispiece.

A book of verse and prose for Sundays and Saints' days, entitled Sursum Corda: Song and Service, by George F. E. Scott (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.), contains sonnets and hymns decidedly above the average of modern religious poetry.

We have also received a second edition of Mr. C. J. Hyne's lively recital of marvels, Beneath Your Very Boots (Digby & Long); The Army and Navy Calendar, 1889-90 (Allen & Co.); Pharisees Unveiled, by Mrs. George Corbett (Tower Publishing Co.), and Young England's Painting Book (Warne & Co.), a pretty series of coloured pictures, with duplicates in outline for the practice of young hands in water-colours.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

ADVERTISEMENTS intended for the SATURDAY REVIEW should be addressed to the MANAGER of the ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT, at the OFFICE, 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON. A printed Scale of Charges can be obtained on application.

The SATURDAY REVIEW may be had every Saturday from Veuve J. BOYVEAU, 22 Rue de la Banque (near the Bourse),
Paris,
by whom also Subscriptions will be received.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW may likewise be obtained in Paris every Saturday of Messrs. GALIGNANI, 224 Rue de Rivoli.

Nearly all the back Numbers of the SATURDAY REVIEW may be obtained through any Bookseller, or of the Publisher, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

Now ready, VOLUME LXVII., bound in cloth, price 16s. Cloth Cases for Binding all the Volumes, price 2s. each. Also Reading Cases, price 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. each. May be had at the Office, or through any Bookseller.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 1,761, JULY 27, 1889:

Egypt.

O'Brien v. the Marquess of Salisbury.

Mr. Benzon's Horse. Crete.

Reporting in the Lords. The Queen v. Bridge.

The Political Situation. The Modern Voter.

"The Mysterious Album": in One Volume. Sunday Trains.

The Bishop of Lincoln's Case. Provident Societies.

Boulangism. The Royal Grants Debate.

Among the Badawin.

Military Genius. London Money-Lenders.

Poets as Landscape-Painters. Racing. People's Banks.

A Degraded Artisan.

Colonel Malleson's Lord Wellesley.

Novels. Art in the Modern State. Stories.

Our Friends in the Hunting Field.

Dictionary of National Biography—Vol. XIX. Diabetes.

Some Atlases. Two Books about Railways. Geoffrey Gaimar—Vol. II.

Agricultural Distress and Trade Depression.

Geoffrey le Baker. Classical Books. Fox-Terriers.

New Music. Some German Books.

French Literature.

New Books and Reprints.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CRYSTAL PALACE, Saturday, July 27.—GRAND EVENING FÊTE, in honour of the Marriage of H.R.H. The PRINCESS LOUISE OF WALES.

Fire Portraits of the BRIDE and BRIDEGROOM, and novel display of AQUATIC FIREWORKS, by C. T. Brock & Co.

Grand Display of all the Great Fountains, and Illumination of Park, Terraces, and Gardens, as on the occasion of the State Visit of His Majesty the Sh-h.

Band of Her Majesty's Royal Horse Guards (Blues), by permission of Colonel the Hon. Oliver Montagu. Conductor, Mr. Charles Godfrey, R.A.Mus.

Grand Floral Ballet, "A GOLDEN DREAM," produced by Mr. Oscar Barrett, and arranged by Madame Katti Lanner. Lockhart's Marvellous Performing Elephants, &c. &c.

One Shilling Day.

THE NEW GALLERY, REGENT STREET.—SUMMER EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. 9 till 7. Admission, One Shilling.

ARUNDEL SOCIETY.—A COMPLETE SET of the CHROMOLITHOGRAPHS issued to First and Second Subscribers (1856-1889) to be SOLD.—Address, Rev. E. R. ORMER, Hougham Vicarage, Dover.

TO OLD ETONIANS.—Mr. MARTIN COLNAGHI has the pleasure of announcing that the PROOFS of "Dr. WARRE" are now ready, and will be on VIEW at the MARLBOROUGH GALLERY, 53 Pall Mall (opposite Marlborough House), on Tuesday, the 30th inst., and three following days.

PLEASURE CRUISE to NORWAY and SWEDEN.—The ORIENT COMPANY will despatch their large full-powered steamship "CHIMBORAZO," 3,847 tons register, 3,000 horse-power, from London on the 21st of August, calling at Leith on the 23rd of August, for Lerwick, Trondhjem, Molde, Naes, Gudvangen, Bergen, Vik, Gothenburg, arriving in London on the 9th of September. The steamer will be navigated through the "Inner Lead"—i.e. inside the fringe of islands off the coast of Norway, thus securing smooth water.

The "CHIMBORAZO" is fitted with the electric light, hot and cold baths, &c.

Cuisine of the highest order.

Managers..... { F. GREEN & CO., 13 Fenchurch Avenue.
ANDERSON, ANDERSON, & CO., 5 Fenchurch Avenue, London, E.C.

For further particulars apply to the latter firm, or to the West-End Agents, Grindlay & Co., 55 Parliament Street, S.W.

SCHWEITZER'S

COCOATINA.

GUARANTEED PURE SOLUBLE COCOA.

This Old-established Article retains its position as "the finest Cocoa in the market." It is unequalled in purity and flavour, bears the strictest Chemical test, and keeps in all climates.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS AND ECONOMICAL.

PURE—SOLUBLE.

BEST & GOES FARTHEST.

EASILY DIGESTED.

MADE INSTANTLY.

VAN HOUTEN'S
COCOA.

"Once used, always used—its PURITY is beyond question."

Health.

"It is admirable—flavour perfect—and so PURE."

British Medical Journal.

C. J. VAN HOUTEN & ZOON,
WEESP, HOLLAND.

ILFRACOMBE.—ILFRACOMBE HOTEL. Thoroughly furnished, equipped, and decorated. 250 Rooms. Eight Lawn-Tennis Courts, Large Swimming Bath, Private Baths. Descriptive Tariff of Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

ST. CLARE COLLEGE, WALMER, KENT.

Head-Master—The Rev. E. D'AUQUIER, M.A. Clare College, Camb.
One of the Examiners to the Irish Board of Intermediate Education, late Head-Master of South-Eastern College, Ramsgate, with a staff of Assistant Masters (Graduates).

The College is situated in a delightful spot, close to the sea, and contains teaching and boarding accommodation, chapel, sanatorium, infirmary, playroom, laundry, gymnasium, tuckshop, workshop, &c., 14 acres of well-timbered and beautiful grounds, cycle path, cricket and football fields, tennis-courts, &c., sea-bathing and boating.

The school year is divided into three terms; each term consists of about thirteen weeks.

Inclusive fees, Eighty Guineas per annum. Exhibitions and Scholarships, of £10, £15, and £21, are annually thrown open for competition.

For further information, apply to the HEAD-MASTER.

HEIDELBERG COLLEGE, Heidelberg.

Principals.

Dr. A. HOLZBERG, Ph.D., M.A. Heidelberg.

A. B. CATTY, M.A., Christ's Coll., Camb.

WALTER LAWRENCE, M.A., St. John's, Oxon.

Principal subjects, French and German. Preparation for Army and all other Exams.

Separate house for Senior Pupils.

At the recent Exam. for the I.C.S. a Pupil of Heidelberg College obtained THE HIGHEST MARKS IN GERMAN of all the Candidates.

BRIGHTON COLLEGE.

Head-Master—Rev. T. HAYES BELCHER, M.A.

Head-Master of Civil and Military Department—E. A. A. SPENCER, Esq., M.A.

late of Cheltenham College.

Head-Master of Junior Department—D. C. WICKHAM, Esq., M.A.

The School has a Classical Side on which Boys are prepared for the Universities, Indian Civil Service, &c. There is also a Civil and Military Department, the work in which is specially adapted for passing boys direct into Woolwich, Sandhurst, or Coopers Hill, or for business life. There is a Junior Department for Boys from eight to thirteen, with separate Boarding-house, school buildings, and staff of Masters.

ST. THOMAS'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL,

ALBERT EMBANKMENT, LONDON, S.E.

The WINTER SESSION of 1889-90 will OPEN on Tuesday, October 1, with an Introductory Address, at 3 P.M., by Mr. WILLIAM ANDERSON, F.R.C.S.

TWO ENTRANCE SCIENCE SCHOLARSHIPS, of 125 guineas and £60 respectively, open to all first-year Students, will be offered for competition. The Examination will be held on September 25, 26, and 27, and the subjects will be Chemistry and Physics, with either Botany or Zoology, at the option of Candidates.

Scholarships and Money Prizes of considerable value are awarded at the Sessional Examinations, as also several Medals.

Special Classes are held throughout the year for the "PRELIMINARY SCIENTIFIC" and "INTERMEDIATE M.B." Examinations of the UNIVERSITY of LONDON.

All Hospital Appointments are open to Students without extra charge.

The fees may be paid in one sum or by instalments. Entries may be made separately to Lectures or to Hospital Practice, and special arrangements are made for Students entering in their second or subsequent years; also for Dental Students and for Qualified Practitioners.

A Register of approved Lodgings is kept by the Medical Secretary, who also has a list of local Medical Practitioners, Clergymen, and others who receive students into their houses.

Prospectuses and all particulars may be obtained from the Medical Secretary, Mr. GEORGE RENDLE.

E. NETTLESHIP, Dean.

CRONDALL SCHOOL, FARNHAM, Surrey.—Invigorating

country life, healthiest in England (see Registrar's Report). Preparation for Public Schools, Royal Navy, &c.; French and German guaranteed; school farm, cricket and football fields, tennis, carpenter's shop, riding ponies.—Address, PRINCIPAL.

RADFORD HOUSE, COVENTRY.

PREPARATORY SCHOOL for the SONS of GENTLEMEN. Established 1800.

Boys received from Six to Twelve years of age, and prepared for College and Local Examinations, which have hitherto been successfully passed by the Pupils of this School. Eight acres of recreation ground.—Apply for particulars to Mrs. and Miss HOUGHTON.

THE Rev. W. ALMACK, M.A., BRUCE CASTLE, near TOTTENHAM, prepares PUPILS wanting special help for the Universities, Army, Legal or Medical Preliminaries, or the ordinary requirements of business life. Excellent house in Park of 20 acres, containing Cricket and Football grounds. References, the Head-Masters of Charterhouse, Cheltenham, and Marlborough.

PRÉ SCILLA, LAUSANNE.—Miss WILLS, late Head-Mistress of the Norwich High School, has a very comfortable English HOME for Elder GIRLS. Garden and full-sized Tennis-court. Numbers limited. Subjects taken:—French, German, Italian, Music, Singing, and Painting.

THE Misses S. and R. ALLEN-OLNEY (formerly Head-Mistresses respectively of Blackheath and South Hampstead High Schools), residing in the healthy suburb of Hampstead, receive a few YOUNG LADIES to board and educate. The arrangements are those of a refined home. Large playground and full-sized tennis-court. Preparation for University examinations and degrees. Reference kindly permitted to parents of present and former pupils.—41 Belsize Park Gardens, London, N.W.

HILLSIDE, GODALMING, Surrey. (Close to Charterhouse.) Preparatory for Charterhouse and other Public Schools. A. M. CURTEIS, M.A., late Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford. G. GIDLEY ROBINSON, M.A., formerly Scholar of Exeter College, Oxford, and late Assistant-Master of Charterhouse.

THE GREATEST of all PIANOFORTES.

THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES, New York & London. Steinway Hall, LOWER SEYMOUR STREET, Portman Square, London, W.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS' UPRIGHT IRON GRAND PIANOFORTES. Prices from 40 Guineas upwards.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Pianoforte Makers by Special Appointment to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, 1889.—18, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W. Lists free.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, Strand, W.C.—The COUNCIL earnestly appeal for DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS. £20,000 required for new Nursing Establishment, enlargement of Medical School, the Convalescent Home, and current expenses. Bankers: Messrs. Drummond. ARTHUR E. READE, Secretary.

SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK. ISSUE of £371,320.

(Authorized by the Sheffield Corporation Acts, 1883 and 1889.) The CORPORATION of SHEFFIELD give NOTICE that they are prepared to receive applications for the above sum of SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK. Minimum price of Issue £100 per cent.

Interest payable half-yearly, on March 1 and September 1, at the Sheffield and Hallamshire Bank, Sheffield, or by their London Agents, Messrs. GLYN, MILLS, CURRIE, & CO., 67 Lombard Street.

No sum less than £50 of Stock will be allotted, and any amount in excess of that sum must be a multiple of £10.

Forms of Prospectus, &c., and all information required, will be supplied by Borough Accountant's Office, Bridge Street, Sheffield, June 13, 1889. W. FISHER TASKER, Registrar.

BRAIN FAG, SHATTERED NERVES, Sleeplessness, Nervous Exhaustion, Rheumatism, Gout, Torpid Liver, Nervous Dyspepsia, &c. yield like magic to the healing influence of mild continuous currents of Electricity, generated, without any shock or discomfort whatever, by wearing

HARNESS' ELECTROPATHIC BATTERY BELT.

This world-famed guaranteed genuine Electric appliance has cured thousands of sufferers, and should be worn by all in search of HEALTH, STRENGTH, and VITAL ENERGY. Write for descriptive pamphlet, containing copies of hundreds of unsolicited testimonials, or call, if possible, and personally consult Mr. C. B. HARNESS, Consulting Medical Electrician (President of the British Association of Medical Electricians), 59 Oxford Street, London, W. (corner of Rathbone Place). Advice free, personally or by letter.

First produced and designated CORN FLOUR by BROWN & POLSON in 1856.

BROWN & POLSON'S CORN FLOUR

Was in the Field some time before any other was anywhere heard of, and no other has now an Equal Claim to the Public Confidence.

FRY'S J. WYBRANTS OLPHERTS, M.D., says: "I find it the most agreeable beverage of the kind I have ever tasted, delicious both in flavour and odour."

PURE CONCENTRATED COCOA. E. BUCKNILL, M.D., says: "Your Pure Concentrated Cocoa is so extremely nice that I have ordered it for family use."

AMERICAN DENTISTRY. Dr. PAGET, SURGEON-DENTIST, 445 STRAND, W.C. (Facing Charing Cross Station.)

ARTIFICIAL TEETH, without plates. Perfect imitations of the natural teeth. Artistic, painless, and perfect. Most moderate fees. Consultations free daily. Illustrated pamphlet post free.

BENGER'S FOOD FOR INFANTS, CHILDREN AND INVALIDS. GOLD MEDAL, HEALTH EXHIBITION. EXTRACT FROM PRIVATE LETTER.—"The infant was very delicate; our medical adviser ordered your Food. The result in a short time was wonderful; the little fellow grew strong and fat, and is now in a thriving condition—in fact, 'the flower of the flock.'"

BENGER'S FOOD is Sold in Tins, at 1s. 6d., 2s. 6d., 5s., and 10s., by Chemists, &c., everywhere. THE TRADE SUPPLIED BY ALL WHOLESALE HOUSES.

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH LAW LIFE ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION (Established 1839). 12 Waterloo Place, London. 120 Princes Street, Edinburgh. Whole Life Bonuses never less than £1 10s. per cent. per annum. Annuities. Loans. Liberal Conditions. ARTHUR JACKSON, General Manager } 12 Waterloo Place, London. FRANCIS E. COLENSO, F.I.A., Actuary }

NATIONAL PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

FOR MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE. See New Prospectus, page 17, for particulars of ENDOWMENT-ASSURANCE POLICIES combining LIFE ASSURANCE at MINIMUM COST with provision for old age. 48 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY, Established 1836. LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE. INCOME and FUNDS (1888). Fire Premiums £615,000 Life Premiums 203,000 Interest 149,000 Accumulated Funds £3,581,000

LONDON ASSURANCE CORPORATION. Established by Royal Charter, A.D. 1720. 7 ROYAL EXCHANGE AND 43A PALL MALL, S.W.

Marine, Fire, and Life Assurances have been granted by the Corporation for more than a century and a half. Funds in hand exceed £3,500,000.

PHENIX FIRE OFFICE, LOMBARD STREET and CHARING CROSS, LONDON.—Established 1782. Moderate Rates. Absolute Security. Liberal Loss Settlements. Prompt payment of Claims. W. C. MACDONALD } Joint Secretaries. F. B. MACDONALD } Losses paid over £17,000,000.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY. Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 22 PALL MALL, S.W. Subscribed Capital, £1,200,000. Paid-up, £300,000. Total Invested Funds, over £1,600,000. E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

ESTABLISHED 1851. BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane. THREE per CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables; the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

REDNESS, ROUGHNESS, & CHAPPING PREVENTED, FAIR WHITE HANDS AND HEALTHFUL SKIN AND COMPLEXION SECURED.

PEARS' SOAP.

This world-renowned Toilet Soap has obtained Fifteen International Awards as a Complexion Soap. It is specially suitable for Ladies, Children, or delicate and sensitive skins generally.

Its regular use cannot fail to benefit the worst complexion.

Recommended by Mrs. LANGTRY and Madame ADELINA PATTI.

FOR THE DECORATION OF THE HOME visit THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY'S Gallery, 74 New Oxford Street, W.C. A noble display of Copies of THE GREAT MASTERS, framed and unframed.

The Chef-d'œuvres of THE NATIONAL COLLECTIONS of London, Paris, Rome, Dresden, St. Petersburg, Madrid, &c. &c.

Catalogue of 186 pages, Sixpence, post-free. A descriptive Pamphlet free by post on application to

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY.

SPECIAL OFFER! PREVIOUS TO STOCK-TAKING, A CLEARANCE BUNDLE

Containing Fifty to Sixty Yards of SUMMER DRESS MATERIAL—chiefly in Full Dress Lengths, Zephyrs, Beiges, Tennis Cloths, &c. &c., sent to any address for ONE GUINEA, by HY. PEASE & CO'S SUCCESSORS, the Mills, Darlington. 67 QUITE EXCEPTIONAL VALUE.

SCOTLAND.

THE MIDLAND COMPANY'S IMPROVED SUMMER SERVICE of Express Trains from LONDON (St. Pancras) to SCOTLAND is now in operation, as under:

	DOWN TRAINS.—WEEKDAYS.				SUNDAYS.
	a.m.	a.m.	a.m.	p.m.	a.m.	p.m.	a.m.	p.m.
LONDON (St. Pancras) dep.	5 15	10 30	10 40	8 25	9 15	8 25	9 15	9 15
Glasgow (St. Enoch) arr.	4 0	7 50	..	6 20	7 40	6 20	7 40	7 40
Greenock.....	4 35	8 29	..	7 32	8 22	7 32	8 22	8 22
Edinburgh (Waverley) „	4 17	..	8 25	5 53	7 20	5 53	7 20	7 20
Perth.....	8 45	..	11 36	8 35	11 10	8 35	11 10	11 10
Aberdeen.....	9 35	..	3 5	11 45	1 55	11 45	1 55	1 55
Inverness.....	..	..	6 30	2 45	6 5	2 45	6 5	6 5
	p.m.	p.m.	a.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.

A.—Sleeping Saloon Cars to Glasgow, Greenock, and commencing July 22nd to Edinburgh, and Perth, also B.—Drawing-Room Saloon Car to Edinburgh. C.—Drawing-Room Saloon Car to Glasgow. D.—Sleeping Saloon Cars to Edinburgh and Glasgow. First-Class Passengers travel in the Cars attached to the Day Trains WITHOUT EXTRA PAYMENT. For Berths in Sleeping Saloon Cars the charge is 5s. in addition to the First-Class Fare.

The Night Express Trains reach Greenock in time for Passengers to join the "COLUMBA," "IONA," or "LORD OF THE ISLES" Steamers for the Highlands. Through Carriages from LONDON to Greenock by these Trains.

For particulars of Up Train Service from Scotland to London, see Time Tables issued by the Company.
Derby, July 1889.

JOHN NOBLE, General Manager.

CARDINAL AND HARFORD,

The oldest established Importers of

ORIENTAL

CARPETS.

THE LEVANT WAREHOUSE,

108 & 109 HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

Catalogues post free.

THE BEST NATURAL APERIENT.—

The Apollinaris Company, Limited, London, beg to announce that, as numerous Aperient Waters are offered to the public with marks, names, and designations very similar to those which are used for the HUNGARIAN APERIENT WATER so long imported by them, they have now adopted an additional Label of their own, comprising their REGISTERED TRADE MARK of SELECTION, which consists of

A RED DIAMOND.

This Label will henceforth also serve to distinguish the Hungarian Aperient Water sold by the Company from all other aperient waters.

DEMAND THE DIAMOND MARK.

Of all Druggists and Mineral Water Dealers.

BOOKS, &c.

Just published.

No. 486 (for JULY) of

SOTHERAN'S PRICE CURRENT of LITERATURE,

embracing the latest additions to their stock of interesting and valuable SECOND-HAND BOOKS. Post free.

SOTHERAN'S GENERAL CATALOGUE of BOOKS for the LIBRARY (380 pp.) Post free, 3s. 6d.

SOTHERAN'S CATALOGUE of NEW BOUND BOOKS, suitable for PRIZES and PRESENTATION. Post free.

136 STRAND, W.C., AND 36 PICCADILLY, W., LONDON.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly, London. All the New and Standard Books. Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c. Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates per annum, paid in advance:

Any part of the United Kingdom	£1 8 2
India and China.....	1 12 6
Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America	1 10 6

STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

Just published, in stiff cover, with Map, price 1s. ; by post, 1s. 2d.

THE CONDITION of DONEGAL: Letters reprinted from the "Times," with further Suggestions for the Improvement and Development of the Congested Districts of Ireland, and the Promotion of Railways, Fisheries, Emigration, &c. &c. By J. H. TUKE.

London: W. RIDGWAY, Piccadilly; NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY, Whitefriars.
Dublin: HODGES, FIGGIS, & Co. And all Booksellers.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.

INDEX to the "ARCHEOLOGIA," from Vol. I. to Vol. L. (1770-1888). 1 vol. thick royal 4to. 806 pp., cloth, 42s.

An exhaustive General Index of Names, Subjects, and Places, in one alphabet, to the whole Fifty Volumes published of the "Archæologia."

"A complete list of the plates and other illustrations in the 'Archæologia' has been appended. This list will be found of great convenience to those who are desirous of ascertaining whether a paper on any particular subject is accompanied by illustrations."

H. S. MILMAN.

BERNARD QUARITCH, 15 Piccadilly, London.

COVENTRY PATMORE'S WORKS.

PRINCIPLE in ART. 5s.

[Just published.]

THE ANGEL in the HOUSE. Sixth Edition. 5s.

COLLECTIVE EDITION of POEMS. 2 vols. Third Edition. 9s.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON, & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

Ready next week, picture boards, 2s. ; cloth, 2s. 6d.

NEW ISSUE OF "LOW'S STANDARD NOVELS,"

COMMENCING WITH

LORNA DOONE.

By R. D. BLACKMORE.

Other Volumes by well-known Authors at frequent intervals.

TWO KINGS of UGANDA ; or, Life by the Shores of the Victoria Nyanza. By ROBERT P. ASHE, M.A., late of the Church Missionary Society's Nyanza Mission. With Illustrations and a new Map specially drawn of Eastern Equatorial Africa. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

"Mr. Ashe's deeply interesting narrative."—Scotsman.

NEW ADDITIONS TO "LOW'S STANDARD NOVELS."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "BY THE WESTERN SEA."

JOHN WESTACOTT. By JAMES BAKER.

Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 448 pp. cloth, 6s.

"A really good sound novel."—Illustrated London News. "Exquisite literary work."—Devon Gazette. "A book to read and re-read with unflagging interest."—Scotsman.

"Charming pictures."—Morning Post. "Effective pictures of life."—Spectator.

THE OPEN DOOR. A Novel. By BLANCHE

WILLIS HOWARD, Author of "One Summer," "Guenn," &c. Crown 8vo. cloth extra, 6s.

"The story is in some respects stronger than the former works of this author that have appeared. As it has all the old grace of manner, it should prove doubly popular."—Scotsman.

NOW READY, PRICE ONE SHILLING.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

AUGUST NUMBER.

CONTENTS:

WESTMINSTER EFFIGIES. JOHN LILLIE. With 8 Illustrations. Drawn by F. Lathrop and Louis Joutel.

THE KREMLIN AND RUSSIAN ART. THEODORE CHILD. With 18 Illustrations. From Drawings by H. D. Nichols and T. D. Thulstrup.

PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO "THE QUIET LIFE." A Poem. AUSTIN DOBSON. With 12 Illustrations. Drawn by Edwin A. Abbey and Alfred Parsons.

FIFTY YEARS OF PHOTOGRAPHY. J. WELLS CHAMPNEY. With Portrait of Daguerre.

COUNTY COURT DAY IN KENTUCKY. JAMES LANE ALLEN. With 9 Illustrations by A. C. Redwood and W. A. Rogers.

THE FAN. LOUISA PARR. With 12 Illustrations.

JUPITER LIGHTS. A Novel. Part VIII. CONSTANCE FENIMORE WOOLSON. &c. &c. 70 Illustrations.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON, SEARLE, & RIVINGTON, LIMITED, ST. DUNSTON'S HOUSE, FETTER LANE, FLEET STREET, E.C.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

COMPLETION OF THE UNIFORM EDITION OF ROBERT BROWNING'S WORKS.

Ready this day, with a Portrait of Mr. Browning. Crown 8vo. 5s.

VOL. XVI. FERISHTAH'S FANCIES; and PARLEYINGS with CERTAIN PEOPLE of IMPORTANCE in THEIR DAY.

* This Edition comprises 16 Volumes, each sold separately, price 5s. It contains Three Portraits of Mr. Browning at different periods of life and a few Illustrations.

Prospectus on application.

FOR AN ARTICLE ON THE

CURIOSITIES OF LEPERDOM

See the AUGUST Number of THE CORNHILL MAGAZINE.

Now ready (Sixpence), New Series, No. 74.

THE CORNHILL MAGAZINE

For AUGUST.

Containing "THE BURNT MILLION," by JAMES PAYN, Author of "By Proxy" &c. &c. Chaps. 6-9—"CURIOSITIES OF LEPERDOM"—"THE DUDDON VALE AS IT IS AND IS TO BE"—"PATIENCE"—"MY ALBUM"—"GROUSE AND PTARMIGAN," and "THE COUNTY," Chaps. 29-32.

New Vols. of Smith, Elder, & Co's Popular 2s. & 2s. 6d. Series.

Ready this day, fcp. 8vo. boards, pictorial cover, 2s. ; or cloth limp, 2s. 6d.

RICHARD CABLE, the Lightshipman. By the Author of "Mehalah," "John Herring," &c.

Just published, fcp. 8vo. boards, pictorial cover, 2s. ; or cloth limp, 2s. 6d. each.

UNDERCURRENTS. By the Author of "Molly Bawn," "Mrs. Geoffrey," &c.

THE GAVEROCKS. By the Author of "Mehalah," "John Herring," &c.

On August 26.

A LIFE'S MORNING. By GEORGE GISSING, Author of "Demos," "Thyrza," &c. Fcp. 8vo. pictorial boards, 2s.

BOOKS FOR SEASIDE AND HOLIDAY READING.

* Messrs. SMITH, ELDER, & CO. will be happy to send, post free on application, a copy of their Catalogue, containing a list of 1s., 1s. 6d., 2s., 2s. 6d., 3s. 6d., 5s., and 6s. Popular Novels, together with a large number of Miscellaneous Works.

Among the Authors whose works are comprised in the Popular Novel Series are the following:—The Author of "Molly Bawn," the Author of "John Herring," James Payn, W. E. Norris, Hamilton Aide, Anthony Trollope, Mrs. Gaskell, Wilkie Collins, Holme Lee, the Brontë Sisters, &c. &c.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 886. AUGUST 1889. 2s. 6d.

CONTENTS:

- SCENES FROM A SILENT WORLD. By A PRISON VISITOR.
THE CRUISE OF THE "CHRYSLIS" (A 9-TON YAWL) OVER THE NORTH SEA TO HOLLAND, AND THROUGH HOLLAND, FRIESLAND, AND ON THE ZUYDER ZEE. By G. CHRISTOPHER DAVIES.
LADY BABY. Chaps. XXVII.-XXIX.
VATES. By CHARLES SAYLE.
CAMPED OUT UNDER THE CULLINS. A Region of Desolation. By Colonel PILKINGTON WHITE.
THE ROLL OF BATTLE: a Romance of Feudalism.
THE PLANTER'S BUNGALOW.
SO LONG AGO. (Roundel.) By C. W. B.
THE OLD SALOON.—THE WRONG BOX—IDEALA: A STUDY FROM LIFE—A WINDOW IN THRUMS—MARGARET MALIPHANT—FRENCH AND ENGLISH, &c.
BRITISH AND AMERICAN DEMOCRACY.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

BLACKWOOD'S NEW SERIAL.

Part III. this day, price 1s.

TRAVEL, ADVENTURE, & SPORT.

From "BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE."

No. III. CONTAINS:—THE NORTH-EAST PASSAGE—TWO NIGHTS IN SOUTHERN MEXICO—ESCAPE OF THE REPUBLICAN EXILES FROM CAYENNE—A BEAR ADVENTURE IN CEYLON—A RIDE ACROSS THE PELOPONNESE. By GEORGE A. MACMILLAN.

* * Each Part, containing several Sketches, will be uniform in size and type and will be issued on Alternate Months with the "TALES FROM BLACKWOOD."

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

Now ready, price Sixpence.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE. No. 82. — AUGUST.

CONTENTS:

- THE BELL OF ST. PAUL'S. Part II. Chaps. 16-18. By WALTER BESANT.
THE NATIONAL SPORT OF VIRGINIA By HORACE HUTCHINSON.
SHREWS..... By A. B. ROCHFORD BATTYE.
ONLY A JOKE By FABIAN BLAND.
SEEN AND LOST By W. H. HUDSON.
OLD COLLEGE DAYS IN CALCUTTA By C. T. BUCKLAND.
MRS. FENTON: a Sketch. Chaps. 1-3 By W. E. NORRIS.
AT THE SIGN OF THE SHIP By ANDREW LANG.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, & Co.

NOW READY, price One Shilling.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE.

AUGUST, 1889.

CONTENTS:

- TENNYSON. Frontispiece. From a Photograph taken in 1888 by Barraud, London.
FORM IN LAWN TENNIS. JAMES DWIGHT, M.D. With Illustrations.
THE MASTER OF BALLANTRAE. X. ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. (Begun in November, 1888. To be continued.) Illustration by William Hole.
TARPOON FISHING IN FLORIDA. ROBERT GRANT. Freely Illustrated.
MEMORIES. BRANDER MATTHEWS.
NOCTURNE. LOUISE IMOGEN GUINEY.
ELECTRICITY IN LIGHTING. HENRY MORTON. With Illustrations.
A PAGAN INCANTATION. H. H. BOYESEN.
HOW TO FEED A RAILWAY. BENJAMIN NORTON.
THE NEW POVERTY. GEORGE PARSONS LATHROP.
A MONSTER OF MY ACQUAINTANCE. E. C. MARTIN.
TENNYSON'S FIRST FLIGHT. HENRY VAN DYKE. Illustrated.
THE TWO LOCKSLEY HALLS. T. R. LOUNSBURY.

FREDERICK WARNE & CO., 15 BEDFORD STREET, STRAND, LONDON

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW

For AUGUST.

Edited by FRANK HARRIS.

- MR. GLADSTONE AND THE CIVILISED WORLD. By KARL BLIND.
DOWNING STREET AND AFRICA. By JOSEPH THOMSON.
GOUNOD'S VIEWS OF ART AND ARTISTS. By Mdlle. BOVET.
PARIS AS A FORTRESS. With a Map.
THE GREAT SERVIAN FESTIVAL. By J. D. BOURCHIER.
GIORDANO BRUNO. By WALTER PATER.
PORTUGUESE BULL-FIGHTING. By OSWALD CRAWFORD.
ROGER BACON. By W. L. COURTNEY.
THE PRESENT DISCONTENT IN CYPRUS. By W. D. HOGARTH.
MR. BROWNING IN A PASSION. By Professor R. Y. TYRRELL.
SOME TRUTHS ABOUT RUSSIA.

CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED.

THOUGHTS for ENTHUSIASTS at BAYREUTH. By the Honourable Mrs. BURRELL.

PART I. A Literary and Historical Guide to Bayreuth, tracing the Connection of the Hohenzollern Family with the Principality, containing the Tradition of their "White Lady" and Facsimiles of Old Prints, notably the original Plan of L'Ermitage, mentioned by the Margravine of Bayreuth in her celebrated Memoirs (II. 257), but never hitherto published with them. Imperial 8vo. vellum, only 100 copies, choicely printed in old style by C. Whittingham, on the best handmade Van Gelder Paper, each copy numbered, with numerous Facsimiles of Prints, &c. Price 21s. net.

PICKERING & CHATTO, 66 Haymarket, London, S.W.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.'S LIST.

EARLY IRISH HISTORY;

CELTIC IRELAND. By SOPHIE BRYANT,

D.Sc., Author of "Educational Ends." Crown 8vo. with 3 Maps, 5s.
"Mrs. Bryant's chapters upon the influence exerted by Irish thought and learning, arms, and arts upon the neighbouring island and upon Europe in the early centuries of our era, her account of the laws and state of society in Pagan and Christian Ireland, and of the political institutions and arts of Erin in its palmy days, are deeply interesting."—Scotsman.
"No reader will rise from the perusal of the volume without the pleasurable feeling that he has been both instructed and delighted."—Manchester Examiner.

HOLIDAY STORIES.

JACOB'S LETTER; and other Stories. By

ROWLAND GREY. Crown 8vo. 5s.

"The author's charms of style and of sentiment give distinction to the simplest sketch. Delicate workmanship is the attribute common to all these graceful stories. The unconscious influence of children is illustrated with rare sympathy and admirable art in 'King Philip'; indeed, we know of no treatment of this attractive yet difficult theme so successful, from the artistic point of view, as this exquisite little story."—Saturday Review.

HOME LIFE IN HOLLAND.

A SUMMER in a DUTCH COUNTRY-

HOUSE. By Mrs. TRAHERNE. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"A simple and interesting love-story.....It is refreshing to turn to a story which is so essentially wholesome in its tone and so thoroughly useful in its teaching.....It is well written; the descriptions of Dutch scenery are skilfully drawn."—St. James's Gazette.

THE WAGNER FESTIVAL AT BAYREUTH.

PARSIFAL: a Festival Play by RICHARD

WAGNER. A Study by ALFRED GURNEY, M.A., Vicar of St. Barnabas', Pimlico. Fcp. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

"It is admirably written."—Academy.

A PRIMROSE LEAGUE HANDBOOK.

A MANUAL of POLITICS. In Three Chapters, with Footnotes and Appendices. By FREDERICK GEORGE LEE. Small crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

PASTORALS and POEMS. By CRAWFORD

WILSON, Author of "Jonathan Oldaker," "Gitanilla," &c.

Small crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

UNSPOKEN THOUGHTS.

"In this little volume of tuneful lyrics.....there is genuine poetry."—Saturday Review.
"Gives vigorous utterance to the individualistic ethics and socialistic politics which are now-a-days so apt to go hand in hand."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"It will be admitted on all hands that the author is a poet who may command a wide popularity.....Poetic fire, imagination, strength of language, and artistic feeling are here in abundance."—Scotsman.

"The versification is good and musical, the observation of nature close and true, the phrasing often forcible and keen, and, generally, the taste unimpeachable."—Birmingham Post.

"The doubts of the day have filtered through an appreciative mind and taken form under a practised pen."—Melbourne Argus.

"As elegant in versification as thoughtful in matter; not a line in them but expresses an idea.....The author possesses the true poetic faculty."—Melbourne Age.

"A work that cannot fail to touch the heart of the cultivated reader.....Sincerity breathes through every line in the book, and exhibits itself in the quality of the work as well as in the substance of the thought.....There is not so much as the turn of a phrase in the book that deviates from the line of good taste.....There is a grace, and a simplicity, and a strenuousness of true human emotion that make the volume a welcome contribution to our literature."—Brisbane Courier.

LONDON: 1 PATERNOSTER SQUARE.

HURST & BLACKETT'S NEW NOVELS.

BOTH OF THIS PARISH. By ALGERNON

GISSING, Author of "Joy cometh in the Morning." 2 vols.

A CROOKED PATH. By Mrs. ALEXANDER,

Author of "The Wooing o't," "The Freres," &c. 3 vols.

A POOR GENTLEMAN. By Mrs. OLIPHANT,

Author of "It was a Lover and his Lass," "Agnes," &c. 3 vols.

HILARY ST. JOHN. By Mrs. A. PRICE,

Author of "A Rustic Maid," "A Wilful Young Woman," &c. 2 vols.

WITH EVERYTHING AGAINST HER.

By Colonel CUTHBERT LARKING, Author of "Bandobast and Khabar" &c. 3 vols.

IRIS DACRE. By ALICE MANGOLD DIEHL,

Author of "The Garden of Eden" &c. 2 vols.

LONDON: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED,
13 GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET.

Just published, crown 8vo. 5s.

SONNETS and REVERIES. By MARCUS S. C. RICKARDS,

M.A., F.L.S., of Merton College, Oxford.

J. BAKER & SON, Clifton.

Just published, price 12s. 6d., or in sheets, unbound, 7s. 6d.

MS. BIBL. REG. 17. A, or REGIUS MS. This celebrated

Poem, the oldest document of the Craft (late 14th Century), reproduced in Facsimile, with a Glossary, Introduction, and Transcript, by Bro. H. J. WHYMPER, C.T.E., Past Dep. Dis. G.M. Punjab, Author of "The Religion of Freemasonry." Bound in exact imitation of the Original in the British Museum, and deemed by all authorities to be a most beautiful work of art.—SPENCER & CO., 15 Great Queen Street, W.C.

Now ready, price 1s.

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY for AUGUST.

CONTENTS:

- | | |
|--|--|
| How I consulted the Oracle of the Gold-fishes. James Russell Lowell. | The German Boy at Leisure. George Moritz Wahl. |
| The Background of Roman History. H. W. P. & L. D. | The Tragic Muse. XX.-XXIII. Henry James. |
| From Generation to Generation. Lillie B. Chace Wyman. | The "Black-Capped" Baltimore. Olive Thorne Miller. |
| The Begum's Daughter. XII.-XV. Edwin Lasseter Bynner. | Emerson's Concord Life. Madame de Staël. |
| A Poet of French Canada. Paul T. Lafleur. | Letters of Thomas Carlyle. |
| Law and Political Fact in the United States. Irving Berdine Richman. | The Contributors' Club. |
| The French Alliance and the Conway Cabal. John Fiske. | Butterfly Psychology — Discords — Why there are so few Mothers in Fiction. |
| | Books of the Month. |

LONDON: WARD, LOCK, & CO., Salisbury Square, E.C.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON'S LIST.

Now ready, price 1s.

THE TEMPLE BAR MAGAZINE.

Contents for AUGUST, 1889.

1. SIR CHARLES DANVERS. By the Author of "The Danvers Jewels." Chaps. 13-16.
2. A PROPOS OF SAMUEL ROGERS.
3. GARRICK AND THE SHAKESPEARE REVIVAL.
4. A COLLECTOR'S DREAM.
5. FLOWERS AND FIRE.
6. ARMINELL.
7. REMINISCENCES OF IMPERIAL PARIS.
8. PAUL'S SISTER. By the Author of "His Cousin Betty." Chaps. 19-21.

"MEMORY'S HARKBACK THROUGH HALF-A-CENTURY."THE RECOLLECTIONS OF
DR. GRETTON.

1 vol. demy 8vo. 12s.

"A very pleasant and very readable production, abounding in variety of topic. Clerical readers will especially enjoy these 'harkbacks' of memory, which, however, will also give pleasure to all Shrewsbury and Cambridge men, and to that large proportion of the public which revels in gossip about the men and manners of old days."—Globe.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "MDLLE. DE MERSAC."

MISS SHAFTO.

By W. E. NORRIS, Author of "The Rogue" &c.

3 vols. crown 8vo.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "COUNTESS IRENE."

ROBERT LEEMAN'S DAUGHTERS. By
J. FOGERTY, Author of "Lauterdale," "Caterina," &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "FASCINATION" &c.

PAST FORGIVENESS? By Lady MARGARET
MAJENDIE, Author of "Precautions" &c. 2 vols. crown 8vo.

"A pleasing specimen of pure and simple fiction. Gentle humour and vivacious description are the author's strong points."—Morning Post.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "NELLIE'S MEMORIES."

THE SEARCH for BASIL LYNDHURST.

By ROSA N. CAREY, Author of "Not Like Other Girls" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"Every character is sketched with care and delicacy, and the style is excellent throughout and thoroughly healthy."—Guardian.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.
PUBLISHERS IN ORDINARY TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

Now ready, crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

FROUDACITY: West Indian Fables by Mr. FROUDE explained by J. J. THOMAS, Author of "The Creole Grammar."

"THE STORY OF THE NATIONS."—Vol. 20.

THE HANSA TOWNS. By HELEN ZIMMERN. Large
crown 8vo. with Maps and Illustrations, cloth, 5s. Presentation Edition, gilt edges, 5s. 6d.

"Unique in the series and unique in itself..... Miss Zimmern's work is admirably done..... It will be read with an unusual interest and profit by many students of history who have hitherto had to deplore the lack of any book of the kind."—Scotsman.

NEW VOLUME (THE SIXTH) OF "UNWIN'S NOVEL SERIES," JUST READY.CHRONICLES of a HEALTH RESORT. By A. HELDER.
Cloth, 2s.

RECENTLY ISSUED IN SAME SERIES.

ISAAC ELLER'S MONEY. By Mrs. ANDREW DEAN.

"So well written and so admirably descriptive..... Mrs. Dean's personages have distinctness and are cleverly drawn."—Manchester Guardian.

THE CENTURY for AUGUST is the SUMMER

NUMBER, and contains:—"THE STREAM OF PLEASURE: the Story of a Boating Trip on the Thames," by Mrs. E. R. PENNELL, with 33 Illustrations by JOSEPH PENNELL; "THE BIBLE IN TENNYSON," by HENRY VAN DYKE, illustrated by Frontispiece Portrait of Lord Tennyson; "THE NEW SCHOOL OF ENGRAVING," by JOHN P. DAVIS, illustrated; "THE OLD BASCOM PLACE," by JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS, illustrated; "A POSITIVE ROMANCE," by EDWARD BELLAMY; &c. &c. Price 1s. 4d.

LONDON: T. FISHER UNWIN, 26 PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

Now ready, Second Edition, demy 4to. half-calf, 35s.

HOSPITAL CONSTRUCTION and MANAGEMENT. By Dr. F. J. MOUTAT, Local Government Board Inspector, and H. SAXON SNELL, Fellow of the Royal Institute of British Architects.

"A systematic work on the Arrangement, Management, and Construction of Hospitals and the Organization of Medical Relief in the Metropolis. Illustrated with a large Map, 54 Lithographic Plates, and 27 Woodcuts of the principal Pavilion Hospitals of the world."—London: J. & A. CHURCHILL, 11 New Burlington Street.

STAMMERERS and STUTTERERS should read a book by a gentleman who cured himself after suffering nearly forty years.

Post free or 13 stamps, from
Mr. B. BRASLEY, Sherwood, Willesden Lane, Brondesbury, London; or Green Bank House, Hall Green (near Birmingham).

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

FATHER DAMIEN: a Journey from Cashmere to his Home in Hawaii. By EDWARD CLIFFORD. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

The Scotsman says:—"There is nothing more touching in the literature of fiction than Mr. Edward Clifford's simple description of the leper settlement."

EDWARD FITZGERALD.

LETTERS and LITERARY REMAINS of
EDWARD FITZGERALD. Edited by W. ALDIS WRIGHT, M.A., Vice-Master
of Trinity College, Cambridge. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

Vol. I. Letters—Vol. II. Euphranor, Six Dramas from Calderon, The Bird Parliament, The Two Generals—Vol. III. Dramas from Calderon, Greek Dramas, Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, &c.

A NEW NOVEL BY MR. F. MARION CRAWFORD.

SANT' ILARIO.

By F. MARION CRAWFORD,

Author of "With the Immortals," "Greifenstein," "Paul Patoff,"
"Mr. Isaacs," "Dr. Claudius," "Marzio's Crucifix," &c.

3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d. [Ready August 2.]

COMPLETION OF SIR GEORGE GROVE'S "DICTIONARY OF MUSIC."

DICTIONARY of MUSIC and MUSICIANS,
A.D. 1450-1889. By Eminent Writers, English and Foreign. Edited by Sir GEORGE GROVE, D.C.L., Director of the Royal College of Music. With Illustrations. In 4 vols. 21s. each.

An APPENDIX. Edited by J. A. FULLER MATTLAND, M.A. bringing the Work down to 1889. 8vo. 9s.

* * * This Appendix, which forms part of Vol. IV., completes the Dictionary. But a Full Index to the entire work is in preparation, and will be presently published as a separate volume.

New and Cheaper Edition, with an additional Tale.

TALES of the BIRDS. By W. WARDE

FOWLER, M.A., Sub-Rector of Lincoln College, Oxford, Author of "A Year with the Birds." With Illustrations by Bryan Hook. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

The Guardian says:—"Mr. Fowler has produced a charming book, which none are too old and few too young to appreciate. He possesses the rare art of telling a story..... Apart from the interest of the stories themselves, the pages are brimful of minute observation of the ways and habits of birds."

FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE.

LESSONS of HOPE: Readings from the
Works of FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE. Selected by the Rev. J. LLEWELYN
DAVIES, M.A. Crown 8vo. 5s.THE HISTORIES of POLYBIUS. Translated from the Text of F. HULTSCH. By EVELYN S. SHUCKBURGH, M.A., late Fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 24s.

GOLDEN TREASURY SERIES.—New Volume.

THEOCRITUS, BION, and MOSCHUS.

Rendered into English Prose, with an Introductory Essay. By ANDREW LANG,
M.A., late Fellow of Merton College, Oxford. New Edition. 18mo. 4s. 6d.

* * * Also a Large-Paper Edition, on hand-made paper, limited to 250 copies, 8vo. 9s.

KANT'S CRITICAL PHILOSOPHY for ENGLISH READERS. By JOHN P. MAHAFFY, D.D., and JOHN H.

BERNARD, B.D. A New and completed Edition in 2 vols. Crown 8vo.

Vol. I. The KRITIK of PURE REASON EXPLAINED and DEFENDED. 7s. 6d.
Vol. II. The PROLEGOMENA. Translated with Notes and Appendices. 6s.

MACMILLAN'S GEOGRAPHICAL SERIES.

Edited by ARCHIBALD GEIKIE, F.R.S., Director-General of the Geological Survey of the United Kingdom.

AN ELEMENTARY CLASS-BOOK of GENERAL GEOGRAPHY. By HUGH ROBERT MILL, D.Sc. Edin. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

SOLUTIONS of the EXAMPLES in Messrs.

HALL & KNIGHT'S "HIGHER ALGEBRA." By H. S. HALL, M.A., Master of the Military and Engineering Side, Clifton College; and S. R.
KNIGHT, B.A., late Assistant Master at Marlborough College, Author of "Higher Algebra," "Elementary Algebra," "Algebraical Exercises and Examination Papers," &c. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

A TEXT-BOOK of EUCLID'S ELEMENTS, including Alternative Proofs, together with Additional Theorems and Exercises, Classified and Arranged. By H. S. HALL, M.A., and F. H.

STEVENS, M.A., Masters of the Military and Engineering Side, Clifton
College. Globe 8vo.

Book I. 1s. Books I.—IV. 3s. Books I.—VI. 4s. 6d.
Books I. and II. 1s. 6d. Books III.—VI. 3s. Book XI. [In the press.]

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE,

No. 358, for AUGUST, price 1s., contains:—

1. MAROONED. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. Chapters 28-30.
2. WILLIAM COWPER. By J. C. BAILEY.
3. CHECHINA. By Mrs. BROTHERTON.
4. A MODERN NOVELIST.
5. IN MACEDONIA. By D. G. HOGARTH.
6. ORLANDO BRIDGMAN HYMAN. By AN OLD PUPIL.
7. TO LORD TENNYSON. By the Rev. H. D. RAWNSLEY.
8. HIPPOLYTUS VEILED. By WALTER PATER.
9. KIRSTEEN. By Mrs. OLIPHANT. Chapters 1-3.

THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE

For AUGUST, Profusely Illustrated, price 6d.; by post, 8d., contains:—

1. THE CARD PLAYERS. From the Painting ascribed to NICHOLAS MAAS. Frontispiece.
2. THE BETTER MAN. By ARTHUR PATERSON.
3. ASTON HALL. By WHITWORTH WALLIS, F.S.A. With Illustrations.
4. BILL BERESFORD AND HIS VICTORIA CROSS. By ARCHIBALD FORBES. With Illustrations.
5. SANT' ILARIO. By F. MARION CRAWFORD.
6. OUT-DOOR PARIS. By THEODORE CHILD. With Illustrations.
7. CHARLES DICKENS AS AN EDITOR. With Introductory Notes by CHARLES DICKENS, Jun.
8. ET CÆTERA. By H. D. TRAILL.

MACMILLAN & CO., BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

EDWARD STANFORD'S LIST.

STANFORD'S
TWO-SHILLING SERIES OF TOURIST'S GUIDES.

NEW VOLUMES, 1889.

WORCESTERSHIRE: the Pleasant and Picturesque. By R. N. WORTH, F.G.S., Author of the "Tourist's Guides to Devon, Somerset, Wilts, Dorset, and Gloucester," "History of Devon," &c. With Map and Plan of Worcester Cathedral.BEDFORDSHIRE. By A. J. FOSTER, M.A., Vicar of Wootton, Bedford. With Map of the County.

NEW EDITIONS, 1889.

THE CHANNEL ISLANDS. By G. PHILLIPS BEVAN, F.S.S., Author of the "Tourist's Guides to Hampshire, Kent, Surrey," &c. With 3 Maps. Second Edition.THE WEST RIDING of YORKSHIRE. By the same Author. With 2 Maps and a Plan of Ripon Cathedral. Fifth Edition.NORFOLK. By WALTER RYE. With Map of the County and Plan of Norwich Cathedral. Fourth Edition, Revised, fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s.*The other Volumes of the Series are:BERKSHIRE. By E. WALFORD, M.A.CAMBRIDGE. By A. G. HILL, B.A., F.S.A.CORNWALL. By W. H. TREGELLAS. Fifth Edition.DERBYSHIRE. By Rev. J. C. COX. Third Edition.DEVON, North. By R. N. WORTH, F.G.S. Fourth Edition.DEVON, South. By R. N. WORTH, F.G.S. Fourth Edition.

The above Guides to North and South Devon in 1 vol. 3s. 6d.

DORSET. By R. N. WORTH, F.G.S.ENGLISH LAKE DISTRICT. By H. I. JENKINSON, F.R.G.S. Fifth Edition.ESSEX. By E. WALFORD, M.A.GLOUCESTERSHIRE. By R. N. WORTH, F.G.S.HAMPSHIRE. By G. P. BEVAN, F.S.S. Third Edition.KENT. By G. P. BEVAN, F.S.S. Sixth Edition.LONDON (Tourists' Guide Through). By the Rev. W. J. LOFTIE, B.A., F.S.A.LONDON (Round About). By the Rev. W. J. LOFTIE, B.A., F.S.A. Fifth Edition.SOMERSETSHIRE. By R. N. WORTH, F.G.S. Third Edition.SUFFOLK. By Dr. J. E. TAYLOR, F.L.S., F.G.S.SURREY. By G. P. BEVAN, F.S.S. Third Edition.SUSSEX. By G. F. CHAMBERS, F.R.A.S. Fourth Edition.WARWICK. By G. P. BEVAN, F.S.S.WILTSHIRE. By R. N. WORTH, F.G.S.WYE (The) and its Neighbourhood. By G. P. BEVAN, F.S.S.YORKSHIRE (North and East Ridings). By G. P. BEVAN, F.S.S. Fourth Edition.JENKINSON'S PRACTICAL GUIDES.ENGLISH LAKES. Eighth Edition. With 9 Maps and 3 Panoramic Views. Fcp. 8vo. cloth, 7s. Smaller Guide, 1s. 6d.NORTH WALES. Fourth Edition. With 2 Maps. Fcp. 8vo. cloth, 6s. 6d.

Also, in Five Sections, separately:

Chester; Llandudno; Bettws-y-Coed and Snowdon; Dolgelly and Bala; Aberystwith and Llangollen. With Maps, 1s. 6d. each.THE ISLE OF MAN. Third Edition. Fcp. 8vo. with Map, cloth, 5s.CARLISLE, GILSLAND, THE ROMAN WALL, and NEIGHBOURHOOD. Second Edition. Fcp. 8vo. cloth, with Map, 5s. Smaller Guide, 2s.THE ISLE OF WIGHT. Third Edition. With Frontispiece and 6 Maps. Fcp. 8vo. cloth, 5s.

Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged, with Corrections and Additions for 1889.

THE HANDY GUIDE to NORWAY. By THOMAS B. WILSON, M.A. With Maps and Appendices on the Flora and History of Norway, Fishing Notes, and Photography. Small post 8vo. limp cloth, 5s.

Third Edition, Revised.

THE BATHS and WELLS of EUROPE; with a Sketch of Hydrotherapy, and Hints on Climate, Sea-bathing, and Popular Cures. By JOHN MACPHERSON, M.D. Small post 8vo. cloth, 6s. 6d.

Second Edition, Revised.

MADEIRA: its Scenery and How to See It. With Letters of a Year's Residence, and Lists of the Trees, Flowers, Ferns, and Seaweeds. By ELLEN M. TAYLOR. With Frontispiece, Map of the Island, and Plan of Funchal. Crown 8vo. cloth, 7s. 6d.STANFORD'S MAPS FOR TOURISTS.

EUROPE.—STANFORD'S PORT-

ABLE MAP of EUROPE, showing the latest Political Boundaries, the Railways, and Submarine Telegraphs. Scale, 105 miles to an inch; size, 33 inches by 30. Coloured and mounted in case, for use of Tourists, 10s.

CENTRAL EUROPE.—DAVIES'S

MAP of CENTRAL EUROPE, containing all the Railways with their Stations. The Principal Roads, the Rivers, and Chief Mountain Ranges are clearly delineated, while the scale upon which the Map is drawn renders it a distinct and useful Guide for Tourists. Scale, 24 miles to an inch; size, 47 inches by 38. Mounted, in case, 16s.

SWITZERLAND.—The ALPINE

CLUB MAP of SWITZERLAND. Edited by R. C. NICHOLS, F.S.A. Scale, 4 miles to an inch; size, 60 in. by 48. Four sheets, mounted in case, £2 12s. 6d.; single sheets, 12s.; mounted, in case, 15s. The Enlarged Edition of the above, scale, 3 miles to an inch, in 8 sheets, sold separately, 1s. 6d. per sheet.

MEDITERRANEAN. — STAN-

FORD'S MAP of the COUNTRIES round the MEDITERRANEAN SEA. Size, 26 inches by 11 inches. Scale, 120 miles to 1 inch. Price, mounted to fold in case, 5s.

BRITISH ISLES. — DAVIES'S

NEW RAILWAY MAP of the BRITISH ISLES and PART of FRANCE. Scale, 22 miles to an inch; size, 31 inches by 35. In case, 9s.

ENGLAND and WALES.—STAN-

FORD'S LONDON ATLAS RAILWAY and STATION MAP of ENGLAND and WALES. Scale, 10 miles to an inch; size, 40 inches by 48. Coloured and mounted in case, 12s. 6d. The Four Sheets can also be had separately—size of each, 22 inches by 27. Coloured and mounted in case, each 5s. Smaller Maps, 5s. and 3s.

ENGLAND and WALES.—STAN-

FORD'S PORTABLE MAP of ENGLAND and WALES; with the Railways very clearly delineated; the Cities and Towns distinguished according to their Population, &c.; and the Mountains and Hills carefully reduced from the Ordnance Survey. Scale, 15 miles to an inch; size, 32 inches by 25. Coloured and mounted, in case, 7s. 6d.

ENGLAND and WALES.—BAR-

THOLOMEW'S LARGE MAP of ENGLAND and WALES, on the scale of 4 miles to an inch, in 16 sheets. Price of each sheet, separately, folded and Coloured, 2s.; mounted on linen, 3s.

LAKES. — STANFORD'S NEW

MAP of the ENGLISH LAKE DISTRICT. On the scale of 1 inch to a mile. With all the Roads and Paths, including Bassenthwaite Lake on the North, Newby Bridge on the South, Ravenglass on the West, and Hawes Water on the East. Size, 27 inches by 32. Folded in cover, plain, 2s. 6d.; coloured, 4s. 6d.; mounted, in case, plain, 5s. 6d.; coloured, 7s. 6d.

ISLE of WIGHT.—TOURIST'S

MAP, on the scale of 1 inch to a mile; size, 27 inches by 21 inches; and descriptive VISITOR'S GUIDE. Folded in cover, plain, 1s.; folded in case, coloured, 1s. 6d.; mounted, in case, coloured, 3s. 6d.

NORTH WALES. — TOURIST'S

MAP. On the scale of 3 miles to an inch; size, 34 inches by 27 inches; and descriptive VISITOR'S GUIDE. Folded in case, plain, 1s. 6d.; folded in case, coloured, 2s.; mounted in case, coloured, 5s.

SOUTH WALES.—TOURIST'S

MAP, on the scale of 3½ miles to an inch; size, 34 inches by 27 inches; and descriptive VISITOR'S GUIDE. Folded in case, plain, 1s. 6d.; folded in case, coloured, 2s.; mounted, in case, coloured, 5s.

LONDON. — COLLINS'S STAN-

DARD MAP of LONDON, on the scale of 4 in. to a mile; size, 34½ inches by 27 inches. With an Illustrated Guide to the Principal Places of Interest, Tables of Cab Fares, an Alphabetical List of nearly 4,000 Street References, &c. Coloured, in case, 1s.; Extended (size, 34½ inches by 34½ inches) and full coloured, in case, 1s. 6d.; mounted on cloth, in case, 3s. 6d. Other Maps at 11s., 8s., 5s. 6d., 3s., and 2s. 6d.

LONDON.—MAP of the ENVI-

RONS of LONDON, including Twenty-five Miles from the Metropolis. Scale, ¾ of an inch to a mile; size, 36 inches by 35. The Railways, Main Roads, Bye-roads, Bridle Paths, are distinguished. Mounted in case, 10s. Other Maps, at 8s., 5s. 6d., 3s., 2s. 6d., 1s. 6d., or 1s.

SCOTLAND.—STANFORD'S NEW

MAP of SCOTLAND, on the scale of 7.69 miles to an inch. Size, about 4 feet by 3 feet 6 inches. Coloured and mounted in case, 12s. 6d. The four sheets can also be bought separately, each 3s.; or mounted to fold in case, 5s. Other Maps at 5s. and 3s.

ORDNANCE SURVEY MAPS.—

The MAPS of the One-inch Survey are well adapted for Tourists. Index Map, showing division of Sheets, sent post free on application. The published Sheets of any part of the British Isles kept in stock. Apply to EDWARD STANFORD, Sole Agent in England and Wales.

STANFORD'S
RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

DERVISH ADVANCE.—STAN-

FORD'S NEW MAP of the NILE, from the Equatorial Lakes to the Mediterranean, embracing the Eastern Sudan (Kordofan, Darfur, &c.), and Abyssinia. Size, 22 by 26 inches. Scale, 94 miles to 1 inch. Price, 4s. in sheet, coloured; per post, packed on roller, 4s. 6d.; mounted to fold in case, 6s. 6d.; per post, 6s. 9d.

STANLEY'S ROUTE to EMIN

PASHA.—STANFORD'S NEW MAP of CENTRAL AFRICA, showing the line of march taken by Stanley's Expedition, Emin Pasha's Province, and the coast-line on both sides of the Continent. Size, 26 by 22 inches. Scale, 94 miles to 1 inch. Price, Sheet, 3s.; per post, packed on roller, 3s. 6d.; case, 5s.; per post, 5s. 3d.

TRANSVAAL GOLDFIELDS, 1889

—STANFORD'S MAP of the TRANSVAAL GOLDFIELDS, British Zululand, the Delagoa Bay Railway, and the Routes from Cape Colony and Natal. Size, 40 by 27 inches. Scale, 16 miles to 1 inch. Price in sheet, 8s.; per post, packed on roller, 8s. 6d.; in case, 12s.; per post, 12s. 3d.; on rollers, varnished, 15s.

AN ATLAS of TWELVE MAPS of INDIA; accompanied with Tables and Notes. By TRELAHNEY SAUNDERS, F.R.G.S., Geographical Assistant at the India Office (retired). Large folio, half-buckram, £3 3s. net.

"This great Atlas is unquestionably one of the most valuable and useful geographical and statistical compendiums relating to our Asiatic Empire which has been produced at any reasonable price. Invaluable to the administrator, the economist, the publicist, the geographer, the military man, and the statesman."—Overland Mail.

A CENTURY of CONTINENTAL

HISTORY, 1780-1880. By J. H. ROSE, M.A., formerly Classical Scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo. 420 pp., with 3 Maps, and 5 Plans of Battles in the text, cloth, 6s.

"The book is written from a popular standpoint, but it admirably fulfils its author's intentions: and we certainly know of no work which in the same compass gives anything like as clear, concise, and well-arranged information concerning the march of political affairs in Europe during a century which has been crowded with epoch-making events."—Leeds Mercury.

ALGERIAN HINTS for TOUR-

ISTS. By CHARLES E. FLOWER. Crown 8vo. cloth, with Frontispiece, 2s.

An Appendix to the Guide-books telling just what to see and how to see it, with latest information as to hotels, diligences, railways, &c.

LETTERS on ARTILLERY. By

Prince KRAFT ZU HOHENLOHE INGELFINGEN. Translated by Major N. L. WALFORD, R.A. Crown 8vo. with 6 folding Plates, cloth, 7s. 6d.

"Under an assumed controversial form these 'Letters' are distinctly authoritative—as might, indeed, be expected from such a master of the art; and under the heads of apparently discursive dissertations, they collect all the decisions afforded by hard experience as to the value of current, and in many cases rather conflicting theories concerning the true part of artillery in war."—Saturday Review.

COMPLETE NOTEBOOK for MILITARY EXAMINATIONS. Compiled by Lieut.-Colonel FITZROY WILSON (late Rifle Brigade), a Graduate of the Staff College, &c. &c. Crown 4to. with 16 folding Plates, strongly bound in leather, 15s.

GERMAN FIELD EXERCISES,

1888. Part II. THE FIGHT. Being a Translation of Part II. of the New German Drill Book. By Captain W. H. SAWYER, Brigade-Major, 1st Brigade, Aldershot. 18mo. cloth, 1s. net; per post, 1s. 2d.

INTRODUCTION to the GERMAN

FIELD SERVICE REGULATIONS; dated May 28, 1887. Translated by Captain W. H. SAWYER, Translator of the "German Field Exercises, 1888." Part II. The Fight. 18mo. 24 pp., sewed, 3d.; per post, 4d.

STELLAR EVOLUTION and its RELATIONS to GEOLOGICAL TIME. By JAMES CROLL, LL.D., F.R.S., Author of "Climate and Time," "Climate and Cosmology," &c. Large post 8vo. cloth, price 5s.

"All men of science who pay due heed to the ultimate principles to which they are perforce brought in the course of their researches will find this work deserving a thorough scrutiny. Mr. Croll has swept away a cloud which seemed at one time likely to obscure the general significance of evolution."—Chemical News.

SEAS and SKIES in MANY

LATITUDES; or, Wanderings in Search of Weather. By the Hon. RALPH ABERCROMBY, F.R.Met.Soc., Author of "Principles of Forecasting," "Weather," in the "International Scientific Series," &c. Demy 8vo. with 3 Maps, 9 Photographs, and 33 Woodcuts by Pritchett, Whymper, Cooper, &c., cloth extra, 18s.

"An important contribution to meteorology as well as to travel. The illustrations are of great interest."—Times. "The record of a pioneer. All that he has to say is worth listening to."—Scotsman.

In preparation.

CHARTS of the CONSTELLA-

TIONS, from the North Pole to between 35 and 40 Degrees of South Declination. By ARTHUR COTTON, F.R.A.S. Thirty-six Charts, printed on drawing paper, 30 inches by 22 inches, supplied folded in half in Portfolio, or flat if preferred. Price to Subscribers before publication, £2 net per set; afterwards, £3 3s. net.

LONDON: EDWARD STANFORD, 26 AND 27 COCKSPUR STREET, CHARING CROSS, S.W.

Printed by SPOTTISWOODE & CO., at No. 5 New-street Square, in the Parish of St. Bride, in the City of London, and Published by WILLIAM BOYCE, at the Office, No. 38 Southampton Street, Strand, in the Parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, in the County of Middlesex.—Saturday, July 27, 1889.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW
OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,762, Vol. 68.

August 3, 1889.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

MINISTERS AT THE MANSION HOUSE.

THE scope of Lord SALISBURY's observations at the Mansion House may have been a little restricted by the fact that his immediate host was suffering under the greatest of all possible misfortunes—that of being a Gladstonian; and it is admitted that the PRIME MINISTER's treatment of the LORD MAYOR's distressing mental affliction was all that could be desired. Indeed, the remarks on Crete, and the fervid disclaimer of any desire to become responsible for the management of a Home-Ruled island, made as good a reference to this part of the subject as was easily possible. Lord SALISBURY has been accused of having repeated the declaration that the present Government will not resign unless it is asked to resign, in the usual way, by a vote of want of confidence. The expression is not discoverable in this particular speech; but there is not, and indeed cannot be, any reason to doubt that its sentiment is imputed, with sufficient justification, both to Lord SALISBURY and to the rest of his cheerful colleagues on Wednesday. There is, indeed, not the slightest reason why they should resign, unless the new-fashioned doctrine that office is like a champion's belt, to be held on pain of continual challenge, one up and the other down, were accepted. Lord SALISBURY is not at the head of an absolute majority of the House of Commons as far as his own personal followers are concerned. It may even be doubted whether, save in some very exceptional circumstances, any Minister of any party is likely very soon to find himself in that pleasant position. That the curse of "groups" should be introduced or reintroduced into England (for, after all, something very like it existed in the last century) is a serious thing, but apparently an accomplished fact. It is the great advantage of the Tory party that it not only has, but, unless the mischievous tendency exemplified by Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL and Mr. HANBURY increases, is likely to retain, the chance of being more numerous than any one of its rivals. At present, by the faithful alliance of the Liberal-Unionists, it has not only a relative but an absolute majority; and we confess that we do not see what would be gained by a substitution of fusion for alliance. Lord SALISBURY is where he is, and may well count on staying where he is.

In his references to the prospects of general peace—in which, both as Foreign Secretary and as the guest of a host opposed to him in domestic politics, he was naturally fuller—the PRIME MINISTER was not quite so ironically sanguine as he had been two nights earlier in the House of Lords. On all that Lord SALISBURY says as to the ballasting power given by the enormous risks incumbent on any Continental, not to say on any insular, Power which should now plunge into war there can be little difference of opinion. Yet it is difficult to discover any very lively consolation in this. Lord SALISBURY seems to hope that the present heats and bad humours (as the old doctors used to say) will, during the period of postponement of war procured by this state of mutual fear, insensibly work themselves off, and pass away. We should be glad to share the belief, and it would not be so very difficult to do so, if the present alarms came from ill temper or from the existence of a roving disposition in nations, or if they were the after-swell merely of some great disturbance. To some observers—and perhaps to Lord SALISBURY at times when he is not cast for the part of optimist—it seems that the causes of anxiety are quite different from these, and that the disturbance is that of the surge which precedes, not of that which follows, the actual storm. But it would have been incomprehensible if the PREMIER had spoken in any other way than he actually did towards the close of a Session in which his Government has been successful, at the height of a summer which has hitherto passed off without either war or immediate threat of war, and on the very eve of the arrival in England of the master of the most powerful army in the world, for the purpose of inspecting under England's flag the most powerful navy in the world. What is perfectly certain is, that if England and Germany could put their horses—their land- and sea-horses—together, no other ordinarily possible combination of Powers could do them any harm, or could against their will break the peace of the world. What is, if not perfectly certain, rather too probable, is that, partly from mere personal reasons, partly from faults of the two Governments, most of all, perhaps, as a result of the jealousy which constantly exists between two powerful members of the same race, and that a race not famed for sympathetic treatment of others—the terms on which England and Germany now are are such that they might be made more intimate and cordial, with a very great deal of advantage to both sides, but perhaps with no small difficulty on both.

One part of Lord SALISBURY's references was definite enough, and referred to a subject of very considerable actual interest. The indication of the present state of affairs on the frontiers of Egypt contained in itself a sufficient answer to French intrigue and refusal to perform international duty, and to the grumbles of Tory Democrats and Radical non-interventionists. WAD-EL-NJUMI, with considerable chivalry, has taken upon himself single-handed the task of answering M. SPULLER, Mr. LABOUCHERE, and Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL all at once. That England cannot leave Egypt to herself in such a state of things is a proposition undeniable by any one not silly enough to believe, or dishonest enough to pretend to believe, that Lord SALISBURY has hired the Gaelic Association to become Fenian, and has contracted with the Khalifa to invade Egypt. But when we come to ask ourselves whether England is discharging this necessary task of defending Egypt as she ought to discharge it, the answer becomes a little more dubious. It is stated significantly enough that there is much more alarm at Cairo than there is at Assouan. Naturally, for the garrison of Cairo has practically been transferred to the frontier. We do not for one moment suggest that General GRENFELL is not strong enough to tackle the Dervish leader. Even the reinforcements which the latter has received can hardly have made up—can certainly not have more than made up—for the constant losses which have been inflicted on his troops from the first battle at Arguin onwards. And it is quite true, as the Sirdar is said to have remarked, that the further north the invaders advance the more crushing will be their defeat. Indeed there would seem to be a kind of hope on the part of the Anglo-Egyptian generals that they may play a return match for the disaster in Kordofan, and cut off WAD-EL-NJUMI even as HICKS Pasha was cut off, so that none may return to tell the tale. This would be effective, but a little difficult to effect with the amount of force at their disposal. Meanwhile it is hard not to share the alarm, or at least the anxiety, of Cairene critics when they see the whole of Lower Egypt (which not so very long ago was in a state of armed revolt) left to the control of such a handful of English troops as would hardly serve for the peace garrison of a third-rate French or German town, while the forces at the front, with everything drained into them, are still not sufficient to prevent the invader from moving pretty much at his own pleasure and from receiving reinforcements as fast as the reinforcements choose to come up to him. The process known as "cutting it fine" is a tempting one to experts in all arts; but "Cut not too fine" is surely as wise a warning as that more general one over the last door in the enchanted castle. Nor would it have been unsatisfactory to have heard from Lord SALISBURY something as to the means projected for stopping this Dervish trouble in the future. The plan above referred to—an ambitious one, which may possibly not have commended itself to those whose present conduct suggests it—would, even if it were crowned with the most complete and the most improbable success, still not touch the root of the evil, and we have seen no other proposed in any official quarter that would touch it. Sir JOHN ADYE is all for conciliation, and suggests Afghanistan and its passes as an example to rebut Sir SAMUEL BAKER's warlike proposals. Sir SAMUEL is quite competent to answer for himself. It will be a little awkward for Sir JOHN ADYE if the answer takes the form of a request to be informed whether Sir JOHN advocates the establishment of a Peshawur at Wady Halfa and a Quetta at Souakin.

YOUNG POLITICIANS.

IT is not a hopeful prospect for the next generation, and it is certainly no credit to this, that the rising young men in politics should be so very sparse and very poor a crop. In the days when Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN was young, there were half a dozen youthful politicians whom it was possible to regard with hope; and with hope they were regarded till discovery was made that their youthfulness was likely to outlast their lives. The "Competition Wallah" was the brightest of them, and the most promising of maturity; but even he was still a youthful politician at fifty years old, while as for the rest, it became plain long before that they would never be anything else. That crop was an entire failure; possibly because it resembled in mental character the Indian Baboo, who is such a wonderfully culturable person up to the age of twenty-five or so, and then goes off in flower, without a single head of fruit to grace the summer of his days. It was a disappointment; but since the failure of these young men we have been denied even the transitory pleasures of hope unfulfilled. Hope for a day, for a century of days, does not count in such affairs; and with one exception so distinctive that it need not be named, there has been no rising young man for years past who has justified hopefulness any longer than he could be well examined. The dearth and the poverty have become yet more remarkable in these later days—the one exception nevertheless; but if we have been denied the pleasure of watching some new star swim into our ken, we have enjoyed the advantage of witnessing the dissipation of some very misleading vaporous false lights. The present year has been precious in this particular. Even the last three months of the unconcluded period have been singularly fruitful in the destruction of baseless pretensions and reputations; and by so much—which is a very great deal—we are far better off at the close of the languid Session of 1889 than at any similar term for years past.

Suicide, and not a mere fading away, is the usual end of the political false prophet and the quack people's friend. The recent clearance is all by suicide—suicide under temporary derangement, during which the heated, heedless sufferer threw off the raiment that shrouded his inner self, exposing it to withering detection. In one instance, indeed, there are suspicions of conspiracy to murder; and some features of the case do recall those sombre domestic tragedies in which the relatives of an old man long a-dying thought themselves justified in accelerating his departure by the imposition of a feather-bed. But even if there be some warrant for the suspicion—as does indeed appear—it was by his own hand, so to speak, that the victim of his family's too urgent private affairs was made helpless. It is not our intention, however, to go all through the list, but rather to dwell for a moment upon the emphatically "happy despatch" which one most superfluous actor on the political stage has executed upon himself, in exact imitation of the Japanese manner.

To be sure, with the history of a French BOULANGER before us, we should not hastily conclude that the British specimen has finally wrought his own destruction. But though (if we shear away some accusations which cannot be levelled at both) the men are very much alike, the nations are different; and we may humbly believe and confidently trust that what does not kill in France is fatal in England. The "what" here referred to is the complete exposure of incapacity, as well as lack of principle, publicly made by Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL this week. Time was when no one could honestly deny that Lord RANDOLPH was a really clever man. There never was a time when he was completely trusted; but the keenest observers of him at his best flattered themselves that they saw in him "a devilish clever fellow," who, when he had been taken from his surroundings and placed in a position of responsibility, would shed the imp in him, discipline his cleverness, go soberly, and do well. He had his chance; for a while he justified expectation in the eyes of all with whom he hadn't as much to do as with his unfortunate colleagues in the Cabinet; and then, all of a sudden, broke loose—we all remember when and how. Still, the belief in his cleverness remained, impressing his late colleagues with fear, and drawing about him a variety of politicians "on the make" who half hoped that he would turn to partnership with them. Crippled as a man of principle, he was yet regarded as a power, on account of his eloquence, his flexibility, his ingenuities, his audacity, and his command of the ear of the masses above all. But even then he was hurt in the esteem of the masses far more than they believed who were admitted to his fascinating conversation. Certain illustrations of the morale of him had been observed; and cleverness without character counts for very much less after the absence of character has been revealed. This was insufficiently understood by those who still prophesied success for Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, and by himself not at all. There is no man of his time so destitute of political conscience, there is none more thoroughly convinced of the possession of commanding oratorical faculty, based on solid mental gifts. To this he trusted, and had reason to trust, but for one thing heretofore concealed from him. He did not know it, few of us who watched him suspected it, perhaps; but here is another example of the British Baboo. Cleverness to any amount, promise to any extent, in a rapidly assimilating brain and an astonishingly facile tongue. This up to the turning point of youth, and then—nothing. Collapse: evaporation. That is the Bengalee Baboo; and that is Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, if the speeches at Walsall and Birmingham do not strangely and painfully belie him.

To many people, the most striking thing about those speeches is their complete demonstration of want of principle; and in that respect they are about as convincing as anything of the kind could possibly be. But the demonstration was complete enough before; and in Lord RANDOLPH's repetition of it in the Midlands this week there is not enough of novelty to command a lingering attention. Far more interesting and important is the disclosure that Lord RANDOLPH's cleverness was but the forced efflorescence of a few seasons; that it has certainly ceased to bloom now; and, to all appearance, is not likely to show much head any more. There can be no mistake about these speeches for any one who is gifted with the commonest sensibilities of the critical sort. They testify to decline in every quality that made Lord RANDOLPH famous, and that was trusted to keep him so. In style they speak of a sudden reversion to boyhood. This is more particularly true of the Walsall speech; which, phrase after phrase, is in point of composition precisely like the lecturing of the more confident young men in a Young Man's Institute. The same consciousness, the same mouthiness, the same tottering top-hamper of solemnity, the same presentation of familiar comment as new and original—all are there, in the very phraseology of the Institute young man. To make matters worse, Lord RANDOLPH paraded a selection of problems of domestic politics more often discussed than any others; and never yet have they been handled by any man pretending to knowledge and thought with a feebler display of competence. In the business of criticism we have to guard ourselves constantly against the use of excessive language. Dealing with these speeches of Lord RANDOLPH's—in what he had to say about the land-laws, the sale of alcoholic liquors, the housing of the poor, the restriction of the hours of labour, and, lastly, of the government of Ireland—the difficulty is of another character. To do strict justice to his utterances on these questions we should have to employ epithets which have long since passed out of the ordinary vocabulary of criticism. Of mere cleverness there is not a spark, even by way of occasional decoration. What the Conservative electors of Birmingham may think of his principles now has not yet been revealed. If they think them Tory principles, or the product of Tory sentiment and opinion, they must have entirely new ideas of political nomenclature. To one thing, however, they may make up their minds: if they adopt those principles they will suffer as complete a transformation as certain mariners suffered at the hands of CIRCE. That, however, is their affair. A matter of more common interest and concern is the great and manifest decline of Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL in the article of cleverness. For this he was still sought in a measure, and still dreaded. But now — ?

"SUPPORTED BY VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTIONS."

AT the meeting of the supporters of the Patriotic Volunteer Fund Mr. STANHOPE moved the following resolution:—"That this meeting, being desirous of preserving the voluntary character of our citizen army, and being impressed with the absolute necessity of equipping the Volunteer forces of the metropolis in such a manner as to meet the requirements of the War Office, heartily commends the LORD MAYOR's appeal in behalf of the Patriotic Volunteer Fund to the support and practical sympathy of the inhabitants of the metropolis and the public at large." Strange as it may seem, the gentleman who moved this resolution is our Minister for War; and what he says is tantamount to this:—"That this meeting, being desirous of preventing the collapse of our citizen army, owing to impecuniosity, and having realized that I have given them the choice of purchasing certain articles of equipment or of being disbanded, approve of the public giving, in the form of charity, what I have always asserted the Volunteers have a right to claim from the Office which I administer." This is the only meaning which this resolution can have, coming from whom it did.

But if the resolution is strange, the speech by which it was followed is stranger still. Mr. STANHOPE begins by shirking the plain straightforward question, which every one who knows anything about the Volunteers is now asking, and to which no answer can be obtained—the question as to why, if this equipment is necessary, the Government does not provide it. He touches the point gently, and says:—"The first question some people were inclined to put was, whether it was desirable that that equipment should be provided by the State or by voluntary effort." It is not a matter of desirability; it is a matter of the fulfilment by the State of their side of a bargain. But even to this delicately evasive way of putting a plain question some answer had to be given. The answer is in the following words:—"There were some people who seemed to think it was necessary to put the Militia and Volunteer forces in precisely the same position as the regular forces." There may be some people possessed of some such extraordinary idea. We have never met them in the flesh nor read their correspondence in the newspapers. But still they may exist. But, granted that they exist by the million, what connexion is there between those who wish to see the Militia and Volunteers converted into regulars, and those who wish to see that the Volunteers are properly equipped at public expense? What unworthy oratorical trickery is this to attempt to confuse the vast army of fad-mongers with those who have the clear and definite demand—Fulfil your side of the bargain, pay for the necessities you insist upon!

But, when a War Office official begins to find himself swimming in deeper waters than are safe, considering the hampering bonds of former engagements and undertakings, which sadly interfere with his eel-like movements, there is always at hand a welcome bathing-machine kept by an old lady of the name of Mrs. BUNKUM. She has a large stock of such machines, and each has a name. And she and her daughters, the fair Miss AUDACITY BUNKUM and the dark Miss MYSTERY BUNKUM, are always ready to assist their customers. Sometimes the rescue requires the united efforts of all three. The names of the bathing-machines are Committee, Pigeon-Hole, Procrastination, Promise, Prudence, and Prevarication. Mrs. BUNKUM and daughters were helping the unfortunate Minister into the last-named refuge when he uttered this sentence (as reported):—"But he could assure them, both as regarded the Militia and Volunteers, that those who were responsible for the defence of the country had not only considered the special duties that must be assigned, in the event of invasion, to each force, but they had also considered the particular duties that would devolve upon every battalion, so that in any recommendations they might now make, both in regard to organization and equipment, they had tried to think out what was wanted for every battalion that was put into the field." (Applause!) Net result, some person or persons unknown have tried to think. But, to be serious, if we really try to find out what has been done during the past few years to place the Volunteers on a footing of efficiency, we can discover almost nothing. A slight but inadequate increase of grant has been made. There has been a flourish of trumpets under Mrs. BUNKUM's special patronage, and over a Volunteer brigade scheme, which has resulted, as far as it has been developed, in the general establishment of a system of dual control. And there has been the still more vaunted mobilization scheme. This latter is the great winner of applause. There is a most delightful impression of security produced in the minds of unthinking audiences whenever it is trotted out. A general notion is instilled into peace-loving minds that at last our War Office is rivalling that thoroughgoing institution in the Friedrich-Wilhelm Strasse, and will have only to utter the mystic words "Krieg mobil" to find every "citizen soldier" arrayed in his place, equipped, accoutred, fed, armed, and supplied with ammunition. All this perfection of mechanism may exist on paper, but only in the stage of being tried to be thought out. It certainly is not in the stage of being "tried to be worked out." Some serious efforts were this year made to practise a few of the metropolitan brigades in the localities where they would be "tried to be thought to be sent" in case of threatened invasion. The efforts were reasonably and seriously attempted. They fell through entirely owing to the refusal of the War Office to grant the necessary funds. Let us hope that by next year the efforts after "trying to think" may produce at least efforts after "trying to act."

There followed then in Mr. STANHOPE's speech the statement that "It was possible, under ordinary circumstances, for Volunteer corps to provide that limited form of equipment for themselves out of the Capitation Grant which was annually provided for them by Parliament." This statement was greeted with cries of "No, no," which mark of dissent was met by the assertion that some did so, and that "there was one even in the metropolis which did so, but that was an exceptional case"—a remark which should have been greeted with laughter. We do not know how the accounts of the different metropolitan battalions stand at the present moment. But in the last authoritative document issued on the subject, the Report of the Volunteer Capitation Committee in 1887, there was only one metropolitan battalion which paid its way by means of the Government Grant, and that was the Railway Corps, whose expenses are, for many reasons, very small. And its commanding officer recommended an additional grant of ten shillings, on the ground that better clothing was required; not unnaturally, as its clothing allowance was in fact almost exactly twelve shillings and sixpence per man per annum! Truly it was a very exceptional case.

The Volunteers must of course take what they can get. But, as Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said a few weeks ago, they must agitate for more. They must, in fact, not leave go of the principle of the payment by the tax-payers of all necessary expenses. It is not encouraging to find that, after all professions of friendliness and support, Mr. STANHOPE has proved repeatedly that he is as weak as other men who have occupied his position before him. We credit him with good intentions, but we discredit him with broken promises—broken not intentionally, but broken under that inexorable source of administrative weakness, the tyranny of the Treasury. He has been placed unfortunately. Had he not supported the LORD MAYOR's "Patriotic" Fund he would have been regarded as unpatriotic. Doing so, he has placed himself in an untenable position. In his speech he has attempted to unite the inconsistent attitudes of the man responsible for carrying out an admitted public duty out of public money, and who at the same time uses private subscriptions for the same purpose, and continues to solicit charity for the same objects. The question had better be faced at once. The Volunteers will take what they can get. They are justified in doing so, owing to the thousands of pounds they have spent. But there can be no doubt that the general feeling amongst them demands more than a Lord Mayor's Fund, supported by a disingenuous speech from the man to whom they look for assistance. It is perfectly absurd to suppose that there can be any finality in an arrangement that does not guarantee out of public funds, and not municipally organized charity, everything necessary to the most complete defensive mobilization.

THE END OF THE ROYAL GRANTS DEBATE.

THOSE persons who (to adopt as general an expression as may be arrived at) desire that the government of England shall not be carried on after the fashion of a Little Bethel with stingy managers have every possible reason to be satisfied with the concluding evening of the Royal Grants debate on Monday last. We say "the concluding," for the belated buffoonery of Mr. WALLACE does not count, and the discussion on the Bill itself had no reality. It had begun well, according to the taste of such persons, and it ended hardly less well. The general satisfaction which in all quarters worth attention has been expressed at Mr. GLADSTONE's speech is much less a recognition of what Gladstonians foolishly consider the general "superiority" of Mr. GLADSTONE than a recognition of the fact that Mr. GLADSTONE when he has a good cause is a very different person from Mr. GLADSTONE when he has a bad one. But this and other speeches of last week were admittedly above the usual present level of Parliamentary debate. We do not think that the speeches of Monday fell much below this improvement. On one and the best of them—Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's—we have some little delicacy in commenting. The best comment is the "beastly froth of rage" (we can never thank Mr. BROWNING enough for that phrase) into which it seems to have thrown the rump of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's former party. To attempt to decide between the new and the old Radicalism on Radical principles is a very hard thing for any one who is not a Radical. At the same time, this very difficulty constitutes a positive qualification for the post of judge as to the dialectical success of the speakers on each side. We are so absolutely impartial between the four (we think it is four; or is it five?) sections of Radicalism represented by Mr. GLADSTONE, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. MORLEY, Mr. LABOUCHERE, and Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, that our opinion may be of some value as to their right to the prize. We should certainly say that that prize went to Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, who, with Lord HARTINGTON, maintained the tradition of their official party, not to Mr. MORLEY and Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, who deserted it.

The palm of curious, as opposed to meritorious, interest, however, is almost admittedly awardable to Mr. MORLEY. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN bestowed much sarcastic comment on his friend with very good effect; but we doubt whether even Mr. CHAMBERLAIN quite reached the bottom of the profound incomprehensibility of Mr. MORLEY's position. Mere inconsistency is nothing, though it is true that the greatest politicians avoid it. In Mr. MORLEY's present party it is even a sort of sign of profession and mark of difference. But when you are inconsistent you should be inconsistent fortiter. Mr. MORLEY was hardly that. To begin with, he abode in his preliminaries after a fashion which for so accomplished a critic of historical politics was a sure evidence of discomfort. What the honourable member for Northampton said, what the UNDER-SECRETARY for INDIA said, and what the PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE said, are things which unfortunately remind us of "what the soldier said," in a famous piece of literature. They are not evidence—not evidence which in the least helps us to understand why Mr. MORLEY found it necessary, but painful, to separate himself from both his great leaders—from Mr. GLADSTONE because Mr. GLADSTONE is in effect nothing but a wretched ci-devant (that is what the bolder spirits say), and from Mr. LABOUCHERE because Mr. LABOUCHERE was discourteous to the Throne. If Mr. MORLEY does not like to be discourteous to the Throne, where is the justification of his amendment, which, with the slightest possible difference of form from Mr. LABOUCHERE's, tells the Throne that it is a sturdy beggar, a robber of the public, and by implication a liar? This is an awkward enough galley for a person anxious not to be discourteous to the Throne to find himself in. But Mr. MORLEY laboured with the skill of the most practised shipwright to make his galley more awkward still. He dwelt with something like eloquence on the pleasure which he, in common with all those-who-are-not-Mr. STOREY (if we may be pardoned a new but convenient term), feels in the associations, the historical associations, of the Crown. He pointed out without the very least ceremony that Mr. STOREY's talk about the contrasts of riches and poverty is the silliest and vulgarest of clap-trap. That is to say, Mr. MORLEY carefully demolished the grounds on which at least a hundred of the hundred and odd Parliamentary tagrag who followed him into the Lobby based their votes. After which he asked them to follow him. That Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN should talk in this sort of fashion is not surprising. When Sir GEORGE came to speak, he instanced as a reason for wishing the minority to be increased the fact that royalty and aristocracy no longer put their offspring into lucrative offices. The extraordinary discipline of topsy-turvature, through which Sir GEORGE went before he cut his Unionist cables and made off to join the Gladstonian buccaneers, may account for any eccentricity of logic. But we should have supposed that the disuse of the practice to which Sir GEORGE referred was exactly the reason for these grants. The contradiction is intelligible enough in Sir GEORGE; in Mr. MORLEY we fear it can only be set down to the fact that Mr. MORLEY s'encanaille with difficulty.

We do not think it necessary to examine further in detail the contentions by which men, whom we should be sorry to describe as anything but men of honour, reconciled themselves to following the lead of a few paid politicians, Debating Society spouters, and Parliamentary mountebanks. We do not ourselves think the system of constant Parliamentary grants a good system; but it is impossible to imagine any other consistent with our present political institutions. The least worthy among many unworthy things said by Mr. MORLEY was his complaint of Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH's remarks about the Crown lands—a complaint based on a kind of chicanery about personal and fiduciary ownership. This part of the complaint was not urged when Sir MICHAEL had reached the House, and it is difficult to suppose that he would not have had an easy answer to it. What is contended for on the score of the indebtedness of the nation, by virtue of the abandonment of the Crown lands to it, is not that the Crown has lost the power of alienation (wherein alone the "personal" question comes in), but that it has lost the power of the most profitable employment. Mr. MORLEY must know perfectly well that, if the QUEEN were able to manage the Crown lands even as the most strictly tied-up landowner can manage his estates under present law, the revenue derived from them at present might be decupled. But it would be altogether too unkind to press this argument. Mr. MORLEY only set an example which all his honourable friends followed in throwing to the wolves the ewe lambs of argument on which his own side had to rely. He, as we have seen, "chucked" the East-End-and-destitution logic of the eminent Mr. STOREY. Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN was nearly as decided, though not nearly as witty, as Mr. CHAMBERLAIN in sending the savings argument to join its poor little brother. Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT (that such a man should be so merciless!) followed suit by whirling over the sledge the last shrieking innocent—the argument about misuse of the Civil List by HER MAJESTY and the PRINCE OF WALES. And before this Mr. LABOUCHERE, yielding to the madness of the hour, had come near to the flat blasphemy of Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, by declaring that it was "quite unimportant" whether the surrendered hereditary revenues were the property of the Sovereign or not; while, to descend for a moment to the infinitely little, Mr. ESSLEMONT, of Aberdeen, by informing the House that he did not care for precedents, at once and with a right and left swashing blow annihilated the argument from GEORGE III.'s reign and the argument from Sir ROBERT PEEL's speeches. In short, the sole desire of almost every speaker on the side of the temporary Opposition appears to have been to show that his friends and brethren were a party of illogical fools. It is not altogether surprising that a majority of something like three to one took such a party at its own valuation. We regret the incident, because it has shown what manner of men can get themselves elected to the House of Commons nowadays, because it has not been altogether well managed by the Government, because it has shown the existence of a certain amount of foolishness and bad blood in the lower class of voters. But we could not have wished for a spectacle of more complete imbecility among the leaders of the opposition to the Grants, and we are glad to note that some of the very organs of that opposition itself admit that the public at large is much more interested in Princess LOUISE than in Mr. LABOUCHERE. It would be odd if it were otherwise, for the most miserly British workman can hardly object to his landlord or employer paying a shilling or two more taxes for the benefit of a popular Royal Family.

THE AUNT'S CHEQUE.

IT was once said by a cynical person that the only use of a bank was to borrow money from, and that the simplest mode of performing that transaction was to overdraw your account. This, however, is a point on which bankers not unnaturally differ from their customers, holding that their business is to lend at higher interest than they pay, when it happens that they pay any at all. The action brought by the Wiltshire and Dorsetshire Bank against a certain Mr. Cook is in favour of the banking community, and further shows the desirability of doing things in some order. Mr. Cook is a fishmonger at Taunton, and has got himself into a rather serious pecuniary scrape by not behaving like other people, but adopting a line of his own. Eccentricity may or may not show that a man is in advance of his age. But it usually results in immediately unpleasant consequences, and martyrdom is not always worth while. Mr. Cook, according to the facts so far as they appeared in Court, must have gone out of his way to assume the position of an insolvent creditor. Having a considerable balance with the Wiltshire and Dorsetshire Bank, he went through one of the most singular processes in the world. He exchanged cheques with a customer of his own to the unexplained amount of six hundred and forty-five pounds. If this is a form of betting prevalent in the West of England, the student of contemporary manners would like to see some more light thrown upon it. If it be merely a method of discharging a liability by barter, the element of uncertainty should, one is disposed to think, be eliminated, and both parties should make a clean breast. For here the customer seems to have obtained, in Homeric phrase, gold for brass, offerings of a hundred oxen for offerings of nine. Cheques are a convenient form of portable property when there are assets, but useless encumbrances when there are not. The result in this case was that Mr. Cook's cheques in the hands of his customer were honoured, while the customer's cheques in the hands of Mr. Cook were dishonoured. Mr. Cook, on being requested to make good the deficit, hit upon a device which, if less complicated than the previous exchange, is even more mysterious. He suggested that the customer's aunt should draw a cheque in his favour for the same sum of six hundred and forty-five pounds. But it will be seen in the sequel that a Taunton aunt is no substitute for a fairy godmother.

Ever since "my aunt's case," when the plaintiff got an order from a County Court judge against the wealthy aunt of an impoverished creditor, there has been a vague notion among spendthrifts that aunts are fair game. In this case the aunt responded with alacrity to the proposal made. She at once drew the cheque; and, indeed, drawing cheques seems to present no difficulties to any member of the customer's family. But alas! this cheque also was dishonoured, and an aunt without a balance is a vain thing to save a man. Deserted alike by aunt and nephew, Mr. Cook found himself defendant in an action brought by the bank to recover a sum of three hundred and odd pounds. The bank submitted that there could be no valid answer to the claim, and Mr. Justice WILLS, in Chambers, made an order for summary judgment unless the money were paid into Court. On appeal to the Divisional Court the plaintiff's counsel argued that, as the defendants had kept the aunt's cheque, they took the risk of its turning out useless; and, further, that having certain cheques drawn by the customer on a bank at Wiveliscombe, they had sent them to their London agents, instead of immediately presenting them. Unfortunately these Wiveliscombe cheques fared no better than their predecessors, being also dishonoured on presentation. The Court held, following a recent case, and also the dictates of common sense, that despatching the cheques to London in the ordinary course of business was not laches, and did not disentitle the bank to recover the money. To have held otherwise would have added a new terror to banking, without giving any real security to the public. For, as a matter of fact, the delay was very trifling, the Wiveliscombe cheques having been paid in on the 23rd of April, and returned on the 26th, while notice was given on the 27th. Mr. Justice DAY was quite clear and strong on the important subject of the aunt. The aunt, he said, had not been taken for better for worse, but only to see what she was worth, and she proved to be worth nothing. It is to be hoped that the history of these interesting and instructive proceedings will be fatal to that superstitious regard for an aunt's purse which has wrought such havoc in the speculations of ingenuous youth. A blind reliance upon the aunts of other people was certainly not to be expected from the ancient and honourable, but usually wideawake, trade of fish-mongers.

THE INFECTIOUS DISEASES NOTIFICATION BILL.

THE Bill which Government has at last introduced for the protection of the community against poisoning by infection has one serious defect. It is not, as it should be, universally compulsory; it imposes on every London doctor the obligation to report all cases of such infectious diseases as are named in its schedule, but it is not as yet worded so as to apply to Ireland, and it leaves the application of the law optional for country towns. For the first omission there is a reasonable excuse, even beyond what is supplied by the common practice of distinguishing between Great Britain and Ireland in legislation. Perhaps the Ministry have not taken the worst way of persuading Irishmen to approve of compulsory notification by not offering it to them. The pulling of the string one way is sometimes known to be the most effectual way of persuading the animal tied to it to go the other. The second omission is less easily justified. The Act is recommended by the fact that no less than fifty provincial towns have already applied for and obtained private Acts to carry out the provisions of this one within their own limits. It would therefore appear that there is no probability that the Act would be generally unpopular. Indeed, the very consideration that some towns might dislike it is in itself a reason why it should have been made universally compulsory. It is possible, but we trust not probable, that there may be other Leicesters in England and other Town Councils as wise as that which has striven to provide small-pox with a secure abiding-place. That these towns should, out of a regard for what they may be pleased to call freedom, or for any other folly, be allowed to foster typhoid fever is not to be desired. The fact that London is not provided with a central health authority is not so much a reason for making the Act compulsory in London, and optional elsewhere, as for supplying the capital with the authority it wants, and ought to possess as fully as Bristol or Dundee.

The reception given to the Bill by the House (the second reading was carried by a majority of more than three to one) should encourage the Ministry to increase the stringency of the measure. Certainly there was nothing in the arguments used against it which need influence the Government. Sir BALTHAZAR FOSTER, who alone spoke against it with any appearance of force, maintained that it might tend to interfere with the friendly relations between doctor and patient, and might result in infractions of the sound old tradition which makes discretion as to his patient's affairs the first article in the doctor's code of honour. We quite agree with Sir BALTHAZAR FOSTER that it would be a thousand pities if this most excellent tradition were in any way weakened. We will even go further, and express a wish that doctors would observe this rule of medical good manners even more carefully than they do. There is, we can assure him, room for improvement. But we do not think that the imposition of an obligation to report all cases of infectious disease on doctors will appreciably diminish the confidence felt in them by their patients. There is the experience of fifty towns to show that the rule may be enforced without any serious disturbance of the relations between patients and doctors. For the rest, we have a profound confidence in the working of the natural desire of those who are sick to get well. The friend of liberty, who is down with a good smart typhoid fever, will in very few cases prove such a heroic martyr as to die rather than send for a doctor who will be bound to report the existence and nature of his disease to the sanitary authorities. As for those who would conceal the existence of disease in their house for purely selfish business reasons, they are entitled to no consideration whatever. No man's rights include the right to poison his neighbours, and it is a pity that the Act does not make the head of every household jointly responsible with the doctor for the notification. If it were not disgusting, it would be laughable, to hear members of Parliament and friends of freedom get up and solemnly argue that the small tradesman or other person who thinks that the presence of infectious disease in his house might injure him financially, and, therefore, conceals it to the great danger of his neighbours, is entitled to be listened to with a kind of respect. It is a great pity, no doubt, that, among the other consequences of infectious disease, there should also be the danger of loss of one's means of livelihood ; but that danger is unavoidable, and for the rest no man is entitled to protect his own means of subsistence at the expense of the lives of innocent people. Besides, rigid precautions against the spread of disease are themselves in the interest of the very class which is most likely to lose money by it. The morality of the question is very easy to state. No decent person wishes to cause danger of poisoning to his neighbours, or would have the least objection to the general application of precautionary measures, and what no decent person would wish not to do, no selfish, reckless, or foolish person ought to be at liberty to do at the expense of other people.

THE TROUBLES OF TURKEY.

THE short conversation in the House of Lords on Monday night as to affairs in the East could not be expected to furnish any very new or startling information. When Lord SALISBURY politely reminded Lord STRATHEDEN that it was open to that noble lord and others "to speculate" on a great number of questions in respect to which those "in the service of HER MAJESTY must abstain from comment," he put into convenient form the undoubted fact that, except on the rarest occasions, listeners to Foreign Secretaries only find, in the words of the poet, a horrid silence invading their ears. Lord SALISBURY says justly that for the last two years Bulgaria has had little history, and that what she has is a record of prosperity and progress, while he subsequently says, no doubt with equal truth to the ear, though perhaps not so much to the sense, that the conduct of Russia has been very "correct." It is possible, as every one knows in private life, to observe correct conduct towards neighbours, relations, friends, and connexions in business, after a fashion of correctness more intolerable and vexatious than the most robustious antagonism. And this would seem to be the sort of correctness shown by Russia in refusing to acknowledge a Bulgarian Government which has been chosen by the will of the Bulgarians, and which has given Bulgaria both prosperity and content. The advice of Lord SALISBURY that all men should carefully "abstain from using action or language tending to stimulate unfortunate differences," his candid, but cheerful, observation that the progress of Turkey, "though not rapid, has been sensible" (and are there not scientific instruments in these happy days which will measure you the hundred-thousandth part of an inch ?), his liberal assurance "that there is no greater ground for anticipating disturbance than there has been in recent times," are as good examples of the political egg-and-sword dance as "in recent times" have been given. This kind of solemn pavane, this evolution in which "the grave Lord Keeper leads the brawls," is one of the incidents of a Foreign Secretary's place, and there have been few Foreign Secretaries who have ever discharged it with a more agreeable mixture of dignified observance of the proprieties to the very least caper with an intelligent enjoyment of the real meaning of the farce.

For actual information as to the state of the case one must, of course, look elsewhere, and the situation will be found, not perhaps more correctly, but more fully, sketched in Lord CARNARVON's sepia than in Lord SALISBURY's rose-pink. Lord CARNARVON's details are quite correct and perfectly consistent with Lord SALISBURY's generalities. The utmost correctness will not prevent you from placing your troops in Province B rather than in Province A of your own territory ; and if it does so happen that Province B marches with a foreign country peculiarly open to invasion, correctness does not require that fact to be taken into consideration. Therefore Lord CARNARVON's observations on the state of things along the Galician border do not at all contradict Lord SALISBURY. The same, exactly the same, is to be said of the similar concentrations in the Caucasus. It at least appears to be true that, as Lord CARNARVON went on to say :—"In Servia you have large masses of men ordered and supplied without any one knowing why." Had Lord CARNARVON spoken a day later he would have been able to read on this head the comfortable words of the Metropolitan MICHAEL to a Daily News Correspondent. From these it is gathered that this most reverend man, by his own account, never meddles with politics except when he thinks that there is some occasion for him to interfere, that he is not in the least a Russian partisan, but merely considers Russia the only European nation with which Servia ought to cultivate active friendship, and several other valuable truths which no doubt would have consoled Lord CARNARVON much. Without pledging ourselves to it, we should be inclined to accept Lord CARNARVON's estimate of the enormous Continental armies now on foot. We fear he is quite right in saying that the Turkish Government has scarcely a penny in its Treasury. We do not take quite the same view that he takes of the Armenian matter, but as a set-off to this Lord CARNARVON said nothing about Crete. As Lord CARNARVON is as far as possible from being a friend of the wicked Turk, his admission that Turkey has fared very badly at the hands of friends as well as of foes is valuable. We do not think that the bearing of the fact on what even the best friends of the Porte must acknowledge to be its shortcomings is quite sufficiently allowed for even by those who never shared the silly anti-Turk craze of a dozen years ago. There is considerable excuse for the Porte if it does not know to whom to trust. The point where it is inexcusable is the neglect so to manage its matters that it shall have as little necessity as possible for trusting to any one. There is, for instance, no intelligible reason for the chronic impecuniosity of which Lord CARNARVON complained ; for, sorely diminished as the Porte's resources are, they are still very considerable, and no sovereign in Europe has the opportunity of governing so cheaply as the SULTAN. With regard to the affairs of Armenia and Crete we do not, as we have already said, quite share Lord CARNARVON's childlike belief in the wrongs of the Armenians. He complains that the charges have never been denied or disproved. May it be suggested to him that there is a preliminary and very important process which seems also to have been omitted—namely, the proving of these charges ? It is useless to deny, and impossible to disprove, things as to which no positive evidence is obtainable. Nevertheless, it is quite conceivable that the Armenians have had wrong in some places ; and it is clear that the way in which the Porte has behaved is the very way to enable its enemies to make the most of this, and to disable its friends from taking its side. The belief in "Can't you let it alone ?" is sometimes a valuable belief, but it may be carried too far. And, when letting-it-alone on the one hand, and occasional harkening to the intrigues of those who are known to be deadly enemies on the other, are the two secrets of policy to which a Government trusts, it is not surprising that it should perpetually find itself in evil case.

The exact condition and prospects of the Cretan outbreak are still very difficult to ascertain. The impudent perversion of Lord SALISBURY's words as to the inconvenience of Home Rule as exemplified in the island would be very properly met by the repeated assurances that England attaches the greatest importance to the maintenance of Ottoman sovereignty. And there is still wanting even the very least evidence that Ottoman sovereignty has had anything to do with the present troubles, except as any government which is not carried on with the very greatest skill may have something to do with troubles arising from desperate faction fights. A Commission is on its way ; troops to maintain or restore order are being despatched ; a delegation (oddly composed of representatives of the Mussulman minority, of the Christian majority, and of the insurgents) is on its way to Constantinople, and the return of PHOTIADES Pasha as Governor is talked of. PHOTIADES Pasha was very popular in Crete, and showed considerable ability there ; but he did not succeed in achieving the impossible. The present difficulty in Crete appears to be simply this—that neither Mussulmans nor Christians will be satisfied with mere equality. Nor is it easy to see how any change of governors, any concessions, any "protocolling" of any kind, will alter or remedy this state of things. What is wanted clearly is a strong and impartial central authority which can make the two parties respect each other's rights, and be content with their own. The Porte is hardly strong enough to do this, and is certainly not believed to be impartial. Greece has no real claim, is not nearly strong enough, and would not be believed to be much more impartial. England could do it, but declines ; some other Powers would very likely be much pleased to do it, but cannot be allowed. Statesmanship of the cynical kind might be inclined to say, "Fight dog, fight bear," till one side or the other is tired ; but what the cant of Europe is pleased to call the conscience of Europe would, no doubt, be horrified by at least the open promulgation of any such advice.

AN OPEN SPACE—GONE.

IF a man wanted to describe the course the Government has taken with the Post Office Site Bill more tersely than good-naturedly, he might say that it is one excellently fitted to give Mr. MATTHEWS an opportunity. High and dry orthodoxy is on one side, and the considerations which would influence a man of the world are on the other. With that choice before him we know which road the HOME SECRETARY would joyfully take. The case is a simple one. The site of Coldbath Fields Prison is free to be disposed of. Government, after a certain amount of higgling not very easy to follow, has decided to use it for Post Office buildings. It has been in such a hurry that it forgot to provide itself with the necessary powers, and is now applying to Parliament for a Bill which will in some degree be a Bill of indemnity. We do not deny that from the purely pedantic standpoint the Ministry has something to say for itself. The Post Office is a national concern. Coldbath Fields Prison is a national asset. To take the asset and use it for the Office is a course for which a good defence can be made out by following one line of argument. You have only to say that some money will be saved thereby, that London has no right to profit at the expense of the taxpayer, that the duty of a good Minister is to spare the national purse, that the London members are fishing for a good thing, and there is your case. Mr. MATTHEWS, who must have enjoyed himself very much, stated it as well as he did the hidebound lawyer's view of the CASS case when he irritated the House of Commons into snubbing the Government and starting a scandal. Mr. COURTNEY, to whom doctrinaire orthodoxy is dear, backed him up stoutly. If this is the proper way to deal with such a question, the Ministry was perfectly in the right, and deserved the majority it obtained—partly by the kind assistance of Mr. ILLINGWORTH, who thought it monstrous London should get a good thing unless it could be shown to have paid handsomely for it.

Perhaps, however, there are other considerations in this matter worthy of attention. After all, what is at stake is not only a possible but problematical loss to the taxpayer, but also the character of some Conservative leaders. Were they or were they not talking a great deal of windy humbug when they, not being as yet in office, professed such a tender interest in the housing of the poor and the supply of open spaces? For they did profess very much about these things. They sat in committees and wrote magazine articles. Among other things, they recommended that the site of Coldbath Fields should be made an open space. Now that they are in office, these humane intentions of theirs are totally forgotten. A chance presents itself for making an arrangement between the Home Office and the Post Office by which it is possible that a little money may be saved to the Treasury. It is an essential part of the arrangement that neither workmen's dwellings nor open spaces will ever be made on or out of the site of Coldbath Fields Prison. At once, and in such a hurry that the necessary Parliamentary authority is dispensed with, the arrangement is made. If the belief spreads among the London workmen that the friendly professions of Conservative statesmen are mere wind, we really do not think that there will be much ground for surprise. They cannot have their cake and eat it. To be economically orthodox, to teach that it is not the business of the State to look after any man's lodging or recreation-ground, is a consistent course. As a matter of fact, however, it is not the course many Conservatives were arguing for some time ago. It is, therefore, with an ill grace that they fall back on it now. They cannot win the praise of being sternly economical according to the strictest sect of the doctrinaires, and also win votes as friends of the people of the modern emotional kind. The course the Ministry is following now may be the wiser, but it would have been more to the honour of their consistency to have taken it before. For the rest, they would be somewhat puzzled if they were called upon to apply their orthodoxy all round. If the London Radical orator knows his business, as we incline to think he does, he will have a great chance with the question, Why, when the Government was looking about for an asset in the shape of an open space, it should pitch on one lying in a very crowded part of London, and put it to a purpose which will make the crowding yet closer?

A LESSON TO THE "NEW" CONSERVATIVES.

IT was a coincidence full of instruction and warning for all who profess and call themselves Conservatives that Mr. BALFOUR and Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL should have delivered their recent speeches, addressed respectively to a London and a Birmingham audience, on the same day, and at about the same hour, of the present week. For there could hardly be a more effective illustration of the contrast between true Conservatism and its counterfeit than a comparison of those two speeches will be found to yield. It is all the more effective from the fact that, as regards one important subject treated of by each of them, the two speakers occupy common ground, and start from an equally unreserved recognition of existing facts. The width to which their inferences diverge is the measure of the discrepancy between their policy and principles. Both spoke in substantially identical terms of the condition of Ireland. Mr. BALFOUR, though he did not like, as he remarked, to "boast" "in the middle of a battle," thought it only right "to say frankly that the improvement in the state of that country was most undoubted and most satisfactory." The firm administration of the law had produced the effect which it always did. It discouraged criminals, and encouraged those who were not. His belief, he said in conclusion, which was founded upon trustworthy information derived from all sorts of quarters, was that at this moment, "not merely had crime diminished in Ireland under the working of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, but that the diminution of crime had brought with it the fruits of peace and goodwill between every class of the community." Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, for his part, had, up to this point at any rate, as good, if not a better, account to give of Ireland. Agrarian crime, he pointed out, had "immensely diminished," boycotting had "largely decreased," moonlighting as a specific form of agrarian crime had "almost disappeared." The savings bank returns were good, the railway traffic returns were good, the harvest prospects were good. The price of stock had much increased, as also had "security with respect to the transactions of individuals among themselves," and there was "going on" "now in Ireland undoubtedly a fair discharge of contracted liabilities which may have been entered into between man and man." Such is Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL'S view of the situation in Ireland; and, as has been said, it is even more favourable—as it is certainly a good deal more circumstantial in its enumeration of satisfactory features—than that of Mr. BALFOUR. When, however, we proceed to examine the lesson which these two observers respectively draw from the result of their observations, we find that they are in absolutely polar opposition to each other. Mr. BALFOUR, applying to politics the principles which any man not destined either for the workhouse or the lunatic asylum applies to his private affairs, is evidently of opinion that when you have succeeded, or are rapidly succeeding, in restoring order, harmony, and well-being to a society, you should not immediately turn things upside down by providing it with a brand-new and highly experimental, not to say extremely doubtful, set of legislative institutions. Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, on the contrary, is of opinion that this is exactly what you should do.

The former of these counsels was less explicitly given than the latter, but it is conveyed by sufficiently clear implication in Mr. BALFOUR'S remarks on the incomparably greater importance of the administrative than the legislative duties of a Government. Lord RANDOLPH, as everybody now knows, and as most people probably have been rather amused than surprised to learn, has just expressly declared himself in favour of immediate legislation of the "large, constructive" order for Ireland—for the immediate institution of a new local government system on the broadest possible popular basis, coupled with the advance of 100,000,000*l.* of money to convert the Irish tenantry into peasant proprietors. That is his recipe for the treatment of a country which he declares to be speedily regaining, if it has not already regained, complete social, agricultural, and commercial health. It is true that he technically saves his logic by dwelling on the existence of a moral phenomenon in Ireland, which, according to him, must neutralize all the effects of physical well-being. He discovers in that country a state of things for which history, he thinks, affords no parallel whatever—to wit, the presence of "every indication of material prosperity, combined with every indication of acute political discontent." If, however, we proposed (which we do not) to inquire whether history presents any parallel to the state of things which Lord RANDOLPH describes, we should begin our investigation by ascertaining its existence as a fact. Ireland is not a very populous country, and it is inhabited by an eminently "vocal" race. Still, there is a considerable disproportion between the silent and the articulate part of the community, and the numbers of the former are, after all, not inconsiderable. It is not to be assumed that the political shoe pinches them because Mr. O'BRIEN cries out, and Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL has got to prove, and not to assume, that this "acute political discontent" which so strangely coexists with material prosperity is really anything more than his own mistaken inference from the undoubtedly acute anxiety of the Irish agitator to—in every sense of the phrase—keep the pot boiling. However we will cheerfully make Lord RANDOLPH a present of his premisses; and will assume that the Irish people are at once highly prosperous and acutely discontented. But we can hardly allow him to blow hot and cold by accepting the testimony of certain persons as proof of the malady, and rejecting their evidence as to the method of treatment. It is—it must be, on the faith of the Irish agitators' assurances and on that alone that Lord RANDOLPH believes in the prevalence of acute political discontent in Ireland; but the very same authorities who have convinced him that the discontent exists assure him that nothing but Home Rule—which he declares to be "impracticable because inadmissible," and, ex vi circulatorum, "inadmissible because impracticable"—will ever cure it.

But it is not till we go on to examine the remedy he actually does propose that we get a complete view—if not of that political school whose maxim is "when in doubt legislate," at any rate of that class of politician who professes to believe that this maxim is the only "paying" one—to recommend to a democratic electorate of the modern type. Political discontent in Ireland is to be allayed, according to Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, by saddling the Irish peasant for forty or fifty years with an obligation which, according to the same authority, he does not even now regard as morally binding, and by calling upon him to elect, principally from among the class of persons who have for years past been inciting him to violate this obligation, a body of local administrators who, as soon as they assume that capacity, are to see that in future he fulfils it. And on the faith that the tenant will then recognize a liability which he now denies, or that, if he does not, he will be compelled to discharge it by the men who are now urging him to repudiate it, the English taxpayer is invited to advance a hundred millions sterling. This is not a caricature, but a strictly matter-of-fact and uncoloured summary of Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL'S scheme of pacification for Ireland. We are convinced, indeed, that its distinguished author himself would accept our account of it as absolutely accurate. The apparently paradoxical character which his plan presents, as described above, will not, we believe, discompose him in the least; for, so far from shrinking from his own paradox, he seems positively to embrace and caress it. Having started from the admission that there is an "hereditary ingrained conviction in the mind of the Irish peasant that the owner of the land has no moral title to the payment of rent," he goes on to argue that the one and only way to ensure his punctual payment of the rent (when it assumes the form of instalments of purchase-money) is to take care that the local body which is to provide the English taxpayer with a security for such payment shall be as accurately representative as possible of the tenants themselves. "No fancy franchise, no proportionate representation, no plural voting ought to be allowed to vitiate the free representative character of that body." See to it, in other words, that no element of opinion in favour of the landlord's "moral title" (and, consequently, of the State's derivative right) to the payment of rent shall, under any circumstances, find its way on to the Boards which are to give us assurance that that rent is to be paid.

Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, as we all know, is not wanting in courage, either intellectual or moral; but he does not talk audacious nonsense from any love of it; and the fact that he talked such nonsense as this at Birmingham is very significant indeed. He was evidently bent on putting in evidence once more his peculiar kind of "Conservatism," and of placing it in the sharpest possible contrast with that of which Mr. BALFOUR is now among the ablest and most trusted representatives. His rival has evidently been burning to show that he at least is not all for "repression," and so forth, as Mr. BALFOUR is; that he at least has a "constructive policy for Ireland," as Mr. BALFOUR, with his insistence on "administration," has not. We rejoice that he has given so frank and self-revealing an account of what his precious "constructive policy" amounts to. Such blessed words as "free representative character," and the like, may be good enough, he perhaps knows, to catch the Radical gallery to which he partly plays. But if the so-called Conservative of the new school has not had his eyes opened to the meaningless vacuity of such "Tory-Democratic" talk, then we fear that the so-called Conservative of the new school must be merely a politician who from one point of view has mistaken his side of the House, or from another way of looking at the matter has selected it with his eyes only too wide open.

THE RIGHT OF SEARCH AGAIN.

IT may easily be believed that the proceedings of Captain SHEPARD, of the United States revenue-cruiser, Rush, are producing some excitement in Victoria, B.C. On the evidence of a gentleman who is said to tell the story from the American point of view, it appears that this energetic officer has been led by excess of zeal into an imitation of the unfortunate example set by his countryman, the captain of the San Jacinto. He has not only imitated it, but bettered it too. When the captain of the San Jacinto stopped a British ship on the high seas, and took Messrs. SLIDELL and MASON out of her, there was war in the States, and at least a possibility that the British ship was carrying contraband. That did not, as the American Government explicitly acknowledged, entitle him to erect himself into a Court of Admiralty, and decide that Confederate agents were contrabands, but it was at least some palliation of his over-haste. Captain SHEPARD has no such excuse. In a time of peace he has taken upon himself to stop British vessels on the high seas, break into their lockers, decide what part of their cargo was and what was not legitimately obtained, and has condemned or acquitted them on his own authority alone. This is, to say no more, somewhat surprising conduct in the officer of a Government which is known to pride itself not a little on its knowledge of and regard for international law. It is nothing more nor less than a revival of the old Spanish right of search, and the Rush is behaving for all the world like a guardacosta on the Spanish Main circa 1735.

The question whether the fishery claims of the United States Government in the Behring Sea are well founded or not is quite independent of the regularity of Captain SHEPARD'S conduct. It is for the nations interested to decide how far the jurisdiction of the States extends from their coasts. However that dispute is settled, it will still be an abuse of his authority in any American officer to seize British vessels on the high seas and to adjudicate out of hand on their offences, real or imaginary. This is what Captain SHEPARD has done. When he took the Black Diamond he examined her cargo, and decided that one hundred and six of her store of sealskins had been captured in close waters. When he overhauled the Triumph he declared on his own authority that her skins had been taken in the Pacific. It is not certain that either capture was effected in waters claimed as American. When Captain SHEPARD was last heard of he was chasing sealers off Paul's Island, which is not in Behring Sea at all. This is the Spanish guardacosta over again. Nobody ever denied—at least no responsible person—that the Spaniards were entitled to stop smuggling in their own waters. What was denied was that they had the right to stop English merchant ships wherever they found them on the pretence that they had been smuggling or were going to smuggle. The case is so clear and the United States Government has laid the law down so distinctly itself that Captain SHEPARD will, in all probability, be disavowed. In the meantime it certainly appears to be a case for H.M.S. Champion. That vessel was lying at Victoria while the Rush was chasing the sealers. As she was sent to protect British fishermen, we are of opinion that her place is elsewhere. The Champion is a steel cruiser of fourteen guns, and able to deal with many Rushes. The protection she is supposed to give the fishermen would be more effectively shown by interference to stop one of these outrageous captures than by a prolonged stay at anchor in Victoria harbour. If she is kept back by orders from home, it is time that they should be taken off. Some action of this kind would bring the preposterous American claim to make Behring Sea an American lake to a test.

This claim has been long a cause of irritation, and it is time that it was settled. Even if the British Government is resolved not to back its colonies up in this matter, it would do better to indicate that plainly at once, and take the possible consequences, than to leave a certain cause of quarrel unsettled for ever. The result of a half measure of that kind is always the same—it brings on a dispute, which is all the hotter because of the preliminary wrangling.

AN ACTING CONSUL AND AN ACTIVE MERCHANT.

THE Acting Consul of HER MAJESTY'S Consular Court for the Bights of Benin and Biafra and the island of Fernando Po administers a peculiar system of law, and administers it in a peculiar way. They have in those regions, so familiar to geographers, and so attractive to seekers after gain, a short and easy method of dealing with the natives. If they do not make the recalcitrant nigger unanimous by riding him on a rail, they put upon him, and upon the tribal community to which he belongs, what Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH would call a pressure within the "law." Mr. REECE, a British merchant, thought too much about the pressure and not enough about the law. The story, as unfolded before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, enlivens the records of legal procedure with a bit of real, and even rather highly-coloured, life. There is, indeed, something not a little droll in the contrast between the scenes described and the place where the narrative of them was given. The dingy little room on a first-floor in Downing Street, where appeals come from every quarter of the QUEEN'S world-wide dominions, veils with unusual success the majesty of British justice. No judge of this Court, not even the Lord Chancellor, wears any robes, and five elderly gentlemen sitting round a table dispense the principles of Imperial equity. Mr. REECE pursues, under an African sun, the business of a dealer in palm-oil. He "sells," this benevolent man, "English goods to the natives of the district of 'Benin on credit.'" What a touching picture of mutual fidelity and confidence does this simple statement conjure up! Here, on the one hand, is a British merchant, whose word is as good as his bond, fit type of the class which has erected the mighty fabric of English commerce, laying its foundations as broad as, and a good deal flatter than, the surface of the earth. On the other hand, we have a simple and guileless population of African negroes, anxious to provide themselves with the material as well as the moral blessings of civilization, but, if possible, still more desirous of paying for them their exact value in palm-oil. What more beautiful, or more pathetic, than this contact of Birmingham with Benin, of Bradford with Biafra? Birmingham, we know, supplies idols, some of which are alleged to be images of Mr. J-S-PH CH-MB-RL-N and Lord R-ND-LPH CH-RCH-LL. Old hats and cheap gin are also supplied by some Christians and philanthropists. But, no doubt, Mr. REECE imports more durable and less deleterious commodities.

The system of credit in Benin and Biafra and in the island of Fernando Po rests, as it should rest, upon trust. In order that there should be no ambiguity in the meaning of this term, trust is defined as follows:—"Whenever any 'natives are in debt to a merchant in respect of goods supplied to them, the merchant can seize oil or other produce belonging to any members of the same tribe as the natives who are so in debt, and continue to seize such oil and produce until his debt is satisfied.'" We are assured that this custom is sanctioned by native as well as European opinion, and we must be content with European authority that native opinion sanctions it. When SHERIDAN was told that the lost Ten Tribes had been discovered, he exclaimed, "How very fortunate! Just when I had exhausted the 'patience of the other two.'" Under the custom of Benin a creditor must be always finding a fresh debtor, and going for him with a vigour stimulated by the fact that he has the law on his side. Mr. REECE, however, was accused of having attempted to enforce a civil liability by the use of firearms, and that is an exuberance of assertion which seems not to be recognized even on the banks of the free-and-easy Benin. Mr. REECE said in his defence that he approached some native canoes for the purpose of seizing oil, and that the occupants of these canoes had the audacity to throw sticks at him. Whether this reprehensible conduct on their part proves that the custom is not quite so universally accepted as Mr. REECE'S counsel contend, or only that there are lawless people everywhere, we shall not assume the province of determining. Mr. REECE, not acquiescing in the position of Aunt Sally assigned to him by this practical expression of local opinion, "fired his gun for the purpose of frightening the 'natives, and in doing so wounded two of them.'" Mr. REECE might have frightened the natives with blank cartridge, which could not have wounded them. But perhaps, as Lord BRAMWELL suggested in a somewhat similar case, he aimed at nothing and missed it. Being brought before the Acting Consul, he was fined five-and-twenty pounds in "trust" for the persons injured, and was further ordered to be removed from the district for ten years at his own expense, provided his removal did not cost more than fifteen pounds. Who would have paid the surplus, if any, does not appear. Mr. REECE paid his fine, but has successfully appealed against the remainder of this singular sentence. He ought to have been previously required to find sureties for his good behaviour; and, as this preliminary formality was omitted, the judgment of deportation has been quashed. When the blessings of competitive examination are introduced into the Bight of Benin, it would be interesting to ask a young Beninite what meaning he attached to the word "trust."

THE GENERAL'S REBUFF.

THE result of the Cantonal elections has been an undoubted check for General BOULANGER. No ingenuity can get over the fact that he stood to be elected in some eighty places and has been returned for a dozen. The contrast between the figures is disagreeably glaring, and it is a matter of course that the pretender's enemies are making the most of his defeat. They have, however, been taught by experience, and are not so unanimous in declaring that he is done for as they had been on previous occasions. It is too manifest that a politician who has jumped up after so many facers may get on his legs again. For the rest, this particular facer is not a very severe one, and the General can without affectation take it in the cool style of his manifesto. The Cantonal elections are purely local, and, unless the voters had forgotten everything except political animosity, they could not have put all consideration of local concerns aside for the sake of returning a candidate purely because he is an enemy to the Government. This fact, of which they are now making the most, ought certainly to have been present to the minds of the Boulangist party managers before they decided to run a very unnecessary adventure. Their decision to risk it does show that they are more or less deficient in sagacity, and their opponents may well be pleased at the proof.

At the same time the Ministry is undoubtedly right in not drawing too much encouragement from the returns. As a matter of fact, the elections, though so unfavourable to General BOULANGER, are not wholly favourable to the Republic. It is only by entirely ignoring the real nature of Boulangism that it can be shown to have any such meaning. The General is not formidable by his own following alone, but because he is an addition to the strength of the Royalist and Bonapartist enemies of the Republic. Every Reactionary added to the Chambers at the approaching election will be an ally of the General's. The varying sections of the Opposition may have their own different ends to serve; but for the present they have one object in common, and can work for it together. That object is the defeat of the Parliamentary Republicans. When M. TIRARD and his colleagues look at the list of successful candidates, they may doubt whether they have much reason to be pleased with the result of the elections. The Reactionary parties have a balance of seven victories in their favour. When to these are added the twelve Boulangist victories, the balance is nineteen against the Republicans. This is not a very crushing defeat; but, if something like it occurs at the general election, the Republicans may find themselves counterbalanced by the Opposition. The Reactionaries already hold nearly a third of the seats. If they add even moderately to their number, and the Boulangists carry only a reasonable handful of seats, the result must be a balance of forces which will produce deadlock. It must also not be forgotten that many, if not most, of the Republican deputies are in favour of Revision. In that they will be supported by Boulangists and Reactionaries alike; so that the first act of the new Chamber may be to bring the whole frame of government into question. There is, therefore, still reason why the Exchange in Paris should emphasize a report of the General's suicide by a rise of 15 centimes in the Funds. The Ministry has also, from its point of view, good cause to push on with its long-drawn-out legal proceedings. After a first moment of exultation, during which there was some talk of a speedy election, the Ministry has fallen back on its old plan of postponement till a sentence can be recorded against its enemy. The last incident in these proceedings—the theft of part of the evidence, and its production by the Cocarde—is a characteristic addition to its remarkable history. All along the Government has allowed it to appear that it is hanging back from producing the evidence on which it is acting. Now it has enabled its enemies to score again. If the stolen evidence is a fair sample of the rest, the whole may be dismissed as of little weight. If it is not, and there is better behind, then the delay of the Government is less intelligible than ever. In any case, it is obviously very ill served by its own agents. It is so universally taken for granted that the General will be condemned by the Senate that nobody asks what would be the effect of an acquittal on the eve of the election. And yet the Ministry must ask itself sometimes what the result will be if the evidence is insufficient and the Court not utterly unjudicial.

THE NEW RADICALS AND THE OLD.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, according to Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, is the acrimonious person who always infuses bitterness into those waters of Parliamentary controversy which Sir WILLIAM himself so invariably sweetens. So far, however, as we can make out the rights of the matter—which we necessarily observe from a perfectly impartial standpoint—this only means that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S Gladstonian opponents prefer, as indeed they have excellent reasons for preferring, to attack him elsewhere than in the House of Commons, while Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, for his part, has a distinct weakness for retorting upon them from his place in Parliament. When at the close of some perfectly calm and argumentative speech he suddenly faces about in his place in front of the red box, as he did the other night, and flings half a dozen sentences of scathing contempt at the new Radicals behind and below him, the onslaught, we daresay, appears to them gratuitous. But so, no doubt, it does to the apple-stealing urchin who finds himself suddenly seized by the ear and neck after his depredations on the orchard. He has as much forgotten the taste of those apples as the Gladstonian revilers of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN have forgotten the bitter flavour of their abuse. But he, at least, may be excused for having a longer memory, and if the administration of the long-delayed punishment does have the effect of exacerbating Parliamentary discussion, it is no fault of the politician, who is always ready to meet his assailants on terms upon which very few of them evidently care to meet him.

That Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has been moved beyond his wont by some recent attacks on him would appear from the fact that he has returned to the combat on this occasion outside the House of Commons, and has treated the new Radicals to a new castigation at a Greenwich dinner. By a curious coincidence Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT was on this same evening engaged in addressing words of cheer and encouragement to that peculiar body of new Radicals with a name too old even for the old ones—the Eighty Club. Sir WILLIAM, who, we see, is now “loudly called for” at Gladstonian gatherings—on occasions, it is true, when it would be no good calling for Mr. MORLEY, who somewhat pointedly absents himself (which, after all, too, is perhaps only another side of the same fact)—Sir WILLIAM, we say, had not anything very remarkable to tell the Parnellite politicians who worship the year when their then leader was considering how best to extinguish Mr. PARNELL. The greater part of his speech consisted of badinage, very well deserved, if very obvious, at the expense of Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, which appears to us to open but a remote source of consolation to a party whose trouble just at present is not that they have frondeurs, but that their frondeurs lead. Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, however, added the very infelicitous remark that “when any politician, either attached or unattached, wanted to recommend himself to the English public, the first thing he did was to assume the Radical garb.” That is an observation which fits Lord RANDOLPH well enough; but, considering that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN was at the very same time exerting all his ingenuity in an attempt to show that the unauthorized Radical programme of four years ago is identical with the Liberalism of the Liberal-Unionists and—so far as their views have been allowed to prevail in the Unionist alliance—with the policy of a Conservative Government, the application of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT'S remark to Mr. CHAMBERLAIN is not quite so apparent. Of the success or otherwise of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S attempts to prove the realization of his programme we may entertain our own opinion; but the mere fact of his making the endeavour is sufficient to show that at least one unattached politician does not think that the assumption of “the Radical garb” is the only hopeful method of recommending himself to the English public. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, in fact, is openly showing the greatest possible anxiety to dissociate himself altogether from the Radicalism of which Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, after many changes of raiment, has now definitely assumed “the garb.” And, though we do not pin our faith to his or any other man's reading of the popular mood, we quite agree—as most readers, we think, of his trenchant speech at Greenwich last Wednesday will agree—that he could hardly have chosen a better moment at which to attack them than now, when the rivalries of lieutenants and the vagaries of mutineers are stultifying and discrediting that party to the popular eye.

AXES TO GRIND.

LAST Thursday night's debate in the House of Commons on Mr. SEXTON'S motion for adjournment was a wanton waste of public time, and from more than one point of view a thoroughly discreditable Parliamentary incident; but it is impossible to deny its lively interest for all observers of the political game. Perhaps, even with such an Opposition as we are blessed with in these days, it would have been impossible in any but the present very peculiar condition of parties in Parliament to get up a debate on Dr. TANNER'S case. Dr. TANNER, as our readers are aware, has been convicted before the Irish magistrates of behaving in a physical sense as he constantly behaves in his place in Parliament in a moral sense—that is to say, like a dirty little street boy. He has been figuratively spitting upon his opponents ever since he has had a seat in the House of Commons, and now he has been charged with, and found guilty of, literally spitting upon an Irish police-inspector. For this disgusting and disgraceful act he has been sentenced with eminent propriety to a month's imprisonment with hard labour. In the course, however, of the proceedings which resulted on this sentence he made use of grossly insulting language to the Court, who, after duly considering the contempt, called upon Dr. TANNER to find bail to the sum of 200*l.* for his good behaviour, and, on his refusal to do this, they committed him to prison for three months. The legality of this last sentence is, or is alleged by the Parnellites to be, open to doubt, and this was the ostensible ground of Mr. SEXTON'S motion. It is noticeable that he and those who followed him felt obliged to assume Dr. TANNER'S innocence of the charge on which he was originally convicted; though it is no less worthy of notice that, though that charge has been matter of common notoriety for weeks past, and though it is one which no man with any pretensions to be a gentleman would allow to remain uncontradicted and undisproved an hour longer than he could help, not a word was heard to upset it before the trial either from Dr. TANNER or from any of his eighty-five available spokesmen in the House of Commons.

We do not propose to enter into the merits of the case and the conviction further than to say that there is not the slightest reason to doubt its justice, and that we do not share the opinion of the chivalrous Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE that Dr. TANNER'S bare and tardy word of denial ought to be accepted, at the expense of imputing to several Irish police-constables a piece of gross, gratuitous, and extremely improbable perjury. And as to the point of law, it may be disposed of in half a dozen words by saying that, if there is anything in it, it might be raised and settled in Dr. TANNER'S favour in the shortest and simplest possible way by means of an application to a Superior Court in Dublin for a certiorari. And it is the perfect familiarity of this fact, which, by making the case for the debate so transparently worthless, at the same time makes the action of those various participators in it on the Opposition side of the House so extremely interesting. Never before at so late a period of the Session—though the lateness, of course, is an important element in the matter—have we seen so many anxious politicians hurrying to the common grindstone with their blunt axes in their hands. Mr. MORLEY and Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT and Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN, contentedly conscious that they had done their axe-grinding for a time on the debate on the Royal Grants, took no part in the debate. But the eager Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, full of tremulous dread lest the People should have forgotten him, actually took the unusual course, for a Front Bench man, of rising in his place to help Mr. SEXTON to his motion. And the staid Mr. HENRY FOWLER was seized, after his manner, with the same anxiety, and made a long speech on behalf of the interesting prisoner. And there, too, was the gentle might of Sir HORACE DAVEY, still animated with the desire to answer Mr. LABOUCHERE'S brusque question, "What did you think we sent you here for?" And there was Mr. REID, who is not suspect like Sir HORACE DAVEY, but fears, perhaps, that in these parlous times he may become so at any moment. And, lastly, on the other side of the House, was Mr. HANBURY, before whom the CHIEF SECRETARY to the LORD-LIEUTENANT of Ireland, according to the Daily News, was disquieted, and who, after his "leader's" recent speeches, thought it well to remind the Government of his existence. The staid Mr. HENRY FOWLER, in our opinion, eclipsed them all. He "did not hesitate to say"—he, an ex-Minister of the Crown—that "he agreed with Dr. TANNER that he could not get a trial before these two men"—a duly constituted court of magistrates, probably appointed by one of Mr. FOWLER'S former colleagues—and he suggested that the rejection of prisoner's appeals might be due to the "scandalous existence of judicial patronage"; that is to say, the Irish County Court judges are as subservient agents of oppression and injustice as the resident magistrates. And he said, amid Irish cheers, that "it would have been unworthy of Dr. TANNER as a man to find securities for his good behaviour." But, though Mr. FOWLER was the best, all were good. It was altogether a most edifying debate, and full of instruction in the peculiar merits of a party system under which our leading public men can touch even a Dr. TANNER without thinking themselves defiled.

HARVEY.

THE Life and Character of Harvey, the Famous Conjuror of Dublin, published in 1727, is not a very common book, and it is possible that some readers may never have heard of Harvey. His Christian name is unknown, for on all occasions he used the simple signature "Harvey"; nor are the dates of his birth and death recorded, for nobody knew whence he came or whither he went. One day he disappeared, and no friend or relative ever made inquiry after him; "nor is there anywhere," says his anonymous biographer, "any Parish Record of his Birth, Christening, Marriage, Sickness, Death, or Burial to be met with in these Nations."

Harvey was tall, round-shouldered, pale-visaged, and ferret-eyed, and he was never known to laugh. His mind was wholly given to studying the Black Art and "enlarging the Doctrine of Demons." He would sometimes regret that he had been born a man, and wish that Lucifer would make him grand-master of the horoscope, so that he might have an opportunity of showing a set of rational animals whose society would be worth cultivating. Often he shed tears when he heard of women being safely delivered of children; but it delighted him to learn of the birth of a monster. Whenever he mentioned the sun he took off his hat; but he always shook his head when he spoke of Saturn. It is an open secret, according to Harvey, that Mars, Mercury, and Venus are peopled by courtiers, soldiers, and "all the polite world." These fortunate persons spend their time in feasting and visiting (light aerial chariots affording communication between the three planets); they are free from all sorrows, and live for several thousand years. Saturn is inhabited by knaves, and there is but indifferent society to be had in the moon.

The Classics, in Harvey's opinion, are the foundation of all useful and polite literature; and the Fathers are responsible for "all clumsy and inconclusive divinity." Of Epiphanius, Athanasius, and the two Gregories he held a mean opinion; but he admitted that Cyprian meant well. He could repeat all Irenæus by heart, especially admiring the headings to the chapters; but his favourites were Cælius Rhodiginus and Justin Martyr. Ovid's Fasti he studied closely, and he was known to weep over the loss of Varro's Books of Ancient Religion. In his own library he had only such works as related to the Black Art (and he could never be induced to give a catalogue of them); but he hired books at twopence or a groat apiece, and read widely. Harvey insisted that every Englishman should read Sir Walter Raleigh's History of the World, Heylin's Cosmography, and Stow's Chronicle. On this point he was very emphatic, declaring that, if he were made king, he would hang any man who had not read these three books. Another of his notions was that every heir to an estate of the value of 100*l.* per annum, and upwards, should submit himself for examination in the Classics to judges appointed by law, and that if he failed to satisfy the examiners, his estate should pass to the next heir qualified by law. Harvey's views de jure belli were, in the language of his biographer, "frantic." He was for turning every kingdom into a bear-garden, where "one part was always to look on while the other part knocked one another on the head." The truth is that he was anxious for the world to be dispeopled, and at an end; hence he was fonder of soldiers and quack-doctors than of nurses and midwives. Harvey was very pious, but he was never known to go to church. The "affair of the Reformation" was the cause "of continual chagrin to him," for he sincerely regretted that "Popery was not suffered to rise to its full height." His political opinions were somewhat hazy, or rather he had no politics.

He wore a long, dangling coat of good broadcloth, buttoned from top to bottom; no waistcoat; a broad, slouching hat; about his neck a broad band with tassels; broad-toed shoes (the lachets tied with two pack-threads); no gloves. We are assured that he was "unalterable" in the matter of dress, and would not have changed his fashion to avert a plague or famine. He carried a long, black stick and trudged slowly along the streets, his body bent nearly double. Keeping his eyes fixed to the ground, he took notice of nobody, but constantly muttered to himself.

A few of Harvey's prophecies are recorded. He predicted that in the year of the world six thousand (no very distant date) the tallest man alive would be but five feet high; by the year seven thousand the maximum height would be four feet; in the year seven thousand five hundred we are to be reduced by another foot; and for the other five hundred years—eight thousand being "the sum total of this creation"—the height would be two feet and a half. The day is coming, according to Harvey, when Mohammedanism will be embraced in New York and Peru. Harvey was capable of anything.

The author promises to give in another volume an account of "the necromantic part of Harvey's life." It is a pity that he never fulfilled his promise, for Harvey had practised the art of conjuring in Dublin for a longer time and with more brilliant success "than any other conjurer on any part of the earth." Possibly the Dictionary of National Biography will have something to say of Harvey's achievements, but it is to be feared that difficulty will be found in procuring precise information. "Credite, posterii," is the motto chosen by the anonymous biographer, but sceptical people may suggest that Harvey is as imaginary a person as Peter Wilkins or Philip Quarll the Hermit.

THE RAILWAY DIVIDENDS.

THE railway dividend announcements so far have, speaking generally, fully realized the anticipations of the shareholders. The weekly traffic returns had shown considerable increases in the earnings all through the past half-year. And it was naturally inferred, therefore, that the dividends would be better. But, of course, it was not known what increase there might have been in the working expenses. And, further, it is notorious that the weekly traffic returns do not even pretend to be quite accurate. There was room, therefore, for some uncertainty as to the dividends. The announcements, upon the whole, are fully up to the general expectation. The Taff Vale and the Rhymney Companies pay the same dividends as at this time last year; and so does the South-Eastern Company, increased expenditure having absorbed the greater part of the increased earnings. Still, the South-Eastern carries forward 12,461*l.*, against only 2,872*l.* at the corresponding period last year. But the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Company, which was able to make no distribution for the first half of last year, now declares a dividend of 1½ per cent., and carries forward to the new half-year about the same amount as was carried forward twelve months ago. This is certainly a very gratifying increase in six months. Sir Edward Watkin, the chairman, indeed, is not satisfied. He thinks that the Company does not get its fair share of the traffic from such places as Grimsby, for example, where it has laid out very large sums in developing the fish trade, and yet the greater part of the proceeds are taken by the other Companies, his own Company having to be satisfied with a smaller proportion. But Sir Edward is a fighting chairman, and always has some grievance against his neighbours and competitors. In any event, the increase from no dividend at all for the first half of last year to a dividend now of 1½ per cent. ought to be very gratifying to the shareholders. The London and Brighton Company also makes a distribution 1½ per cent. higher than for the first half of last year, the rate now being 4¼ per cent., against 3 per cent. at this time last year. Perhaps even more remarkable is the increase of 1 per cent. in the case of the North-Eastern, the rate now being 6¼ per cent., against 5¼ per cent. twelve months ago. The London and South-Western pays ¾ per cent. more, 4½ per cent. against 3¾ per cent. The increase of the Midland dividend is likewise ¾ per cent., 5¼ per cent. against 4½ per cent. The dividend of the London and Chatham Preferred Stock is also ¾ per cent. higher, 3¼ against 2½ per cent. That of the Lancashire and Yorkshire is ½ per cent. higher, 4¼ per cent. against $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. So is the Great Northern dividend, $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. against 3 per cent. The Great Eastern dividend is $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., against $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. twelve months ago, being an increase of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.; and there is a similar increase in the Metropolitan Preferred dividend, 3 per cent. against $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. There are also gratifying increases in Irish railway dividends announced, so that the benefit of improved trade is being felt in all parts of the United Kingdom.

These satisfactory dividend announcements contributed materially to the extraordinary rise in home railway stocks which took place last week. Other causes, no doubt, were still more potent. For example, at the Fortnightly Settlement which ended on Friday night it was found that there was a scarcity of most of the stocks, the rates charged for continuing purchases for another fortnight having been exceptionally low. But perhaps the most potent influence upon the market was exercised by the decision of the Great Northern Directors to apply to the shareholders and to Parliament for authority to resume once more the division of the Ordinary Stock into Preferred and Deferred Ordinary Stocks, and the announcement of this decision had the greater effect because it is reported that several other boards of directors are inclined to take the same course. This speculative stimulus applied to the markets, however, was greatly aided by the satisfactory dividends announced, and by the steady and large increases in the earnings of the several Companies shown to be going on by the weekly traffic returns. Thus it appears from those returns that in the first three weeks of the new half-year there is an increase of as much as 220,000*l.*, compared with the corresponding period of last year, in the gross receipts of seventeen selected British and Irish Companies. As the crops all over the United Kingdom are better than they were last year, and as trade is still decidedly improving, it is not unreasonable to expect that the growth of railway receipts will continue all through the half-year. Therefore, speculators are looking forward to a still further advance in the prices of home railway stocks, especially as the supply of those stocks in the market is small. It appears to us, however, that speculators do not take sufficient account of the increase in the working expenses. Owing to the improvement in trade, the prices of fuel and materials are higher now than they were last year, and not improbably may advance still further. Wages, likewise, are tending upwards. It is quite true, of course, that the rise in wages and prices does not tell immediately upon railway working expenses, because the Companies' contracts for coal and materials are usually made for a considerable time ahead. And the wages of railway servants do not generally rise so rapidly as wages in the manufacturing trades. Still, as the old contracts expire new contracts will have to be entered into at much higher prices than the old, and there must likewise be an increase in the wages bills. The mere fact that more goods have to be moved and more passengers carried implies a larger consumption of fuel, greater wear and tear, and some addition to the working staff. Although, then, there may not be a very marked increase in the working expenses, even in the new half-year, there is very likely to be some increase, and, therefore, as great a proportion of the increased receipts is not likely to be net profit as in the half-year for which the dividends are now being declared.

There is one other circumstance to be taken into account—namely, the influence which the money market may exercise upon the course of trade. If the withdrawals of gold from the Bank of England continue for any length of time on the present scale, it is certain that there must be a very sharp rise in the rates of interest and discount before long. And if that rise does not stop the withdrawals, there may be a very anxious time before the half-year is at an end. No doubt the influences that are working for the improvement in trade are exceedingly powerful. They have prevailed over war scares, incessant political anxieties, a disturbed money market every now and then, and the like. And they may continue potent enough to neutralize any disturbance that may occur this autumn in the money market. Still, investors and speculators would do well to recollect that the improvement in trade has now continued for a longer time than any revival since the great fall in prices began. And for that reason alone a check is more probable than it was earlier in the improvement. But, unless the disturbance of the money market is more serious than we have reason now to anticipate, there are good grounds for hoping that the improvement in trade will go on, and that there will be a steady augmentation in railway earnings. The increase in the working expenses is hardly likely to be so great in the current half-year as to prevent a material addition to the dividends compared with those paid for the second half of last year. But while this is all true, it hardly justifies a further advance in the prices of home railway stocks. They are now higher than they have been in the lifetime of the present generation. Next year, even if the trade improvement continues in the most satisfactory manner, there must be a very material addition to the working expenses. And as time goes on the working expenses will so augment that little addition can be made to the dividends. As we have observed above, the increase in the working expenses will begin to make itself felt in the current half-year. In the past half-year it was felt by only a few Companies. Generally, the Companies had been working under contracts made when prices were lower, but in the current half-year most of the Companies will show augmented working expenses. The augmentation is hardly likely to be equal to the increase in the gross receipts, assuming that the disturbance in the money market is not more serious than we have any reason now for anticipating. Therefore the current half-year ought to be as satisfactory to railway shareholders as the half-year just passed. But that does not justify a further considerable rise in the prices of stocks. After all, investors should buy with regard to the average return of a number of years, not in expectation of a single good dividend. And when this year ends the increase in working expenses is likely to be very considerable. The division of stocks referred to above and speculative movements may drive up prices unreasonably, but we fail to see any ground that would justify to a cautious investor a much further advance.

THE WAIL OF THE PLAYWRIGHT.

THE leisure of August affords a convenient opportunity for referring to an article by Mr. H. A. Jones, recently published in the Nineteenth Century, on "The First Night Judgment of Plays." If the reader expects that an author of Mr. Jones's literary attainments and practical experience of the stage would not attack his subject had he not some valuable suggestions of reform to offer, he will be disappointed; for, after discoursing at some length, and not infrequently somewhat wide of the text on which he is supposing himself to preach, Mr. Jones frankly confesses that he has no alternative of his own to propose as against the existing state of affairs, and adds, somewhat vaguely, that "natural remedies are the best." Surely it is a case of "much cry and little wool" to occupy some fifteen closely-printed pages in arriving at no more practical result than that.

The paths by which Mr. Jones leads us to this conclusion, or rather lack of conclusion, have often been trodden before. We are reminded (as a matter of grave reproach) that "in no sense can the Victorian drama be said to bear any such relation to the Victorian literature and the Victorian age as the Elizabethan drama bears to the Elizabethan literature and the Elizabethan age"; but we are not reminded, in this connexion, that, owing to a variety of causes (chief among which were the dearness of printed books, the small number of the reading public, and the non-existence of a newspaper press), the stage of three hundred years ago was the one medium by which a thinker and writer could readily put himself in communication with his fellow-men, and that the dramatist held, practically without a rival, the field which he is now compelled to dispute with the writers of books, journals, and magazines innumerable. Again, in reminding us that, "when the great masters of our modern literature have written plays they have only shown that they do not know the stage," our mentor ignores the fact that the stage of to-day is a complicated affair, differing from its Elizabethan prototype much as a modern ironclad differs from the vessels of Drake and Frobisher. Without for a moment undervaluing the vanquishers of the Armada, it may be conceded that they were ignorant of much that it behoves every commander of a modern warship to know; and similarly the ingenious mechanism of the modern stage imposes on the dramatist of to-day conditions of technical knowledge by which his predecessors were unfettered, and which can hardly be fulfilled save by a more exclusive attention to theatrical technique than "the great masters of our modern literature" can be expected to bestow. With the two rules which Mr. Jones lays down for the guidance of the modern playwright we have no fault to find. He tells us that—

1. The public is his judge.
2. The public must not be bored.

But when he begins to enlarge on these texts we soon feel compelled to join issue with him. On the question whether, the public being judge, as aforesaid, it is possible to educate the public taste to higher and better things, he can find no better argument than that education is possible, because it is only by education that the patrons of modern burlesque can arrive at the full enjoyment of that debased style of entertainment. But surely an education which consists of denying oneself "the contemplation of all heroic actions and personages in history, in fiction, and in surrounding modern life," of severely abstaining "from all acquaintance with the graces of English literature," of surrendering "pleasant leisure" to haunt bar-rooms, and the like, can only, by perversion of terms and jugglery of language, be described as "education." Education is a process of cultivation; what Mr. Jones describes is letting the mind lie fallow. When he talks of the public being "trained to delight in nonsense, in imbecility, in bunkum, in claptrap, in sensation, in all sorts of passing extravagance and emptiness," he is merely enumerating and calling by rather hard names the kinds of entertainment to which the mind is first attracted in childhood, and to which the οἱ πολλοί, if the bonds of education are relaxed, will ever be ready to renew their allegiance without any training whatever. We should have thought it easy to prove, and that not by roundabout and negative evidence, which is no evidence at all, that the education of a theatre-going public was possible. Do we in London forget how much we owe to the successive visits of foreign actors—we do not now speak of individual "stars," however distinguished, but those companies from France, Germany, and Holland which showed us our deficiencies in the matter of that completeness which is more exactly expressed by the word "ensemble" than by any phrase of native growth?

From the first visit of the Comédie Française to the Opéra

Comique, in 1871, we learned that a perfect performance depends quite as much on the playing of the small parts as on that of the great; by the Saxe-Meiningen Company at Drury Lane, and by the Dutch Company, our eyes were opened to the capabilities of a stage-crowd. The praises justly bestowed by our press and public on these foreign artists were not without their effect on our own theatres and their directors, who can hardly have felt flattered by the comparisons freely made between the existing state of things among us and the work of our visitors. Here was a distinct education of the public to demand higher work, and a response on the part of the English stage, of which we enjoy the benefit to this day.

When Mr. Jones comes to discuss his second rule—that the public must not be bored—which he does at considerable length, we fail to find any very valuable fresh light thrown upon the subject. Mr. Sneer, in the Critic, says (when he speaks the words of Sheridan, which he rarely does upon the stage nowadays) that “Now, he is sorry to say it, people seem to go there [i.e. to the theatre] principally for their entertainment.” This complaint Mr. Jones solemnly echoes; and, moreover, proceeds to treat us to another familiar argument—to wit, the appeal ad misericordiam, on the ground of the ephemeral nature of all stage-work.

We are reminded, by no means for the first time, that whereas the condemned picture remains in existence, perhaps to find an appreciative purchaser hereafter, and the condemned book may perchance find readers—the critic’s ill word notwithstanding—the condemned play is consigned out of hand to absolute oblivion. Mr. Jones, therefore, pleads in the matter of first-night criticism for “suspension of judgment.” How he proposes that his panacea shall practically work he fails to say—indeed, practical suggestions do not form any part of his article; but we can only suppose that, instead of condemning any new play, either by Mr. Jones or any other author, the audience should file out of the theatre in thoughtful silence, determined to take an early opportunity of consulting the views of those who might witness the play on some other occasion, or, better still, to arrive at a perfectly dispassionate point of view by a second visit and a second payment at the doors; it is but natural that such a “suspension of judgment” should recommend itself to a dramatic author; but whether, considering the number of our London theatres, it will appear equally satisfactory to the playgoer, and, still more, to the critic, is another matter. There are many plays—we will imitate Mr. Jones’s forbearance, and mention no names—which it is a severe tax on the patience to have sat through once; to ask that one should repeat the dose to make sure that one was right in being thoroughly (or even partially) bored and disgusted on the former occasion is, as Mr. Sam Weller has it, “rayther too rich.” In the fact that audiences seldom openly hiss a piece except on a first night Mr. Jones appears to see evidence that what offends a “first-nighter” is not offensive to an ordinary playgoer. We should, however, prefer as explanation the fact that whatever may have provoked a hiss on a first night is generally removed before the play is again presented to an audience; and as regards the statement that there is no hissing on the second night of a failure, Mr. Jones must be fully aware that on such mournful occasions the audience consists chiefly of “paper”—of those, that is, provided by the management with free admissions, that the empty boxes may not make too manifest to the eye the extent of the failure; and that from those in the receipt of such favours the brutal frankness of a hiss can scarcely, whatever their candid opinions, be expected. The spectacle of a mature labourer in this workaday world pleading for suspension of judgment, for forbearance, allowance, and indulgence is not a particularly pleasant one; the prizes of dramatic authorship are so rich that those who aspire to them must be content to take the rough with the smooth. How many workers are there in other literary fields hungering for that prompt recognition of their work, be it for good or ill, which Mr. Jones is anxious to barter for “suspension of judgment”? Give the dramatic author that suspension, and he will promptly begin to grumble, and look back with regret to the “good old times” when the morning after the production of his play each daily paper devoted a column or more to its analysis; and who is to decide how long judgment shall remain in suspense? Are there not many plays—again will we follow Mr. Jones’s lead and refrain from quoting examples—which, without the opportune advertisement afforded by immediate recognition both by press and public, would never have survived to face any criticism whatever?

THE SENOUSSIA.

SOME months ago the newspapers had frequent reports that our old enemies the Mahdists, or so-called Dervishes, were in their turn invaded on the west by the followers of Es-Senoussia, and it was even rumoured that Khartoum had fallen into their hands. It was curious to observe that these reports were received with a certain satisfaction, as if the Anglo-Egyptian Government were likely to find a more conciliatory neighbour in the Senoussia than in the Mahdists. But this satisfaction—and it was openly expressed—was part and parcel of the popular misconception in which the real position of the great Mohammedan order of North-East Africa is involved. We have observed more than one suggestion crop up that the Senoussia and the Mahdists are somehow rolling a united tide of invasion down the Nile. Nothing could have less foundation. The exact origin of the fighting in Darfour and Kordofan between the Mahdists and the so-called Senoussia is unknown. It was probably nothing more than a raid by the warlike tribes of Wadai and Ennedi, who are certainly tinctured with the new doctrine. But the order itself did not fly to arms; there would have been a considerable stir over all North-East Africa if it had. The Senoussia, if it is ever destined to do so, which is problematical, has not yet replaced the Mahdists of Khartoum, the followers of the Khalifa Abdullah, who succeeded Gordon’s opponent, and carry on his propaganda. Nor has it amalgamated with the Mahdists. Two antagonistic revelations could not easily come together, and the rival Prophets could not yield an inch to each other without losing their followers. The Senoussia, on the contrary—at least its central organization—has remained inactive; and this quiescence justifies the anticipations of those who look upon it as destined to pass into a purely mystical brotherhood, instead of taking its place in history as a fighting movement. There is, of course, the other hypothesis, that Es-Senoussi may be playing a waiting game. But the fate of previous movements, to which the Senoussia revival is so closely akin, rather indicates its gradual absorption in Mohammedan mysticism.

The available information about the Senoussia comes chiefly from French sources, and is to be found in the notices of General Ducrot, M. Ricard, and M. Henri Duveyrier. Most of the material was thrown together by this last writer in an article in 1884, published in the proceedings of the Société de Géographie, which, however, was somewhat exaggerated and sensational in tone. But M. Duveyrier made the connexion of Es-Senoussi’s doctrines with the principles of existing Mohammedan associations in North Africa quite clear. The founder of the order, moreover, as might be expected, came under the influence of the Wahabees early in life. Originally an Algerian law-student, Sidi Mohammed Ben Ali Es-Senoussi met with little success when he first appeared in Mecca as a religious teacher. Nor do his doctrines ever appear to have made much way in the Arabian Peninsula. In North Africa it was different. The soil which had already been stirred by kindred teachings was ready for the seed. Es-Senoussi’s missionaries have carried it further afield; and it is notable that it has been most eagerly received in the regions round Lake Tchad and near Senegal—that is, where there is mixed Arab and negro blood. Es-Senoussi’s vocation was to recall believers to the true faith of the Koran, and to denounce trafficking with the infidels. The commentaries which had overgrown the sacred revelation were torn away, and the reverence for shrines and dead saints forbidden. Holy men in their lifetime might be venerated; for the breath of the Deity is in them, and Es-Senoussi himself insisted to the full upon reverence, veiling his face whenever he went abroad (like the Prophet in Lalla Rookh) to conceal its brightness. His followers, who grew rapidly in number, were united by a particular arrangement of prayers or religious exercises revealed after a due period of initiation. Strict asceticism was enforced upon them. Tea and coffee are forbidden to the devout Senoussite, and also sugar, inasmuch as it is prepared with the bones of animals slain by infidels. A simple dress is insisted upon; gold, silver, and precious stones may only be used to adorn the hilt of the sword which is consecrated to the Holy War. Intercourse with Christian or Jew is likewise prohibited, and in general every art is employed to excite the fervour of the confraternity and to ensure unquestioning obedience to its heads.

With regard to the military and political importance of the sect it is difficult to form a conclusion. No doubt Es-Senoussi, between the years 1850 to 1880, showed marvellous powers of organization. A great number of Mohammedan societies in North Africa were won over to his teaching; and an elaborate network of communications and rest-houses between the different centres have been established. The chief monastery, and seat of Es-Senoussi himself, is in the El-Jer-hajib Oasis, between Tripoli and Egypt, close to a deserted port, where it is said that munitions of war have been landed. Routes leading from this into the Sahara and south to Wadai, which is the real stronghold of the movement, undoubtedly exist. But the Jer-hajib establishment itself has been very much exaggerated by M. Duveyrier; and the arsenals which Senoussia is supposed to control are probably the result of imagination. An estimate of Es-Senoussi’s adherents is, of course, very much a matter of conjecture. It has been put at three millions. But the disciples are certainly scattered; and, in spite of the network of communications, it is doubtful whether the Senoussia could put a large force in motion. The real interest of the movement, however, lies in its relations to the Soudan and to the expected advent of a Messiah or Mahdi in the Mohammedan world. Before his death Es-Senoussi designated his son and successor, Sidi-Mohammed El-Mahdi (also known as Es-Senoussi, like his father), as the renovator of Islam, who was to appear, according to old prophecies, at the Mohurram of the Christian year 1882. The confraternity have acknowledged the sacred calling of their new head, and await his triumph. But Sidi-Mohammed has done nothing yet to vindicate his claims; and meanwhile the Mahdi of Khartoum took advantage of the same prophecy and the unrest it created in men’s minds, after a more striking fashion. Naturally these rival claims admit no reconciliation. The known hostility of the Senoussia to the Mahdi is also fortified by the secular hostility between the tribes of the Sahara and the Soudanese. Hence the report that the Senoussia was attacking the rival revelation in flank. The raids into the Western Soudan may have been favoured by Es-Senoussi, and the invaders may well have been prompted by the double motives of plunder and religion. But it is quite certain that the Messiah himself has not quitted his oasis and led out the faithful to a Holy War. He may yet do so. But it is more probable that the corruption of riches and the corruption of mysticism will abate the lofty pretensions of the original founder.

GEORGE CLERK.

IN the obituary of the Times of the 27th ult. there appeared a notice of the various appointments held by the eminent man whose name we have placed at the head of this paper. The functions which he had discharged in India, at the Cape, and in England, were correctly enumerated, and readers were duly reminded that Sir George Clerk, K.C.B. and G.C.S.I., had been Political Agent "on the Bengal Frontier," wherever that particular spot may have been in the writer's eye; that he had twice filled the office of Governor of Bombay; that he was employed to settle a troublesome boundary question at the Cape of Good Hope; and that he was Permanent Under-Secretary at the India Board, and a member of the Indian Council of the Secretary of State from 1863 to 1876. We think that to one of the foremost of Anglo-Indian politicals a little more space should be given than is usually accorded to the mayor of a commercial town in the North of England, to a successful colonist who has found a rich lode of nuggets or "fleece a thousand flocks," or even to the experiences of an English politician of the second rank, who after fighting seven contested elections for his party, has been properly rewarded with a peerage.

George Clerk, to go by Anglo-Indian chronology, was born in 1800, a year after the capture of Seringapatam and two years before Assaye and Argaum, and he died in the Administration of Lord Lansdowne, at his residence in Elm Park Gardens. His arrival in India in 1818 was coincident with the final subjugation of the Mahrattas and the dispersion of those pests the Pindary raiders. Almost from the first, George Clerk was exclusively employed in what is known as the political or diplomatic line. He studied native princes, penetrated their intrigues, and became thoroughly conversant with their good and their bad qualities, at Nagpore and at the Courts of the Rajput chiefs—Jaipore, Kotah, Boondi, and other feudatories of the highest rank and the most unblemished lineage. But his real work was done and his finest qualities were displayed in the management of difficult and delicate negotiations with the Sikh Government of Lahore, at a time when a single false step or a failure to grasp the situation might have turned what was a terrible, though a temporary, disaster into a lasting and irretrievable disgrace. Let us briefly recapitulate the main points of the first Afghan campaign, about the year 1841-2. A British force had been annihilated in the Khord Kabul Pass. Sale, with his "illustrious garrison," was holding the Fort of Jellalabad, like a rock in a tempestuous ocean. The authorities at Calcutta were paralysed and impotent. Englishmen and natives were looking at our miserable inaction with incredulity and amazement. At the other end of the Empire we were very nearly involved in a premature war with the King of Ava. It was gravely proposed by the highest officials that reinforcements should be sent from India, not, indeed, for the purpose of planting the British ensign on the Bala Hissar, but for the limited object of rescuing Sale and his brigade, and to facilitate the retreat of the supposed survivors of the Kabul force. It was actually thought by the Governor-General and by the Commander-in-Chief that these ends could be attained by the despatch of one brigade, with some artillerymen who had no guns, and who were instructed to beg the loan of half a dozen field-pieces from General Avitabile, the Sikh Governor-General at Peshawar. Fortunately at Amballa there was a man who shrank from no responsibility, who, by quick political instinct, took in the whole situation, and who had established over the minds of Sikh feudatories and the independent Lahore Durbar that mysterious and magical ascendancy which we are accustomed to term prestige. George Clerk, without waiting for orders, at once moved additional forces to the frontier, brigade after brigade, ordered their commander to hurry through the Punjab and to assemble at Peshawar, and extorted a reluctant approval of his action from Lord Auckland and Sir Jasper Nicolls. To ensure the hearty co-operation of the Durbar, George Clerk himself proceeded to Lahore. We have no space for details. The Sikh forces were unruly, and were already contemplating that trial of strength with the British army which was only deferred for four years. The Sikh chiefs, Hira Sing, Dhyan Sing, Sher Sing, Fakir Azizzuddin, all destined subsequently to play prominent parts in war or politics, had to be conciliated and encouraged. It was Clerk's aim, says the historian of the war with truth, to obtain the effectual co-operation of the Sikh Government in the hour of trial, without exposing the weakness and vacillation of his own. That all obstacles were finally overcome; that a rupture with the Sikh Durbar was avoided; that the repugnance of the Sikh troops to enter the terrible Khaibar Pass was conquered; that carriage and commissariat did not fail; and that Sir George Pollock was enabled to relieve Sale "with little loss of life and no loss of baggage"; and, finally, to restore British credit by the recapture of Kabul, is due, no doubt, to the bravery of the troops and to the skill of their captain, but also in the first instance to the tact, firmness, and powers of conciliation of the Agent and Envoy, George Russell Clerk. And it is an additional merit that Clerk at that crisis discovered the capacity and character of Henry Lawrence, and brought him to the front. It might be said with some slight exaggeration, as the French critic said of Homer in relation to Virgil, "C'est là son plus bel ouvrage." It is necessary to lay stress on Clerk's remarkable insight into character and his power of ensuring the obedience of Englishmen and Asiatics, because these are just the qualities which soonest pass out of sight and remembrance. Like the magic tones and the delivery of a great orator, they are remembered for a time by his contemporaries, and soon become dim and forgotten. George Clerk was never employed in any of those permanent and solid works of reconstruction and development which for generations have made the names of Englishmen household words to millions of Asiatics. He had no revenue training whatever and never, we believe, framed and carried out a Settlement of the land. No backward province, conquered or ceded, was ever handed over to him, to be reduced into order or deceived gradually into wealth or prosperity. He was never called on to promote the education of the masses or the classes, to put down cruel rites, to create a sense of ownership in the tenant-proprietor, to frame simple and intelligible codes, and to establish tribunals not too complicated and refined for the people. Other Anglo-Indians of eminence have occasionally failed with Englishmen when they have been successful with natives, or vice versa. It was George Clerk's distinction to have succeeded with both. He stimulated, controlled, and guided his English subordinates; he roused his superiors to action; and he impressed the Oriental by the chivalry and courtesy of his manner and the magic of his voice. When we have said that his main work lay in the successful exercise of diplomatic functions, of which the subtlety escapes the touch of posterity, we do not forget that for years after he had ceased to have any connexion with Loodiana or Amballa those who followed him in the actual work of judicial and revenue administration were often appealed to by native suitors and applicants of all sorts in Clerk's name. Practically Jarge Clârük to many natives on the banks of the Sutlej filled a place which a few years afterwards, in the reconstruction of society and social order and in the same neighbourhood, was filled by Jân Larruns. Like another celebrated diplomatist, he deserved the title of a Great Elchi. Never in the annals of Anglo-Indian diplomacy were the demands of English statesmanship set forth with greater powers of persuasion or enforced with more dignity of language and demeanour. Scott tells us in Kenilworth that Elizabeth, when bidding Leicester and Sussex to forget their idle animosities, so accented her words that the entreaty to the one sounded like a command and the command to the other like an entreaty. Something similar must have been the effect of Clerk's conferences with the Lahore Durbar. In his first administration of the Governorship of Bombay, Clerk had to contend with the opposition of two rather strong colleagues, who, in all honesty and sincerity of purpose, differed from their chief on divers important questions. And it may cause some regret to the supporters of cram and competition to be told that at Haileybury George Clerk achieved no distinction whatever. He gained no medal, nor on the prize-day when the Directors went down in all solemnity to the East India College, did he walk off burdened with the weight of Burke's Speeches or Clarendon's History, stamped with auspicio regis et Senatûs Angliæ, in letters all of gold. It is fair, however, to say that this distinction of having risen to real eminence in India, after having been nearly last on the pass-list at the final examination at Haileybury, is one which, as far as we recollect at present, was achieved only by George Clerk and by the late Sir Ashley Eden. But so it is that natural selection, or in other words patronage, does occasionally catch statesmen unawares. We trust that the present system may not fail to give us in the future men who can show that, under Providence, events are often just what force of individual character can make them. The vigour, the sound judgment, the undaunted bearing, and the fertility of resource which marked the conduct of the Governor-General's Agent on the frontier, redeem our policy of that time from a "policy of infatuation." He could not expunge from the record the political and strategical errors of the first Afghan campaign. But he deserves a high and honourable place in the memory of all Englishmen who can fully appreciate the nature of our difficulties after the Kabul disaster, and the singular combination of splendid qualities by which that disaster was repaired.

TWO STUDENTS' CONCERTS.

THE unusually lengthy musical season has ended with two interesting concerts given by the two most important of the many institutions devoted to musical education. At the Royal College of Music at Kensington the weekly concerts given during the past year by the students over whom Sir George Grove presides, though they have often presented features of considerable interest, have been passed by in silence, for it can hardly be the intention or desire of either the Council or the Professors of the College that public notice should be taken of the performances of pupils, who, however promising they may be, must yet be considered immature as artists. With the orchestral concert given on the 24th of last month the case is somewhat different, for, though the programme did not present any features of absolute novelty, yet the selection of music was so ambitious, and the performances, on the whole, so good, that the event deserves a brief record in the musical annals of the year. The College orchestra, which took part in every number of the programme, is evidently the strongest feature of the institution; though it does not entirely rely upon the pupils to fill every desk, yet it is satisfactory to note that there is scarcely any instrument which is not played by at least one pupil, and the proportion of professorial assistance required to obtain the proper balance is very small. It would not be right to expect from a body of players including so many youthful performers either the tone or finish of a more mature assemblage, but what is lacking in this respect is supplied by the enthusiasm and energy which inspire the whole band. The purely orchestral selections at the concert on the 24th consisted of such arduous works as Spontini's Overture to Olympia, Brahms's first Piano-forte Concerto, St. Saëns's Poème Symphonique, Phaeton, the Charfreitagszauber, from Wagner's Parsifal, and Dvořák's Symphonic Variations; while the remainder of the programme was made up with an aria, "Va sbramando quegli ardori," from Spohr's Faust, and "Deh vieni," from Mozart's Nozze di Figaro. Such a selection of difficult works would be enough to task the powers of an experienced orchestra; but, all things considered, the College pupils left very little to be desired, and their performances reflected great credit upon themselves, their teachers, and Professor Stanford, their conductor. Whether the selection was altogether a wise one may be open to question; but at least one number was very welcome. Spontini's music is so strangely neglected in these days that the performance of his fine overture to Olympia had almost the effect of a novelty. It is perhaps too much to hope that the whole opera should be revived; but the impression created by the overture was such that it might be worth the consideration of the College authorities as to whether it would not be well to perform a longer selection from the works of this fine but neglected composer. The solo part in Brahms's Concerto was played with much ability by Miss Ethel Sharpe; but the work is not one of the Viennese master's most inspired efforts, and though it contains many beauties, it is, on the whole, thankless to both soloist and orchestra. Miss Mary Richardson's refined and expressive singing of Mozart's Scena deserves a word of commendation. Her voice is hardly yet fully developed; but she promises to be one of the best vocalists which the College has hitherto produced. Mr. Magrath was hardly so satisfactory in the Air from Faust; but Spohr's vocal music is little suited to modern singers.

The Concert given by the students of the Royal Academy of Music on Friday, the 26th, depended less upon the orchestral performances for its interest than that given at the Royal College. Both band and chorus included a considerable number of professional members; but it must be remembered that it is only recently that, under Dr. Mackenzie's rule, attention has been sufficiently paid at the Academy to the importance of orchestral playing, and that probably more difficulty has been experienced in getting together a sufficient number of pupil performers than at the College. The programme included one interesting novelty—namely, the hymn "In seiner Ordnung schafft der Herr," which Weber wrote in 1812 for the Zürich Musik-Gesellschaft, and which, though first produced at Leipzig in 1813, had not been previously heard in this country. Though it is an early work of the composer's, and written before his style was fully developed, it deserves to be heard more frequently, if it were only for the fine concluding chorus, which contains an admirably written fugue, worked up to a splendid climax. This number alone should rescue the Cantata from oblivion: it reveals quite a new side of Weber's genius. The spirit of transition which is affecting the Academy was exemplified in the three compositions by students which were performed at this concert. Two of them—a Romance for Orchestra, by Mr. E. C. Nunn, and an Andante, from a MS. Symphony by Mr. R. Steggall—were cast in a somewhat dry and scholastic mould, and, though well enough written, did not betray much originality of idea or treatment. The third—a Ballad for Orchestra, entitled "The Spirit of the Glen," the composition of Mr. Drysdale, showed fancy and a certain amount of feeling for picturesque orchestration, though much that was good in the work was marred by the composer's diffuseness and inability to develop his themes at length. Of the three works the last was by far the most promising; but Mr. Drysdale has much to learn before he should venture upon the difficult path of programme-music. Of the pianists, of whom no less than four appeared, the most promising was Miss Kate Goodson, who played Liszt's E flat Concerto extremely well. Her touch is at present not very powerful, but this is a defect which time will probably remedy; the accuracy and good style of her playing were deserving of much praise. The best of the vocal performances was that of Mr. David Hughes, who, in a recitative and air—"The Fiend of Darkness"—from Spohr's Faust, showed that he possesses a baritone voice of much beauty; his singing was careful and intelligent. Miss Emily Squire, who holds the Parepa-Rosa scholarship, was formerly a pupil at the Royal College of Music. From her performance of Rossini's antiquated "Di tanti palpiti" it is difficult to pronounce a definite opinion as to her powers. Her voice appears to be unsettled, and it is doubtful whether it is a contralto or a soprano. The higher notes in it are the most agreeable, but her compass is evidently very extensive, and her voice demands very careful treatment. The other performances do not call for detailed notice, though in passing a protest may be raised against the manner in which Miss Mears has been taught to sing the hackneyed "Tre Giorni," ascribed to Pergolesi. Almost every singing-master, without exception, treats this well-known song as if it were most tragic in sentiment, though, as a matter of fact, it is a characteristic example of the eighteenth-century buffo aria.

COSMOPOLITAN COOKERY.

IT is announced upon authority that the German Emperor has consented to patronize an exhibition of "Food and Comestible Delicacies" at Berlin next year. If it be designed to repeat the spectacle with which we are familiar—pyramids of phials hermetically sealed, "trophies" of tin cases and corked bottles—that stupid mystification has ceased to divert. Or if the projectors meditate a congress of cooks who shall display to the uninitiated those higher realms of art which few but stockbrokers and their dames habitually visit, though the notion be pleasing, we must declare that Berlin is not its natural habitat. It may be hoped, however, that an enterprise sanctioned by the Kaiser has a more original motif. In every quarter of the world a traveller finds dishes strange to him, which have been perfected probably by the thoughtful care and experience of generations; and in every quarter of the world nowadays the Teuton is established. A British exile, so far as we have observed, commonly approves the best items of the native cuisine; but, excepting curries, he does not use them freely—much less does he introduce them at his table when restored to civilization. The German seems to be more "receptive" in this as in other matters. It seems possible that the great number of traders and travellers now returning to the Fatherland may have excited curiosity by their reports of abnormal food. We hope it may prove to be so.

For there are many strange meats, and more strange ways of cooking meats familiar, which well deserve to be known in Europe. Europe itself, indeed, can supply certain local dishes as odd in flavour and as delicious—to those who like them—as any to be found in Asia or Africa. Above all stands the national dish of the Magyar, unless it be, as Croats declare, the national dish of the Serb—paprika hühn. This is one of the very few, among so many that have struck us in a roving life, of which we secured the recipe. Since the reader would look for it in vain among English or North-German cookery-books, we transcribe the directions:—"Cut two onions fine. Put them into a saucepan with the same quantity of lard, and turn on the fire till they become yellow. Add a teaspoonful of paprika (red pepper) and three teaspoonsful of flour. Cut two fowls into quarters. Put them into the saucepan, with the livers and the trail. Salt. Cover the whole with cream. Close the saucepan tight, and let it simmer till the fowls be done." Not more difficult than that!—but we undertake to say, upon the testimony of many friends, that those to whom the quaint and delicate flavour is agreeable will be enthusiastic in their gratitude. Any red pepper will do, but the Viennese or Pesth manufacture is far best. Another impressive dish of Europe—so impressive and so warmly appreciated generally at first that strangers grow to hate it in a short time—is the Russian manner of cooking sterlet—very good indeed, however, as we can avouch, when applied to the British eel. They have a way of cooking beefsteaks in Roumania, with a singular arrangement of potatoes and raw cabbage sliced, which recurs to our memory with longing. But as for eccentric modes of treating a steak, the Peruvian is quite the best within our knowledge—a stew with chopped eggs; unhappily we have no further information, but a good many of our readers could supply detail, no doubt. They would confer a boon upon the public. Of Turkish eccentricities it is useless to speak. The secret of a pilaff, and of kabobs, saloop, and the rest is given in all cookery-books accurately enough; and yet who would recognize in the happiest of these imitations the delicious meat he has eaten with a Turkish friend? It was our habit, when we visited the Bezestan, to dine in some merchant's stall on provisions from the cookshop at the corner. Endlessly interesting was the menu, if we were able to give notice, and endlessly nasty for the most part under any circumstances. But the pilaff and the kabobs never failed to please, though our companions might be the sturdiest of British tourists. Only once have we enjoyed the pleasure of dining in an unceremonious way—of taking real "pot-luck"—with a Turkish gentleman who keeps the good old-fashioned usages; he may be gratefully named without indiscretion, Artin Effendi, then and now Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. It was an entertainment to remember for the variety and excellence of its odd dishes. In particular the stew-soup—composed of fish and flesh, and fowl, fruit, vegetables, corn, and currants, which is exchanged every year among friendly households on a certain day, in commemoration of Noah's first meal after leaving the Ark—was no hotch-potch, as it is elsewhere, but a careful and judicious combination. Some travellers maintain that kabobs and pilaff are so good in their native home simply because the Turkish cook never washes his utensils. They are quite mistaken; but we feel no doubt that some merits of the Spanish-American cuisine must be attributed to this cause. For example, the frijolés. Of all human food dry beans are most tasteless; and mere lard makes no improvement in particular. But in a cottage of Central America—the poorer the better—or in an “hotel,” as hotels went in our day, they are a local equivalent for game, delicious eating. “Pepper-pot,” as everybody is aware, avowedly owes its piquancy to the fact that the vessel has been used for the same purpose for many years—say twenty, to begin with; under that sum the article is not regarded seriously. In the great old times of the West Indies men boasted the age of their pepper-pot as warmly as the age of their Madeira; in a rough way they calculated its value as increasing one pound per annum, and trade was brisk at the price. The basis of this perennial dish, which occupies the place of curry in the Western Tropics, is kassareep, or casaripe. It may be hoped that the Berlin Exhibition will be the means of introducing kassareep to European commerce. It is seldom to be found in London—indeed only, so far as we can learn, at the shop in Leicester Square.

The staple food of West Africa is snails and kanki, upon neither of which is it advisable to dwell; be it observed in passing that the snails are as large as a man's fist, with an enormous “wing,” so to speak, on either side, larger than a sparrow's. But West Africa can boast two plats, which those who have eaten them, with conscience and judgment, cannot forget. These are “land-turtles” and “Anamaboo rice.” The former must needs remain local, perhaps, for the present at any rate; an abiding puzzle for those who still think that all is arranged for the best in the best of all possible worlds. How reconcile with this theory the fact that one of the dearest and sweetest little creatures that can be offered to the cook is limited to a barbarous realm where cooks scarcely exist? But, “Anamaboo rice” might be concocted, unless we were misinformed, wherever the small yellow tomato, somewhat less than a thistle's egg, is grown. The whole delightful mystery is contained in the manipulation of these little things, together with a fowl, an onion, rice—and seasoning, but such manipulation as produces a result quite unique. Elsewhere in Africa little occurs to us worth mention. The spatch-cock of quails or pigeons which some dragomen serve upon the Nile is understood to be a Greek dish—of the islands, doubtless, for we never found anything to resemble it on the mainland. Of all countries bordering the Mediterranean there is none so stupidly, hopelessly tasteless in its cuisine as the Hellenic kingdom, though original enough. This spatch-cock is one of the most pleasing breakfast-dishes extant, and happily we can give directions. Split the birds, and fry them brown. Put into a saucepan equal quantities of claret and water, a teaspoonful of Harvey Sauce, a tomato if possible, garlic, a small bag of spices. Let it simmer ten minutes. Drop in the birds, and stew slightly. The Boers have a dainty which should be named, by way of warning, the fricadel; they have also a curious made-sauce, of red-pepper and tomatoes, we imagine, so very good, in those few houses where cooking is regarded, that it might well be introduced to Europe.

All things Indian are so familiar that it is not worth while to speak of them; but in a comprehensive survey of human tastes the liking for assafoetida should not be disregarded. Through the Punjab and Afghanistan it occupies the place which garlic holds in Southern Europe, and its service in this capacity has been, for at least a century, known to some London gourmets in connexion with steak. In the deserts of North America, also, assafoetida grows wild, and the neighbouring population use it freely. Not every one, however, is acquainted with the dishes of the Far East. Those who wander off the beaten track there will very soon be introduced to novelties. Within a few hours, probably, they may make acquaintance with “Country Captain” in one of its local forms, which are varied. We can give a single recipe—not the best, unhappily, but distinct and agreeable. Steep the joints of a fowl in vinegar, salt, cayenne, and minced shallot for an hour. In half a pint of water, hot, mix half a pint of flour. Stir till quite smooth. Add two ounces of butter and the whites of two eggs well beaten. Roll the joints of your fowl in this batter, and fry in lard or oil till brown. In the most delicious variety, curry is mingled with the batter, but this addition seems to be a more difficult process than would be supposed. To speak of Malay curry, that daintiest and most fascinating species of the whole genus, is sheer waste of time, and an irritation to the flesh. The late Duke of Northumberland fruited the mangosteen and the cocoa-nut, but we undertake to say that if he tried to serve a Malay curry he failed. It seems to be beyond the scope of art in Europe to reproduce the daily fare of the poorest Orang Laut. But there are adjuncts which we might enjoy. Many people dislike turtles' eggs, but so many others think them delicious, that it is little less than inhuman to throw them away, as is the practice in the City. Among sambals, also, the special pride of a Far Eastern cook, the very best might be forwarded to Europe, with some extra care in the preparation. This is the russet, a fish like whitebait, preserved in salt-water; one of the most delicate flavours within the range of culinary science.

We pause—not for want of matter. Any reader who can supply directions for preparing these strange meats will act the part of a philanthropist in making his knowledge public—especially in the instance of “Anamaboo rice.”

REVIEWS.

EARLY LETTERS OF JANE WELSH CARLYLE.*

MR. RITCHIE'S reasons for adding to the already great and steadily growing mass of “Carlyle” books are sound. He possessed valuable evidence, and he hints that so much had been already published about the private life “of the valued marriage pair Carlyle,” and it has been of such a character that there would in any case be a kind of affectation in complaining of indiscretion now. But Mr. Ritchie has a better excuse than this negative one. He has been the more inclined to publish these letters because of “the pleasing light in which, on the whole, they show both Carlyle and his wife.” It is a kindly motive, and one which we are perhaps not uncharitable in supposing was not the most influential with some other contributors to the long shelf of materials for Carlyle's biography already filled and in process of growth. For the manner in which Mr. Ritchie has executed his pious task there can be nothing but praise. Whatever elucidations and explanations were required have been supplied, even down to reproductions of seals. These last are, indeed, evidence in themselves; for it throws some light on Mrs. Carlyle's tastes in her youth that she should have engraved “Faithful” and “L'Amista” on her seals. Then, too, there is an excellent index and a table of contents, in which will be found a neat précis of each letter. On these Carlyle would certainly have looked with a friendly eye.

The letters themselves will not greatly surprise, we should think, the wiser among the readers of Mr. Froude or the Letters and Memorials. They show, indeed, that Mrs. Carlyle was by no means the bitterly unhappy woman we were asked to believe her. Although these letters are called “early,” some two-thirds of them were written after her marriage, and the last of them just before her death. If Mrs. Carlyle had been the very unhappy woman she was tempted to call herself in a moment of nerves and irritation, some evidence of her misery would appear in these pages. Miss Eliza Stodart, to whom the letters were nearly all written, was obviously a most trusted friend; and, though the correspondence died down after the Carlyles came to London, it never quite ceased, and at the very end it even burnt up again. From the whole correspondence, however, it does not appear that Mrs. Carlyle had to complain of more than many thousands of wives who are not thought unhappy. She had an impatient spirit and a sharp wit. She lashed out fiercely at the obtuseness of the stupid sex, as every woman does who is worth her salt—with this difference, that nature has happily not supplied the vast majority with quite such effective claws as Mrs. Carlyle's. It will be no surprise to anybody to find that Mrs. Carlyle appears in this volume, as elsewhere, to have been a very clever woman. The soft and low voice which is such an excellent thing in her sex she had not; but neither was she shrill. Hardness is the note of these letters from first to last. To a large extent it was national; for the Scotch, to whom she belonged, have been taught by an education many centuries long to be tough and to keep their emotions in strict order, and Mrs. Carlyle was intensely Scotch of the Lowland type. Hard sense and the inclination to think that all men and women are more likely to act on a small or a bad motive than not, a keen eye for pretence, the love of thrift, the hatred of meanness, came to her with her blood. She had the old Scotch habit of outspoken speech, and could be as “indelicate” as those amazingly down-right Edinburgh ladies of the eighteenth-century type. But there was a very strongly-marked character of her own in Mrs. Carlyle. Many young Scotch ladies had her shrewdness and her pluck, but very few can have shared her intellectual boldness. There cannot have been many young ladies in the Lothians about 1820 who read Rousseau and rejoiced in the Nouvelle Héloïse with her audacity—for the taste was an audacious one in the provincial Scotland of those days. One gathers that Dr. Welsh must, in the course of the instruction he gave his daughter, have largely justified an old prejudice touching the heterodoxy of medical gentlemen, and his teaching fell on favourable soil. There is not a word in these letters to show that Mrs. Carlyle was brought up in a world which was religious in a very exacting fashion. Yet, and it is a proof of the natural strength of her character, there is no affectation of free-thinking independence. She simply leaves the subject alone; and seems to have arrived, by a kind of natural affinity and without an effort, at the creed her husband reached after frightful mental struggles. Much as she loved Byron, and admired Rousseau, she was not in the least Byronic, and the sentimentalism of the Frenchman never touched her. Withal, too, she was not in the least an “hommasse,” but as thorough a woman as ever took care to look well, or was irritated by male clumsiness. It took all Carlyle's genius to atone for his nasty trick of making pies in his tea-cup, and his habit of kicking the fire-irons. Had he been more of a St. Preux she had been a happier woman. Had George Rennie been more of a Carlyle she would have lived a very different life. The frequent mentions of him give a fragmentary outline of a romance which seems really to have been a more serious business than Irving's. It is not always safe to take Mrs. Carlyle's words too literally; but she was not the woman to indulge in fictitious autobiography,

* Early Letters of Jane Welsh Carlyle; together with a few of later date, and some of Thomas Carlyle, all hitherto unpublished. Edited by David G. Ritchie, M.A. London: Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 1889.

and unless she was guilty of that folly not once and at one time, but often and over a series of years, there had been passages between those two of which Carlyle never heard. George Rennie's good manners and good looks, his sudden forgetfulness and incomprehensible conduct, form the matter of many passages in the letters, and there is a mention of his reappearance in London, which is eloquent indeed. But Mrs. Carlyle was not the woman to allow a romance, which never came to anything, to get the better of her. Even when she was most wroth with the false man, she had eyes and attention for other things. She writes of her daily life at Comely Bank, Craigenputtock, or Chelsea, brightly and incisively. On the whole, these letters leave the impression that, though she might have been a happier woman if she had not been married to an exacting genius, yet she was by no means merely a victim. After all, nature had not only given her beak and claws, but the inclination to use them on provocation. There must have been times when it was quite as trying to be the husband of Jane Welsh as to be the wife of Thomas Carlyle. Those times, however, were the exception. The Carlyles were as happy as nature meant those two fierce and fiery persons to be.

NOVELS.*

THE Search for Basil Lyndhurst is a work of a highly moral tendency. Every character in it is good and true—and there are endless characters, differing in name only, men and women, boys and girls, babies and dogs—they are all saintly and wearisome. The heroine is not even pretty; she has a candid brother, who tells her that “for a girl you are very so-so; your complexion is all right, but your upper lip is too long, and your nose is just what a nose ought not to be, and your forehead is too high.” The book matches the heroine, and is never interesting for a moment; but there is a great deal of it, which may recommend it to those who prefer quantity to quality. Basil Lyndhurst is searched for in a desultory and perfunctory manner through the first half of the second volume, and found so easily and uneventfully that a mysterious wife is forced into the bulging pages of “small, small, imperceptible small talk,” to furnish forth meats for a funeral feast and a raison d'être for the third volume. She is lovely, stately, lowborn, virtuous, ungrammatical, and a spasmodic dipsomaniac. Remorse overwhelms her. She takes chloral and dies. Suicide suggests itself enticingly to the reader's imagination. Anything would be a relief from the everlasting goodness that prevails. No; alas no! The author is nothing if not consistent, and proves clearly to every credulous mind that an overdose of the insidious drug was taken accidentally. Carry her out and bury her decently. If any one of his own free will ever reads the whole of this book, he will discover that it is not vulgar, only commonplace, and that there are some pretty little descriptions of scenery, soothing word-pictures which will act like a healing balm on his irritated mind, and which will be pleasant to remember when he wakes from the sweet sleep he will have nobly earned.

In Light and Shade the light is not bright nor the shade deep. The book consists of very light sketches drawn with a heavy hand, and some terrible verses which are meant to be very sad, and are quite funny. The stories ought to have been better—they have possibilities; the verses ought to have been better, too—they begin well, but they do not continue, and the end is that of Humpty Dumpty. Here is a specimen from “The Two Maids” of an ending where words have failed:—

And that tall youth? A type he too,
A type of—Well! why! Me and you.

It is a relief to turn to a book so pleasantly written as Hilary St. John. The story runs smoothly along in English country life, the joys and sorrows are neither storm-driven nor passion-tossed; no one breaks all the Ten Commandments at once; there are no peril scenes; it can hardly be called a modern novel. But Hilary St. John is a lovable, honest little girl, though somewhat spoilt; and those who learn to love her watch her character develop through toil and tribulation with the semi-regretful feeling that is awakened by the sight of an old garden. The earth hath no such maidens now. In such a book the hero was bound to be a curate, but we are told that he “was pitchforked by circumstances into a profession he had never dreamed of entering,” and that “a vivid sense of his own insufficiency for the highest labour a man can be called to remained woven in with his nature, binding him always to be doing his very best with all entrusted to him.” The villain is a cad, as a villain should be, and is one of the best drawn characters in the book, unless we except that of Mr. St. John, the impecunious heavy father. Where all are good it is difficult to individualize, and the crowning merit of the work reveals itself in the fact that there are only two volumes.

Miss Blanche Willis Howard has taken a new and more ambitious flight in The Open Door than in any of her previous works. Those who read American writings will remember with pleasure the pretty little story of One Summer, and the sad history of Guenn. An Englishwoman would scarcely have composed a novel on such a theme as the one given from Epictetus in the early pages of The Open Door. “Above all things, remember that the door is open. Be not more timid than boys at play. As they when they cease to take pleasure in their games declare that they will no longer play, so do you, when all things pall upon you, retire. But if you stay do not complain.” Count Hugo von Kronfels has transcribed this with other similar passages into a “little black book,” his constant companion through long, lonely hours of pain and misery:—

He had had, indeed, his bright, brief reign; the absolute monarchy of youth, beauty, and strength, the kingship of a fearless spirit. His golden days were dead and gone. One September evening four men, with blanched faces and slow and heavy tread, bore his unconscious body through the long hall, past a group of frightened servants, to his own rooms. His young strength fought hard for life. His soul balanced many weeks between this world and the next. At length the suave doctors pronounced him saved, which meant, being interpreted, that his broken machinery had been cleverly repaired, that the ugly wound on his head was healing, and that everything, indeed, was highly gratifying except the recalcitrant spine, which, refusing to respond to the skill of world-renowned specialists, threatened to make him a cripple for life.

This man interests us at once, and he is painted in vivid colours. The fretfulness of the invalid, the morbid sensitiveness of the cripple, the keen longing for the old life, the forced resignation and patience, are well set forth. Excellently well described, also, is the stonemason, Bernard Dietz, with his bewitching voice and artistic fancies, his trusting, easy nature, and the endless tact with which he leads the Count to recognize the wants and sorrows of his humbler neighbours and to interest himself in those who are not only ill and helpless, but who have the hardship of poverty crushing them as well. The Countess von Kronfels has rather the characteristics of a Russian than a German—the large white-faced aristocrat so pitiful and tender to her dog, so coldly impatient to the son who is no longer a credit to her. There is also the dog, Mousey, a demon dog, pampered and overfed, a cur and sneak, yet almost human in the instinct that teaches him where he may safely tyrannize. We have too the family friend, everybody's friend, Frau von Funnel—the woman with the iron hand and the velvet glove, the impulsive speech and bold action, the woman we have all known and suffered from. And, as a novel must have a heroine, we have Baroness Gabriel von Dohna, who is pretty and good, but too persistently sympathetic. There is little or no plot in the story; but the conclusion is noteworthy, inasmuch as no real conclusion is arrived at. Count Hugo cherishes “the little black book,” though Gabriel is strong in her conviction that “Love guards the door.” The problem is as absorbing in its way as that of The Lady and the Tiger. The whole book is unusual, and generally interesting. The German influence is very obvious in many passages, which seem to have been thought out in German and translated into English—not, perhaps, the English of England, but the English of Boston, which city is, we are assured, the centre of civilization, and may therefore be correct in writing “gayety” and “Embassador,” and using certain forms of expression which the mother-country considers second-rate.

Eight Bells is a delightful book for boys. Two boys run away to sea, having made up their minds, aided thereto by the sage counsels of a retired pirate, that they will be cabin-boys rather than captains, as there is less responsibility. Every delightful experience is theirs—they meet with shipwrecks, pirates, gold-diggers, cannibals, mutineers, missionaries. They see strange countries; they acquire, in company with the reader, a varied acquaintance with our colonies, and the pigeon-English presumably spoken by the Australian Chinese. They are inspired by the most noble sentiments, and, bursting with British courage, they perform heroic and impossible deeds. The old British flag is waved all the while; and “Finis” comes with fireworks and a flourish of trumpets, while Eight Bells ring out joyfully over the sparkling ocean.

ANCIENT CHARTERS.*

IN this new volume of the Pipe Roll Society's publications Mr. Horace Round, who is well known as one of our most critical and, as some would perhaps add, contentious antiquaries, has edited with much care and learning a selection of charters between 1095, or a year or so later, and 1200. He has copied his documents at firsthand, and not from any Cartulary or other collection, whether printed or otherwise, and has very wisely printed them with their original abbreviations, avoiding thereby all question as to the correctness of expansions. They are arranged in chronological order, and each is furnished with a heading describing its purport, and with notes on its date and contents. These notes really leave nothing to be desired; they are at once full and concise, and afford the reader ample information on every point of interest in the text. Several matters of some importance to the genealogist and antiquary are settled or illustrated by these charters. Among them we may note that the first, a writ of

* The Search for Basil Lyndhurst. By Rosa N. Carey. London: Bentley & Son.

Light and Shade. By Herbert Sherring. London: Thacker & Co.

Hilary St. John. By Mrs. A. Price. London: Hurst & Blackett.

The Open Door. By B. W. Howard. London: Sampson Low & Co.

Eight Bells: a Tale of the Sea and the Cannibals of New Guinea. By Hume Nisbet. Illustrated by the Author. London: Ward & Downey.

* Publications of the Pipe Roll Society. Vol. X.—Ancient Charters, Royal and Private, prior to 1200. Part I. Edited and Annotated by John Horace Round, M.A. London: Wyman & Sons.

William Rufus to Robert [Bloet] Bishop of Lincoln, proves that the famous Urse de Abetot succeeded to the Lincolnshire fief of his brother, Robert the Dispenser, which is a leading fact with regard to the connexion between the houses of Despencer and Marmion, the assertion of an eminent genealogist that Roger Marmion was the immediate heir of Robert having hitherto been generally accepted. Another charter of about 1127 tells us for the first time the parentage of Maud, wife of Richard fitz Pons. She was a daughter of Walter of Gloucester, and so sister of Miles, who received the earldom of Hereford from the Empress. The document, which concerns Maud's marriage portion, is of some interest, for it presents Miles apparently in the character of trustee for his sister. From the marriage of Richard and Maud came the great house of Clifford, which, as we learn from another charter, probably of the same year, already resided at Clifford.

A few of the documents have to do with ecclesiastical affairs. One contains a grant by Archbishop Ralph to Lewes Priory of the "circescet" paid from his manor of Pagham, where this somewhat obscure due took the form of thirty-six loads of beans. An ordinance of the Abbot and convent of Leicester relating to the establishment of the collegiate church of St. Mary de Castro at Leicester, as re-organized by Earl Robert, is worthy of special attention on account of its recital of the elaborate provisions made by the Earl's father Robert, Count of Meulan, for the expenses of his foundation, for finding lights, strewing the church with rushes in summer and straw in winter, and washing and mending the vestments. The editor notes the singularly early use in this document of the word scaccarium, for the exchequer of a private person. Both here and in the grant of the church of Compton to Lewes Priory there is a special clause against non-residence. The Agreement between Ramsey Abbey and the Priory of Holy Trinity, London, has already been printed in the Ramsey Cartulary (Chron. Abbatie Rames. p. 241, Rolls Ser.) There, however, the list of witnesses is incomplete, and the editor of the volume has strangely enough assigned the Agreement to 1115-20, whereas it is evident, as Mr. Round points out, that it must be dated subsequently to the grant of their soke by the Cnihtengild to the Church of the Holy Trinity—which gift took place in 1125—for it runs:—"p̄dict⁹ abbas dimisit calūpnīā suā q̄m habuit sup̄ trā de anglica cnihta gilda q̄m ipsi anglici dederūt p̄dicte ecclīe scē t̄nitatis." Among the names of the witnesses is that of Edward of Cornhill, "one of the fifteen members of the guild by whom the gift was made. Two mortgage deeds present some curious features, which are fully commented on in the notes. One, dated Martinmas, 1183, is a mortgage of the manor of Tottenham to Avigaia, a Jewess of London, and her son Abraham, for a hundred marks, at nine marks a year "de lucro," or 13½ per cent., with the condition that, if the mortgagor should pay forty marks of his debt at the ensuing Christmas, his remaining debt should be reduced to forty marks, on which, however, he should pay two marks and a half interest at each quarter, or 25 per cent. Here, as the editor observes, it is evident that we "must read between the lines." The borrower, while acknowledging a debt of a hundred marks, can only have received eighty; he had a "chance of wiping off three-fifths of the debt" by repaying half the money which he had actually received; but, if he did so, he was to pay a greatly increased amount of interest on the remainder. There is evidence that he never cleared off the mortgage; for King John granted the manor to David, Earl of Huntingdon, grandson of King David of Scotland, "quit-claiming to him all the rights of Abraham, son of Rabi Jose (Rabi Josei), therein." The other mortgage deed is framed so as to evade the law; for the mortgagor, as a Crusader, was forbidden to pay "usury," and the mortgagee, as a Christian, to receive it. Mr. Round has added an excellent index, in which he has as far as possible identified the places mentioned in his text. He has done his work in a thoroughly scholarly spirit, and we are glad to see that he intends to contribute other volumes of charters to the publications of the Society.

TWO BOOKS ON CENTRAL AFRICA.*

THE Emin Relief Committee having succeeded in stopping the publication of Mr. Rose Troup's account of his share in their Expedition in virtue of an agreement with Mr. Stanley not to anticipate his authorship, no more authentic account of that expedition—or at least of the share in it taken by the singularly ill-fated rear-guard—may be expected for some time than that of Mr. J. R. Werner. He was not a member of the expedition, and hence his mouth is not closed; but he was serving as engineer on board one of the Congo State steam-launches ("steamers," as they are often called, is rather a misleading term to the general) on the Upper River, and was for some time actually on and about the mouth of the Aruwhimi just before Major Barttelot's murder. He was in constant communication with the Major and his assistants, and, most important of all, he was distinctly informed not merely by natives, but by his own Belgian superior, that Tippoo Tib had personally bidden the Manyema to shoot the Major if he did not treat them well. He was told this before the disaster, but after he had left the camp, and the rear-guard had started; so that he could not put Barttelot on his guard. This testimony, we confess, seems to us far to outweigh the expressions of Mr. Stanley and of the Congo authorities as to their belief in the Arab's good faith; more particularly if it be remembered that these persons, by making Tippoo virtually their viceroy, and abandoning vast districts to him, have, so to speak, bound themselves to regard him as a respectable person. Mr. Werner, on the other hand, seems to have had no personal ill-feeling against Tippoo (who never did him any harm beyond rather overcrowding the launch) was in a very good position to know, and was actually witness of not a few proceedings showing what construction the Arab and his followers placed on the appointment of "District Governor," which Mr. Stanley conferred on the great trader—and raider.

Mr. Werner's account of his own adventures, which began (he does not quite know why) in 1886 and ended last year, has the rather rare charm in such books of being quite destitute of literary "cooking," and yet of being free from any awkwardnesses or dullnesses of style. He might have spared us the voyage out; but, after all, his account of it does no harm. He wisely avoids entering into the curious hocus-pocus which transformed the "International" Congo State into a close Belgian corporation. In treating of individuals he is invariably sweet-blooded—the rarest of all virtues in such a case—and in treating of himself he does not brag. He speaks well of Major Barttelot, well of the Belgian Captain Coquilhat, who, with Mr. Werner as engineer, ran up through a hostile country, though he was half dead with dysentery, to Stanley Falls, where the Arabs were attacking that brave Englishman (afterwards killed by an elephant), Mr. Walter Deane, and, though they were not in time to save the place, saved him. This little adventure is remarkably well told. Of Mr. Jameson, Major Barttelot's second, a Will Cary of Westward Ho! come alive again, and alas! dead again, the account is singularly attractive. The descriptions of the Congo scenery are very good and well supported by sketches. There are some good stories, the best being the following:—The Congo State served out to its officers at Léopoldville "half a bottle" of Portuguese wine a day. Hence—obviously and patently to the most childlike imagination—a contention who should send in the largest bottles, magnums, jeroboams, demijohns, and what not. The Administration, of course, met this trick by fixing a standard bottle, which was to be at largest that used for the foaming grape of Eastern France. But science (and we wish science had never done anything worse) was not to be thus done. The engineers met and put their heads together; the result being that they not only succeeded in blowing out the "kick" of a champagne bottle, but actually expanded that vessel by the aid of heat so much that, outwardly remaining the same, it held inwardly about half as much again as an undoctored comrade from Rheims or Epernay. We are not always in charity with the scientist; let him on this occasion receive our sincerest admiration.

And yet the book is a melancholy book in its way; though that way does not lie on the surface. Mr. Werner (though his name might bespeak any one of at least five nationalities) appears to be an Englishman. For what did he expend all this energy in an infernal climate during three years? It certainly was not for money; he tells us as much. It certainly was not for any fleshly delights; for what with fever, dysentery, goat's flesh like leather or indiarubber, and not too much of that, mosquitoes, runs at full speed for thirty-six hours, and the like, the Congo must have been to him much more like a purgatory than a paradise. He was doing no good to England; and (though he seems, in his own person, to have succeeded in keeping up that pleasing delusion) it is not easy to understand how he thought that he was doing any good to Africa. He was uncomfortable enough when the Manyema followers of the worshipful Tippoo Tib (who, by the grace of Mr. Stanley and some Belgian persons, was his senior officer) swarmed out of his (Mr. Werner's) own launch to harry and murder in a perfectly harmless native village. He does not seem to have taken any extraordinary joy in potting natives with his Winchester when they were dull to the blessings of trade. The amount of romantic interest which you can get out of fighting canoes with steam launches, spears and knives with long-range guns, must surely be small. The collection of ivory for European capitalists to sell at a greater profit than other European capitalists cannot be wildly exciting. What is called "freedom from the restraints of civilized life," no doubt, counts for something; but will it count for all this, especially when civilized life telegraphs contradictory orders to you from Brussels? We can understand absolute shaking off of the "restraints"; but keeping at least some of them, and adding all the discomforts of savagery, seems to us a thing only to be justified by patriotism, religion, or the romance of adventure. The adoption, for choice, of this kind of mongrel adventure, of hybrid freedom does not commend itself.

The great merit of Mr. Werner's book is that it is evidently a livre de bonne foi, and that it is very fresh to date. We do not think that the reading of it will do much to remove the misgivings of those who question whether such enterprises as this of the Congo State do any good whatever. Mr. Werner, faithful witness as he is, seems still to believe in the "blessings of civilization," and has cheerful dreams of the results of the proposed Congo railway; while it is fair to say that his book contains

* River Life on the Congo. By J. R. Werner. London and Edinburgh: Blackwood & Sons. 1889.

The Life and Work of Emin Pasha in Equatorial Africa. By the Rev. H. W. Little. London: Virtue. 1889.

neither account nor hint of the malpractices towards the natives which have sometimes been charged against the employés of the Company or State. But the authority of the State would appear to be nil off the river, though "on paper" (as Tippoo Tib, who seems to have been clever enough to catch up not a few European ideas, says, it seems) it runs half-way to the Zambesi and Heaven knows where else. On the river it extends very little beyond the decks of the steamers and the areas of the stations. It has deliberately handed over the Upper Congo to the Arab slave-drivers and ivory-robbers; and what blessings of civilization, beyond bad rum, worse gin, and improved weapons of destruction, it has given to the Lower are things not very apparent here. Worse than all, it seems to have committed the mistake which few colonists except Englishmen, and Englishmen themselves by no means always, have avoided, the error of him qui trop embrasse. It is so easy to mark a great country off into prefectures; it is not so very difficult to run a steam-launch up a river between rapids and cart it across the rapids themselves. But it is not so easy really to colonize and civilize. Nor is it quite clear what good is going to be done. Suppose the barren places to be made fertile and cultivated with tropical products. As it is, tropical products are so abundant and cheap that it hardly pays to produce or sell them. That the climate can ever be otherwise than fatal to most Europeans is exceedingly improbable. Mr. Werner himself very shrewdly remarks that bringing the natives together in large settlements would probably begin a series of epidemics which would devastate the land. In short, the country got on without us quite as well as it is at all likely to get on with us, and perhaps much better.

Mr. Little's Life of Emin Pasha in Equatorial Africa is a piece of bookmaking which is neither very good nor very bad. Published with the consent of the managers of the Relief Expedition, it is authentic enough as far as it goes; but is, of course, subject to the drawback imposed by the stipulations which, as above recorded, defeated Mr. Troup's scheme, and it does not, we think, contain anything that has not already appeared in the newspapers. It contains, however—"extended" as the phrase is with a certain amount of obligatory fine writing—a sufficiently clear account of the history of the Equatorial Province, of the life of Emin, and of the fortunes of the Relief Expedition so far as they are known. The account, however, is purely official, and the most favourable view of the conduct of Tippoo Tib is given—a view which, as we have observed above, conflicts with evidence which there is reason to believe, and which has to the critical mind the further very awkward drawback that it is a view necessitated by the conduct which both the Congo State authorities and the managers of the Relief Expedition have thought proper to pursue towards the chief of all such as cut men's throats in Central Africa. As, however, this matter is undecided, Mr. Little could hardly be expected to enter into any argument about it in such a book. Some other defects might more reasonably be expected to have been looked to. The map at the beginning is insufficient; for though the actual relief route is faithful enough, the view of Emin's province, which is even more germane to the book, is very poor, and does not contain several names which occur in the text. There are also some carelessnesses in the spelling, Mr. Jameson being called throughout "Jamieson." But this does not matter much for the special purpose of the book, which will no doubt be useful.

THE DISEASES AND DISORDERS OF THE OX.*

IN all our experience we do not think that we ever met with a work which so thoroughly deserved to be called a family book as The Diseases and Disorders of the Ox. Mr. George Gresswell is its prime author, and it has an addition by Dr. Albert Gresswell, to whom "the very fullest possible acknowledgment is due." Inaccuracies have been rectified by Dr. Astley Gresswell; Mr. James Brodie Gresswell supplied notes; information was derived from Mr. Alderman Dan Gresswell; the Rev. Henry William Gresswell made suggestions, Mr. Charles Gresswell helped, Mr. Edmund Gresswell contributed, and Mr. Samuel Gresswell's assistance is thankfully acknowledged. Altogether no less than nine of the family of Gresswell appear to have had a finger in this literary pie.

As might be expected, a great portion of the work is more suited for the study of veterinary surgeons than of laymen; but in the early pages some warnings are given which are evidently intended for ordinary people. The first is against eating underdone meat—what would the author say to raw-meat juice, which is so much recommended by certain of the faculty? The second is against "the most dangerous habit" of allowing dogs to eat from plates which are afterwards to be used for the food of human beings. Had those who are guilty of this practice "the barest notion of the results which might therefrom ensue, they would certainly abstain from such folly." The third is against "the dangerous practice of caressing and kissing" pets. "If they would read the late Professor Cobbold's most valuable work on Helminthology, the eyes of some ladies would certainly be opened in a somewhat startling manner." A matter, again, which concerns others besides keepers of oxen is the question whether bovine scarlet fever can be communicated to mankind. Dr. Klein experimented upon house-mice by feeding them and inoculating them with "cultures of the micrococcus scarlatinae," both from human beings and from the cow, and he found the action the same in each case. Many people will remember the outbreak of scarlet fever in Marylebone, St. Pancras, Hampstead, St. John's Wood, and Hendon in 1885, which was attributed to the use of milk from a certain dairy. Full and interesting details of the investigations which were made into the matter are given in this book. The suspected dairy, which was at Hendon, was found to be in a good hygienic condition, and there had been no cases of scarlet fever in its neighbourhood for a long time previously. The outbreak occurred soon after the introduction into the dairy of three newly-purchased cows, one of which had small vesicles and ulcers on its udder and teats. The cow continued to give its usual yield of milk and did not show any particular signs of illness, but the affection spread rapidly among the other cows in the same shed. Sixty-three barn-gallons of milk were returned to the dairy, with an intimation that the Marylebone Health Officer suspected that milk from this place had been causing scarlatina in the neighbourhood. The whole of the liquid was given to the pigs, and orders were issued that the milk from the shed occupied by the cows with the ulcerated udders should be thrown into a pit. Poor neighbours begged for it, only to be refused by the owners of the dairy; but one or two of the cowmen gave it to them, thinking it "a pity to waste it." About a week afterwards scarlatina broke out in six families that had been supplied with this milk. It is almost as interesting to inquire whether scarlatina may be communicated to human beings by horses as whether it can be communicated to them by cattle. Turning for a moment from Messrs. Gresswell's book to other works, we find that Dr. Copland, in his Medical Dictionary, goes so far as to say "that scarlatina was originally a disease of the horse," "that it was communicated in comparatively modern times from horses to man," and "that it may be, and has been, communicated also to the dog." Professor Williams, on the contrary, in his Principles and Practice of Veterinary Medicine, says:—"I have seen numbers of horses suffering from it, but in no case did it exhibit any tendency to spread by contagion or infection; and I am of opinion that it is impossible to transmit it from the horse to any other animal." Dr. Albert Gresswell thinks that not only the germs of scarlet fever, but also those of typhoid fever and diphtheria, as well as other maladies, can be conveyed to human beings through the agency of milk. There is a double danger of this; for, in the first place, it is at least possible that a disease to which cows are subject may be communicated by them to another animal; and, in the second, germs of a disease from which cattle are exempt "may be conveyed to milk by means of the contact of that fluid with the exhalations of patients" as well as "by the addition of water into which some infective excretion has been accidentally introduced in consequence of faulty drainage or other hygienic defects or shortcomings." It is well known that milk is a liquid peculiarly adapted to the development and multiplication of germs, and Dr. Gresswell calls it "that most nutritious, but yet at times most dangerous, article of diet"; adding that "it is in all cases a very wise precaution to raise the temperature of that fluid to just below boiling-point, and to keep it at that temperature for some little time, since this is said to be sufficient to kill the streptococci of scarlet fever, if they be present therein." If this be needful, it seems to us that those who live in constant terror of streptococci had better drink nothing but intoxicating fluids.

We are great admirers of that excellent book King Solomon's Mines; but it was a surprise to us to find it cited as an authority on a point of farriery. The passage in question relates to the inoculation of Zulu cattle for pneumonia. The following is a mere fragment from the very lengthy quotation made from that work:—"This is done by cutting a slit in the tail of an ox, and binding in a piece of the diseased lung of an animal which has died of the sickness." It is then stated that the beast takes the disease in a mild form, and that the tail drops off about a foot from the root. Dr. Gresswell tells us that this method used formerly to be practised in England, but that one or other of the milder forms of inoculation is now adopted; and he himself recommends the use of a small seton, made of thick white worsted and soaked in fluid obtained from the lung of an ox suffering from the first stage of a mild attack. It should be applied through the under surface of the tail. This system is followed by Mr. Rutherford of Edinburgh. Professor Williams would only scarify the skin of the tail slightly, and inject one drop of the fluid.

The Messrs. Gresswell inform us that, although foot-and-mouth disease usually affects ruminants, "it may break out in any warm-blooded animal, being met with not only in cattle and sheep, but also in swine, dogs, poultry, and even human beings are not secure against invasion." We have never had the privilege of meeting a human being invaded with foot-and-mouth disease; but we can well believe that he would be a pitiable object. It has not yet been "definitely proved that human tuberculosis can be produced by eating tubercular flesh"; but "it is at least very probable that it can arise in this way. The differences between the two diseases, human and bovine tuberculosis, seem to be very slight." In the opinion of the author, it is dangerous to use the milk of tuberculous cows. Dr. Fleming also thinks that it is not safe to use either the milk or the flesh of tuberculous oxen, if the disease is advanced, and that any part of a body in which tubercles are actually present should be avoided like poison. Yet Mr. Gresswell tells us that there are few cows or oxen that have been kept in cowsheds for some time, and milked in the ordinary way, that are not tainted with tuberculosis. Anthrax, again, is another complaint to which men as well as cattle are thought to be subject by many authorities, and it is stated that "in 1617 the malady was of so fatal a type that over 60,000 people died round Naples from eating the flesh of animals which had died of the disease." In France, anthrax is known as Charbon, in Germany it is called Miltz-brand, in Central Asia it is known as the Loodianah disease, in the United States as the Texas fever, and in Australia as the Cumberland disease. Reference is made to anthrax in the Scriptures as the "grievous murrain and blains which afflicted man and beast in the days of the captivity of the children of Israel." "Anthrax also may have been the cause whereby the army of Sennacherib the Assyrian met with total extermination in one night (2 Chron. xxxii. 21)." This disease seems to be on the increase in England, partly, perhaps, through the present system of forced feeding, and possibly from too much in-and-in breeding—so, at least, thinks Mr. Gresswell. With regard to the even more deadly scourge of cattle-plague, we read that what is termed benignant cattle-plague is usually to be found in Eastern Europe. In those regions it appears to have lost much of its power; but, when it is propagated in other countries, it assumes the malignant type, as some of us have good cause to remember. Even the mildest of mild cases of benignant cattle-plague, imported from the East, may generate the malady among the cattle of other countries in its most deadly form. "With regard to treatment, no veterinarian would recommend that any should be tried if the disease should again break out in England." It is generally admitted that pigs, poultry, and cats are subject to diphtheria; but, although he considers it probable, the author is by no means certain that cattle and sheep are ever attacked by it. Two other matters he also thinks doubtful; the first is whether the foliage of the yew-tree is only poisonous when in a dry condition, and the second is whether ergot of rye so often brings about the ill effects attributed to it as is commonly supposed. The latter doubt, it may be remembered, was strongly expressed in Stephens's Book of the Farm, which was lately reviewed in this journal. Mr. Gresswell says, however, that in countries where rye-bread is much eaten, ergot sometimes is present in large quantities in the flour, and that "very alarming symptoms, and even death, may result therefrom among human subjects." Both sheep and oxen are subject to tetanus. Bromide of potassium is the remedy here suggested, and it is probably the best, although we have known prussic acid to produce marvellous cures. The story of Jenner's discovery of vaccination is too well known to bear quotation here; but some people may not be aware that six condemned felons were pardoned by George I. on condition that they should submit to be inoculated.

* The Diseases and Disorders of the Ox; with some Account of the Diseases of the Sheep. By George Gresswell. With Additions on Human and Comparative Pathology. By Dr. Albert Gresswell. London: Allen & Co. 1889.

A large portion of a work on the diseases of sheep and oxen must necessarily be devoted to descriptions of parasites and their cures. Valuable and important as is this part of the book, it would be an unpleasant one to discuss here. The description of delirium in cattle and sheep reminds us that, when a valuable sow was very ill, we asked the "vet." how she was going on. "Sir," said he with great gravity, "she is wandering." In conclusion, we wish to praise the "Bovine Formulary," or index of the diseases of oxen, with prescriptions for each, at the end of the book, which, we should add, has a good index of the ordinary kind as well. We should be glad to see the "Bovine Formulary" brought out in the form of a small book for the pocket. It is clear, concise, and practical, and it would make a very convenient handbook of reference for the kind of practitioner who is sometimes known among illiterate rustics by the terribly suggestive title of the "furrier."

NEW LAW BOOKS AND EDITIONS.*

MR. CHAN-TOON is a young gentleman of Oriental extraction who made himself famous for a day or two, it may be a year ago, by gaining an unprecedented number of studentships, scholarships, and the like, at the Middle Temple, and otherwise showing himself to be exceedingly proficient in the art of passing examinations. He appears at that time to have published

* The Nature and Value of Jurisprudence. By Chan-Toon, Barrister-at-Law, of the Middle Temple. Second (enlarged) edition. London: Reeves & Turner. 1889.

Elements of the Law of Torts: a Text-Book for Students. By Melville M. Bigelow, Ph.D., Lecturer in the Law School of the University of Boston, U.S.A. Cambridge: at the University Press. 1889.

The Law of Tithes and Tithe Rent Charge. By Edward Fairfax Studd, M.A., B.C.L., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London: Stevens & Sons. 1889.

The Law relating to Local Rates, comprising the Statutes in full and a Digest of 718 Cases. By George F. Chambers, F.R.A.S., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law, and late an Assistant-Boundary Commissioner for England and Wales. Second edition. London: Stevens & Sons. 1889.

The Law and Practice under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Acts, 1883-88. By William Norton Lawson, M.A., of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law. Second edition, enlarged. London: Butterworths. 1889.

Suggestions for the Amendment of the Law relating to Weights and Measures. New edition, enlarged. London and Birmingham: W. & T. Avery lished a pamphlet which "well-meaning friends" tried hard to induce him to enlarge into a book. They have succeeded, as well-meaning friends so often do. The volume was written "with a view of guiding beginners in the law who had not been influenced to neglect the study of jurisprudence prior to reading English law from an arbitrary standpoint." The introduction takes the form of an essay upon "the importance of relative studies." Their importance is illustrated by examples "taken from various matters of thought because they all point to the truth of the principles here contended." In knowledge "one department may be the kindred of another." For instance, nobody can deny that medicine and law are to some extent connected, as witness the recent delivery at the Middle Temple of lectures on what Mr. Chan-Toon describes as "Toxicology, or the legal aspect of poisons." "The Bishop of Chester, otherwise known to us as Dr. Stubbs," has ventured upon the similar generalization that for the adequate study of history it is not amiss to know something of religion and something of law. Therefore "what I [Mr. Chan-Toon] complain of is the abrupt demarcation of the sciences, thereby losing sight of the idea of necessity and convenience. From this it results, therefore, the want of confidence in studies beyond one's own, and the consequent loss of aid that would otherwise be obtained." The wise man knows that "Geology can be of assistance to Statistics in explaining the causes of the prevalence of a particular class of crimes in one part of a country and its entire absence in another part," and even "Science has been effective in correcting the belief in fanciful and imaginative superstitions." Therefore all departments of human knowledge should be each other's handmaids, so much so that it is not well even to distinguish too definitely which is which; for "When hard distinctions are made, they aggravate perseverance and defy solution of problems which depend on foreign ideas for elucidation." When we get to the substance of what Mr. Chan-Toon has to say about jurisprudence, it is much less novel and interesting than the beauties of the introduction would lead us to expect. Mr. Chan-Toon has perused and extracted from the works of Blackstone, Bentham, Austin, Maine, Stephen, and very many other writers, and he collates their sentiments nicely enough; but when he is thus employed he is ten times less amusing and a hundred times less instructive than when he is doing original work, such as the reflections of which the introduction consists. For it is, as Mr. Chan-Toon says in the course of his volume about something else, a "result appropriate of fruitful investigation" to observe what are the sort of mental qualities which may carry a man triumphantly through any number of examinations, and how brilliant are the results of really effective study under the auspices of the Council of Legal Education. Therefore it is better to study Mr. Chan-Toon's own speculations than his commentary upon other people's, and it is a thing to be thankful for that Mr. Chan-Toon was not "influenced to neglect" the importance of relative studies prior to learning English "from an arbitrary standpoint."

It is only across the Western wave that they begin prefaces of law books like this:—"It chanced some time ago that my Elements of the Law of Torts found favour in the instruction of the Law School of the University of Cambridge, and that not long afterwards a suggestion came to me over sea, from those who had been using the book there, to prepare an English edition of it. More to say were needless. The University Press undertook the work; the result is here." The result is not so bad as it would probably be if an English author had begun by expressing himself in this sentimental fashion. The best part of the book, in our judgment, is the introduction, in which Dr. Bigelow indicates his view of the subject of torts generally in a manner so compendious, and yet so clear, as to leave the student no excuse for not having in his mind a good foundation of principle on which to erect an edifice of familiarity with the leading features of the law of torts. Like other authors who have treated of the subject, Dr. Bigelow professes his inability to supply any definition of a tort which will enable the man who knows and understands it to say at once, and without consulting authority, of any given act or omission whether or not it constitutes a tort. The nearest that he gets to a definition is, "A tort may be said to be a breach of duty, fixed by law, and redressible by a suit for damages." (It may be observed here that the only effect of the comma after "duty" is to make the sentence look as if it meant that not the duty, but the breach of it, was fixed by law.) As definitions go, and subject to Dr. Bigelow's explanations, this is rather a good one. The subject generally is divided by Dr. Bigelow, in accordance with a sort of inner light of his own, as follows. Torts may be classified according to the duties of which they are branches, and those duties are (1) the duty to refrain from fraud and malice; (2) certain absolute duties; (3) the duty to refrain from negligence. The "absolute" duties are those which do not in any way depend upon the state of the tortious person's mind, such as trespass. The classification is ingenious, and appears to be exhaustive. The treatise is really an American one, adapted for the use of English students, by the substitution of English for American authorities as a general rule. Unfortunately it is not an absolutely safe guide to English law, as it contains statements supported by American authorities, but incorrect so far as our law is concerned. For instance, it is said that in actions for malicious prosecution, "malice cannot be inferred from the mere proof of a want of probable cause," and an American case is cited in support of the proposition. The exact contrary is well-established law in England. A few blemishes like this, however, matter the less as the book is one for the use of students almost exclusively. For them its clearness, neatness of statement, and freedom from unnecessary detail can hardly fail to make it valuable.

Mr. E. F. Studd has written a nice little book about tithes, being moved thereto by having observed that, while a good deal has been recently said about tithes, "there seems to be an astonishing and widespread absence of accurate knowledge" of the law and history of the subject. Mr. Studd is easily astonished. A widespread presence of accurate knowledge on any subject a fiftieth part as intricate as tithes and tithe rent-charge would be something to be astonished at. In the heroic, but probably vain, hope of narrowing the spread of ignorance about the law of tithes, Mr. Studd has written his account of it, wherein he seeks to expound "the history and present position of the law in a popular form." With the history and so much of the law as is "practically obsolete" Mr. Studd allows that he has "dealt superficially," while he has attempted "to treat exhaustively the present law" in the hope "that the book may prove useful to the profession as well as the general public." These are two stools between which there is much risk of falling, and unhappily it cannot be confidently asserted that Mr. Studd has acquired a really firm seat on both or either. He is, however, nearer to professional than to popular success, which is as it should be. His volume is not amusing, and would probably be the worse for it if it were. At the same time it is hardly adequate to the subject. It may be remarked that, however "obsolete" the old law of tithe may be, it is seldom possible to give trustworthy advice on a question of tithe without somewhat profound antiquarian research. Still Mr. Studd's statement of the existing statute law on the subject is fairly good as far as it goes, and may possibly be found useful in practice.

Mr. G. F. Chambers's Law relating to Local Rates, of which the second edition is now before us, is a modest sort of work. He describes it not as a treatise on rating, but as "simply a book of reference on the Statute Law and Cases" relating to the subject, and also incidentally as "a Repertory of Legal Information relating to Local Finance." It consists first of statutes and bits of statutes printed without comment or annotation, and secondly of a list of very curt head-notes of cases, which Mr. Chambers calls a Digest, and which differs from the works usually so described in being almost without arrangement, and entirely without anything more to guide the reader in his search for information than headings not repeated on the ensuing pages. If it were a first edition we should say with confidence that it would not help anybody much, but as it is the second it must be presumed that it has been found to be of use.

The second edition of Mr. W. N. Lawson's Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Acts contains the principal Act, that of 1883, the ancillary Acts of 1885, 1886, and 1888, all the rules now extant that have been made under those Acts, and the "International Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property" of 1883, to which Great Britain has subsequently adhered. There is also an appendix containing a moderate number of forms. The Acts are very fully and carefully annotated, and the edition altogether appears to be a good one.

There is no person to whom money is of any consequence who is not interested in weights and measures, and there are probably very few who take any interest in them. It is apparent on the face of things that it is of importance for all commercial purposes that the use of weighing-machines, weights, or measures which are inaccurate either by design or by misfortune, should be made as nearly impossible as circumstances permit. A slim pamphlet, bound in cloth, is published on this subject by Messrs. W. and T. Avery, who discourse modestly and sensibly of the present administration of the existing law. They certainly—if their statement of facts is at all accurate—demonstrate the existence of defects, and suggest what look like efficient remedies. The great fault to be cured is the lack of uniformity of practice among district inspectors, the same machine which inspectors in some districts advise being habitually made a ground of prosecution by inspectors in other districts. It is urged that by the appointment of travelling inspectors, and the strengthening of central authority, these divergences of practice might be removed, and the contention seems plausible enough. In any case, the Messrs. Avery's pamphlet deserves the careful attention of the Board of Trade and its advisers.

THE CAPTAIN'S DAUGHTER.*

IT augurs ill for the general success of a translation when it begins by misquoting the initials of the author. As is pretty well known, the name of Russia's greatest poet is Alexander Serguiévitch Pushkin, and we can only account for this translator's writing it otherwise by the fact that in Russian the letter C corresponds to the English S. In general, however, we protest against the hideous rendering of Russian proper names here adopted. This, perhaps, is a matter of taste and habit, but in this case betrays an ignorance of Russian history which does not inspire confidence.

The Captain's Daughter is a very charming tale of Russian military and social life, which, though it has been translated before into English, deserves to be pressed upon the attention of the public till its merits be properly recognized. The hero, Andrew Petrovitch Grineff, or Grineff—we intend to stick to the usual phonetics—is the son of a country gentleman of Simbirsk, and, enrolled from his birth in the Semeonovski regiment of Guards, has, at the time when the narrative begins, attained the grade of sergeant. Of course the inevitable French "outchitel" is introduced: M. Beaupré, whom the translator will persist in calling Bopré, as if it were a Russian name. He is the counterpart of

Monsieur l'Abbé, a starving Gaul, who figures as Eugene Onéguine's tutor, and meets a similar fate; for when "youth's rebellious hour drew near"—

Monsieur clean out of doors they chase;

a regular episode, it would seem, in the drama of Russian domestic life, in which it used to be customary for paterfamilias to seize the unfortunate "mossoo" when in a moment of temporary relaxation and forthwith to kick him out of the house. Exit "mossoo," and the hero is sent into the army under the care of Savelitch, his dadka, or male nurse, a most amusing character, and quite essentially Russian. He does not go, however, to St. Petersburg and the Guards, as he had anticipated, but is sent by his sagacious parent to Orenburg, where the general in command at once posts him to the fort of Bielagorsk, on the banks of the Ural, far away in the lonely steppe. It is commanded by old Captain Mironoff, the father of Masha, the Captain's Daughter. As a matter of course, the youth Grineff falls in love with her, and, as another matter of course, in the general absence of excitement he fights a duel with Lieutenant Shvabrin, another admirer of the solitary beauty of Bielagorsk. He is wounded through the officiousness of Savelitch, who, getting wind of the encounter, and hurrying with loud cries to "save" his master, by so doing momentarily distracts his attention from the adverse blade. As he is tended during illness by the charming Masha, Grineff's gratitude naturally prompts a declaration; his affection is reciprocated, but the consent of Grineff père, which Masha declares to be indispensable, cannot be obtained. At this juncture the great revolt of Pugatchoff (of which Pushkin was himself the historian) breaks out, and the little fort of Bielagorsk is surrounded by the Cossack leader's murderous hordes. Upon this striking episode in Russian history the plot is constructed. The fierce Pugatchoff's heart has been touched by an act of boyish generosity exercised by Grineff in his favour, who is thus able to soften the savage's heart, and not only to save his own neck from the rope, but to rescue Masha from dishonour, and place her in safety with his parents at Simbirsk. The whole of the foregoing narrative is interspersed with charming incidents illustrative of Russian life and character: its fidelity, good-nature, reverence, and single-hearted devotion to authority; though whether these good qualities have altogether survived the emancipation of 1861 may perhaps be open to doubt. Returning to the plot, the hero during his adventures has laid himself technically open to the charge of desertion, and, after the suppression of the revolt, he is summoned before a military tribunal to answer it. He has been denounced by the villain Shvabrin, who, actuated by love and jealousy, sided with the rebels and is in consequence led to execution. The same fate was in store for Grineff, since he refused to defend himself, fearing to compromise the name and fame of Masha. That damsel, who is now residing with the elder Grineffs at Simbirsk, undertakes a journey to St. Petersburg to save her imprisoned lover's life and reputation. In a delightfully related scene she meets the Empress Catherine incognito during an early morning promenade in the palace gardens. After due inquiry the imperial lady summons the girl to her presence, and grants her petition with the grace and charming condescension of which she was so perfect a mistress.

We think it is a pity that the translator should have undertaken the superfluous duty of expurgating Pushkin's novel: the poet's work never requires it. Sometimes this piece of folly seems due to prudery, sometimes to carelessness. For example, in the very first paragraph of the book the translator writes:—"From the time I was five years old I was handed over to the ostler Savelitch"; but why is the following sentence, which stands in the original, omitted, "Appointed for his sobriety as my guardian"? and wherefore ostler? Gentlemen do not keep ostlers, but grooms. This can scarcely be called a literal rendering of the original as promised on the title-page. Again, further on, the translator's sense of propriety prompted him to expunge a passage concerning the love escapades of M. Beaupré, though Mrs. Telfer, in Russian Romance, found it no stumbling-block. Again, a British officer is positively too modest to relate that the hero, passing through the town of Simbirsk, took rather more wine than was good for him, supped "at Arinushka's," and had to be led home to his quarters by a comrade of riper years, who, though he ought to have known better, assured the ensign that experiences like these were necessary in order to "accustom him to the service." We cannot refrain from mentioning one more instance of this absurd purism. On arrival at Orenburg, Grineff presents a letter of introduction from his father to the general commanding, an old comrade. The latter while reading it audibly pronounces certain phrases, as ". . . Hm . . . your Excellency has not forgotten . . . Hm . . . now about a matter . . . Hm . . . and so forth." Will it be credited that ejaculations like the following have been ruthlessly cut out, "Hm . . . when . . . the late Field-Marshal Mün . . . campaigns also . . . little Caroline . . ." ? when the General breaks in:—"Ah, old chap, you remember our old pranks, then!" A translator has no right whatever thus to emasculate other people's creations.

* The Captain's Daughter. A Novel. By A. C. Pooshkin. Translated by Stuart H. Godfrey, Bombay Staff Corps. London and Calcutta: Thacker, Spink, & Co.

We have ventured to remark that the translator's phonetic system betrays ignorance of history, and certainly he has little knowledge of the German tongue. The famous Marshal Münnich figures here as Count Meeneekha; General Michelson as Meekhelsoff; Traubenberg as Traobenberg; while, to crown all, Keestreen (Cüstrin) and Otchakoff are described in a foot-note as Turkish forts taken by the Russians! Shades of the Great Frederick and Münnich the "Hawk," spare the translator your nocturnal visits! Of downright errors we encounter not a few. Thus in the passage, p. 65, "When I remember that this occurred in my time, and that I have now lived to the short reign of the Emperor Alexander," we ought to read benign reign (karoiki, short; krotki, benign). And at p. 22, where Grineff, to the horror of his "nurse," presents the then vagabond Pugatchoff with a hare-skin pelisse, and thereby earns his lasting gratitude, "the peasant immediately began to measure it" ought to be rendered "began to try it on."

RECENT VERSE.*

THE larger portion of Sir Edwin Arnold's memorial volume In My Lady's Praise is a reprint from a recent book, which is now appropriately associated with a dozen or more new poems written in honour of the late Lady Arnold. In "The Casket of Gems," a sequence of poems in rhymed quatrains arranged acrosticwise, the poet's fancy ranges with characteristic ease and buoyancy through many a rich field of legend and history, and does not disdain to add to the poetic garnering somewhat of the spoils of science. The chemist and the geologist may claim a share in the making of the "Casket." Into the fabric of his verse the poet has shaped, or re-set, the fair or fantastic, the mystical or magical, lore of precious gems, realizing in the discursive scheme of his poems the lines of Cowper:—

Heaven, earth, and ocean plundered of their sweets,
Nectarian essences, Olympian dews,
Æthereal journeyings, submarine exploits.

though without suggesting, it is fair to add, the image of Katerfelto, "with hair on end at his own wonders." Scientific facts are not often so skilfully wedded to poetic fancy as in the poem on opals and the operations of Nature's laboratory:—

Mean rubbish of the road-heaps; silicates
Which gather in chalk hollows, where, sea-bred,
Millions of billions, tubes and tunicates
Laid down their living shells, Nature's small dead.
Who would have thought there should be use, or other Service, for such lost atoms of the main,
When, sinking through the seas, they give the Mother
Their tiny life-garbs to lay up again?
But She, who hastes not, wastes not, scorns not—takes it,
Each relic of her nameless children gone,
Stores her sea-oozes with their spoil and makes it
Chalk down or marble vein or quarry stone.

Of the amethyst there is the charming story from Ælian, charmingly told, of Heraclia and the grateful stork. The topaz suggests the legend of the miraculous restoration of sight to Theodosius; beryl and aquamarine call up a Lucianic vision of happy islands in the foamless seas. Perhaps the sum total of all the virtues attributed to jewels, including such talismans as jade, are surpassed by the magical properties of that wondrous garnet "hued like purple wine congealed," the possessor of which may, like Aladdin with the lamp, gratify the most extravagant wish. But in order to raise the slave of the stone, which, with the delicious vagueness of romance, we are told "lurks in Balkh, under the lower snows," it is necessary to use a certain formula, the immediate product of which is a red she-wolf, whose appearance is only too likely to petrify the young beginner in magic. On the whole, the most fascinating of these legends is the Persian fable that tells how Solomon was offered immortality in a ruby cup, and, while every creature urged him to drink, was saved from the fate of Tithonus by the wise yet cryptic warning of the turtle-dove, who had been overlooked by his councillors and intervened at the last moment. These old-world fancies are prettily handled by Sir Edwin Arnold. Here and there, it is true, the old man of science pops in; but he is never very troublesome, and once, at

* In My Lady's Praise: Poems Old and New. By Sir Edwin Arnold, M.A., &c. London: Trübner & Co. 1889.

Long Ago. By Michael Field. London: George Bell & Sons. 1889.

Battle and After. By R. St. John Tyrwhitt. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

Poems. By Horace Smith. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

Verse-Musings on Nature, Faith, and Freedom. By John Owen. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co. 1889.

Idylls of the Home. By Harry Douglas. London: Spencer Blackett. 1889.

Told in a City Garden: Tales and Lyrics. By Eastwood Kidson. London: Elliot Stock. 1889.

least—in some admirable stanzas on the making of opals (pp. 16, 17)—is a true ally of the poet. Written in other moods and a less ornate style are the remaining poems. Nothing could be more remote from the elaborate gem-poems of the "Casket" than the unadorned simplicity of the charming song "In Happy Days":—

The harvest moon stands on the sea,
Her shining rim's a-drip;
She gilds the sheaves on many a lea,
The sails on many a ship;
Glitter, sweet Queen, upon the spray,
And glimmer on the heather;
Right fair thy ray to show the way
Where lovers walk together.

The red wheat rustles, and the vines
Are purple to the root,
And true love, waiting patient, wins
Its blessed time of fruit;
Lamp of all lovers, Lady-moon,
Light these glad lips together
Which reap alone a harvest sown
Long ere September weather.

Moved by the "passionate pleasure" excited by Dr. Wharton's edition and version of Sappho, Michael Field has undertaken the "extension" of the antique fragments of song into "lyrical form." The enterprise is undoubtedly bold. It involves more than the attempt to sing the songs of Sappho in a strange tongue. "Extension," in this instance, implies either the lyrical completion of fragments that are often extremely slender and imperfect, however inspiring, or a process of expansion that must tend perilously towards diffuseness. The task is one that may well fall to a poet, though there is the ever-imminent danger of the intrusion of the artificer, with his modern method of elaboration and the premeditated art that is alien to lyrical poetry. "Lyrical form" is one thing, and readily attained; the spirit of the lyric is another, and by no means at the command of the poet with a set task such as this. Perhaps it is scarcely surprising that all of the seventy poems in Long Ago are not even lyrical in form. The most liberal or exhaustive definition of lyrical poetry cannot be said to comprehend a goodly number of Michael Field's extensions of Sappho, and slight, indeed, is their connexion with the Greek text, which supplies the theme or subject developed in the completed poem. The beauties of these poems are for the most part of the picturesque order, and the ingenuity and dexterity of the modern craftsman are sufficiently apparent. Altogether, we are impressed by the poet's skilled artistry and essentially modern forms of expression, rather than swayed responsive to the lyrical emotion. The address to Aphrodite, suggested by one of the most ardent and the most perfect of the Sapphic lyrics, is grievously marred by these lines:—

For me the trembling boy grows honey-pale,
While for the mighty
Fervours of Phaon's breast, without avail
My mad heart prays.

There is disillusion, too, in the grotesque expression of Sappho's aspiration while witnessing the choral rites of the virgins of Artemis:—

O moon, be fair to me as these,
And my regretful passions ease;
Restore to me my only good,
My maidenhood, my maidenhood!

Better representatives of the poet's lyrical powers than the more ambitious strains that treat of the "fearful mastery of love," in what purport to be the fearless, unashamed outpourings of Sappho, are the songs of simpler form and wider scope and application. Here is an excellent example of Michael Field's singing capacity:—

Spring's messenger we hail,
The sweet-voiced nightingale;
She sings where ivy weaves
Blue berries with dark leaves.

The glades are soft with dew,
The chestnuts bud anew,
The fishers set their sails
To undelusive gales.

The shepherd's pipe is heard,
The villages are stirred
To shout the wine-god's praise,
And jest in rural ways.

Then breaks the piercing note
From Philomel's wild throat,
Passion's supremest pain
That may not hope again.

Ah, woe is me! I learn,
When light and flowers return,
Love's anguish, cark and care;
Its infinite despair

Comes back, and makes me mad,
Telling how all is glad;
Then swell the throb, the wail,
The want, O nightingale!

Battle and After is a curious specimen of the "poem with a purpose," Mr. St. John Tyrwhitt's purpose being the illustration of a spiritual law, analogous to the law of gravitation, by which the souls of men, whether they be "full of disobedience and crime, or the contrary," are irresistibly impelled towards the centre of the spiritual life—the Maker and the Judge. The poet admits that the operation of man's free-will must modify the action of this law, though no modification can suspend it or render it ineffectual. In Battle and After the poetic exposition falls far short of the spiritual significance of the theme. We are not at all concerned about the orthodoxy of Mr. Tyrwhitt's speculation, which, he is advised, is "harmless in a doctrinal point of view," and have only to consider the fragmentary lyrical drama in which its elucidation is attempted. This, we are compelled to find, is a cheerless undertaking. The poem is composed of choruses of spirits, depressingly commonplace in structure and diction, and some rather dusky discourse between a celestial "Guide" and the emancipated spirit of "Thomas Atkins, late sergeant, Grenadier Guards," slain at the fight of Abu Klea. Mr. Tyrwhitt's failure is, after all, deserving of no severity of censure, for it is doubtful if there be more than one poet living capable of an imaginative treatment of so transcendental a theme.

Mr. Horace Smith's volume appears to be made up of new verse and old. There is much freshness and melody in the poetry of the shorter lyrics, though in none is there much revelation of a vigorous or imaginative personality. Perhaps the most notable poems are the blank verse narratives, "Abel Andrews" and "Memories," which reproduce the idyllic manner of the Poet Laureate not unhappily:—

Old Abel Andrews, sitting in the sun
Outside the Haycock Inn I saw, and turned
To greet him. Hale and honest, double-chinned,
Red-faced, and open-hearted, stout and true.
A jovial burly nature, mixed with gleams
Of tender kindness, rough in the rind,
Yet soft and sweet within, old Andrews lived
A quiet life as landlord of the Inn.

"'Tis not so fine this year, sir, not so bright
As I could wish; for last October, sir,
I could not mind the brewing as I used,
And so the ale was spoiled by other folk.
You mind young Annie Clayton of the farm
Up yonder on the hill, among the elms,
She died, sir, last October." Then he paused,
And I, "Indeed, I had not heard—how came 't?"
"Well, well, the tale is sad enough!" he said,
"Some folks will say hard things; but I say, No!
Mayhap her foot slipped as she crossed the bridge."

Distinctly literary is the inspiration of Verse-Musings, though the source is not always directly indicated as in the series "Quotations and Comments." In these the poet takes a text from some favourite author, and holds forth as one who expounds to the multitude. Mr. Owen may be a thoughtful writer, though he does not seem to possess adequate gifts of expression and concentration. His method can only be acceptable to persons who think that poetry can be written at will by any one who has learned the trick of verse-making. The most daring effort in the volume is an "Ode to the Skylark," from which we cull this pretty feat of mimicry:—

I mark thy rhythmic glee,
Ti-ra-lee, ti-ra-lee, ti-ra-lee,
In triplets trippingly;
Then trā-tā-rā, trā-tā-rā-lee,
In rhythmical dactylic melody,
Tit-ār-ā-lee-lee; tit-ār-ā-lee-lee,
Swiftest dactyle expanding to spondee,
Myriad numbers with measures blend freely.

Idylls of the Home is a narrative poem, with fair interspaces of reflective moralizing, in blank verse that is somewhat too smooth and unvaried, though altogether fully up to the standard of the minor poet's execution. The picture of love in a cottage "full hard upon the verge of Paradise," in Mr. Douglas's Idylls, is full of pretty touches of art, though our charmed contemplation is now and again startled by some bravery of phrase or far-strained simile that little befits the poet's subject. Let Mr. Douglas only be natural, forget the "poet's diapason," and yearn no longer to "drain Apollo's harp-strings of their harmonies," and he may produce idylls of a purer order of art than these.

Mr. Kidson's volume includes several examples of the versified story, none of which gains greatly by not being told in prose. As an artist in landscape the poet shows favourably in "Poppy Grange," a story that is not unskillfully planned, though in its main incident a good deal incredible. Only in a poem or novel could "the law's all-confident minions" play such pranks as Mr. Kidson sanctions in this poem. Surely, too, it is not the voice of nature we hear when the wife of a yeoman or squire thus refers to the loss of her son:—

Come, Lawrence, talk to me, and give me hope
Concerning our lost Mark. 'Tis hard to cope
With sorrow in forced silence, to be dumb
As marble Niobe, when voices come
From mute and senseless things which speak of him,
Reproaching our unnatural silence grim.

To make a poem of a story is a greater and rarer achievement than the young bards of the day appear to imagine. Easy may be the devising of the tale; in the transmuting process lies one of the most strenuous tests of the poet's art.

TWO BOOKS ON ART.*

MRS. STRANAHAN'S History of French Painting is one of those fortunate books that come just when they are wanted, and are neither too ambitious nor too full for their purpose. Much attention has been paid of late to French painting. Many artists of merit in every country have been educated in France. Moreover, to France is due a revival in landscape art and in the technique of painting of all kinds. A history of painting, then, that is to satisfy the real demands of the day must deal before all with the art of this century. The material of this part of history until Mrs. Stranahan brought it together was scattered in magazines, letters, lectures, and foreign notices of particular men and schools. Mrs. Stranahan has collected information very carefully from all sources, and has shaped it to fit a general account of the movement of the century. It has been no easy and no small task to cut down the voluminousness of individual memoirs or particular criticism to the comparative importance required in her scheme of history; to pair off the conflicting partialities of various writers and critics, and so obtain something like the truth; to walk circumspectly amidst the clamour of contemporary quarrels, and fairly note the merits of the vanquished as well as the conquering school. The author has performed her task with judgment, modesty, and wakeful conscientiousness. She has not trusted to her own feelings, prejudices, or knowledge. Where their opinions have been recorded, she has let artists speak for themselves. She has embodied the æsthetic views of all parties in plain language, free from personal gush and sentiment; and, although one may divine the direction of her own tastes, one admires all the more the candour with which she has put forward the claims and explained the intentions of unsympathetic schools. Nearly three-quarters of the book are devoted to the nineteenth century; and it is by the success of the modern division that Mrs. Stranahan's work must be judged. The earlier centuries have been treated better, more fully, and with closer sympathy by other authors. As far as we know, Mrs. Stranahan is the only one who has given a complete, succinct, and duly proportioned account of French painting in our own age. And the history of modern French painting since David is the history of art in this century, or the best part of it. This History will be chiefly used as a reference-book by writers, artists, dealers, amateurs, &c. To make it thoroughly serviceable to such persons the index at the end should be fuller and more correct. Every name that appears in the book, whether in the small or large print, should also appear in the index. Many names of importance—such as Falguière and E. Delaunay—are not to be found in the index. The author, rightly or wrongly, has not considered them worthy of separate notice. They occur only in lists arbitrary in arrangement and not easily consulted. Again, for instance, we find in the index the name Danton; turning up the page indicated, we find him in a list with Duez, Gervex, Bastien-Lepage, Dagnan-Bouveret, and other modern men of note. Now there may be such a painter; but he is certainly not of such consequence as Dantan, whose name does not appear in the index, and whose work is of a sort to entitle him to be mentioned with the artists named. As this book does not pretend to eloquence or originality of view, all the more care should have been taken to make it valuable as a book of reference and dictionary of French art. In a subsequent edition it would be well, not only to enlarge the index, but to print and arrange the very valuable list of painters in a form clearer and more easy to consult. This is the more necessary as the classification of painters of the nineteenth century is extremely difficult. No one could guess under which head to look for certain painters. Perhaps any possible arrangement would have been open to the charge of vagueness; all the more reason to use every resource of type and arrangement to guide one among such divisions and subdivisions as Classic, Romantic, Classic-Romantic, Neo-Classic, Naturalistic, Orientalist, Landscape, Semi-Classic or Historic, Historical Genre, Rustic Genre, Figures in elevated style, Sympathetic Genre, Landscape and Marine, Impressionists, and one or two more. Some of these divisions are based on difference of manner, others on difference of subject, and so on. The importances of division and subdivision are scarcely maintained. Probably the author intended to make subjects rule the divisions and manner the subdivisions, but the intention has not been uniformly carried out. We do not wish to criticize the author's application of the names of schools—that would mean an essay on the terms Classic, Romantic, Naturalistic, &c. The distinctions are unfortunately vague, and have been applied sometimes to subject and sometimes to style. We only suggest that a clearer arrangement, under fewer and more distinct heads, would improve an already excellent book. It is baffling to find Millet buried in a corner for the sake of a Rustic Genre, or Decamps stowed away with a single companion, Marilhat, in order to provide Period II. with an Oriental compartment. Corot and Français, by the way, are as Classic as they are natural; indeed, they may be called Neo-Classic quite as justly as Gleyre, Couture, Hamon, &c.; yet they are both, perhaps

* A History of French Painting, from its Earliest to its Latest Practice, including an Account of the French Academy of Painting, its Salons, Schools of Instruction, and Regulations. By C. H. Stranahan. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1889.

The Enchanted Island; The Venice of Titian, and other Studies in Art. By Wyke Bayliss, F.S.A., President of the Royal Society of British Artists. London: Allen & Co.

unavoidably, under the class Naturalist of Period II. But chief among the Naturalists of Period I. is H. Vernet; now the naturalism of Vernet is most unlike the quality so called to be found in Corot. Cocherneau, who painted "L'Atelier de David," in the Louvre, was much more of a naturalist, or realist if you will, than Vernet; but we cannot find him in this book. The question arises whether by Classic you mean a painter of classic subjects, a painter in the traditions of David, a painter in the traditions of old masters of the culminating schools, or any painter who uses form and colour in the service of broad and serious decoration; whether by Naturalist you mean a man who paints every day subjects in any style, a man not concerned with decoration, but with natural character of forms and colours, or a man chiefly occupied with showing real light as seen on objects at certain focuses. There is no uniformity in the way these terms are used, and Mrs. Stranahan's work does nothing to determine their meaning. But those who read her book will be, for the most part, people who have their own views on these questions, and the only faults they will have to find with Mrs. Stranahan will be a want of clear and evident headings and too many long lists, so jammed together that the eye cannot easily disengage the names from the text. Full accounts of the French Academy, the Institute, the Beaux Arts, the annual salons, the system of rewards, and a careful history of the changes of constitution of these bodies, renders the work peculiarly interesting to students.

Some people will like Mr. Wyke Bayliss's book The Enchanted Island. They will call it elevating, and will take to themselves great merit because they have not been depressed by the fine vagueness of the preacher, his endless allegory, and his panting pursuit of the stalest sirens of sentiment. Among his admirers will be no one who likes things said straightly and with as little of the fume and vapour of art cant as is possible, no one who refuses to mistake the figure for the thing figured; no one who prefers clearness to mystification, sense to singularity, and information to moral advice. Mr. Wyke Bayliss could tell us something about art; but unfortunately that is not his really heartfelt desire. He has read a good deal of many books, chiefly poetical, and his wish is to plant a few phrases and metaphors that he is in love with; for he is a most unhappy victim to words. If he finds it possible to attach one of these figurative expressions by any slender connexion to a real thing, he instantly considers the expression and the thing as the same, and proceeds to argue from one to the other. The method is one well known of late since art has fallen into popular discussion. The word purity favours this purpose. It can be applied to many things not related to one another even in the most distant connexion, as, for instance, pencil lines, water, and the domestic hearth, the latter whether understood metaphorically or directly. Then many terrible moral lessons can be held up to the artist or the town surveyor, though only in the case of the former would any one be fool enough to attach importance to the sermon. Mr. Wyke Bayliss is too curious in research to content himself with such cheap performance as this. He immerses you and himself in a whole chapter of strained and long-drawn allegory, till neither can know the ground of his preaching or what is real and what is imagined. It is a pity that art has become a vehicle for moral reflection. It ceases to be the consolation of mankind; that field where every one might throw up their caps and enjoy a holiday. But we may yet hope; even thus was jam prostituted in the conveyance of Gregory's Mixture, and yet jam is triumphant. Our age is, unhappily, sententious and a victim of phrases and tall talk. Even the once irresponsible artist is become concerned about his neighbours' views, and the clown and ballet-dancer itch to thump the pulpit. Naturally, then, the professional who deals in words cannot be kept from new fields of metaphor and illustration. To find sermons in stones may have been safe enough in Shakspeare's time; but the intractable stubbornness of modern geology makes the game dangerous nowadays; and so art is the favourite vehicle for conveying gush, fads, and discontent with one's neighbours' morals. Even the speakers at the Art Congress at Liverpool regarded art, not only as a minister to spiritual wants and fit medicine for a mind diseased, but as a universal panacea for all evil. The prescription seemed to be—Mix purity, virtuous indignation, a faint spice of allusion to brass work; dilute according to taste with Religion or Socialistic fads, and label Art, to be taken in and out of season. The end of Mr. Bayliss's book is even more wearisome than the beginning. Many pages are devoted to parallel passages from Professor Palgrave's Decline of Art and Mr. Bayliss's Witness of Art. This is to dispute with Mr. Palgrave the possession of such common property in ideas as "To the Greeks, it is hardly too much to say, the world owes the creation of the Beautiful—that first and last word in art." "The fine arts, which are always the expression of their age, changed with it." "The sense of beauty belonged to the Greek race," &c.

TWO FOLK-LORE BOOKS.*

MISS SMITH is an enthusiast "on" her subject, to use a phrase of her own. She writes about gipsy poetry, and remarks that some of it is perhaps in terseness and expressiveness equal to anything in the whole circle of Gentile poetry.

* Through Romany Songland. By Laura Alexandrine Smith. London: Stott. 1889.

Eastern Romances and Stories. By W. A. Clouston. Privately printed. 1889.

Miss Smith may not find all her readers of the same mind. Her pretty little book contains examples of gipsy music, and a great many extracts from Ouida, Mr. Groome, Mr. Leland, Longfellow, Miss Strettell, Mr. Keary, and the Songs which Scott put into the mouth of Meg Merrilies. On the whole, we gain from Miss Smith's compilation the idea that gipsy poetry is, as a rule, the popular poetry of the country where the gipsies happen to find themselves. Occasionally, as in Spain and Hungary, there is a wild nomadic sentiment:—

I a gipsy child was born,
Of a mother all forlorn;
In the long grass I was lain (sic),
None baptized me but the rain.

But in several cases Miss Smith might almost as well have quoted Mr. Matthew Arnold's poem "To a Gipsy Child" as some of the pieces she has inserted. What is gipsy in this?—

Dans votre humeur coquette
Vous me contez fleurette.
Ah! que vous seriez obligeant
Si vous me comptiez de l'argent.

In your mischievous coquetry
You ask the flower petals of my love—
Ah! how obliging you would be
If you would count me out some money.

The translation donne furieusement à penser. "Johnny Fa," again, is more a ballad about gipsies than a gipsy ballad. Miss Smith mentions that she has not visited Yetholm, as she hears that the gipsies there have become settled in "neat cottages," disproving the proverb "No washing will turn the gipsy white"—a saying attributed to Ferdousi. It appears that the Scotch gipsies still sing the ballad of "Hughie the Graeme," but nobody pretends that they composed it, nor the ballad of "Hugh of Lincoln," which has been taken down from the recitation of a negro child in New York. Miss Smith's book, to be brief, is mainly a compilation, and at second hand. It is not uninteresting, but is purely popular, and of no value for anything like serious study of gipsy verse. In fact, one would imagine, on the evidence of this work, that the gipsy taste in song is local, not characteristic of the race, though there may be a preference for songs of adventure. Miss Smith is so indifferent to accuracy that she vaguely quotes "a French novel whose name and author I have entirely forgotten," and cites a song from this valuable source. This is clearly not the right way of collecting and editing popular songs.

Mr. Clouston's collection of Eastern Romances and Stories is, of course, a much more valuable work. The stories are from Persian, Tamil, and other sources; they are long, and copiously decorated in the Eastern taste. A man hears "a pleasing tale" in a bazaar, he "adorns it with flowers of rhetoric," he places it in a moral setting, and the result is such romances as Mr. Clouston publishes with notes. The stories are popular material, dressed up in robes of Oriental state. Instead of saying "There was a rich man," these tedious people write "The caravan of his good fortune had for a long time travelled in the lands of success; the hand of detriment was never extended towards the skirts of his wealth; nor did the Simúm of loss and misfortune ever blow in the gardens of his prosperity, so that he passed all his days in the cradle of happiness and content." After a few pages of this stuff, the Western jaws are extended in the yawn of tedium, and the Western head sleeps in the cradle of lassitude. The wickedness of women, the malice of men, the impossibility of resisting Fate are among the topics which the tales are made to illustrate. The Oriental mind can rarely tell a plain tale, but must drag in pearls of rhetoric and sapphires of edification. Mr. Clouston says little about the disputed questions of the origin of popular tales:—"All that is now maintained by the so-called Benfey school is that many of the Western popular tales current orally, as well as existing in a literary form, during the mediæval times which are found in old Indian books reached Europe from Syria, having travelled thither from India through Persia and Arabia, and that this importation of Eastern fictions had been going on long before the first crusades." Mr. Clouston's grammar is hard to construe, "during the mediæval times which are found in old Indian books reached Europe from Syria"—we make no sense out of this. If Mr. Clouston means that many Oriental stories got into mediæval literature through a series of translations, his position is impregnable. But popular versions of many of those very tales had been current in the West, probably before Homer's time. Nothing proves that they came from the East, though late literary forms of them did arrive in Europe through various versions from the Sanskrit. But perhaps as to this proposition, too, Mr. Clouston "draws the finger of acquiescence over the face of content," like Hatim Tai. We confess that we are bored by húrî-like damsels who declare that "men are of weak intellect, and so fickle that they bestow every moment their affection on a new object. One eye needs not two pupils, and one scabbard cannot contain two swords. Let no one be thirsty in a river, nor wish for flowers in a garden." This is playing the bosh, or, in English, is "fiddlestick." Who will may pursue the adventures of the washerman, the painter, and the geomancer. Mr. Clouston's notes are the best part of the book, and show a wide knowledge of Märchen. For these we extend the hand of gratitude to the forehead of instruction; but as for the dismal moral legends, we shake the fist of indignation at the Oriental apologue of pedantic imbecility.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE veteran chansonnier who now publishes Nouvelles chansons (1) is the very last survivor of his school. In M. Nadaud's verse there is scarcely a trace of the influence of 1830 (though he was but ten years old then), and he is hardly even a follower of Béranger so much as a junior boy in the school which Béranger himself captained under the tuition of Desaugiers and the elders. The reversion to this style (now that those which supplanted it, and which no doubt were at their best far loftier poetry, have dwindled down too often into maundering mannerism) is not unpleasant. It was perhaps not unnatural, though certainly we think unfortunate, that M. Nadaud should think it necessary to take notice in a preface of a spiteful bit of newspaper gossip revived from time to time, like all such things, in which Lamartine is said to have avenged himself for a fancied slight (Nadaud having obeyed a summons from the Princess Mathilde, thereby breaking an engagement with the poet) by an ill-tempered and insulting impromptu in which M. Nadaud was called a "chansonnier," per invidiam, and accused of frequenting the victors in preference to the vanquished. The matter is a trumpery one, and, though M. Nadaud himself comes quite scatheless out of it, Lamartine, while disavowing the actual verses, seems to have admitted a vexation which does not do much credit either to his good sense or his temper. The text of the book is a welcome change from pettinesses of this kind. M. Nadaud's verse is sometimes a little trivial, and very rarely has something, not of the grivoiserie, but of the coarseness, of the old chanson; but at his best he can do the thing excellently. Here, for instance, is a pastiche (songs of this particular kind are almost necessarily pastiches) which seems to us so good that we must make an exception to an almost necessary rule in this place and quote it:—

C'étaient trois hussards de la garde
Qui s'en revenaient en congé;
Ils chantaient de façon gaillarde
Et marchaient d'un air dégagé.
"Je vais revoir celle que j'aime;
C'est Margoton, dit le premier.
— C'est Madelon, dit le deuxième.
— C'est Jeanneton, dit le dernier."
Un homme était sur leur passage:
"Hé! C'est Jean, le sonneur, je crois.
Quoi de nouveau dans le village?
— Tout va toujours comme autrefois.
— "Et Margoton, notre voisine?
— J'ai sonné ses vœux l'an dernier,
Car elle est sœur Visitandine
Dans le couvent de Noirmoutier.
— "Et Madelon! toujours bien sage?
— Oui dà. Pour elle j'ai sonné,
Voilà dix mois, son mariage,
Voilà dix jours, son premier né.
— "Et Jeanneton, dit le troisième,
Toujours heureuse?—Ah? sûr, ment:
Trois mois passés aujourd'hui même,
J'ai sonné son enterrement.
— "Sonneur, si tu vois Marguerite
Dans le couvent de Noirmoutier,
Dis-lui que je la félicite
Et que je vais me marier.
— "Sonneur, si tu vois Madeleine
Dans la mai-on de son époux,
Dis-lui que je suis capitaine
Et que je fais la chasse aux loups.
— "Sonneur, quand tu verras ma mère,
Va la saluer chapeau bas;
Dis-lui que je suis à la guerre,
Et que je ne reviendrai pas."

Although there is nothing of the very first importance in the well-printed volume which contains the Memoirs of Count de Rochechouart (2), who was born the year before the outbreak of the French Revolution, and died in 1858, the book is by no means ill worth reading. M. de Rochechouart's date and connexions made it practically impossible for him to avoid serving, if he served at all, some foreign Power, and the hazard of the gambling-table more than anything else decided him to serve Russia. He had wished to do so, but had not money enough to reach the Czar's dominions; so he set aside two louis, resolving if he lost to go to Verona and enter the Austrian army, if he won to make for Poland; he did win, was taken up by Richelieu (then Duke of Fronsac, and a successful soldier of fortune in the Czar's service), and saw some not uninteresting service in the South of Russia, and then in the great campaigns which brought about the downfall of Napoleon. There is not much here that has to do with events later than 1815, and nothing that is dated after 1834. The whole is a fair "document"—one more for the painful historian to riddle, and not such a bad specimen for riddling.

One more volume has been added to the handy illustrated edition of M. Daudet's books. This time it is Jack (3), which would be a work of genius if a certain work called David Copperfield had not had the ill manners to precede it, which would be purely pathetic but for the unpleasant suspicion of the personalities which are M. Daudet's besetting sin in the sketches of "Les ratés," and which is in any case a very clever book. The illustrations are those curious smudgy lithograph vignettes which have been fashionable for a time, and which vary from rather good to intolerably bad.

M. L. Wuarin (4) begins with an allegory about the giant Mille-Bouches and the giant Amicopopolo, which is not the worst attempt that we have seen to write like Voltaire. Unluckily, the attempts to write like Voltaire (with very rare exceptions, such as Ixion, The Infernal Marriage, &c.) are generally classable in some degree or other of badness. However, this only concerns the preface. When M. Wuarin sets to work seriously to consult the purse of the contribuable and its interests, he is less ambitious, but hardly more judicious, as may be judged from the fact that he is for the election of magistrates, and that he wants to "interdire à tout élu du peuple des relations d'affaires personnelles avec les autorités au milieu desquelles il siège."

We have before us three philosophical, or physiologico-philosophical, books. M. Janet's (5) laborious and intelligent carrying out of a certain kind of psychological inquiry is well known, and his Automatisme psychologique is a respectable new instalment of it. It has been decided by many authorities that the late M. Guyau (6) was a very clever young man, and we are certainly not going to "fight a prize" by contesting it here. Certainly M. Guyau was a distinguished representative of his school—the school which tries to make a kind of science out of collecting, classifying, and commenting on a vast and heterogeneous assortment of literary quotations, popular ideas, observed facts or suppositions—in short, the school of Mr. Herbert Spencer. M. Guyau's untiring eulogist, M. Alfred Fouillée, strikes a useful keynote by telling us that Guyau, compared with Mr. Spencer, gives "a more sociological theory of style considered as an instrument of sympathetic communication and æsthetic sociability." Those to whom this statement conveys some meaning will doubtless enjoy the work. M. Beaunis (7), frankly physiological, is to us, we own, the most attractive of the three.

We may briefly note a French translation (Paris: Ollendorff) of the book called An Author's Love, which we are amazed to see during the last few days has been taken seriously by serious literary persons in England.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

"YET another book on Egypt"—Egypt under Ismail, by J. Carlile McCoan (Chapman & Hall)—may seem, in the opinion of the author, to require some apology. Mr. McCoan's plea for his book is not without substance. The reign of Mehemet Ali, he urges, has had many historians; while the equally important career of his reputed grandson has not yet been chronicled in complete and connected form. Here was a "still empty corner" in the well-worked field of Egyptian history, and Mr. McCoan proceeds to occupy it, attracted by the unparalleled despotism, extravagance, and "loan-mongering spoliation" that characterized the long rule of the late Viceroy. The result, as a contribution to history, needs no excuse. Mr. McCoan's acquaintance with Egyptian affairs is evidently considerable, his painstaking industry in sifting the diverse materials at his command merits recognition, his plain and vigorous style decidedly becomes a chronicler whose only aim is to extenuate nothing. The sober historian of Ismail's reign is confronted with many difficulties; and Mr. McCoan is right in anticipating that all his statements may not be accepted as historical. Egypt has always been prolific of mysteries. That almost forgotten book by Mme. Audouard, Les Mystères de l'Égypte dévoilés, which the present writer utilizes, was a notable example of contemporary curiosity concerning the secret history of Ismail's intrigues. Perhaps Mr. McCoan, though a sober seeker after truth, is not ill advised in the choice of his sub-title, "a Romance of History." In contemporary records history is frequently compacted of mystery. For example, Mr. McCoan's account of the "removal" of Sadyk Pasha and the confiscation of his property is not entirely a solution of one of the most mysterious and dramatic events of Ismail's career, though it vividly reflects the irrepressible sensation it aroused in many quarters. The financial history of the period is very clearly set forth. It is treated in the impartial spirit of one who has probably neither suffered nor benefited by the foreign loans negotiated by Ismail, and who is yet, as is inevitable, a willing witness to the extraordinary business capacity of Mehemet's successor. Mr. McCoan tells us he was once bad courtier enough to tell Ismail "that if he had been a solicitor or a stockbroker he would have made his fortune," to which the Viceroy smilingly replied "Mais vous me flattez, mon cher"; but he "never quite forgot or forgave the maladroit compliment." There never was certainly a bolder experimenter in the arts of raising a revenue. The story of Ismail's financial operations and the ruinous fiscal oppression they entailed occupies the larger

(1) Nouvelles chansons à dire ou à chanter. Par G. Nadaud. Paris: Tresse et Stock.

(2) Souvenirs sur la Révolution, &c. Par le Général Comte de Rochechouart. Paris: Plon.

(3) Jack. Par Alphonse Daudet. Paris: Marpon et Flammarion.

(4) Le contribuable: comment défendre sa bourse. Par L. Wuarin. Paris: Alcan.

(5) L'automatisme psychologique. Par Pierre Janet. Paris: Alcan.

(6) L'art au point de vue sociologique. Par M. Guyau. Paris: Alcan.

(7) Les sensations internes. Par H. Beaunis. Paris: Alcan.

and more important portion of Mr. McCoan's very readable and interesting volume.

Mr. Edward Clifford's Father Damien: a Journey from Cashmere to his Home in Hawaii (Macmillan & Co.) is a little book that calls for no commendation to the reader. Everybody knows somewhat of the mission of the devoted young Belgian priest to the afflicted and long-neglected settlement of lepers at Molckai, and everybody will read with painful and absorbing interest Mr. Clifford's pathetic account of Father Damien's labours. It is a pity, perhaps, that Mr. Clifford should prefix to a narrative so simple and sincere and affecting an apology for his Protestantism, which we cannot but think is entirely needless. We question its propriety, and are convinced of its irrelevancy, even while in agreement with Mr. Clifford on the main points of the subject discussed. His book, happily, has other and stronger claims on readers than this casual incitation to polemics. Nothing could be more impressive than the story of Father Damien's life and death, nor is it conceivable that any one should read without feeling some assurance that the emotions it excites must produce lasting fruit. The plea, too, for legislation as to leprosy in India—"Our next duty," as Mr. Clifford's chapter is headed—will, it is hoped, be fruitful in another and extremely important direction. Another feature of this record of a voyage must be noted, and this is, the striking and vivid description of Hawaiian scenery. Mr. Clifford is a painter, who not only sees with the painter's eye, but depicts the wonders of Kilauea and the lake of fire with all the resources of the painter's art. His pictures of the volcanic region surpass all previous descriptive efforts of the kind.

Mr. William Oxley is a little indiscriminate in compiling his annals of human credulity, Modern Messiahs and Wonder Workers (Trübner & Co.), a title too suggestive of the exemplary "Great Men for Little Boys" or "Self-made Heroes" order of books. He masses great men and mean, seers and impostors, spiritual leaders and "cranks," Swedenborg with Johanna Southcott, Edward Irving with James White, and it is only in favour of Mme. Blavatsky that he feels any exception is to be made from this exuberant category. What Mr. Oxley calls "modern spiritual history" cannot be written in this way. His biographical sketches are not unamusing, but he offers no philosophical or historical survey of the subject. His indignant comments on the disgraceful antics of such prophets as Thomas Lake Harris and James White, the "Christian Israelite," are even more diverting than his evidently robust faith in "psychic power." The portraits in the book are among the most revolting examples of what used to be called "rude woodcuts" we have ever seen. The "Mrs. Girling" and the "Ann Lee," mother of Shakers, are gems in this style of art.

Something new in American poetry, even though it be light as sea-foam, is matter for gratitude. Novelty there is, of a truth, in Mr. Charles Henry Webb's Vagrom Verse (Boston: Ticknor & Co.) Clearly enough, from the dedication, it is no libel on the American language to declare "poet" suffers a thin sea-change to "pote" in the States:—

I do not come in purple dressed,
In pride of trolls and catches;
I come in rags and stand confessed
A poet of shreds and patches.

The vagrom pote has many moods, mostly lightsome. In the pretty verses to "Miss Kitten" he is like unto Mr. Ashby-Sterry, and when he addresses the "Coggia Comet" he invokes the shade of Hood. At his best, however, he suggests no parallel, as in "Deacon Brown." This whimsical production is a very pleasant satire on the universal taste for wicked heroes in fiction. It is "a dialectical excuse for a good man," and one stanza will suffice as a sample:—

His kerrieter, eh? What, old Deac. Brown?
Well, I'm ruther 'shamed to say
Thet he wa'n't much the sort o' saint
Sot up by Harte and Hay:
He never cussed in his nat'ral life—
I mention this with consarn—
He didn't know how, though he might a know'd
Ef he hed a car'd ter larn.

There is genuine humour in the demonstration of the Deacon's moral unfitness to stand as a hero in fiction.

Lessons of Hope (Macmillan) is an excellent selection from the writings of F. D. Maurice, edited by the Rev. J. Llewelyn Davies. The Lincoln's Inn Sermons, Theological Essays, Doctrine of Sacrifice, and other works of Maurice are drawn upon in the composition of the volume. The result is a body of extracts, each of which is truly self-contained, and the whole thoroughly representative of the writer's theology. To attain this end skill and sympathy were demanded, and Mr. Llewelyn Davies exhibits both qualifications.

The approach of harvest is signalized by a small collection of sermons, The Kindly Fruits of the Earth (Skeffington & Son), the work of Canon Atherton, Mr. S. Baring-Gould, and others. Brief, simple in style, appropriate to the season, and not too didactic in aim, these discourses are well suited to country congregations.

A new edition of Mr. Philip Acton's Songs and Sonnets (Longmans & Co.) should attract new readers to the sonnets comprised in it, many of which show more delicacy of expression than is common to modern poetry.

We have also received the "large paper" edition of Essays on Men and Books, "Lotos Series" (Trübner & Co.); the fifth edition of Dr. Hessey's Bampton Lectures, Sunday; its Origin, History, and Present Obligation (Cassell & Co.); a new edition of Stray Pearls, by Charlotte M. Yonge (Macmillan & Co.); and Sheridan's Plays, the first volume of the new sixpenny re-issue of "Morley's Universal Library" (Routledge).

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

ADVERTISEMENTS intended for the SATURDAY REVIEW should be addressed to the MANAGER of the ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT, at the OFFICE, 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON. A printed Scale of Charges can be obtained on application.

THE UNITED STATES.

The Annual Subscription to the SATURDAY REVIEW, including postage to any part of the United States, is £1 10s. 4d. or $7 39, and may be forwarded direct to the Publisher, Mr. WILLIAM BOYCE, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, or to Mr. B. F. STEVENS, American Agency, 4 Trafalgar Square, London. International Money Orders can be sent from any office in the United States, and Subscriptions, payable in advance, may commence at any time.

The SATURDAY REVIEW may be had every Saturday from Veuve J. BOYVEAU, 22 Rue de la Banque (near the Bourse),
Paris,
by whom also Subscriptions will be received.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW may likewise be obtained in Paris every Saturday of MESSRS. GALIGNANI, 224 Rue de Rivoli.

Nearly all the back Numbers of the SATURDAY REVIEW may be obtained through any Bookseller, or of the Publisher, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

Now ready, VOLUME LXVII., bound in cloth, price 16s. Cloth Cases for Binding all the Volumes, price 2s. each. Also Reading Cases, price 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. each. May be had at the Office, or through any Bookseller.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 1,762, AUGUST 3, 1889:

Ministers at the Mansion House.
Young Politicians. "Supported by Voluntary Contributions."
The End of the Royal Grants Debate.
The Aunt's Cheque. The Infectious Diseases Notification Bill.
The Troubles of Turkey. An Open Space—Gone.
A Lesson to the "New" Conservatives.
The Right of Search Again.
An Acting Consul and an Active Merchant.
The General's Rebuff. The New Radicals and the Old.
Axes to Grind.
Harvey.
The Railway Dividends. The Wail of the Playwright.
The Senoussia. George Clerk.
Two Students' Concerts. Cosmopolitan Cookery.

Early Letters of Jane Welsh Carlyle.
Novels. Ancient Charters.
Two Books on Central Africa.
The Diseases and Disorders of the Ox.
New Law Books and Editions. The Captain's Daughter.
Recent Verse. Two Books on Art.
Two Folk-Lore Books. French Literature.
New Books and Reprints.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

SCOTTISH PROVIDENT INSTITUTION

No. 6 ST. ANDREW SQUARE, EDINBURGH.

RESULTS for 1888.

NEW ASSURANCES COMPLETED £1,163,000.

Being for the 15th year in succession above a million.

PREMIUMS IN YEAR £558,875.

TOTAL INCOME £855,886.

CLAIMS (including Bonuses*) £328,530.

* Averaging 49½ per cent. on Policies Participating.

REALISED FUNDS, £6,516,468

(the Increase in year being £401,212).

PREMIUM FOR £100 AT DEATH: With Profits.

Age next Birthday	Payable during Life	Limited to 21 Payments
25	£1 18 0	£2 12 6
30*	2 1 6	2 15 4
35	2 6 10	3 0 2
40†	2 14 9	3 7 5
45	3 5 9	3 17 6
50	4 1 7	4 12 1

* A man of 30 may secure £1,000 at death by the yearly payment of £20 15s., which generally assures £800 only.

Or he may secure £1,000 by twenty-one yearly payments of £27 13s. 4d.—being thus free of payment after age 50.

† At 40 the Premium ceasing at 60 is, for £1,000, £33 14s. 2d.—about the same as most Offices require during the whole of life. Before these Premiums have ceased the Policy will have shared in at least one division of profits. To Professional Men and others, whose income is dependent on continuance of health, this limited payment system is specially recommended.

COMBINES THE ADVANTAGES OF

Mutual Assurance with Moderate Premiums.

THE PREMIUMS are so moderate that an Assurance of £1,200 or £1,250 is generally secured from the first for a yearly payment which elsewhere assures (with profits) £1,000 only—equivalent to an immediate Bonus of 20 to 25 per cent.

The WHOLE PROFITS go to the Policyholders, on a system at once safe and equitable,—no share being given to those by whose early death there is a LOSS. On this principle large additions have been, and will be, made to the Policies of those who live to participate, notwithstanding the lowness of the premiums.

The SURPLUS at last Investigation was £1,051,035, of which £350,345 was reserved for future participation. The number who shared was 9,384. First shares were (with a few unimportant exceptions) from 18 or 20 to 34 per cent., according to age and class. Other policies were increased 50 and 80 per cent.

The SOCIETY has taken a leading part in the REMOVAL OF FORFEITURES.

POLICIES, as a rule, are WORLD-WIDE, and free from Restrictions on Residence after five years—provided the Assured has attained age 30.

Surrender Values compare favourably with other first-class Offices.

June 1889.

JAMES WATSON, Manager.

BRANCH OFFICES:

GLASGOW, 29 St. Vincent Place.

ABERDEEN, 259 Union Street.

BRISTOL, 31 Clare Street.

LIVERPOOL, 25 Castle Street.

NEWCASTLE, 3 Queen Street.

DUBLIN OFFICE: 16 College Green.

BIRMINGHAM, 95 Colmore Row.

LEEDS, Royal Exchange.

MANCHESTER, 10 Albert Square.

BELFAST, 23 Donegall Place.

Secretary in London—J. MUIR LEITCH,

OFFICE, 17 KING WILLIAM STREET, E.C.

Subject, by special Acts of Parliament (1848 and 1884), to the jurisdiction of the English and Irish Courts.

Copies of Annual Report containing Tables of Rates and Full Information may be had.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CRYSTAL PALACE. — CHILDREN'S FIREWORKS
on Thursdays, August 1, 8, 15, and 22, at 8.30.

Amusing Novelties by C. T. Brock & Co. Novel Aquatic Fireworks, from Lake spanned by "Tower Bridge," Superb Illuminations, Saturdays, August 3, 10, 17, and 24, at 9.15.
Admission, One Shilling daily.

THE NEW GALLERY, REGENT STREET.—SUMMER EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. 9 till 7. Admission, One Shilling.

SCHWEITZER'S

COCOATINA.

GUARANTEED PURE SOLUBLE COCOA.

This Old-established Article retains its position as "the finest Cocoa in the market." It is unequalled in purity and flavour, bears the strictest Chemical test, and keeps in all Climates.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS AND ECONOMICAL.

VAN HOUTEN'S COCOA.

PURE—SOLUBLE.
BEST & GOES FARTHEST.
EASILY DIGESTED.
MADE INSTANTLY.

"Once used, always used—its PURITY is beyond question."
Health.

"It is admirable—flavour perfect—and so PURE."
British Medical Journal.

C. J. VAN HOUTEN & ZOON,
WEESP, HOLLAND.

ILFRACOMBE.—ILFRACOMBE HOTEL. Thoroughly furnished, equipped, and decorated. 250 Rooms. Eight Lawn-Tennis Courts, Large Swimming Bath, Private Baths. Descriptive Tariff of Manager.

THE GREATEST of all PIANOFORTES.

THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES, New York & London.
Steinway Hall, LOWER SEYMOUR STREET, Portman Square, London, W.

EDUCATIONAL.

ST. CLARE COLLEGE, WALMER, KENT.

Head-Master—The Rev. E. D'AUQUIER, M.A. Clare College, Camb. One of the Examiners to the Irish Board of Intermediate Education, late Head-Master of South-Eastern College, Ramsgate, with a staff of Assistant Masters (Graduates).

The College is situated in a delightful spot, close to the sea, and contains teaching and boarding accommodation, chapel, sanatorium, infirmary, playground, laundry, gymnasium, tuckshop, workshop, &c., 14 acres of well-timbered and beautiful grounds, cycle path, cricket and football fields, tennis-courts, &c., sea-bathing and boating.

The school year is divided into three terms; each term consists of about thirteen weeks. Inclusive fees, Eighty Guineas per annum. Exhibitions and Scholarships, of £10, £15, and £21, are annually thrown open for competition.

For further information, apply to the HEAD-MASTER.

HEIDELBERG COLLEGE, Heidelberg.

Principals.

Dr. A. HOLZBERG, Ph.D., M.A. Heidelberg.

A. B. CATTY, M.A., Christ's Coll., Camb.

WALTER LAWRENCE, M.A., St. John's, Oxon.

At the recent Exam. for the I.C.S. a Pupil of Heidelberg College obtained THE HIGHEST MARKS IN GERMAN of all the Candidates.
Mr. LAWRENCE in London: Oakley Lodge, Fulham, S.W.

THE LONDON HOSPITAL MEDICAL COLLEGE.

The WINTER SESSION will commence on Tuesday, October 1.

The Hospital, which is the largest general Hospital in the kingdom, contains nearly 800 beds, all in constant use. There are wards for Accidents, Surgical and Medical cases, Diseases of Women and Children, and Ophthalmic cases. Special departments for Diseases of the Eye, Ear, Throat, Skin and Teeth, and for Cancer, Tumours, Diseases of the Bladder, Piles, and Fistula. Number of in-patients last year, 8,873; out-patients, 101,518; accidents, 7,456. Surgical operations daily.

APPOINTMENTS—Resident Accoucheur, House Physicians, House Surgeons. Forty of these appointments are made annually. Numerous Dressers, Clinical Clerks, Post-mortem Clerks, and Maternity Assistants are appointed every three months. All appointments are free. Holders of resident appointments are also provided with free board. The New College Buildings are now complete, and afford more than double the former accommodation.

SCHOLARSHIPS AND PRIZES—Twenty Scholarships and Prizes are given annually. Luncheons or dinners, at moderate charges, can be obtained at the Students' Club.

The London Hospital is now in direct communication with all parts of the Metropolis. The Metropolitan, District, and other Railways have stations within a minute's walk of the Hospital and College.

For further information apply personally, or by letter, to Mile End, E. MUNRO SCOTT, Warden.

ST. MARY'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL, PADDINGTON, W.

The WINTER SESSION begins on October 1, with an INTRODUCTORY ADDRESS by Dr. MAGUIRE, at 4 P.M.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, one of £105, and FIVE of 50 guineas, of which two are specially open to Students from Oxford and Cambridge, will be awarded by Examination on September 26 and 27 at 10 A.M.

The Hospital has 251 beds, with well-appointed special departments for Diseases of Children and of the Eye, Ear, Skin, and Throat. Eight resident appointments in it are open to students without expense or charge.

The School is replete with all the requisite laboratories and appliances for the study of Anatomy, Physiology, Chemistry, Pathology, Bacteriology, and Hygiene, and the course of teaching both in the hospital and the school provides complete preparation for every examination and degree.

The RESIDENTIAL COLLEGE is under the care of the Warden, Dr. LUFF.

The Prospectus, to be obtained by application to the School Secretary, contains full information as to the Scholarship Examinations, as to the Annual Prizes and School Scholarships, the course of study, and the Special Classes for the higher University degrees.

HERBERT W. PAGE, M.A., M.C., Cantab., Dean.

CRONDALL SCHOOL, FARNHAM, Surrey.—Invigorating country life, healthiest in England (see Registrar's Report). Preparation for Public Schools, Royal Navy, &c.; French and German guaranteed; school farm, cricket and football fields, tennis, carpenter's shop, riding ponies.—Address, PRINCIPAL.

CRYSTAL PALACE EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

THIRTIETH SESSION, 1889-90.

THE HIGHEST EDUCATION IN ART, SCIENCE, AND LITERATURE.

For LADIES: I. The School. II. Junior Section. Opens September 30.

GENTLEMEN: SCHOOL OF PRACTICAL ENGINEERING.

NEXT TERM September 9.

I. Mechanical Course. II. Civil Engineering Division. III. Colonial Section.

SCHOOL FOR THE IMPROVEMENT OF ESTATES. September 1.

Prospectuses in the Library, Byzantine Court, Crystal Palace.

F. K. J. SHENTON, F.R.Hist.S.

Superintendent Educational Department.

THE Rev. W. ALMACK, M.A., BRUCE CASTLE, near TOTTENHAM, prepares PUPILS wanting special help for the Universities, Army, Legal or Medical Preliminaries, or the ordinary requirements of business life. Excellent house in Park of 20 acres, containing Cricket and Football grounds. References, the Head-Masters of Charterhouse, Cheltenham, and Marlborough.

PRÉ SCILLA, LAUSANNE.—Miss WILLS, late Head-Mistress of the Norwich High School, has a very comfortable English HOME for Elder GIRLS. Garden and full-sized Tennis-court. Numbers limited. Subjects taken:—French, German, Italian, Music, Singing, and Painting.

THE Misses S. and R. ALLEN-OLNEY (formerly Head-Mistresses respectively of Blackheath and South Hampstead High Schools), residing in the healthy suburb of Hampstead, receive a few YOUNG LADIES to board and educate. The arrangements are those of a refined home. Large playground and full-sized tennis-court. Preparation for University examinations and degrees. Reference kindly permitted to parents of present and former pupils. —41 Belsize Park Gardens, London, N.W.

HILLSIDE, GODALMING, Surrey. (Close to Charterhouse.) Preparatory for Charterhouse and other Public Schools. A. M. CURTEIS, M.A., late Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford. G. GIDLEY ROBINSON, M.A., formerly Scholar of Exeter College, Oxford, and late Assistant-Master of Charterhouse.

BELL FARM, CLEWER HILL, WINDSOR.—BOYS prepared for ETON and other PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—Address Miss HIBBARD.

RADFORD HOUSE, COVENTRY. PREPARATORY SCHOOL for the SONS OF GENTLEMEN. Established 1800. Boys received from Six to Twelve years of age, and prepared for College and Local Examinations, which have hitherto been successfully passed by the Pupils of this School. Eight acres of recreation ground.—Apply for particulars to Mrs. and Miss HOUGHTON.

SCHOOL PIANOS.—NEW MODELS from 18 Guineas. All the latest Improvements. These instruments are remarkable for their beautiful tone, perfect touch, and durability. PIANOS for HIRE, or on the THREE YEARS' SYSTEM.—W. J. ENNEVER & SON, Manufacturers, 57 Berners Street, London, W.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS' UPRIGHT IRON GRAND PIANOFORTES. Prices from 40 Guineas upwards.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Pianoforte Makers by Special Appointment to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, 1889.—18, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W. Lists free.

A Y R T O N & T H O M A S, PATENT AGENTS.

Conduct every kind of British, Foreign, and Colonial Business connected with

PATENTS, DESIGNS, AND TRADE MARKS.

Mr. H. M. THOMAS, Author of "The True Position of Patentees," being a practical engineer, PERSONALLY SUPERINTENDS the applications in respect of mechanical inventions.

Moderate Terms. No charge for preliminary advice.

Telegraphic Address, "Prolonged, London."

& 10 Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, W.C.

FRY'S

J. WYBRANTS OLPHERTS, M.D., says: "I find it the most agreeable beverage of the kind I have ever tasted, delicious both in flavour and odour."

PURE CONCENTRATED

E. BUCKNILL, M.D., says: "Your Pure Concentrated Cocoa is so extremely nice that I have ordered it for family use."

COCOA.

BRAIN FAG, SHATTERED NERVES, Sleeplessness, Nervous Exhaustion, Rheumatism, Gout, Torpid Liver, Nervous Dyspepsia, &c. yield like magic to the healing influence of mild continuous currents of Electricity, generated, without any shock or discomfort whatever, by wearing

HARNESSE' ELECTROPATHIC BATTERY BELT.

This world-famed guaranteed genuine Electric appliance has cured thousands of sufferers, and should be worn by all in search of HEALTH, STRENGTH, and VITAL ENERGY. Write for descriptive pamphlet, containing copies of hundreds of unsolicited testimonials, or call, if possible, and personally consult Mr. C. B. HARNESSE, Consulting Medical Electrician (President of the British Association of Medical Electricians), 52 Oxford Street, London, W. (corner of Rathbone Place). Advice free, personally or by letter.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, Strand, W.C.—The COUNCIL earnestly appeal for DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS. £20,000 required for new Nursing Establishment, enlargement of Medical School, the Convalescent Home, and current expenses. Bankers: Messrs. Drummond.

ARTHUR E. READE, Secretary.

ROYAL ALFRED AGED MERCHANT SEAMEN'S INSTITUTION. Opened in 1867.

THE HOME, BELVEDERE, KENT.

Pensioners at all Ports of the United Kingdom.

Annual Disbursements, £6,000. Annual Subscriptions, £1,800.

Number of Inmates, 100. Out-Pensioners, 200.

Patron—Rear-Admiral H.R.H. THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH, K.G.

Chairman—Admiral Sir F. LEOPOLD MCCLINTOCK, F.R.S.

Deputy-Chairman—Captain DAVID MAINLAND, F.R.G.S.

The object of this Charity is to give a Home or a Pension to the Merchant Sailor when Old, Destitute, and Friendless.

800 Old Sailors, out of 1,700 Applicants, have enjoyed the benefits of this Charity; but from want of funds the Committee are unable to admit hundreds of necessitous and worthy Candidates, who for Forty years have been at Sea as Seaman, Mate, or Master.

Subscriptions and Donations are urgently needed to reduce this heavy list and to relieve many from destitution.

Bankers—Messrs. WILLIAMS, DEACON, & CO.

Office: 58 Fenchurch Street, London, E.C.

W. E. DENNY, Secretary.

METROPOLITAN DRINKING FOUNTAIN and CATTLE TROUGH ASSOCIATION.

Supported entirely by Voluntary Contributions.

This is the only Society providing Free Supplies of Water for Man and Beast in the streets of London and Suburbs.

Contributions are very earnestly solicited.

Bankers: Messrs. BARCLAY, BEVAN, TRITTON, RANSOM, BOUVERIE & Co.

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH LAW

LIFE ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION (Established 1839).

12 Waterloo Place, London. 120 Princes Street, Edinburgh.

Whole Life Bonuses never less than £1 10s. per cent. per annum.

Annuities.

Loans.

Liberal Conditions.

ARTHUR JACKSON, General Manager } 12 Waterloo Place,
FRANCIS E. COLENSO, F.I.A., Actuary } London.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY,

Established 1836.

LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE.

INCOME and FUNDS (1888).

Fire Premiums £215,000

Life Premiums 203,000

Interest 149,000

Accumulated Funds £3,581,000

PHENIX FIRE OFFICE,

LOMBARD STREET and CHARING CROSS, LONDON.—Established 1782.

Moderate Rates. Absolute Security.

Liberal Loss Settlements. Prompt payment of Claims.

W. C. MACDONALD } Joint Secretaries.
F. B. MACDONALD }

Losses paid over £17,000,000.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 22 PALL MALL, S.W.

Subscribed Capital, £1,200,000. Paid-up, £300,000. Total Invested Funds, over £1,600,000.

E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.

THREE per CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables; the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA.

This pure Solution is the best remedy for Acidity of the Stomach, Heartburn, Headache, Gout, and Indigestion.

DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA.

The safest and most gentle Aperient for delicate constitutions, Ladies, Children, and Infants.

180 Bond Street, London; and all Chemists.

First produced and designated CORN FLOUR
by BROWN & POLSON in 1856.

BROWN & POLSON'S
CORN FLOUR

Was in the Field some time before any other was anywhere heard of, and no other has now an Equal Claim to the Public Confidence.

AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

Dr. PAGET,

SURGEON-DENTIST,

445 STRAND, W.C.

(Facing Charing Cross Station.)

ARTIFICIAL TEETH,

without plates. Perfect imitations of the natural teeth. Artistic, painless, and perfect. Most moderate fees. Consultations free daily.

Illustrated pamphlet post free.

SCOTLAND.

THE MIDLAND COMPANY'S IMPROVED SUMMER
SERVICE of Express Trains from LONDON (St. Pancras) to SCOTLAND is now in operation, as under:

	DOWN TRAINS.—WEEKDAYS.				SUNDAYS.
	a.m.	a.m.	a.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.
LONDON (St. Pancras) dep.	5 15	10 30	10 40	8 25	9 15	8 25	9 15
Glasgow (St. Enoch) arr.	4 0	7 50	..	6 20	7 40	6 20	7 40
Greenock.....	4 35	8 29	..	7 32	8 22	7 32	8 22
Edinburgh (Waverley) ..	4 17	..	8 25	5 53	7 20	5 53	7 20
Perth.....	8 45	..	11 36	8 35	11 10	8 35	11 10
Aberdeen.....	9 35	..	3 5	11 45	1 55	11 45	1 55
Inverness.....	..	..	6 30	2 45	6 5	2 45	6 5
	p.m.	p.m.	a.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.

A—Sleeping Saloon Cars to Glasgow, Greenock, and commencing July 22nd to Edinburgh, and Perth, also B—Drawing-Room Saloon Car to Edinburgh. C—Drawing-Room Saloon Car to Glasgow. D—Sleeping Saloon Cars to Edinburgh and Glasgow. First-Class Passengers travel in the Cars attached to the Day Trains WITHOUT EXTRA PAYMENT. For Berths in Sleeping Saloon Cars the charge is 5s. in addition to the First-Class Fare.

The Night Express Trains reach Greenock in time for Passengers to join the "COLUMBA," "IONA," or "LORD OF THE ISLES" Steamers for the Highlands. Through Carriages from LONDON to Greenock by these Trains.

For particulars of Up Train Service from Scotland to London, see Time Tables issued by the Company.

Derby, July 1889.

JOHN NOBLE, General Manager.

P. and O. MAIL STEAMERS FROM LONDON TO

BOMBAY, GIBRALTAR, MALTA, BRINDISI, EGYPT, ADEN, and MADRAS via BOMBAY..... every week.

CALCUTTA, COLOMBO, CHINA, STRAITS and JAPAN, AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND and TASMANIA, and ALEXANDRIA..... every alternate week.

CHEAP RETURN TICKETS.

For particulars apply at the Company's Offices, 122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., and 25 Cockspur Street, London, S.W.

SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK
ISSUE of £371,320.

(Authorized by the Sheffield Corporation Acts, 1883 and 1889.)

The CORPORATION of SHEFFIELD give NOTICE that they are prepared to receive applications for the above sum of SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK. Minimum price of Issue £100 per cent.

Interest payable half-yearly, on March 1 and September 1, at the Sheffield and Hallamshire Bank, Sheffield, or by their London Agents, Messrs. GLYN, MILLS, CURRIE, & CO., 67 Lombard Street.

No sum less than £50 of Stock will be allotted, and any amount in excess of that sum must be a multiple of £10.

Forms of Prospectus, &c., and all information required, will be supplied by Borough Accountant's Office, W. FISHER TASKER, Registrar.
Bridge Street, Sheffield,
June 13, 1889.BOOKS, &c.*H. SOTHERAN & CO.

BOOKSELLERS, BOOKBINDERS, AND PUBLISHERS.

GENERAL AGENTS FOR PRIVATE BOOKBUYERS & PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS
IN AMERICA, INDIA, THE COLONIES, AND FOREIGN PARTS.A MONTHLY CATALOGUE OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS, published over forty years; Specimen No. gratis and post-free.

Telegraphic Address: BOOKMEN, LONDON. Established 1816.

136 STRAND, W.C. AND 36 PICCADILLY, W.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the ls.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly,
London. All the New and Standard Books. Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c.
Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates per annum, paid in advance:

Any part of the United Kingdom	£1	8	2
India and China	1	12	6
Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America	1	10	6

STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW.—The following NUMBERS
of THE SATURDAY REVIEW are required, for which 1s. each will be given, viz.:
1, 2, 15, 25, 56, 59, 73, 75, 99, 112, 130, 132, 135, 174, 452, and 1627 (clean copies)—at the Office,
34 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.STAMMERERS and STUTTERERS should read a book by a gentleman who cured himself after suffering nearly forty years.Post free for 13 stamps, from
Mr. B. BEASLEY, Sherwood, Willesden Lane, Brondesbury, London; or Green Bank House, Hall Green (near Birmingham).

Just published, price 12s. 6d., or in sheets, unbound, 7s. 6d.

MS. BIBL. REG. 17. A, or REGIUS MS. This celebrated Poem, the oldest document of the Craft (late 14th Century), reproduced in Facsimile, with a Glossary, Introduction, and Transcript, by Bro. H. J. WHYMPER, C.T.E., Past Dep. Dis. G.M. Punjab, Author of "The Religion of Freemasonry." Bound in exact imitation of the Original in the British Museum, and deemed by all authorities to be a most beautiful work of art.—SPENCER & CO., 15 Great Queen Street, W.C.

Price 2s.

SACRIFICE of EDUCATION to EXAMINATION: Letters from "All sorts and conditions of men."
WILLIAMS & NORGATE, London.THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

AUGUST. 2s. 6d.

A BREAKFAST PARTY IN PARIS. By FREDERIC HARRISON.
THE NEW LIBERALISM. By L. ATHERLEY JONES, M.P.
ON CHANGE OF AIR. By Dr. BURNEY YEO.
WANTED—A GOSPEL FOR THE CENTURY. By the Rev. Father BARRY.
THE DEADLY WILD BEASTS OF INDIA. By Sir JOSEPH FAYRER.
THE WORKS OF HENRIK IBSEN. By WALTER FREWEN LORD.
MR. GLADSTONE'S "PLAIN SPEAKING." By Lord BRABOURNE.
THE ART OF CONVERSATION. By Lord RIBBLESDALE.
PHENICIAN AFFINITIES OF ITHACA. By the Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE, M.P.
THE FRENCH IN GERMANY. By Professor GEFFCKEN.
WOOL-GATHERINGS. By FREDERICK GREENWOOD.
NOTICEABLE BOOKS—
(1) By the Right Hon. JOHN MORLEY, M.P. (2) By W. S. LILLY. (3) By ROWLAND
E. PROTHERO. (4) By Sir FREDERICK BRAMWELL. (5) By H. G. HEWLETT.
(6) By FREDERIC MYERS. (7) By the Hon. HALLAM TENNYSON.
THE APPEAL AGAINST FEMALE SUFFRAGE: A REJOINDER. By Mrs.
CREIGHTON.
APPENDIX—SIGNATURES TO THE PROTEST AGAINST FEMALE SUFFRAGE

LONDON: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW

For AUGUST.

Edited by FRANK HARRIS.

MR. GLADSTONE AND THE CIVILISED WORLD. By KARL BLIND.
DOWNING STREET AND AFRICA. By JOSEPH THOMSON.
GOUNOD'S VIEWS ON ART AND ARTISTS. By Mdlle. DE BOVET.
THE FORTRESS OF PARIS. With Map.
THE GREAT SERVIAN FESTIVAL. By J. D. BOURCHIER.
GIORDANO BRUNO. By WALTER PATER.
THE PRESENT DISCONTENT IN CYPRUS. By W. D. HOGARTH.
ROGER BACON. By W. L. COURTNEY.
PORTUGUESE BULL-FIGHTING. By OSWALD CRAWFORD.
MR. BROWNE IN A PASSION. By Professor R. Y. TYRRELL.
SOME TRUTHS ABOUT RUSSIA.

CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED.

Price Sixpence.

KNOWLEDGE.—An Illustrated Magazine of Science, &c.
CONTENTS—AUGUST:

MORTALITY AND ACCIDENTS FROM LIGHTNING. By W. MARRIOTT.
ON THE DISRUPTIVE EFFECTS OF LIGHTNING AND ON DARK FLASHES.
By A. C. RANYARD.
THE COMMON COCKROACH. By E. A. BUTLER.
THE PRODUCTION OF SUGAR. By WARD COLERIDGE, B.A.
EARTH-WORMS—II. By E. MANSEL SYMPSON, M.A., M.B. Cantab.
THE GREAT NEBULA IN ANDROMEDA, 31 MESSIER. By A. C. RANYARD.
GROWTH AND DECAY OF MIND. By the late RICHARD A. PROCTOR.
LETTERS: Sir G. G. STOKES, ARTHUR W. CLAYDEN, ISAAC ROBERTS, FRANCIS HERON.
SOME PROPERTIES OF NUMBERS. By ROBERT W. D. CHRISTIE.
THE FACE OF THE SKY FOR AUGUST. By HERBERT SADLER, F.R.A.S.
WHIST, CHESS, &c.

London: Wm. H. ALLEN & Co., 13 Waterloo Place. And all Booksellers.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 886. AUGUST 1889. 2s. 6d.

CONTENTS:

SCENES FROM A SILENT WORLD. By A PRISON VISITOR.
THE CRUISE OF THE "CHRYSALIS" (A 9-TON YAWL) OVER THE NORTH SEA TO HOLLAND, AND THROUGH HOLLAND, FRIES-
LAND, AND ON THE ZUYDER ZEE. By G. CHRISTOPHER DAVIES.
LADY BABY. Chaps. XXVII.—XXIX.
VATES. By CHARLES SAYLE.
CAMPED OUT UNDER THE CULLINS. A Region of Desolation. By Colonel PILKINGTON WHITE.
THE ROLL OF BATTLE: a Romance of Feudalism.
THE PLANTER'S BUNGALOW.
SO LONG AGO. (Roundel.) By C. W. B.
THE OLD SALOON.—THE WRONG BOX—IDEALA: A STUDY FROM LIFE—A WINDOW IN THRUMS—MARGARET MALIPHANT—
FRENCH AND ENGLISH, &c.
BRITISH AND AMERICAN DEMOCRACY.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

BLACKWOOD'S NEW SERIAL.

Part III. this day, price 1s.

TRAVEL, ADVENTURE, & SPORT.

From "BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE."

No. III. CONTAINS:—THE NORTH-EAST PASSAGE—TWO NIGHTS IN SOUTHERN MEXICO—ESCAPE OF THE REPUBLICAN EXILES FROM CAYENNE—A BEAR ADVENTURE IN CEYLON—A RIDE ACROSS THE PELOPONNESE. By GEORGE A. MACMILLAN.

* * * Each Part, containing several Sketches, will be uniform in size and type and will be issued on Alternate Months with the "TALES FROM BLACKWOOD."

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

Monthly, 2s. 6d.

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

CONTENTS FOR AUGUST.

THE PAPACY: A REVELATION AND A PROPHECY.
SPEECH AND SONG. II. SONG. By Sir MORELL MACKENZIE.
THE CENTENARY OF THE BASTILLE. By FREDERIC HARRISON.
A FEMALE MEDICAL PROFESSION FOR INDIA. By Sir W. W. HUNTER.
REFORM IN THE TEACHING OF THE OLD TESTAMENT. By Canon CHEYNE.
SOUTH AFRICA UNDER IRRESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT. By FREDERIC MACKENZIE.
MR. WALLACE ON DARWINISM. By GEORGE J. ROMANES, F.R.S.
THE PROPOSED ROYAL ACADEMY REFORM. By M. H. SPIELMANN.
IBSEN'S "PEER GYNT." By PHILIP H. WICKSTED.
THE CIVIL LIST AND ROYAL GRANTS. By HENRY DUNCLEY, LL.D.

ISBISTER & CO., LIMITED, 15 & 16 TAVISTOCK STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

AUGUST. 2s. 6d.

GROUSE SHOOTING. By GEORGE CAMPION.
THE RELIGION OF OUR BOYS. By AUSTEN PEMBER.
THE SOUTH AFRICAN PROBLEM. By Major H. ELSDALE, R.E.
LAND LEAGUE BALLADS. By C. J. HAMILTON.
PROFESSOR GREEN'S POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY. By F. C. CONYBEARE.
SOME EAST-END WORKWOMEN. By CLEMENTINA BLACK.
SOME FEW THACKERAYANA. By D. D.
THE FRENCH REVOLUTIONARY CALENDAR. By FRANCIS HITCHMAN.
AN EMPIRE OF CROFTERS. By JOHN ROE.
A FRENCHMAN'S IMPRESSIONS OF LONDON IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY. By ARTHUR IRWIN DASENT.
POLITICS AT HOME AND ABROAD.
CORRESPONDENCE.

LONDON: W. H. ALLEN & CO., 13 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

128 pp. price ONE SHILLING.

THE

NEWBERY HOUSE MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS OF NO. 2, AUGUST 1889.

THE REREDOS IN ST. PAUL'S, AND PERIL OF IDOLATRY. By the Rev.
T. HANCOCK, M.A.
LAY AND CLERICAL CONFERENCES ON CHURCH QUESTIONS. Conference I.
continued. By a PRIVILEGED REPORTER.
NOTES ON THE SUBJECTS, DATES, AND TEXTS OF THE PSALMS. Part II.
By the Rev. J. M. RODWELL, M.A.
THE ORNAMENTS RUBRIC. Part II. By the Rev. T. W. BELCHER, D.D.
SERMON OUTLINES FOR AUGUST. By the EDITOR.
INSTRUCTIONS ON THE CREED. Art. I. By C. THAYNE.
RECENT DISCOVERIES IN CHRISTIAN ARCHAEOLOGY IN ROME. Part I.
(Illustrated.) By the Rev. S. BARING-GOULD, M.A.
CHRIST'S HOSPITAL FIFTY YEARS AGO. I. Scholastic Life. (Illustrated.) By an "OLD CRUG."
"THE BISHOP'S BIBLE." Chaps. IV., V., VI. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY and H.
HERMAN.
THE ABBAYE DE CÉRISY. By Mrs. MOLESWORTH.
THE CHURCH ORGAN. By A. G. HILL, F.S.A.
WHAT WE ARE DOING FOR OUR GIRLS. By SARAH TYTLER.
POETRY. "DIVES." By Mrs. HAMILTON KING.
"BOY." A Story for the Young. (Illustrated.) By HELEN MILMAN. Continued.
BIBLICAL QUESTIONS FOR COMPETITION. By the EDITOR.
CURRENT EVENTS IN CHURCH LIFE.
CORRESPONDENCE AND REVIEWS.
CALENDAR FOR THE MONTH.
ILLUSTRATED TEXT—NOTICES OF FORTHCOMING MEETINGS, &c.

GRIFFITH, FARRAN, OKEDEN, & WELSH, LONDON.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON'S LIST.

Now ready, price 1s.

THE TEMPLE BAR MAGAZINE.

For AUGUST 1889 contains among other Articles of interest :

SIR CHARLES DANVERS. By the Author of "The Danvers Jewels." Chaps. 13-16—APROPOS OF SAMUEL ROGERS—GARRICK AND THE SHAKESPEARE REVIVAL—A COLLECTOR'S DREAM—FLOWERS AND FIRE—REMINISCENCES OF IMPERIAL PARIS—PAUL'S SISTER. By the Author of "His Cousin Betty." Chaps. 19-21. &c. &c.

"MEMORY'S HARKBACK THROUGH HALF-A-CENTURY."

THE RECOLLECTIONS OF DR. GRETTON.

1 vol. demy 8vo. 12s.

THE SCOTTS of BESTMINSTER. By
J. MASTERMAN, Author of "A Fatal Error" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

MISS SHAFTO. By W. E. NORRIS, Author of
"The Rogue," "Mlle. de Mersac," &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

ROBERT LEEMAN'S DAUGHTERS. By
J. FOGERTY, Author of "Lauterdale," "Caterina," "Countess Irene," &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

PAST FORGIVENESS? By Lady MARGARET
MAJENDIE, Author of "Precautions," "Fascination," &c. 2 vols. crown 8vo.

THE SEARCH for BASIL LYNDHURST.
By ROSA N. CAREY, Author of "Not Like Other Girls," "Nellie's Memories," &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LIMITED,

30 to 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.;
241 BROMPTON ROAD, SOUTH KENSINGTON, S.W.;
AND 2 KING STREET, CHEAPSIDE, E.C.

FOR THE CIRCULATION OF BOOKS.

SUBSCRIPTION from £1 1s. per annum.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists Gratis.

FOR THE SALE OF BOOKS.

Second-hand Copies of all the best Books of past Seasons,
at greatly Reduced Prices.
Lists with Prices Gratis.

FOR THE BINDING OF BOOKS.

On the Premises by the best Workmen.
List of Bound Books Gratis.

N.B.—All Lists and Prospectuses Gratis and
Postage Free to any Address.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY,

30 to 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Just published, small 4to. 350 pp., 7s. 6d., a New Posthumous Work of Dr. Anna Kingsford, forming a companion book to "The Perfect Way."

CLOTHED with the SUN; being the Book of the Illuminations of Anna (Bonus) Kingsford. With Preface, Notes, and Appendix, Exegetical and Biographical. Edited by EDWARD MAITLAND.

A work demonstrating the higher potentialities of man; interpreting the Mysteries and disclosing the "origines" of Christianity; restoring the Understanding as the basis of Faith; and going far to realize the most sanguine anticipations of that "new birth of religion in which philosophy, religion, and poetry shall be fused into a unity, to the full satisfaction of man's highest needs and aspirations."

 Mrs. Kingsford's Illuminations have been recognized far and wide by experts in religious science as destined largely to control the faith, worship, and practice of the future.
London: GEORGE REDWAY, 15 York Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

POPULAR EDITION OF L. B. WALFORD'S NOVELS.

Now ready, with Frontispiece engraved in Paris, from Drawings by Laslett J. Pott, cloth extra, each 2s. 6d.

MR. SMITH. A Part of his Life.

THE BABY'S GRANDMOTHER. By L. B. WALFORD,
Author of "Cousins," "Nan," "A Mere Child," &c.
The Author's other Novels will be published at intervals.
London: SPENCER BLACKETT & BALLAM, 35 St. Bride Street.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

COMPLETION OF THE UNIFORM EDITION OF ROBERT BROWNING'S WORKS.

Ready this day, with a Portrait of Mr. Browning. Crown 8vo. 5s.

VOL. XVI. FERISHTAH'S FANCIES, and PARLEYINGS with CERTAIN PEOPLE of IMPORTANCE in THEIR DAY.

 This Edition comprises 16 Volumes, each sold separately, price 5s. It contains Three Portraits of Mr. Browning at different periods of life, and a few Illustrations.
Prospectus on application.

FOR AN ARTICLE ON THE CURIOSITIES OF LEPERDOM

See the AUGUST Number of THE CORNHILL MAGAZINE.

Now ready (Sixpence), New Series, No. 74.

THE CORNHILL MAGAZINE for AUGUST.

Containing "THE BURNT MILLION," by JAMES PAYN, Author of "By Proxy" &c. &c. Chaps. 6-9—"CURIOSITIES OF LEPERDOM"—"THE DUD-
DON VALE AS IT IS AND IS TO BE"—"PATIENCE"—"MY ALBUM"—
"GROUSE AND PTARMIGAN," and "THE COUNTY," Chaps. 29-32.

New Vols. of Smith, Elder, & Co.'s Popular 2s. & 2s. 6d. Series.

Now ready, fcp. 8vo. boards, pictorial cover, 2s.; or cloth limp, 2s. 6d.

RICHARD CABLE, the Lightshipman. By the Author of "Mehalah," "John Herring," &c.

THE GAVEROCKS. By the Author of "Mehalah," "John Herring," &c.

The "MOLLY BAWN" SERIES of POPULAR NOVELS.

Works by the Author of "Molly Bawn," "Green Pleasure and Grey Grief," &c.
In Pictorial Cover, fcp. 8vo. 2s.; or in limp red cloth, fcp. 8vo. 2s. 6d. each.

PHYLLIS: A NOVEL.
MOLLY BAWN.
AIRY FAIRY LILIAN.
MRS. GEOFFREY.
ROSSMOYNE.
DORIS.
PORTIA.

BEAUTY'S DAUGHTERS.
GREEN PLEASURE & GREY GRIEF.
FAITH AND UNFAITH.
LADY BRANKSMERE.
LOYS, LORD BERRESFORD, & OTHER TALES.
UNDER-CURRENTS.

BOOKS FOR SEASIDE AND HOLIDAY READING.

 Messrs. SMITH, ELDER, & CO. will be happy to send, post free on application, a copy of their Catalogue, containing a list of 1s., 1s. 6d., 2s., 2s. 6d., 3s. 6d., 5s., and 6s. Popular Novels, together with a large number of Miscellaneous Works.

Among the Authors whose works are comprised in the Popular Novel Series are the following:—The Author of "Molly Bawn," the Author of "John Herring," James Payn, W. E. Norris, Hamilton Auld, Anthony Trollope, Mrs. Gaskell, Wilkie Collins, Holme Lee, the Brontë Sisters, &c. &c.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

HURST & BLACKETT'S NEW NOVELS.

BOTH OF THIS PARISH. By ALGERNON
GISSING, Author of "Joy cometh in the Morning." 2 vols.

A CROOKED PATH. By Mrs. ALEXANDER,
Author of "The Wooing o't," "The Freres," &c. 3 vols.

A POOR GENTLEMAN. By Mrs. OLIPHANT,
Author of "It was a Lover and his Lass," "Agnes," &c. 3 vols.

HILARY ST. JOHN. By Mrs. A. PRICE,
Author of "A Rustic Maid," "A Wilful Young Woman," &c. 2 vols.

WITH EVERYTHING AGAINST HER.
By Colonel CUTHBERT LARKING, Author of "Bandobast and Khabar" &c.
3 vols.

IRIS DACRE. By ALICE MANGOLD DIEHL,
Author of "The Garden of Eden" &c. 2 vols.

LONDON: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED,
13 GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET.

EDWARD STANFORD'S NEW CATALOGUES,

Post-free on application.

CATALOGUE of MAPS, ATLASES, and other GEO-GRAPHICAL PUBLICATIONS, published or sold by EDWARD STANFORD.
92 pp., in wrapper.

CATALOGUE of MAPS and BOOKS for TOURISTS, published or sold by EDWARD STANFORD. 56 pp. in wrapper, with Index
Maps of the Government Surveys of England, France, and Switzerland.

METHODS of MAP MOUNTING, with Illustrations, giving hints as to the best methods of Mounting Maps for the Library, Hall, Schoolroom, &c.

LONDON: EDWARD STANFORD,
26 AND 27 COCKSPUR STREET, CHARING CROSS, S.W.
Sole Agent for the sale of the Ordnance and Geological Survey Maps in England and Wales.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

Now ready, in medium 4to. bound in vegetable vellum,
price ONE GUINEA.

DEDICATED, BY PERMISSION, TO H.R.H. THE PRINCESS OF WALES,
And with DEDICATORY POEM by the EARL of ROSSLYN.

THE BOOK OF WEDDING DAYS

(On the Plan of a Birthday Book).

With 96 Illustrated Borders, a Frontispiece, Title-Page, &c.

By WALTER CRANE.

And Quotations for each day compiled and arranged by K. E. J. REID,
MAY ROSS, and MABEL BAMFIELD.

NEW BOOK BY H. RIDER HAGGARD.

CLEOPATRA: being an Account of the Fall
and Vengeance of Harmachis, the Royal Egyptian, as set forth by his own hand. By H. RIDER HAGGARD. With 29 Full-page Illustrations by
M. Greiffenhagen and R. Caton Woodville. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

* Fifty Large-Paper Copies have been printed on Dickinson's Fine Art Paper.
Price can be obtained through all Booksellers.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN WESTACOTT."

BY THE WESTERN SEA: a Summer Idyl.

By JAMES BAKER, Author of "John Westacott" &c. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

NATURAL RELIGION. The Gifford Lectures
delivered before the University of Glasgow, in 1888. By F. MAX MÜLLER, K.M., Foreign Member of the French Institute. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

SWISS TRAVEL and SWISS GUIDE-
BOOKS. By W. A. B. COOLIDGE, Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, and
Editor of the "Alpine Journal." Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

The THEORY of CREDIT. By HENRY
DUNNING MACLEOD, M.A., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law, selected by the Royal Commissioners for the Digest of the Law to prepare the Digest of the Law of Bank Notes, Bills of Exchange, &c. (Two vols.)
Vol. I. 8vo. price 7s. 6d. [Vol. II. in the press.]

The DISEASES of CHILDREN, MEDICAL and SURGICAL. By HENRY ASHBY, M.D. Lond., M.R.C.P., Physician to the General Hospital for Sick Children, Manchester; Lecturer and Examiner in Diseases of Children in the Victoria University; and G. A. WRIGHT, B.A., M.B. Oxon., F.R.C.S. Eng., Assistant Surgeon to the Manchester Royal Infirm and Surgeon to the Children's Hospital. With 138 Illustrations.
8vo. 21s.

EPOCHS OF CHURCH HISTORY.

Edited by Professor MANDELL CREIGHTON. New Volume.

The ARIAN CONTROVERSY. By H. M.
GWATKIN, M.A., Lecturer and Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge. Fcp.
8vo. 2s. 8d.

Now ready, price Sixpence.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.—No. LXXXII.

AUGUST.

CONTENTS:

THE BELL OF ST. PAUL'S. Part II. Chaps. 16-18. By WALTER BESANT.
THE NATIONAL SPORT OF VIRGINIA By HORACE HUTCHINSON.
SHREWS By A. B. ROCHFORD BATTIE.
ONLY A JOKE By FABIAN BLAND.
SEEN AND LOST By W. H. HUDSON.
OLD COLLEGE DAYS IN CALCUTTA By C. T. BUCKLAND.
MRS. FENTON: a Sketch. Chaps. 1-3 By W. E. NORRIS.
AT THE SIGN OF THE SHIP By ANDREW LANG.

Now ready, price Sixpence.

The NEW REVIEW. No. III. AUGUST.

Edited by ARCHIBALD GROVE.

CONTENTS:

THE RELATIONS BETWEEN FRANCE AND RUSSIA SINCE 1871 By M. FLOURENS (Member of the French Chamber).
MATTHEW ARNOLD. Part II. By the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE OF ENGLAND.
TALK AND TALKERS OF TO-DAY (Continued).
TWO VIEWS OF THE GERMAN EMPEROR.
I. By POULTNEY BIGELOW.
II. By
EIGHT HOURS THE MAXIMUM WORKING DAY By H. M. HYNDMAN.
MYTHOLOGY AND THE OLD TESTAMENT .. By ANDREW LANG.
THE NEW TREASURE HUNT By TIGHE HOPKINS.
ELECTRIC LIGHTING By the DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

FATHER DAMIEN: a Journey from Cash-
mere to his Home in Hawaii. By EDWARD CLIFFORD. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

The Spectator says:—"The account of Father Damien himself is very impressive, and many details are given us which make the present life of the poor lepers more or less vivid to us."

EDWARD FITZGERALD.

LETTERS and LITERARY REMAINS of
EDWARD FITZGERALD. Edited by W. ALDIS WRIGHT, M.A., Vice-Master
of Trinity College, Cambridge. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

Vol. I. Letters—Vol. II. Euphranor, Six Dramas from Calderon, The Bird
Parliament, The Two Generals—Vol. III. Dramas from Calderon, Greek Dramas, Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, &c.

A NEW NOVEL BY MR. F. MARION CRAWFORD.
SANT' ILARIO.

By F. MARION CRAWFORD,

Author of "With the Immortals," "Greifenstein," "Paul Patoff,"
"Mr. Isaacs," "Dr. Claudius," "Marzio's Crucifix," &c.

3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

SKETCHES of RURAL LIFE: Poems. By
FRANCIS LUCAS. Extra fcp. 8vo. 5s.

RECOLLECTIONS of a NURSE. By E. D.
Crown 8vo. 2s.

BY THE RIGHT REV. THE BISHOP OF DURHAM.

ESSAYS on the Work entitled

"SUPERNATURAL RELIGION." By the Right Rev. J. B. LIGHTFOOT, D.D., D.C.L., LL.D., Bishop of Durham, &c.
Reprinted from the "Contemporary Review." 8vo. 10s. 6d.

FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE.

LESSONS of HOPE: Readings from the
Works of FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE. Selected by the Rev. J. LLEWELYN
DAVIES, M.A. Crown 8vo. 6s.

FELLOWSHIP: Letters addressed to my Sister-Mourners. By Lady EASTLAKE. Third Edition, Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

THE HISTORIES of POLYBIUS. Translated from the Text of F. HULTSCH. By EVELYN S. SHUCKBURGH, M.A., late Fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 24s.

GOLDEN TREASURY SERIES.—New Volume.

THEOCRITUS, BION, and MOSCHUS.
Rendered into English Prose, with an Introductory Essay. By ANDREW LANG,
M.A., late Fellow of Merton College, Oxford. New Edition. 18mo. 4s. 6d.
* Also a Large-Paper Edition, on hand-made paper, limited to 250 copies, 8vo. 9s.

BOOKS FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

MACMILLAN'S THREE SHILLING AND SIXPENNY NOVELS.

ROBBERY UNDER ARMS: a Story of Life and Adventure in the Bush and in the Gold Fields of Australia. By ROLF BOLDREWOOD.
Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

SCHWARTZ. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

NEIGHBOURS on the GREEN. By Mrs. OLIPHANT. 3s. 6d.

THE WEAKER VESSEL. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY. 3s. 6d.

JOYCE. By Mrs. OLIPHANT. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

CRESSY. By BRET HARTE. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

WESSEX TALES; Strange, Lively, and Commonplace. By THOMAS HARDY, Author of "The Woodlanders" &c. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

A LONDON LIFE. By HENRY JAMES. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

MISS BRETHERTON. By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD, Author of
"Robert Elsmere." Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

REUBEN SACHS. By AMY LEVY. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

A BELEAGUERED CITY. By Mrs. OLIPHANT. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

* Other Volumes to follow.

DICKENS'S DICTIONARIES, 1889.

New and Revised Editions, with Maps and Plans, sewed, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

The Saturday Review says:—"They are indispensable handbooks..... That of Paris is altogether the best of handbooks for the Exhibition visitor."

DICKENS'S DICTIONARY OF PARIS, 1889.

DICKENS'S DICTIONARY OF LONDON, 1889.

DICKENS'S DICTIONARY OF THE THAMES, 1889.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE,

No. 358, for AUGUST, price 1s., contains:—

1. MAROONED. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. Chapters XXVIII.-XXX.
2. WILLIAM COWPER. By J. C. BAILEY.
3. CHECHINA. By Mrs. BROTHERTON.
4. A MODERN NOVELIST.
5. IN MACEDONIA. By D. G. HOGARTH.
6. ORLANDO BRIDGMAN HYMAN. By AN OLD PUPIL.
7. TO LORD TENNYSON. By the Rev. H. D. RAWNSLEY.
8. HIPPOLYTUS VEILED. By WALTER PATRICK.
9. KIRSTEEN. By Mrs. OLIPHANT. Chapters I.-III.

THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE

For AUGUST, Profusely Illustrated, price 6d.; by post, 8d., contains:—

1. THE CARD PLAYERS. After NICHOLAS MAAS. Frontispiece.
2. THE BETTER MAN. By ARTHUR PATERSON.
3. ASTON HALL. By WHITWORTH WALLIS, F.S.A. With Illustrations.
4. BILL BERESFORD AND HIS VICTORIA CROSS. By ARCHIBALD FORBES.
With Illustrations.
5. SANT' ILARIO. By F. MARION CRAWFORD.
6. OUT-DOOR PARIS. By THEODORE CHILD. With Illustrations.
7. CHARLES DICKENS AS AN EDITOR. With Introductory Notes, by CHARLES DICKENS, Jun.
8. ET CÆTERA. By H. D. TRAILL.

MACMILLAN & CO., BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

In the press, 2 vols. demy 8vo.

DEDICATED BY SPECIAL PERMISSION TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

THE LIFE and LETTERS of the REV.

ADAM SEDGWICK, LL.D., F.R.S., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, Prebendary of Norwich, and Woodwardian Professor of Geology from 1818 to 1873. By JOHN WILLIS CLARK, M.A., F.S.A., Superintendent of the University Museum of Zoology and Comparative Anatomy, and formerly Fellow of Trinity College; and THOMAS MCKENNY HUGHES, M.A., Woodwardian Professor of Geology.

THE COLLECTED PAPERS of HENRY

BRADSHAW, including his Memoranda and Communications read before the Cambridge Antiquarian Society. With upwards of 10 Facsimiles. Edited by F. J. H. JENKINSON, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College. Demy 8vo.

[Nearly ready.]

A HISTORY of the STUDY of MATHE-

MATICS at CAMBRIDGE. By W. W. ROUSE BALL, M.A., Fellow and Lecturer on Mathematics of Trinity College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo. 6s.

In the press, demy 4to. 10 half-yearly vols. Vol. I. now ready, 25s.

THE COLLECTED MATHEMATICAL

PAPERS of ARTHUR CAYLEY, M.A., F.R.S., Sadlerian Professor of Pure Mathematics in the University of Cambridge.

A TREATISE on the GENERAL PRINCIPLES of CHEMISTRY.

By M. M. PATTISON MUIR, M.A., Fellow and Prælector in Chemistry of Gonville and Caius College. New Edition. Demy 8vo. 15s.

TREATISE on DYNAMICS.

By S. L. LONEY, M.A., Fellow of Sidney Sussex College. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. [Nearly ready.]

A TREATISE on ANALYTICAL STATICS.

By E. J. ROUTH, Sc.D., F.R.S., Fellow of the University of London, Honorary Fellow of St. Peter's College, Cambridge. [In the press.]

SOPHOCLES.—The PLAYS and FRAG-

MENTS. With Critical Notes, Commentary, and Translation in English Prose, by R. C. JEBB, Litt.D., LL.D.

Part I.—OEDIPUS TYRANNUS. New Edition. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d.

„ II.—OEDIPUS COLONEUS. New Edition. Demy 8vo. [Shortly.]

„ III.—ANTIGONE. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d.

„ IV.—PHILOCTETES.

[In the press.]

THE HISTORY of ALEXANDER the GREAT: being the Syriac Version of the Pseudo-Callisthenes. Edited from Five Manuscripts, with an English Translation and Notes, by ERNEST A. WALLIS BUDGE, M.A., Tyrwhitt Scholar, Assistant in the Department of Egyptian and Assyrian Antiquities, British Museum. Demy 8vo. [Shortly.]

THE OLD TESTAMENT in GREEK, according to the SEPTUAGINT. Edited by H. B. SWETE, D.D., Honorary Fellow of Gonville and Caius College. Vol. I.—GENESIS—IV. KINGS. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. Vol. II., by the same Editor. [In the press.]

THE BOOK of PSALMS, in GREEK, according to the SEPTUAGINT. By the same Editor. 2s. 6d. [Shortly.]

CANADIAN CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY

By J. E. C. MUNRO, LL.M., Professor of Law and Political Economy at Victoria University, Manchester. Demy 8vo. 10s. [Nearly ready.]

NOTITIA CODICIS QUATTUOR EVANGE-

LIIORUM Græci membranacei viris doctis hucusque incogniti quem in museo suo asservat Eduardus Reuss Argentoratensis. 2s.

THE LATIN HEPTATEUCH. Published

piecemeal, by the French Printer, WILLIAM MOREL (1560), and the French Benedictines, E. MARTENE (1733) and J. B. PITRA (1852-88). Critically reviewed by JOHN E. B. MAYOR, M.A., Professor of Latin in the University of Cambridge, and Fellow of St. John's College. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d.

THE FOUR GOSPELS, in Anglo-Saxon and Northumbrian and Old Mercian Versions synoptically arranged; with Collations exhibiting all the Readings of all the MSS. Edited by the Rev. W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D., Elrington and Bosworth Professor of Anglo-Saxon. New Edition. 1 vol. demy 4to. 30s.

Each Gospel separately, 10s. each.

DANTE.—CONTRIBUTIONS to the TEX-

TUAL CRITICISM of the DIVINA COMMEDIA, including the complete Collation throughout the "Inferno" of all the MSS. at Oxford and Cambridge. By the Rev. EDWARD MOORE, D.D., Principal of St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, and Barlow Lecturer on Dante in the University of London. Demy 8vo. 21s.

THE LITERARY REMAINS of ALBRECHT

DÜRER. By WILLIAM MARTIN CONWAY, late Roscoe Professor of Art, University College, Liverpool, Victoria University. With Transcripts from the British Museum Manuscripts and Notes upon them by LINA ECKENSTEIN. Royal 8vo. with Illustrations. [Nearly ready.]

THE HISTORY of LAND TENURE in IRELAND, being the Yorke Prize Essay of the University of Cambridge for the year 1888. By W. E. MONTGOMERY, M.A., LL.M., Clare College, Cambridge; and of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d.

ELEMENTS of the LAW of TORTS: a Text-

Book for Students. By MELVILLE M. BIGELOW, Ph.D., Lecturer in the Law School of the University of Boston, U.S.A. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

A MANUAL of CURSIVE SHORTHAND.

By HUGH L. CALLENDAR, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College. 2s.

THE PRIMER of CURSIVE SHORTHAND.

A Class-book for Beginners, containing a complete practical exposition of the system. Pp. 32, price 6d. [Shortly.]

READING PRACTICE. Easy Extracts for Beginners. Lists on application. [Shortly.]

NEW VOLUME OF THE CAMBRIDGE BIBLE FOR SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

THE EPISTLE to the PHILIPPIANS. By

Rev. H. C. G. MOULE, M.A. 2s. 6d.

NEW VOLUME OF THE CAMBRIDGE GREEK TESTAMENT FOR SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

THE EPISTLE to the HEBREWS. By the Ven. Archdeacon FARRAR, D.D. 3s. 6d.

NEW AND STANDARD VOLUMES OF THE PITT PRESS SERIES.

SOPHOCLES.—OEDIPUS TYRANNUS. School Edition. By R. C. JEBB, Litt.D., LL.D. 4s. 6d.

PLATONIS APOLOGIA SOCRATIS. With Introduction, Notes, and Appendices, by J. ADAM, M.A., Fellow and Classical Lecturer of Emmanuel College. 3s. 6d.

PLATONIS CRITO. With Introduction, Notes, and Appendix. By the same Editor. 2s. 6d.

THUCYDIDES. Book VII. With Notes and Introduction. By H. R. TOTTENHAM, M.A., Fellow of St. John's College. [Shortly.]

PLUTARCH.—LIFE of TIMOLEON. With Introduction, Notes, and Lexicon. By the Rev. HUBERT A. HOLDEN, M.A., LL.D., Examiner in Greek to the University of London. [Nearly ready.]

THE ODYSSEY of HOMER. Books IX. & X. With Introduction, Notes, and Appendices, by G. M. EDWARDS, M.A., Fellow of Sidney Sussex College. 2s. 6d. each.

HERODOTUS. Book VI. Edited, with Notes, Introduction, and Maps, by E. S. SHUCKBURGH, M.A., late Fellow of Emmanuel College. 3s.

HERODOTUS. Books VIII. & IX. With Notes, Introduction, and Maps. By the same Editor. 3s. 6d. each.

THE HIPPLYTUS of EURIPIDES. With Notes and Introduction. By W. S. HADLEY, M.A., Fellow of Pembroke College. 2s.

LUCRETIUS. Book V. With Notes and Introduction. By J. D. DUFF, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College. 2s.

LIVY. Books XXI. & XXII. With Notes, Introduction, and Maps. By M. S. DIMSDALE, M.A., Fellow of King's College. 2s. 6d. each.

GAI IULI CAESARIS de BELLO GALLICO COM. II., III. With Maps and English Notes. By A. G. PESKETT, M.A., Fellow of Magdalene College. 2s.

M. TULLI CICERONIS ORATIO PHILIPPICA SECUNDA. With Notes and Introduction. By the same Editor. 3s. 6d.

P. VERGILI MARONIS AENEIS. With Notes and Introduction. Libri I.—XII. By A. SIDGWICK, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. Each 1s. 6d.

P. VERGILI MARONIS GEORGICA. With Notes and Introduction. By the same Editor. Libri I., II., 2s.—Libri III., IV., 2s.

P. VERGILI MARONIS BUCOLICA. With Notes and Introduction. By the same Editor. 1s. 6d.

HORACE.—EPISTLES. I. With Notes and Introduction. By E. S. SHUCKBURGH, M.A., late Fellow of Emmanuel College. 2s. 6d.

BONNECHOSE.—LAZARE HOCHÉ. With 4 Maps, Introduction, and Commentary. Revised Edition. By C. COLBECK, M.A., late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. 2s.

MOLIERE.—LE BOURGEOIS GENTILHOMME. Comédie-Ballet en Cinq Actes. (1670.) With a Life of Molière, and Grammatical and Philological Notes. Revised Edition. By Rev. A. C. CLAPIN, M.A. 1s. 6d.

L'ECOLE des FEMMES. MOLIERE. With Introduction and Notes. By GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A. 2s. 6d.

HAUFF.—DAS BILD des KAISERS. With Notes and Introduction. By KARL HERMANN BREUHL, M.A., Ph.D., University Lecturer in German. Price 3s.

DOCTOR WESPE. Lustspiel in fünf Aufzügen. Von RODERICH BENEDIX. With Notes. By the same Editor. 3s.

SELECTIONS from MENDELSSOHN'S LETTERS. Edited by JAMES SIME, M.A. 3s.

ELEMENTARY COMMERCIAL GEOGRAPHY. A Sketch of the Commodities and the Countries of the World. By H. R. MILL, Sc.D., F.R.S.E., Lecturer on Commercial Geography in the Heriot-Watt College, Edinburgh. Pp. 136, price 1s.

ON STIMULUS. A Lecture delivered for the Teachers' Training Syndicate, at Cambridge, May 1882. New Edition. By A. SIDGWICK, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. 1s.

Complete Catalogues on application.

London: C. J. CLAY & SONS, CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE, Ave Maria Lane.
GLASGOW: 263 Argyle Street.

/ THE SATURDAY REVIEW
OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,763, Vol. 68.

August 10, 1889.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

CRETE.

THE progress of the Cretan insurrection is extremely edifying, in the sarcastic sense, to those who have paid attention to the recent course of foreign politics, and could have been foretold almost exactly by them. The Powers of Europe, in their wisdom, impose upon the Turkish Government a complicated function in regard to one of its provinces—a function which, at the best, it is ill suited to perform. Having thus set it an impossible task, they then proceed to watch for occasions on which it fails. Those occasions are provided in plenty by the new arrangements. If the Porte endeavours to get over the difficulty by pacific means and fails, grave sermons point out how unsuitable it is for governing; if it resorts to physical force, the brutality of the Turk is descanted on by agonized canons and deeply-hurt newspaper editors. The whole process resembles more closely the procedure of that estimable tribunal the Holy Inquisition than any other which a memory reasonably well stored with historical and juridical precedents affords us at the moment. In Crete all things have proceeded according to COCKER. For nearly twenty years tranquillity of a kind has been, by considerable forbearance on the part of the Porte and no small ability on the part of its representatives, maintained in Candia, though not without ebullitions from time to time, which have led hasty observers to conclude that the Cretans are as much prone to insurrection as, according to ST. PAUL and his poetic authority, to another practice. Now these ebullitions have increased to something like an eruption. Nobody interferes by pointing out to the Cretans that they already have franchises superior to those enjoyed by almost any of their fellow-subjects. Nobody bids the Turks make short work of the insurgents. When the Moslem minority are attacked by the Christian majority, and turned out of house and home, and when they subsequently retaliate, it is pointed out, with an exquisite forgetfulness (or more probably a less exquisite ignorance) of the parallel, that the Moslem is really très méchant. Russia gravely inquires what measures Turkey is going to take to protect Russian subjects in Candia; though, if Turkey took the shortest way to protect Russian or any other subjects—that is to say, the indiscriminate knocking on the head of every insurgent who failed by a certain day to lay down his arms—Russia would be the first to cry out. Greece not only follows this worthy example about her subjects, but informs the Powers that, if these subjects are not protected, she will have to bare her right arm and protect them herself, making at the same time “naval preparations at Salamis,” after the well-known ASTLEY-and-FRANCONI parody of great old things and great old names which distinguishes the modern Hellene.

Meanwhile the advanced institutions of Crete are already exemplifying (in a way which seems to annoy the more intelligent Gladstonians a very little) the characteristics which provincial Parliaments must always and will always display in times of faction and disorder. The failure, it is said, of the mission of MAHMOUD DJELLALEDIN, the Ottoman Commissioner, was “brought about by the obstacles which it encountered from a section of the majority in the Cretan Assembly which opposed the recall of the Governor-General, and was also averse to reforms not introduced by the Assembly itself.” Those who are acquainted with the history of the Irish Parliament will more than ever recognize the wisdom of that immortal sentence of THUCYDIDES which contains all history and all politics in half a dozen words. It is to be observed, too, that absolutely no clear statement has been put forward, either by friends or enemies of the Cretans, of what it is they demand, of what the reforms are to be, or of anything that the Porte can do, except endeavour to restore order. Yet, all the same, the Porte is blamed, and there are those who exclaim at the dreadful notion of Mussulman Volunteers, when at the very same time news is brought of Christians beginning the attack on Mussulmans. This religious zeal on the part of Gladstonian editors is mighty amusing. The terms of the Greek Note, however, are such as to invite a little examination. M. TRICOUPIS is perhaps, if not a statesman, the nearest approach to a statesman that the Hellenic kingdom possesses, and his attitude on this occasion is distinctly interesting. The admissions and the suggestions which the Note contains are of the most unusual character, and almost every one of them tends to exonerate the Porte. The usual Turcophobe regards the insurrections of Crete as instances of the intolerable tyranny of Mussulman rule; M. TRICOUPIS, who has the strongest interest in taking this view, admits that the movement “was at first entirely local, and arose from quarrels among the Christian population.” The Turcophobe views with horror the importation of Turkish soldiery; M. TRICOUPIS sees in this only the natural and proper thing to do. But M. TRICOUPIS, it is true, comes to the rescue of the Turcophobe by denouncing the distribution of arms to the Mussulman population. Considering that the Christian population, who admittedly began the disturbances, are abundantly provided with arms (M. TRICOUPIS, though, no doubt, he has not supplied them, might be able to give as good a guess as another man by whom some at least of these have been supplied), it certainly does not seem a very terrible thing that the minority should be supplied with means of defence when the majority are so well supplied with means of attack. The threat with which the Note ends of Greek “intervention” is, of course, mere bounce. “Greek intervention,” if a fair fight were allowed between the Porte and the Greeks, could only result in the utter defeat of the latter. But what is most curious is the hint that precedes this. “If massacres,” says M. TRICOUPIS, “were to occur in the island, the Cabinet of Athens, being a Parliamentary Government, might possibly not be able to control or withstand a popular movement in favour of the Cretans.” A plainer insinuation that the Greek Opposition may “squeeze if it likes” has seldom been made in any diplomatic document. It is improbable that the persons appealed to will be deaf to the obliging invitation.

It is, indeed, very conceivable that true Greek patriots (for no doubt there are such, though the usual Greek public man is rather a politician than a patriot) might be in two minds about the annexation of Crete even if it were open to them. Some rather maladroit English Philhellenes have remarked that it is “nearly two hundred years [lege two hundred and twenty] since this Greek island [which was “never other than most doubtfully Greek] was wrested by “the SULTAN [from whom?] from the Venetian Republic.” And since the Venetian Republic had, as matter of fact, held it for nearly five hundred years before, it would seem that the heirs of that Republic have a much better claim than Greece. No doubt there are many real Greeks, as real Greeks go now, in Candia, but they are simply immigrants on business, just as the Maltese are immigrants on business in Tunis and other parts of the mainland of Africa. The Cretans themselves are far more Oriental than Greek. But, even supposing things were different, the acquisition of Crete, though no doubt most Greeks would jump at it, would be by no means an unmixed advantage to Greece. The Cretans are already accustomed to a quasi-independence tempered by faction fights; and it would become necessary for Greece, unless she wished to get into difficulties with Europe, to put a stop to the faction fights without meddling with the independence. Some Cretans who have discussed the subject have already frankly confessed that, if they are annexed to Greece, it must be a case of Home Rule annexation. This will be no great gain for King GEORGE's Government, and it will be a very troublesome increase of responsibility, involving a considerable increase in the Greek navy and a considerable disturbance to the recovering, but still rickety, Greek finances. That a young, a very young, nation must take all it can get and make the best of it, is no doubt not the worst maxim of politics as regards the nation itself; but how are the Powers who are, after all, the arbiters of the situation—for without their permission Greece cannot stir (and with their permission Turkey can soon suppress the rising)—justified in experimenting in this fashion on so large a piece of territory? Indeed, all things considered, it is by no means impossible that this ostentatious pother about Crete on the Greek side is only an attempt to get compensation on the northern frontier for temporarily abandoning claims on Crete.

THE GERMAN VISIT AND THE GERMAN PRESS.

THERE is nothing more remarkable about the German EMPEROR's visit to England than the general sense of Englishmen that they had not much to do with it. Although the shores to which the visit was paid are undoubtedly ours, and though it is we who supplied the welcome and adorned it with the magnificent spectacle paraded for the EMPEROR's pleasure at Spithead, yet from first to last the feeling here has been very much that of a man who views from the edge of the crowd some noble show in a foreign land; his chief interest being in the effect produced on those for whom the show is made, of this feeling—about which, of course, there is no incivility—we have all been conscious more or less; and there is very little difficulty in discovering the explanation of it. As a matter of fact, the EMPEROR's visit was intended to draw the eyes of others rather than our own. We have heard, indeed, that a journey to England was included in the tour which His Majesty planned as soon as he came to the throne; and, though it does seem questionable whether the round would have been so extensive if his interview with the CZAR had been more satisfactory, we are not justified in rejecting that statement. But, if a visit to England was meant from the first, reasons for carrying out the intention accumulated later on. Since they are perfectly well known to all the world, some of those reasons may be touched upon without danger of offence.

Whatever calculations may weigh with the statesmanship or soldiership of Germany in these days, the popular sentiment in that country is hostile to Russia. It is sometimes said too hastily that certain peoples "hate" each other; but if so strong a feeling as hatred exists between any two peoples—(natural hatred we mean, apart from the immediate provocations of injury)—it may be found in the mutual aversion of Germans and Russians. Wherever in Germany the EMPEROR's extremely prompt interview with the CZAR was interpreted as an approach with a view to "understandings," it was little liked; and when it appeared—as rightly or wrongly it soon did—that that interview was a failure, and a failure not quite without humiliation, it was liked very much less. The consequent annoyance and vexation were heightened by the very obvious circumstance that the sympathies of Englishmen with the Government and people of the Fatherland had been weakened since the accession of the Emperor FREDERICK's successor. Now, in spite of girdings here and girdings there, the friendship of England is valued by Germans—who are not all Prussians, and do not all live in Berlin—more than any other. It is valued more than any other as a mere matter of sentimental preference; and moreover, the fact that while France is very strong at sea, England possesses a yet stronger fleet, as well as precisely all the best naval stations on the face of the globe, has a world of meaning for the ever-anxious Germans of our time. Therefore, as the days passed on, and the lofty indifference of the CZAR to German armaments and alliances became more manifest, while a variety of petty provocations in Africa and elsewhere continued the alienation of England, more uneasiness arose in Germany, and a stronger suspicion that the new EMPEROR was rather more busy than wise. It is, no doubt, impossible to produce evidence of these misgivings, but they did come into existence (as in the nature of things they were sure to do), did spread, and did come to the perception of the EMPEROR, though for some time they really seem to have been suppressed in the minds of his nearest advisers. Moreover, it is something to the purpose that the alienation of the English as a people could no more be concealed from the foes of Germany than from its friends; and, while it was, no doubt, a pleasing sight for France, it could give no delight to the Austrian and Italian allies of the Government at Berlin, nor add anything to their confidence.

After mentioning these particulars, it is not necessary to enlarge upon them for the purpose of showing that the EMPEROR could not abstain from including England in his round of visits without inconvenience, though he was perfectly well aware (and this also is no secret) that not a few persons in this country would have repined at exclusion. On the other hand, the handsome reception which no one was disposed to deny him, the ceremonial and the spectacle, which would be none the less splendid if they were almost as much a matter of stipulation as of cheerful homage, would have their uses. They would have their uses in neighbouring nations, and yet more in Germany itself, where it had become no unimportant business to restore popular confidence in the cordial friendship of England. To that we can have no objection whatever, as long as the process is confined within reasonable bounds. There is in this country a strong and radical body of goodwill to Germany; and if it has been rather disturbed of late, the disturbance does not go very deep, and the blame for it is assigned to a few individuals, for whom plenty of allowance can be made if they will only give up the idea that this is a country that can be "bounced" when it cannot be otherwise persuaded. There are some signs, indeed, that that is an idea on the point of abandonment; and if so, all the more readily may we understand the efforts of German statesmanship and German journalism to convince the Emperor WILLIAM's subjects that the relations of the two Empires are cordial exceedingly. But the bounds of moderation should be observed, if only in satisfaction of that truth in the abstract, for which both nations are understood to have a more than common reverence. And the short truth is, that in celebrating the EMPEROR's reception in the stretch of water between Portsmouth and the Isle of Wight, the German newspapers have gone amiably but dangerously far. They do not content themselves, these journalists (than whom no similar set of men in the world are so ready to sacrifice the other virtues on the altar of Patriotism), by exaggerating "acclamation" and "enthusiasm." If they had been satisfied with excess so far carried, no one here could have complained with reason—perhaps not with decency. But the whole body of German journalists—fired, it may be feared, with inspiration from a certain bureau in the Wilhelmstrasse—have gone a great deal further. Even before the KAISER had landed from German timber upon British soil they had not only foreseen the wild enthusiasm of His Majesty's reception, but all that it signified—all that, in fact, lay behind it. Since then—that is to say, since Saturday—the signification of the yet unbreathed acclaim, the still unvoiced enthusiasm, has been revealed in a universal innuendo to this effect:—There exists, not a doubt about it, "the closest possible relations, not only between the two Courts, but between the two Governments." Here we may see "a mighty demonstration of sympathy with the Central European alliance," which the EMPEROR's visit will (in all likelihood) precipitate into a declaration of formal partisanship. Much to this effect might be quoted. It is the burden of all that has been written in the German press and in the journals directed from Berlin from the time the Emperor WILLIAM came within the three-mile limit of these shores. In a certain sense it is complimentary to us; in another not so; but the main fact for observation is that the basis of fact is very small for the superstructure of imagination. As the EMPEROR came, so the EMPEROR goes. He was received with the ceremony and respect due to him as the head of a great and kindred people, in whom most Englishmen behold their most natural and welcome allies in Europe. But if there were "no closest possible relations" before he came, there are none more close now that he departs. If they are not all they are described to be in the German press, there is not the faintest hostility in them so far as we are concerned; and there should be intelligence enough in Germany to discern, and candour enough to acknowledge, why as matters stand we cannot make those relations the closest possible. If there were more assurance that the Peace Alliance really meant peace and nothing else, that would make a difference, and (with all respect, be it said) that question is in a little more doubt now than it was before the present Emperor of GERMANY arose to take command of the whole alliance, by whomsoever it may be composed.

THE GENERAL'S CASE.

WHATEVER the influence of the proceedings against General BOULANGER on French politics may be, they have done one thing already. They have given the most complete example of the practice of trial by newspaper which has been seen on this side of the Atlantic. The trial is also unique in this respect, that both sides of the case are, so to speak, being conducted by the defendant. It is the Boulangists who have obtained possession of the Procureur-Général's réquisitoire and some of the evidence on which it is founded, and have published them. Now, after some delay, they publish the statement of the defendant. We shall not do anything so idle as to inquire whether this is the way legal proceedings should be conducted. In truth, legal principles and precedents have little to do in the matter. The trial is only a form of party warfare, a modern and French—very modern and very French—version of the impeachment of STRAFFORD. How little of the judicial character it will have may be seen from the report of the first day's proceedings before the Senate, which have reproduced all the usual incidents, interruptions, and taunts of a debate. It must be looked upon as a game. On the whole, the play of the Boulangists has been the more wily. There is such a superiority of weight against them that they can do little more than prolong the match till help may come; but they have done that by smart dodging. The six columns or so of answer to M. QUESNAY DE BEAUREPAIRE just published over the General's signature is a clever move. There is a briskness and air of confidence about them which will encourage his friends. No doubt the thing abounds in faults of taste. If we were to judge it by a respectable critical standard, we should have to point out, for instance, the folly or the aimless spite of a man who can describe the author of Le Berger as "un romancier sans talent." But the Boulangists do not appeal to a delicate sense of the becoming. For the rest, if the answer is full of vague general assertion, so was the réquisitoire; if it is abusive, so was M. QUESNAY DE BEAUREPAIRE. Before a magistrate scolds he should be sure that he has the accused in his power, otherwise he is likely to be answered by abuse. In this case the abuse was to have been foreseen, and yet it appears to have stung.

It would be a waste of time to examine all the General's answers to the charges against him in detail. On the face of it he seems to have made an effective reply to the accusation of fraud. If it is true that he condemned the now famous coffee tablets, or that the accusation of bribe-taking is based wholly on the word of M. BURET, the Government has made a great mistake in saying anything about them. For the moment there is, however, nothing but round assertion on one side and the other. The value of much of the General's answer does not, however, depend on evidence. Whether, for instance, he did or did not circumvent the agent of a foreign Power who had organized a spy service, did or did not contrive to steal this officer's confidential papers, did or did not give a subvention to journalists who would act as spies abroad, and enter into relations with the Socialists in a certain country, are not, for the moment, vital points. The important thing is to know what effect these revelations or allegations will produce in the "certain country," what effect they will produce on the fortunes of General BOULANGER, and what they indicate as to his opinion about his own position. It is not to be supposed that the German Government—for all the world knows what foreign officers and what country is meant—will be much disturbed by the calculated indiscretion of the General. But it may well take note of them for a future occasion, and if ever the Boulangist coalition comes to the top will be able to assert that France is ruled by a man who endeavoured to stir up treason in Germany. This may be mere boasting on the part of the General. There may have been no theft of papers, and the journalists may have been paid not to intrigue with Socialists, but to sing the praises of M. BOULANGER. The fact remains that a French pretender can think that assertions of active hostility to Germany will serve his turn. If he wins, the meaning of the victory will be clear. In the meantime, however, these boasts may only prove that the General feels his back against the ropes and is hitting out. He has always played for the part of the patriotic leader who can frighten Germany, and may some day defeat it. But as yet he has observed a certain reserve in acting this part. Now he has dropped all appearance of caution, and is posing boldly as the fearless patriot. He must know that, if France elects a man who has bragged of fomenting treason in Germany, it will be supposed to be prepared to run a risk, and that the knowledge of this fact must have some influence on the electors. If then the country is not prepared for the risk, the General's hitting is wild indeed.

CAVE PROCERAS.

JUDGE BAYLEY, of the Westminster County Court, has just decided a very delicate question of legal ethics or ethical jurisprudence. It seemed at first sight a commonplace action enough, merely a claim for goods sold and delivered. But things are not what they seem, as Mr. LONGFELLOW sagaciously, if not originally, observed. The plaintiffs in the Westminster County Court were Messrs. MOORE & STEPHENSON, dealers in furniture. The defendant is "a very tall young lady." The very tall young lady did not deny that she had bought some furniture of the plaintiffs, nor did she assert that she had paid for it. But she said that she was a "legal infant" when the transaction took place. This plea is, for obvious reasons, not very often put forward; but when it does appear upon the record, it seldom fails to raise neat and appropriate points. In the Westminster County Court there was no jury. But even where, as the culminating achievement of the British Constitution, twelve men have been got into a box, the judges reserve to themselves the pleasure of determining what are "necessaries" and what are objects of luxury. The importance of this point is that for necessaries supplied during infancy the infant may be sued when he comes of age, whereas for luxuries he cannot. Now necessaries are not confined by the accommodating wisdom of our law to sufficient food and decent clothing. They depend upon the infant's "position in life," and what is considered suitable thereto. Thus if the infant be respectable, he may have a gig. If he is a chorister, he may have a surplice. Perhaps, if he were a peer, he might have a coronet on his carriage. It was once, if we remember rightly, held that gold studs were necessary for an Eton boy, and that the son of a millionaire was entitled to gold tops for the bottles in his dressing-case. It is obvious that a great many questions may be put on this interesting topic. How many pairs of breeches are required by the younger son of an earl? May a bishop's daughter have a different costume for every ecclesiastical season? How many hunters may properly be kept by an undergraduate at Christ Church who has expectations from an aunt? There is literally no end to the possible developments of this fascinating theme, and we are only sorry that the limitations of space forbid us to pursue it further.

The question for Judge BAYLEY was whether the very tall young lady, Miss HANLEY by name, had any need for a house of her own. For if so, it appeared only reasonable that she should furnish the same. Miss HANLEY is an actress, and the judge has decided that an actress need not live, like St. PAUL, in her own hired house. As many actresses live in lodgings, Judge BAYLEY's ruling is in accordance with the realities of things. But Messrs. MOORE & STEPHENSON cannot be brought to take such a philosophical view of the matter. They are what screamers of the CUNINGHAME-GRAHAM type call bourgeois. They think that when they supply goods they ought to be paid for them. This is a natural, but a narrow, view. Messrs. MOORE & STEPHENSON should rise to the height of the occasion. They should imitate Mr. GOSCHEN's father, whose intellectual pleasure in going to law and becoming a "leading case" more than compensated him for losing his money. Their "representative" in the Westminster County Court said that the case was a very hard one, as the defendant had paid ten pounds on account. We should have thought that the latter fact was a mitigating rather than an aggravating circumstance. It is surely better to get ten pounds than to get nothing. The hardship is indisputable, or at least not easy to dispute. The plaintiffs must console themselves by reflecting that they have helped to clear up the law, and that the defendant's stature may fairly have misled them. Miss HANLEY, on the other hand, is to be doubly congratulated. In the first place, she has won her action, and, in the second place, she has proved that she is even now only twenty-one. To some people the latter success will seem the more valuable of the two. An attempt was made on behalf of Messrs. MOORE & STEPHENSON to show that the defendant described herself as "Mrs." HANLEY, which would have opened up fresh complications, and perhaps led to a charge of obtaining goods by false pretences. But Miss HANLEY denied the impeachment, and it is impossible to believe that she would perjure herself on such a point as that. The more crucial proof of her age was supplied by the real Mrs. HANLEY, the defendant's mother. Judge BAYLEY's decision will not improve the position of actresses who wish to get credit from tradesmen.

THE BATTLE OF TOSKI.

BEFORE it was known that a decisive battle was so near, it was reported that WAD-EL-NJUMI "will never surrender, but intends to fight to the last." It is nearly a week now since all men have known that this was no empty boast. Though the "Dervish" leader kept up his haughty attitude boldly enough, and though in the early days of the invasion the continued retreat, or at any rate the shy fighting, of the Anglo-Egyptian troops may have inspired him with hopes that the Mahdist triumphs over "Hicks and Gordon," in which he himself is said to have played no mean part, would be repeated, he must in all probability have seen cause recently, if his ability as a fighting man is not exaggerated, to change his opinion. He could not get to the river; the reinforcements which reached him were not large; he evidently could draw no recruits worth speaking of from the country itself, and he must have already found out that desertion or treachery in the regular forces opposed to him, such as certainly happened in former cases, was a thing not to be hoped for. Yet he seems to have had not the slightest hesitation in fighting when General GRENFELL chose to fight, and the immense proportional loss of the Dervishes shows the vigour with which he fought. We cannot hope to satisfy French critics of the behaviour of these "tame Dervishes"; indeed, men who have, in the recent performances of their own army at places like Lang-Son, such a high standard of comparison are naturally hard to please. But we might have thought, if it had been ever possible for French critics to afford praise to the poor Briton, that at least some meed might be given to our success in the art of Dervish-taming. To teach fifteen hundred men out of three thousand to come and be killed without a murmur or a struggle, and just when they are wanted, is surely something of an achievement.

No Englishman, we should hope, is likely to exaggerate the military glory gained on Saturday last. It would not be easy to find braver antagonists than the Anglo-Egyptian troops then had before them, and it is certain that no European army (with the doubtful exception of the Russian) save our own has for many years had a foe, other than European, of such fighting qualities to face. But, except as far as the cavalry were concerned, English troops took little part in the affair. The Dervishes were, it would seem, greatly outnumbered, and were certainly inferior to a far greater degree in arms and equipment. Except for the excellent work done by the 20th Hussars and the other English mounted troops, the thing to congratulate oneself on in this battle is the capital discipline and good military skill shown by English officers. The Egyptian "black" troops are not much inferior, save in the point of fanatical enthusiasm, to the "Arabs" themselves; but the fellaheen of Lower Egypt have long had the credit of being as bad fighting material as can be easily found. The battle, indeed, still gives no criterion of what might happen without a stiffening of English troops and the constant presence and encouragement of English officers. There was certainly present on Saturday no leader braver or more skilful than BAKER Pasha, and we know what happened under his command; there was no one with half GORDON's power over natives, and we know what happened when GORDON went to immortality and Mr. GLADSTONE went to the theatre. But it is still a great thing that the fellaheen, and even the blacks, should meet Dervish rushes with the bayonet again and again, and get the better of them. Moreover Sir FRANCIS GRENFELL's tactics appear to have been very good indeed. His despatch is brief and modest, and it is to be hoped that he will not spoil it by any repetition of the bombast of Souakin. But, as far as can be seen, he did something than which, as a matter of fact, the greatest commanders have done no more in their greatest feats—that is to say, he beat the enemy he had got to beat, as he meant to beat him, and by taking the proper means to beat him. Nothing could have better justified the policy of drawing the foe up as far north as possible than the course and results of the fighting on Saturday. If General GRENFELL's calculations are not wrong, within thirty-six hours half the invaders' fighting strength had fallen, and two-thirds of the other half had been captured; while the outposts at Wady Halfa and the men sent on by steamer were trusted to cut off the remainder, or most of it. Thus the reversal of the "Hicks and Gordon" disasters, at which, as we pointed out last week, the English leaders appeared to be aiming, was already all but complete, and General GRENFELL might almost have written, "I have the honour to report that the Dervish forces in this neighbourhood are killed, wounded, and taken, as per margin," after the famous and (in spite of the reluctance to believe the fact of certain professors of history) absolutely authentic statement of Captain WALTON of the Canterbury.

One sentence only in General GRENFELL's despatch we look upon with very decided regret, and that sentence is the following:—"All British troops can now return to Cairo." Not that we feel the very least regret at British troops escaping from the neighbourhood of the Cataracts in August—very much the contrary. But the phrase is susceptible of the interpretation "We have done our work and may now go play." We have not done our work; and, if we think we have, General GRENFELL's sentence may be not extravagantly paraphrased, "The KHALIFA may now get together another invading force at Khartoum." For that will in the ordinary course of things be the sole result of the victory of Toski, if it is not followed up in a very different way from that in which any former victory has been followed up. We say in the ordinary course, for in an extraordinary course it might very well happen that the defeat and death of WAD-EL-NJUMI should serve to discourage the others. But so also it might have happened (the very thing has happened before) that a complete success on his part should be followed by the breaking up of his army, and its return to Khartoum. We must judge, not by the chapter of accidents, but by the regular chain of cause and effect. And according to that chain the mere repulse, even the mere annihilation, of a particular force of invaders will no more check the arrival of fresh forces of invaders than the evaporation, absorption, and outflow of one year's Nile flood will prevent the arrival of the next. As usual, there is talk of half-measures, though "half" is rather too grand a name for the advance of the present frontier to Sarras. Sarras would be better than Wady Halfa, just as Dongola would be better than Sarras, Berber better than Dongola, and Khartoum best of all; but in itself it will be of very little service. We shall have slightly lengthened the arm's length at which we determine to keep invaders; we shall not have sterilized the germs of invasion. We are not fond of the sensational use of facts and figures; but if anybody who is will add up (without counting British losses) the round numbers on both sides of Arabs, Dervishes, and Egyptian troops who have been sacrificed to the policy of scuttle in this one particular part of the world since the determination to abandon the Soudan, his little illustration of the "Inhumanity of Humanitarianism" will equal in epigram of title and surpass in practical value of fact the celebrated dissertation, Sur l'Incommodité des Commodités. In the present raid, from the fight at Arguin to that at Toski, probably not less than three thousand Dervish lives have been lost, possibly many more; and, though the loss of the Anglo-Egyptian forces has been insignificant in comparison, it has been equally preventible and therefore equally superfluous. We are not excessively alarmed at such losses ourselves, for a man may die many worse deaths than in doing his duty to defend what he is charged to defend, and not a few worse ones than in boldly attacking what, for this or that reason which he thinks good, he has made up his mind to attack. But in the minds and mouths—in the mouths at least—of the persons who are responsible for the policy which has brought about the loss, that loss is a thing in itself, and anyhow, horrible. How they reconcile themselves to the horror, how the purely practical men reconcile themselves to the eminently unpractical character of the present policy, how (for we will even go thus far) those who want to see England come out of Egypt reconcile themselves to the policy most certain of all others to keep her there to the Day of Judgment—these are problems which we regard with lively interest, though we do not in the least expect ever to be told the solutions, and have not the slightest hope of discovering them for ourselves.

INSPECTION AND REVIEW.

IT is a matter of serious and congenial speculation for the Admiralty whether the German EMPEROR inspected or reviewed the fleet at Spithead. As far as we could grasp the distinction, when it was first pointed out by the subtle intelligence of Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, the event would be an inspection if it came off on the Saturday and a review if it occurred on the Monday, which was Bank Holiday. But as a matter of fact the weather took care that it did come off on the day which constituted it a review. Is it, then, to be considered as what it was meant to be, or as what it was? Here is matter for grave deliberation at Whitehall, and it may fill up the toilsome hours which are not fully occupied—as is but too obvious—in discovering whether the navy is not short of lieutenants, whether the staff of engineers is not too small, and how we are to secure a sufficiently numerous body of trained stokers. It is the more to be recommended, because it really does not matter, and can have no practical consequence. The War Office has made no sign that it doubted whether the review at Aldershot was a review. We may, therefore, accept it at once without further comment than this, that it seems to have been very successful. The German EMPEROR was shown a somewhat larger force than was—if Mr. THACKERAY is to be believed—paraded for the admiration and instruction of the Czar NICHOLAS. In the present state of opinion, and considering the abundance of our virtuous modesty, nobody, it may be believed, made to the Emperor WILLIAM the rude remark which, according to the satirist, was implied in the hospitality shown to the Czar. Perhaps, as it turned out that after all we could be NICHOLAS's master whenever we pleased, though we had only two battalions of Guards to show him, the observation was in this case thought superfluous. In any case, an attempt was made to please the EMPEROR, and he seems to have been pleased—greatly to the gratitude, and a little to the surprise, of some effusive commentators. The EMPEROR is possibly not so condescending as the newspaper gentlemen think. He may even be aware that what he saw at Aldershot was a portion of an army which, small as it may be, has seldom interfered in Continental wars without effect, and does even in peace-time a more varied and more trying kind of work than falls on his own numerous forces.

The qualifying "if" in the EMPEROR's little speech at the Royal Yacht Club was probably inserted by the reporter. As the report stands his hesitation as to the sufficiency of the British navy contrasted sharply with his confidence in his own army. On this, as on more important previous occasions, the report may not be absolutely correct. The EMPEROR's speeches have so commonly to be taken subject to revision. For the rest it is true that the sufficiency of any fighting force is not a thing one can be absolutely certain about. It remains to be seen, for instance, what the German army will do if ever it meets a force not hopelessly inferior to itself in numbers, armament, and generalship. But, whether the question was asked on this occasion, and whether the occasion was one on which it ought to have been asked, it is in itself a very good question. A splendid fleet has been collected at Spithead, and is now beginning its course of practice. That no single Power could collect such a force in a place so admirably convenient for purposes of defence or attack is beyond doubt. No two Powers, nor yet any three, could do it. But, though that is true, there are certain considerations not to be overlooked. The extent of our field of operations in war is one very obvious consideration to be taken into account in judging of the sufficiency of the fleet. Another, and to our mind a graver one, is the question as to the value of the individual ships. So much in the squadrons at Spithead is purely experimental, and we know so very little of what they would really do in war, that one cannot look at them with unmixed confidence. There are wiseacres who seem never to look at an ironclad without sagely observing that it would certainly have sunk all NELSON's fleet at Trafalgar. The person who twaddles this kind of platitude is apt to credit himself with what he calls an instructed imagination. It is a proof of instruction, it seems, to moon over the great problem of what drink supply would be attainable if all the earth were apple-pie and all the seas were ink. NELSON's fleet might have been sunk by the Rodney—and even so would the Greek triremes at Salamis have been shattered by the Victory—as easily as regular soldiers armed with breechloaders can dispose of spearmen. If everything were different, the state of things would be otherwise, no doubt. The truth is beyond dispute; but whether it is worth the ink it is written in we doubt. What a not altogether uninstructed person might be moved to think when he looked from the Victory to the Howe, for instance, is that what we have gained in power we seem to have lost in security. The triremes at Salamis and the line-of-battle ships at Trafalgar were at least instruments with which the workman was perfectly familiar. They had developed slowly, and had been tested at every stage of their development by actual battle. Moreover, he who could use one of them could use all. Their crews might have been interchanged on the eve of battle and no great harm done. With our fleets it is a very different matter. There is, to begin with, the complete absence of experience from which to argue. And then it is certain that, not only do these vessels differ utterly from every kind of ship made before them, but they differ so from one another that a particular training, in addition to the general one, is required to handle them. No doubt sailing vessels had individual character, and a captain who was new to one might fail to get the best out of her. But at least he was not liable to find that he had ruined his vessel by a minute oversight, still less to be crippled because an otherwise competent subordinate had not an intimate acquaintance with the minutiae of one particular engine. That, however, is the risk run by the modern captain. There was, it seems, delay in getting up anchor at Spithead because the crews were new to their vessels, and the weighing gear of one differs from another, so that, without previous practice, officers and men hardly know what to do with it. Then H.M.S. Hercules has given an instance of the tyranny of the modern machine. She has come crippled into Portland already, because an engineer who did not know the peculiarities of her engines was left in charge of the engine-room for one watch. In fact, these mighty modern warships are so complicated and so delicate, they have such a multiplicity of machinery, that a crew of specially trained skilled artificers is needed to look after each of them. Now H.M.S. Melpomene is laid up at Plymouth "with various defects in her machinery." What will be the fate of all this delicate machinery under the strain of war when the skilled artificers are killed and have to be suddenly replaced, when ships have to be manned in haste and crews transferred on an emergency? These are questions which may cause the instructed imagination to look back on three-deckers and seventy-fours with other feelings than smug satisfaction over modern progress.

Perhaps some reflections of this kind may have arisen in the minds of My Lords during their late inspection of Portsmouth Dockyard. They certainly have had somewhat given them to think about. They will learn, for instance, that, "not only are the Sharpshooter and the cruisers of the M Class in a condition of suspended animation, but the Camperdown, the Australia, and the whole groups of ships fitted with double-ended boilers and steel tubes and tube plates are in a similar state of untrustworthiness. Any of them may be expected to break down when called upon to exert their maximum capacity." In view of the possibility of this misfortune, it is said the manœuvres, now beginning, will be conducted carefully at less than full speed. The reason given for these defects by the correspondent of the Times at Portsmouth is infinitely instructive. "It has been attempted," he says, "to obtain from them" (the engines of the M Class, &c. &c.) "too much horse-power per square foot of grate-surface, and the only practical remedy is to provide extra boiler-power for the work sought to be obtained, or to set economy at defiance and revert to copper or brass as a substitute for steel where subjected to intense heat and sudden chills." Here is something for the instructed imagination to feed on. First, it may reflect on this, that whole groups of our ships are mere experiments; then, it may reflect that no effort was apparently made to test one experiment thoroughly (as would have been so easy in the case of boilers) before turning out whole groups of them; and, thirdly, he might reflect on the wisdom of the management which subjected steel to a strain which it is notoriously ill adapted to bear. These heads of reflection are more fruitful than the platitude that an iron steamer must be more powerful than a wooden sailing-ship. If the two must be compared, we think the problem might be stated in this way—Whether or no a wooden sailing-ship which could keep the sea was a better fighting machine than a metal armoured steamer which has to run into port because its bearings are twisted, or has to be left in the dockyard because its tubes leak? We should like to hear logic and the instructed imagination argue it out.

THE ROYAL GRANTS.

THE passage of the measure technically known as the Prince of Wales's Children Bill to the House of Lords and its reception there have put an end to one of the ugliest recent exhibitions of a certain kind of modern Radicalism. We have said before that we think the necessity of submitting these proposals an unfortunate one. So long as there was little danger of their being regarded as anything but what they are—the formal and successive discharges of an indebtedness which has been far more than covered beforehand—there was no harm in them. They were certainly a very desirable substitute for the bad habit of incurring liabilities first and coming cap in hand for the discharge of them afterwards. But since Parliamentary decency has disappeared from the land, and the bright exemplar of a certain numerous class of politicians has been Major WARDLE crossed with JOSEPH HUME, it is, to say the least, disagreeable that the QUEEN should be exposed to the pleasantries of Mr. LABOUCHERE and the hoof of Mr. ABRAHAM. Fortunately the good omens have shamed the ill very completely on the whole. The subject has afforded Mr. GLADSTONE an opportunity of showing what he was—what nearly all English gentlemen were before it pleased some to seek out inventions which are not the inventions either of gentlemen or of the multitude of honest taxpayers who do not pretend to be gentlemen. Mr. MORLEY, the one leader on the Gladstonian-Radical side who, after Mr. GLADSTONE, retains a shred of the respect of his adversaries, supplied a most agreeable foil by taking the opposite side to Mr. GLADSTONE himself and breaking down completely. Every debater on the Opposition side who has not been merely impertinent has been contradictory either of himself or his fellows, and the cap was put to the whole proceeding by the appearance of Mr. ROBERTSON (ultimus suorum) on Monday night with counsel's opinion from Mr. ILBERT and Mr. FREEMAN. Mr. ILBERT is sufficiently burdened for posterity by a certain Ilbert Bill to make it a little cruel to cite him on a subject where his opinion is of no more value than that of any other denizen of Pump Court; and Mr. FREEMAN's great historical authority scarcely extends even to times which are five hundred years distant from the times concerned with the present subject.

The reception of the Bill in the House of Lords was what it should have been, and it is only necessary to take note of the curious perversion of Lord SALISBURY's words which has been made, perhaps by mistake. The whole subject has been such an instance of the inconvenience of "said I" and "said he" that the PRIME MINISTER was more than justified in wishing not to let slip any incorrect version of the understanding, or whatever it is to be called, on which the present compromise has been arrived at. Accordingly, Lord GRANVILLE, having used one form, which was not the correct form, Lord SALISBURY used another, which was. Had he not done so, it would infallibly have been cast up against him that he had endorsed Lord GRANVILLE's form by passing it unchallenged. As he did so, it is now charged against him that he "repudiated the QUEEN's assurances," told the House of Commons that it had been "successfully duped," and, in effect, boasted that the Bill had been "passed by false pretences." This is a fair instance of the madness of party. Let us only, in noticing it, add that the stress Lord GRANVILLE laid on the scrupulous abstinence of the Crown during the present reign from outrunning the constable was an important point, and one which virtually disposes of the whole Labouchertian contention. That contention is, that if any economy is made on grants during the time that they are exposed to certain claims, the economy debars the recipients from enlarged allowances when fresh claims arise. Clearly this puts a premium on extravagance, and may thus be said to invite it. The counter-claim is clear:—"I have made your former allowance do when I had such and such persons and things to spend it on; now that I have others, I may fairly come on you for more."

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.

THE Blue-book containing the Report of the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies and the Memorandum of the Actuary, together with the Report of the Select Committee, appear, it is to be hoped, sufficiently soon after the late discussion in the House of Commons to secure attention. They both certainly tend to confirm the impression left by what was then said, and what had been learnt from the Yorkshire scandal. If further evidence was wanted, it might be obtained without unfair straining from the late meeting of the Foresters. That Society is known to be one of the most respectable of all, and yet we may gather from its own words that its standard of solvency is not extraordinarily high. But, without any help from outside, the Blue-book and the Report of the Committee are enough in themselves to make out a case for the interference of Parliament. One fact alone shows it. A controlling authority has been set up—the Registry of Friendly Societies—which is supposed to keep a check on these bodies. It does it, however, so little, that, according to the Actuary, "out of 12,848 Societies, no less a number than 5,733, or 44·6 per cent., made no annual returns at all in the five years ending December 31, 1885." Those who did report in all the five years were only 24·7 per cent. In other words, the supposed check is illusory. It is obvious that those who reported regularly were the solvent and well-conducted ones, which could do so with confidence. The ill-managed and insolvent did not comply with the law. But it was precisely to control them that the Registry was established. By setting it up Parliament undertook to keep watch on the Societies. If the watch is not kept, its intentions are frustrated; and, whether the failure is due to want of power or want of will in the officials, the need for amendment is equally clear.

The Select Committee has arrived at the conclusions indicated in the Blue-book, and it has drawn up a series of resolutions which contain the heads of such a Bill as will probably be presented to Parliament next Session. As a matter of course it asks for more Government inspection; and, indeed, if there is to be inspection, it should be efficient. It proposes that the office of Registrar should be reorganized, and a central office established. Yearly reports are to be sent to this central office, and its powers will be large. Whenever it thinks, either of its own mere motion or on complaint from members, that a Friendly Society requires overhauling, it is to have power to appoint inspectors or one of its own body with power to administer oaths and summon witnesses. It will have power to charge expenses either on individuals or the Society. If it should see cause, it can order the dissolution of the Society and appoint official receivers. The Committee also recommend that a relinquishment value, properly calculated and duly notified, shall be secured to all who have paid premiums regularly for five years. This provision, which is based on the practice of the most respectable insurance Companies, is intended, we suppose, to act as a restraint on the Provident Societies, which notoriously rely for part of their profits on the lapsed payments of those of their clients who fall into difficulties. Other recommendations provide for the compulsory registration of all Societies, and impose the obligation of making a serious deposit on all Societies formed before 1870 which intend to begin an industrial insurance business. The Committee makes many other recommendations, but these are enough to indicate the character of the legislation it recommends. The Act it has sketched would certainly be abundantly stringent. It would set up a central authority endowed with ample powers and directed to apply certain recognized principles. Such an authority could hardly fail to sweep away existing insolvent Societies, and prevent the formation of others, unless there were a very general determination among members to elude the law. There is, however, no reason to suppose the existence of any such determination. The misdeeds of Friendly Societies are done at the expense of the members, for the most part, by managers who have every motive to be dishonest, and are subject to no efficient check. Such people are not likely to be shielded by their victims, and certainly do not deserve to be. They are the cause of a great deal of loss and misery, and it is time that their power for mischief should be checked. If any other reason for the establishment of an effective control is needed, it may be found in the well-founded belief of the Committee that the life-assurance business of these Societies, both infantile and adult, is, in its present ill-regulated state, often an incentive to crime.

THE EDUCATION DEBATE.

ONE thing, and perhaps one only, seems to be admitted by critics of divers opinions as to the debate on the Education Estimates, and that is that Sir W. HART DYKE's statement was an excellent one. This is a well-deserved tribute to a politician who has done a remarkably varied and a remarkably large amount of good work in his time, with perhaps less fuss than almost any one else of either rank on either side. But when we leave this happy isle or oasis of agreement we plunge into a sea or a wilderness of troubles. The statement made or put into the mouth of one of his characters by one of the ablest of Englishmen a quarter of a century ago—that more nonsense had even then been talked about education than about any other subject—is an eternal verity. But even from this it is not so clear why more heat should be spent on education than on any other subject. Talkers of nonsense are sometimes, but not always, quarrelsome, and the idiot ward of a workhouse sometimes resounds with an almost placid babel of rival chatter. The Educationists (as they delight to call themselves), on the other hand, are at each other's throats almost before they have opened the mouths to which those throats are attached. Nor is the reason difficult to discover. Few advocates of education are single-eyed, and political and religious differences enter into the discussion as they hardly do anywhere else. The battle, for instance, between voluntary and Board schools is notoriously, though in another sense from the original, a "dishonest" battle. Voluntary schools provide, for their means, an even better education than Board schools; they provide it with far less inconvenience, at an expense to the nation much smaller, and in a manner much more in accordance with the traditions of English social and political life. But the Nonconformist and Radical parties have no desire to put their hands in their pockets when they can put them in those of their neighbours; and they are jealous of the striking spectacle which is afforded by the Church of England and other voluntary schools, as well as of the influence which they think these schools exercise on the rising generation. It is naturally annoying to B to think that A is allowed at his own expense to educate C in principles which B does not like, when if things were otherwise B could at A's expense make C learn what he likes and A does not. A prohibition to exercise tyranny is always felt as most odiously tyrannical. At the same time the "voluntaries" are naturally, but perhaps unwisely, annoyed by the vast sums which are poured at the public expense into the pockets of those who do the work certainly not better, and still more certainly not more cheaply, than themselves. And so the fight rages.

Between the two the impartial critic is rather in a difficulty. It is certain that vast sums of national money, whether subscribed, levied, granted, or paid in fees, have been utterly wasted of late years on what is called education. A wise system of national education would be constructed on the principle of giving to capable persons the maximum of profitable opportunity, and of imposing on incapable ones (who will always be the great majority) the minimum of unprofitable effort. Our present system goes on exactly opposite lines. A wise education would go on the principle of aiming first of all at the cultivation of a spirit of intelligent application, and of being comparatively careless of mere nominal acquisitions in different "branches." Our present system does exactly the contrary. In the Education Department and the immense teaching service we have endowed a large number of, in the great majority of cases, doubtless deserving persons (which, by the way, is pretty much what the monastic system did), and this is the right side of the matter. We have, at any rate, provided subsistence (non-productive subsistence) in this way for about one in twenty of the more intelligent scholars whom our schools turn out. Another gleam of comfort is given by Sir W. HART DYKE's remarks on cookery, for civilized man cannot live without cooks, and frequently finds great difficulty in getting them. But this latter silver lining concerns only the other sex; no new VATEL, that we know of, has yet issued from a Board school. For what we have done for the teachers let them be thankful; for what we are doing for the cooks we may some day be thankful ourselves. For what we have done for the rest the amount of thankfulness due is much more doubtful, and the persons who owe it are much more difficult to discover.

THE IRISH CONSTABULARY VOTE.

WE have no doubt that Mr. BALFOUR was right—he has certainly an abundance of materials on which to form his judgment—in saying that the speeches delivered from below the gangway in the debate on the Irish Constabulary Vote were "moderate and reasonable, compared with recent years." The CHIEF SECRETARY himself undoubtedly came in for fewer of the characteristic amenities of Parnellite oratory than it has sometimes fallen to his lot to listen to, though it should be noticed that a circumstance to which his comparative immunity was in some measure due was itself made the foundation of a compliment of the old-fashioned kind from Mr. REDMOND. An Irish debate at which Mr. O'BRIEN is unable to assist is pretty sure to gain something in reasonableness and moderation on that account alone; but the member for Fermanagh ingeniously contrived to supply some of the ingredients which Mr. O'BRIEN would have contributed had he been present, by infusing them into an explanation of his absence. The Government, he amiably suggested, had "juggled the member for North-east Cork out of the House in a most discreditable way, in order to get rid of a disagreeable opponent." And generally we may say that it is no fault of Mr. REDMOND's that the CHIEF SECRETARY found himself in a position to pay a tribute to the conduct of the Parnellites which will probably give them acute annoyance. He behaved personally with a noisy rowdyism which narrowly missed, and in the opinion of a good many people, we suspect, ought to have completely succeeded in, bringing upon him the penalty of suspension. Had the Chairman of Committees seen his way to "dropping upon" Mr. REDMOND, and perhaps also Mr. EDWARD HARRINGTON, the proceedings of the House last Tuesday night would, at any rate, have been more decent and orderly, even if the general tone of the speeches below the gangway had thereby gained no particular accession to the qualities which Mr. BALFOUR magnanimously found in them.

The discussion, considered as a whole, presented the usual points for remark. There was the same half-ashamed co-operation on the part of the more obscure occupants of the Front Opposition Bench with the Irish apologists for disorder in Ireland; the same convergence of attack from several quarters of the House, and on a multiplicity of different grounds, upon Mr. BALFOUR; and the same imperturbable readiness and indefatigable vigour of reply on the part of the Minister attacked. A glance through the copious catalogue of "points" made against the Irish Executive—many of them, it is true, of a transparently worthless and trivial description, but all, according to our present Parliamentary practice, treated as deserving the honour of a serious answer—will suffice to show the combined industry and impudence of Mr. BALFOUR's persecutors. The numbers and cost of the Irish Constabulary; their dealings with Mr. O'BRIEN at Cork Station and at Charleville; their practice of "shadowing" English members of Parliament in Ireland; their conduct at evictions; their conduct as reporters at public meetings; their excessive pay and allowances; their excessive consumption of stationery; their behaviour to Dr. TANNER; their indefensible attendance before the Parnell Commission Court in obedience to their subpoenas—these by no means exhaust the list of complaints to which Mr. BALFOUR had to reply the other night, and which drew from him a series of continually interrupted speeches, covering altogether something like four out of the eight or nine columns of the Times over which this report of the discussion extends. To have dealt at equal length with every one of the confused mass of charges urged against the Irish Constabulary would have been unwise, even if it had not been impossible, and many of them, of course, were dismissed with the contemptuous brevity which was their only just desert. But the CHIEF SECRETARY left nothing inadequately answered, and replied at length and in detail to every accusation which derived any weight either from intrinsic probability or from the semblance of authoritative sponsorship. The House, he said, would forgive him—and we are quite sure that the public will—for not "going at length into some of the wonderful fictions which had been heard in the course of the evening. There had been a good many base accusations made against the police, sometimes without name, date, or place being given, sometimes without sufficient details to enable the truth of the matter to be inquired into, and sometimes at such short notice that it was impossible for any Chief Secretary to answer them at once." Among those into which it was possible for him to enter in detail was that most characteristically Irish of all recent complaints of the administration of the law—the complaint founded on the collapse of the case against Mr. GILL. The use which has been made of this incident should open the eyes of any English Radical who still pretends to any respect for reasonableness and for fair-play to the true character of the cause which he has taken up and the partisans with whom he has allied himself. When an agitator is convicted upon police evidence his friends exclaim against the iniquity of "removable magistrates." When a Court proves its impartiality by rejecting such testimony in any particular case and discharging the accused, the assailants of the Irish magistracy, instead of retracting one jot of their slander, ignore the action of the tribunal altogether, and hold up their hands in affected horror at the worthlessness of the evidence upon which the Court has not acted, and pretend to believe that the witnesses whose evidence has been believed in previous convictions must have been equally untrustworthy.

It is always more interesting, of course, to study the behaviour of the Front Opposition Bench than to follow the proceedings of the Parnellites. The portentously prolix oration with which Mr. SEXTON favoured the House on Wednesday afternoon may easily be, as we suspect it was generally, "taken as read" by the ordinary newspaper reader; and the whole mass of rhetoric does not contain anything half so worthy the attention of the student, either of politics or of human nature, as the speeches of Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE and Mr. FOWLER and Mr. BALFOUR's reply thereto. Mr. FOWLER, it is true, has not yet acquired Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE's comfortable partisanship with anarchy. His performance in the recent debate on Dr. TANNER's case was, for him, an extraordinary one; and perhaps—for Mr. FOWLER still seems to cling to the traditions of official decorum, which party exigencies are gradually compelling him to cast aside—he may have been a little abashed by the look of his late remarks when he came to read them in print. He was rigorously statistical in his criticisms of last Tuesday night; but still he did take part in the debate, and thus gave Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE the moral support afforded by the participation of at least one official colleague. And the member for Bradford, as in all questions where the R. I. C. are concerned, was full of a complacency which in itself presents a curious psychological problem, since if there be one subject which we should have supposed that Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE would be unwilling to talk about, it is that upon which he apparently burns to deliver himself on every possible or impossible occasion. In this instance we, of course, heard all the old complaints about the "shadowings" of members of Parliament by Irish constables—complaints singularly indicative of the secret belief that, because a certain number of electors have been foolish enough to appoint certain vain and unwise persons to make laws for the country, those persons acquire a sort of mysterious license to break them with impunity. Mr. BALFOUR's reply to Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE's remonstrances in his own case was the very pertinent one that the Irish Constabulary had not the advantage of that fuller knowledge of the right honourable gentleman's disposition which would have assured them of his perfect harmlessness. Sir BALTHAZAR FOSTER is still a dark horse so far as any Irish performances are concerned, though his record is very well known in reference to other matters. But the House of Commons has very little excuse for wasting its time upon either of them, and nothing but the pressing necessity which the Front Bench men of the second importance appear to recognize for getting abreast of their leaders in the matter of Radical self-advertisement would account for these politicians wasting their own time upon it. As it is, however, only a few belated ones are doing so. Mr. BALFOUR satirically called attention to the fact that, although there were two occupants of the Front Bench who had been Chief Secretaries, the leadership of the Opposition on the question had been "left to a gentleman whose only connexion with Ireland was that he had refused to accept 'the Chief Secretaryship on a critical occasion.'" But of course the absence of the two ex-Ministers in question is easily accounted for. "Home they have gone and ta'en 'their wages.'" They have done their spell of work for the "New Radicalism" in the debate on the Royal Grants. Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE remains behind to "put in his time" in the workshop of those employers with whom he has taken service.

LORD TENNYSON'S BIRTHDAY.

THE eightieth anniversary of the Poet Laureate's birth on Tuesday last is naturally suggestive of a more comprehensive survey of the poet's influence than any retrospect of the poetry of HER MAJESTY's reign can call forth. The position of uncontested supremacy occupied by Lord TENNYSON since the death of WORDSWORTH remains impregnable still. After more than half a century of production, his verse does not persuade us he is old. But to stand alone, merely, is not to be great, though the measure of greatness is undoubtedly facilitated by the lack of competition. No poet, however, to his contemporaries appears absolutely comparisonless, save for a brief space and under an exceptional combination of circumstances. POPE perhaps, and Lord BYRON certainly, held this proud position. They are the most striking, if not the only, examples that the annals of the past offer. But Lord TENNYSON's influence is of far wider scope and of incomparably greater continuity. His time of undisputed sway comprises the whole period of the Victorian age. He is not merely the most popular of our poets, but also the national poet—the poet who represents the political and social life, the patriotism, the aspirations and ideals, deep-set or transient, of the nation as a whole. This is Lord TENNYSON's special distinction. Rare and fortunate, indeed, is the conjunction of national popularity and national influence. In the popular judgment he has not always been supreme, if we take popularity alone as a test. Over the Atlantic there was a poet of prodigious reputation whose name was constantly coupled with his. Yet, apart from the popularity, there is not a trace of affinity between the two poets. The works of LONGFELLOW may be searched in vain for any manifestation of a poetic personality that is purely American, any technical achievements that proclaim mastery of his craft, or any deep and sympathetic reflection of the current movements of national life. He added nothing in these directions to poetic literature, and much that he did produce was of the kind already abundant or of the secondary order of inspiration that is purely literary. Possibly he found nothing worthy of his magic in the national life of his country. "I am 'half-sick of shadows,'" he might have sung, as he turned for inspiration to the legendary lore of the land and the exhaustless literature of effete Europe. Many are the channels through which popular enthusiasm for Lord TENNYSON's poetry has made a fluent way. These supply some of the strongest and most convincing proofs of the poet's universal attraction. There never was living poet who inspired such an array of interpreters. He has allured the most diverse, the most antagonistic of spirits. There are industrious admirers eager to display what to the Bible he may owe and what to VIRGIL. The commentator, the concordancer, the parallel-monger, and all the infinite horde represented by CARLYLE's "critic-fly" have long battered on the works of Lord TENNYSON. And all this exhibition of zeal is effected apart from the parental guidance of a Tennyson Society. The book-collector, of course, holds Tennysonian first editions with a firm hand. More remarkable still is the devotion of professional men to the study of the Poet Laureate. One ingenious scribe recently examined Locksley Hall from a legal standpoint. With patience and research, more eloquent than what is commonly called eloquence, he drew up the genealogy of the LOCKSLEYS, and revealed unsuspected technical flaws in the succession of the family. Such witnesses to popularity altogether transcend the experience and estimates of publishers.

The testimony of more than one generation of critics is almost as striking and scarcely less pleasing. From the outset, when the Poet Laureate's first two volumes appeared, there was a general stir in the poetical world. Few poets have been honoured with recognition so prompt, and not many have produced, it must be owned, verse so rich in promise, as well as striking in performance, as Lord TENNYSON's Juvenilia. In recent collected editions these poems, after undergoing some sifting and rejection, are once more reinstated in full, and any purchaser may now compare with them the utterances of contemporary critics. On the whole, they show more appreciation and a sounder judgment than characterize the first public reception of most modern poets. The critic who thought the poet had more to unlearn than to learn paid a pretty compliment to Lord TENNYSON's workmanship. This early recognition of the poet's artistry is curious. More singular, however, was the reprobation in another quarter of some of the more exquisite of the felicities of phrase in "The Sleeping Beauty" and other poems. These were bluntly termed "affectations" of the too-effusive school of LEIGH HUNT. Looking back on the rich results of time, we may smile at these things. The author of "Mariana" bettered his instructions, as poets will sometimes, till he left no ground for comparisons, no pretext for chatter about the poet's idyllic manner, early or late, or the merits of this period or that, though he was ever prodigal of the surprise and delight from which admiration springs. Since he has excelled in so many poetic forms, and proved his mastery as a composer of harmonies, enchanting, mighty, and magical, no one would be surprised if the Poet Laureate should once again charm our ears afresh. It is in everybody's recollection that it was when engaged on dramatic work which caused, and still causes, more contention among lovers of poetry than any of his writings, that he fired the whole country with the noblest ballad that has appeared in our literature since the great age of poets and heroes it commemorates. To do such deeds of youth falls only to the greatest. The poet, it has been well said, is never old, and the illustrious singer of "The Revenge" confirms the adage. Before now the laureateship has dignified the bard. During seventy years past the poet dignified the office. Far off may the prospect be of the resumption of the bad old precedent when we shall be compelled to murmur, "What, PYE come again!"

A WOMAN'S PLEA FOR THE "GLOVES."

TO prevent disappointment, it may be well to apprise our readers at the outset of this article that it has nothing to do either with the recovery of feminine wagers on the event of a horse-race or with the penalty traditionally exigible from gentlemen discovered asleep. The gloves here in question are simply the "mittens" of the playful parlance of our forefathers, and the "woman's plea" for them is neither more nor less than a lady's protest in the columns of a provincial contemporary against the too common neglect of parents, guardians, and preceptors to instruct their young charges in the noble art of self-defence. Man, writes "An Englishwoman" indignantly, "is rapidly ceasing to be the gallant defender of our sex. Once upon a time we looked up to him, and rested upon his arm. Now, alas! the tables are turned. In the present day he idly takes our arm, while we are obliged to take his part and our own as well." "Again and again," continues the lady, whose experiences in this respect are, it is to be hoped, exceptional, "have I witnessed the revolting spectacle of a lady quitting the side of her gallant defender, in order to punish and reprimand an insolent coward for his annoyance, her nerveless companion standing helplessly and tremblingly by, merely looking on in despair—not even offering, it would appear, to act as scent-bottleholder while the "punishment" is being administered. The theory that he may be acting upon a perverted or at least an exaggerated view of Christian duty is dismissed by his female censor with contempt. "Returning good for evil is more often returning evil with grosser evil"; and "a sound thrashing scientifically dispensed often forms a more valuable lesson to a bullying coward than the sermons of a lifetime." Nay, more; it is æsthetically valuable for its own sake; for, "whilst I write strictly in the interests of peace," proceeds this Spartan dame, here rising into positive enthusiasm over the virtue of handiness with "the bunch of fives," "I must confess there is to my mind no grander spectacle in nature or art than to witness a cowardly, insolent scoundrel who has mistaken his man receive a sound thrashing, scientifically bestowed, at the hands of a master of his art." Niagara and the Coliseum, the primæval forest and the mediæval cathedral, a sunrise on the Alps and a thunderstorm in the tropics—all alike sink into uninteresting insignificance beside the spectacle of an insolent scoundrel receiving "one on the conk" scientifically administered. If this be really the case, it is almost to be hoped that a good supply, not only of "masters of the art," but of insolent scoundrels who mistake their man, may never fail us, and that their joint efforts to elevate our moral being, as only the grandest spectacles in nature or art can elevate it, may never cease in the land. What the spectacle may be when the master of the art, as sometimes happens, mistakes his man "An Englishwoman" does not tell us; but no doubt the sight of a good man getting the worst of it may have a bracing effect of its own.

We hardly know what to say to this lady's "plea for the gloves." We are, we need hardly say, entirely in favour of encouraging proficiency in boxing, as in other forms of manly sport, and it cannot, of course, be denied that occasions may arise for turning a mastery of the noble art to account in actual life. One can conceive circumstances in which the male companion might and ought to, and we hope he would, interfere to administer summary chastisement to an insolent coward in the manner which "An Englishwoman" desires. Such an emergency would certainly arise if the lady were proceeding to resort to voies de fait for the punishment of the offender on her own account. The "nerveless companion standing helplessly and tremblingly by" is, we hope, a fancy picture. But "An Englishwoman" should be on her guard against mistaking mere unreadiness in the scientific administration of thrashings for contemptible cowardice. To tell the truth, the position of a lady during a merry mill between her male companion and an insolent scoundrel is apt to be a somewhat embarrassing one. It is true the situation is not an uncommon one in novels; but then the novelist is careful to lay the scene of the encounter on a country road, where Beauty can retire behind a five-barred gate and hold Valour's hat, and watch while Valour gives the drunken tramp such a dressing as he never had before in his life. But secus, as the law reporters have it, in a London street. There the lady's position on the "side-walk," while cavalier and coalheaver are manœuvring to get each other's head in chancery on the roadway, is almost sure to attract disagreeable remark. And, as the combatants are pretty sure, if more than one or two rounds are fought, to be taken into custody, further complications may be expected to ensue. On the whole, the part of "gallant defender" of a lady is not by any means so easily discharged, even by a "master of the art," as "An Englishwoman" appears to imagine. Of course, if a policeman is on the spot or in sight, it may be sound tactics to knock down the insolent scoundrel as a preliminary to giving him in charge before a crowd has time to collect; but it is hardly worth while to base tactical rules on a foundation of improbable hypotheses.

THE PENSION LIST.

THE Return of Pensions charged upon the Civil List which has just been laid before Parliament is in every sense of the word an instructive document. It shows with how little discretion the taxpayer's money is bestowed. It proves that rich people have no objection to see their relatives supported by public charity. And it contains many names which will be quite new to the nation at large as having performed any sort of national achievement. Perhaps more than this could hardly be expected from a Parliamentary paper only twenty-three pages long, including the index. But there is more. For some of the explanatory descriptions intended to enlighten the reader on the origin and justification of individual grants obtain an easy victory over the ancient and historic sport of cock-fighting. The first of these pensions was awarded by Lord MELBOURNE on the 31st of December, 1839, the last by Mr. SMITH on the 29th of May, 1889. The children of a policeman killed nearly fifty years ago still receive an annuity of twenty-five pounds; and Dr. JAMES HUTCHESON STIRLING, a psychologist of repute, has just begun to draw one of fifty pounds. The total amount thus expended was, when this Return was ordered in June, rather more than twenty-five thousand pounds. According to law, twelve hundred pounds, and no more, may be given by the Treasury to needy and meritorious persons every year. As this figure is always reached, and cannot be exceeded, the cost of the Pension List to the country at any given moment depends upon the lives of the Pensioners, a class in which longevity is not uncommon. Five-and-twenty thousand pounds is not an excessive burden, if such claims are to be recognized at all. But the system, or want of system, on which the money is frittered away could scarcely be condemned beyond its deserts. The Times has selected Lord TENNYSON and Sir RICHARD OWEN as examples of pensions misapplied. Lord TENNYSON receives two hundred and Sir RICHARD OWEN three hundred a year for their distinguished services to Literature and Science respectively. It may safely be said that, if no name on this list were open to more objection than these two, scarcely a murmur against the Pension List would ever have been heard. The doyen of science and the NESTOR of literature are gracefully held up in the evening of their days to the opprobrium of comfortable but uneducated people who do not know what comparative anatomy means, and cannot see what the Lady of Shalott goes to prove. It is true that Lord TENNYSON's pension was granted in 1845, when the profit from the sale of his poems must have been very small. He is reported to have since realized a sum which a successful soap-boiler might leave to his younger son, and whether in those altered circumstances he should have retained the two hundred pounds granted to him by Sir ROBERT PEEL is, no doubt, a matter of opinion. But it is utterly incorrect to say that if Lord TENNYSON relinquished this income some more necessitous person would receive it. The maximum of twelve hundred pounds cannot be exceeded, and Lord TENNYSON's pension would lapse into the broad bosom of the Exchequer.

It must be admitted that other names of distinction are not common in this List. Professor ADAMS, the surviving discoverer of Neptune, may be reckoned among them; and Mr. BAILEY, the author of Festus, and Dr. HASSALL, the scientific chemist. On Mr. WILLIAM ALLINGHAM, and Mr. MARTIN TUPPER, and Mr. ROBERT BUCHANAN, opinions differ, and perhaps always will. But, as Mr. TUPPER's pension was granted in 1873, it is a possible, though perhaps an unduly harsh, criticism to say that he has now survived his reputation for sixteen years. Lady JACKSON is a fluent writer, and Dr. JOULE is a really eminent man of science. Mr. GEORGE MACDONALD is a prolific novelist; and, with the utmost respect for Mr. SMITH's superior judgment, we should not describe his novels as historical. But here he figures for a hundred a year, though we should add that this pension was awarded by Lord BEACONSFIELD, who may have had more sympathy with novelists than Mr. SMITH. No money could be better bestowed than the two hundred a year received by Mr. ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, a naturalist only second to Mr. DARWIN, and Dr. MURRAY, of the English Dictionary, is worthy to stand beside him. But five hundred a year to the daughters of Lord STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE, "with the benefit of survivorship," stands in somewhat odd relationship to the eighty pounds still received annually by the sister of JOHN KEATS, whose "porridge" was a good deal less plentiful than Lord STRATFORD's. Considering how much has been said lately about the late Sir WILLIAM PALLISER's public services and their inadequate recognition, it is both satisfactory and surprising to find that Lady PALLISER enjoys a pension of three hundred a year. Readers of poetry will be glad to learn that Mr. CHARLES PATRICK O'CONOR's poetical merits are acknowledged by Mr. GLADSTONE, while Lord PALMERSTON recognized in Mr. GERALD MASSEY "a lyric poet sprung from the people."

THE TITHES BILL.

THE disappointment which is being occasioned by the prospect of a more prolonged Session than had been expected is rather a natural than a reasonable feeling. No one had any real right to assume that the Parnellites would allow the "contentious" Irish Votes in Supply to pass in an uncontentious fashion, and if their discussion of them has been no less disorderly, it has not been any more protracted than usual. Moreover, the true cause of the postponement by a week or so—it ought not to be more—of the expected rising for the recess is not Estimates at all; it is legislative business. It is the resolve of the Government to pass the Tithes Bill during the present Session, which has really necessitated its prolongation, and though the announcement of the resolve has taken members somewhat by surprise, we are not at all sure that they had any excuse for their astonishment. The Leader of the House has certainly never said anything to encourage the belief that the Tithes Bill would be dropped, and as certainly it was introduced in the first instance as a measure of urgency. Urgency, indeed, is admittedly the sole justification for a measure which deals only with a portion of the subject to which it relates, and it is therefore the sole answer which Ministers can make to the objectors to piecemeal legislation. It is, however, in our opinion, a quite sufficient one. That part of the tithe question with which the Government propose to deal is not only perfectly separable, in point of logic and of practical convenience, from the remainder, but it is also a part of it which a certain class of persons are interested in keeping unsettled, with a view of prejudicing the ultimate treatment of the whole. Whatever arrangement may finally be made with respect to the liability to tithe, that charge is at present in the position, in a certain quarter of the kingdom, of a legal debt which is practically irrecoverable by legal process. In that position it is, of course, the interest of the debtors to keep it, not only because all debtors gain by the evasion of their debts, but because, in this instance, the longer they can keep their creditors out of their due, and the more trouble they can give them in enforcing their rights, the better the terms which it is hoped to exact from the Legislature when the promised "comprehensive measure" for the settlement of the whole tithe question comes up for discussion.

That, we say, is the position in which the Welsh farmers naturally desire to keep the tithe-owners' perfectly legal claim; but it is not a position in which any Government ought to be willing to leave it, and its rescue cannot legitimately be delayed by any theoretical objections to piecemeal legislation or any academic preference for symmetry and completeness of legislative design. They have, in fact, no right to postpone the relief of persons whom, as the circular issued by the Bishop of St. ASAPH points out, "simple starvation awaits," in their existing condition of inability to recover, in the face of mob violence, inefficiently checked by Executive action, a strictly legal debt. Ministers, therefore, have done no more than their bare duty as guardians of the law in determining to delay no longer in extending their assistance to those whom an open defiance of law has for too long a time defrauded of their just rights. That there may be difficulties in the way of passing the Tithes Bill this session is likely enough. If the Parnellites throw in their lot with the English Radicals on the question—which, however, is happily not free from doubt—the progress of the Bill may possibly be impeded by obstruction, judging from the scandalous proceedings last Thursday night, of a more than usually disorderly kind. We are not, however, without hope that before the Tithes Bill gets into Committee, Mr. COURTNEY may have roused himself to a keener appreciation of his duties than he has lately displayed. The discredit of the scene which took place during Mr. BALFOUR's speech on the vote for the resident magistrates cannot be admitted to rest wholly on the Parnellite Alsatian who got it up. Some share of it is reflected, we regret to say, upon the Chairman of Committees. That Mr. EDWARD HARRINGTON should have left his seat and descended to the floor of the House with the intention, afterwards averred, of "dragging" Mr. BALFOUR by force below the bar, and that he should then be able to return to and retain his seat unpunished for the rest of the evening, boasting of his valorous exploit, is a sequence of Parliamentary incidents on which Mr. COURTNEY, as temporary moderator of its proceedings, can hardly reflect with satisfaction.

THE LIVERPOOL MURDER.

SINCE the conviction of PALMER for the murder of Cook, twenty-three years ago, there has been no criminal trial in this country so remarkable and characteristic in itself as that which ended last Wednesday afternoon in the conviction of FLORENCE ELIZABETH MAYBRICK for the murder by poison of her husband, JAMES MAYBRICK. The case lasted seven days, of which two were occupied by the summing-up. The evidence was of several kinds, a great controversy arising among witnesses of medical experience and reputation as to the symptoms, ante-mortem and post-mortem, of poisoning by arsenic. The defence depended entirely upon this controversy, and it failed because, when the whole body of evidence was taken together, it was held to establish the prisoner's guilt. The position and resources of the prisoner were such as to admit of the defence being laid before the jury with all the forensic skill and all the medical advocacy that the country could supply.

JAMES MAYBRICK was a well-to-do cotton-broker in Liverpool, who married some eight years ago an American lady considerably his junior. The history of the crime by which he lost his life begins about the middle of March in the present year. At that time Mrs. MAYBRICK wrote to an hotelkeeper in London ordering rooms for her sister-in-law and her husband, who, she said, were about to spend a few days in town. The sister-in-law knew nothing of the arrangement; but on the appointed day Mrs. MAYBRICK herself came to London and occupied the rooms she had ordered. The evening of her arrival she spent with a man whose identity was not ascertained; but the following day she was joined by another man, named BRIERLEY, who was undoubtedly her paramour, and who lived with her for two or three days at the hotel. Her movements for a few days after this were never discovered; but after a week's absence from home she returned to Liverpool, and accompanied her husband on the day following her return to the Grand National Steeplechase. On the course, and afterwards, a serious quarrel took place between the MAYBRICKS, apparently on the subject of BRIERLEY's attention. Mr. MAYBRICK seems to have struck his wife, and she made preparations to leave his house; but one of the maidservants persuaded her not to do so, and a kind of reconciliation took place. A few weeks after this, towards the end of April, Mr. MAYBRICK was taken ill. It was noticed that the medicine which his wife gave him frequently made him sick, and in one way and another suspicion was aroused. His brothers came to the house, nurses were hired, and Mrs. MAYBRICK was watched. On Wednesday, May the 8th, Mrs. MAYBRICK wrote from her husband's sick-room a note in pencil to BRIERLEY, and gave it to the children's nurse to post. The nurse gave it to the baby to carry, and the baby dropped it in the mud. The nurse then opened it, with no other object, as she afterwards swore, than to put it in a clean envelope. Having opened it, she found that it began "Dearest," and contained such expressions as "my own darling." She therefore gave it to Mr. MAYBRICK's brother. In it Mrs. MAYBRICK referred to her visit to London and to BRIERLEY's future movements. She said that her husband was "sick unto death," underlining the phrase; that it was "only a question of how long his strength would hold out"; and that he had been delirious since the previous Sunday. The last of these statements was absolutely untrue; the other two were not at that time believed by any person except herself, and seemed to imply a belief consistent with her putting him to death by slow poison. From the following day he got rapidly worse; on the Friday his case was hopeless; and on the Saturday evening, May the 11th, he died. Late on the Thursday night Mrs. MAYBRICK was observed by the nurse to take a small bottle of a preparation called Valentine's Meat Juice from her husband's bedroom into an adjoining dressing-room, and bring it back after a minute or two. In the ordinary course some of this Meat Juice would have been given to Mr. MAYBRICK; but it was put on one side, and he took none of it. After his death the contents of the bottle were analysed, and found to contain arsenic.

A post-mortem examination of Mr. MAYBRICK's body was made as soon as possible, and in different parts of it was found a very small quantity of arsenic—less than one-hundredth of a grain in all. But Mr. MAYBRICK's bedroom and dressing-room were found to be absolutely cumbered with preparations of arsenic, some stronger and some weaker. There were some two dozen fly-papers, containing about half a grain of arsenic each, recently bought by Mrs. MAYBRICK, while others were soaking in a basin of water. There was in a cardboard box a paper of arsenic in powder, labelled on one side "Poison" and on the other, in pencil, "Arsenic—poison for cats." There were six or eight miscellaneous bottles, all containing solutions of arsenic, some strong enough for two or three fatal doses. A bottle of medicine, prescribed by a London doctor and made up by a respectable chemist at Liverpool, contained arsenic which the dispenser had never put there. Even a bottle of glycerine, with which the poor man's lips had been moistened, by the doctor's orders, to relieve his thirst when he could not retain so much as a drop of water on his stomach, contained a small quantity of arsenic.

Yet there was a defence, and one that seemed, at different times during the trial, extremely likely to prove successful. In the first place, it was insisted by a variety of eminent medical men, headed by Dr. TIDY, the well-known writer and lecturer on forensic medicine, and Dr. MACNAMARA, of the Irish College of Surgeons, that Mr. MAYBRICK did not die of arsenic at all. Every one admitted that he died of inflammation of the stomach and intestines, which doctors call gastro-enteritis; and, further, that arsenic causes death by producing gastro-enteritis. But Dr. TIDY and others swore positively that a man could not die of arsenic unless he suffered from four main symptoms, or at any rate some of them. These are violent and persistent vomiting and purging, acute pain in the pit of the stomach, soreness of the eyes, and cramp in the calves of the legs; and that they gathered from the report of the physicians who attended the case that, except vomiting, none of these symptoms were observed. They declared that gastro-enteritis might be produced by taking certain kinds of food affected by certain latent impurities, not capable of being specified, and that the kinds of food most likely to go bad in this mysterious way were sausages, cheese, and lobster. They also denied that the post-mortem symptoms reported by those who had examined Mr. MAYBRICK's body resembled the post-mortem symptoms of arsenical poisoning. To this it was replied that as to vomiting Mr. MAYBRICK was proved to have vomited long enough and violently enough for anything, and that as to the other symptoms Dr. STEVENSON and other eminent doctors did not consider them essential. The doctors for the defence explained the arsenic found in MAYBRICK's body by the fact that, as was conclusively proved, he had been in the habit three or four years ago of taking medicine in which arsenic was an important element. There was also evidence, less conclusive, that he had continued this habit to within eighteen months of his death, and it was urged that, if he continued it longer still, some small quantity of arsenic would probably be found in his body after his death. All the doctors for the defence were contradicted in the handsomest and most complete manner by doctors for the prosecution. The humbler of these had had the advantage of seeing their patient both alive and dead; and they not only delivered their opinion that he did die of poisoning by arsenic, but were able to prove conclusively that for about a fortnight before his death he never had an opportunity of eating either sausages, cheese, or lobster. Alone, among Mrs. MAYBRICK's experts, Dr. MACNAMARA was prepared to go the length necessary to the satisfactory establishment of his theory as to the cause of death—that a man with a weak stomach might have gastro-enteritis merely because he caught cold, and without eating anything noxious at all.

The trial also supplied a further illustration of the great advantage guilty prisoners—and most prisoners are guilty—derive from not being allowed to give evidence. So great an impression was produced by the very positive evidence of Dr. TIDY and his fellows that Mrs. MAYBRICK might possibly have escaped, after all, if she had not claimed to be allowed to make a statement. Mr. Justice STEPHEN, as he and some other judges always do, allowed her to do so. It was artfully made, but it contained two questionable assertions, and was open to the fatal retort that it had not been made the basis of the defence, and that no witnesses had been called or questions asked in support of statements which might have been confirmed if they were true. She owned that she put poison in the bottle of meat juice, and said that her husband had asked her to put a powder in it, and that she had done so without knowing what it was. She also said that she had been extracting essence from fly-papers in order to make a face-wash, as she had been taught to do by friends in Germany. Both these statements were sprung upon the Court at the end of the evidence, and neither was supported by any fact in the case. The jury refused to be guided by the energetic speculations of Dr. TIDY, and found a verdict of Guilty, after half an hour's retirement.

MR. W. R. S. RALSTON.

ONE of the most familiar figures of London literary society has passed away in the person of Mr. Ralston, whose death, by an overdose of chloroform, took place last Tuesday. He was generally believed to have started for a long tour in Russia, intending to spend the winter in Bulgaria; but he died in London. He was a solitary man, without near surviving relatives, and his life oscillated between periods of extraordinary social activity, during which he was seen everywhere at once, and longer periods of melancholy seclusion, in which he remained cloistered in his rooms, communicating for months at a time with no one but his books. His appearance was striking; his height was several inches over six feet; he was exceedingly thin and haggard, and a long grey beard floated in the wind as he dashed from place to place in his rare intervals of cheerful activity. Underneath this picturesque exterior he cultivated a heart of singular warmth and unselfishness. He was known to all his friends as "the Russian Don Quixote," and his brighter moments were spent in the most vehement, the most exhausting and extravagant attempts to make his fellow-beings less unfortunate. No Roumanian patriot or Russian ballet-dancer stranded in the wilderness of London, no singer who could not sing nor scribbler who could not write, but Mr. Ralston was ready, at the most unexpected moment, to seize him or her in the whirlwind of his philanthropy. He was the most eccentric of men; but his eccentricity was merely kind-heartedness and tender sympathy gone wild, and a more generous, a more unselfish, creature never breathed. He came of an Ayrshire family, and his name, until after he left college, was William Ralston Sheddon, his grandmother's name being afterwards added to his own. After having been educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, in the belief that he was destined to be a wealthy man, he suddenly found himself penniless. He obtained an appointment at the British Museum, and rose to a high position in the Library. If he had continued to hold it, as all his friends desired, he would probably be alive at this moment. But about 1875, in consequence of a misunderstanding with certain officials who have since died, he rashly resigned his appointment, although supported by the Trustees, and particularly by the late Archbishop of Canterbury. Since this time his eccentricity and his ill-health grew upon him. Nothing could be more pathetic than the career of a man who lived entirely for others, and could not be persuaded to cultivate any of the arts of life for himself.

The body of Mr. Ralston's work is not equal in importance to what might reasonably be expected from so very original and striking a personality. Even in literature it was more by what he said and did than by what he wrote that he effected an influence. He was a learned student of the languages of Eastern Europe, and in particular of Russian. He was indefatigable in urging on editors the importance of a recognition of contemporary Continental writers. He was the earliest friend of Turgeneff in this country, and the present fashion for Russian novels started with him. One of the latter, Liza, he translated twenty years ago. He had a very remarkable gift in reciting, with appropriate gestures and cries, the weird stories of Slavonic folklore, and his public performances of this nature will long be remembered. His own books were numerous. Of them all, possibly the most durable contribution to literature is the learned and elaborate volume of The Songs of the Russian People, published in 1873.

MODERN CAVALRY.

IT is a noteworthy fact, and one not easily explained, that while the English nation has, for the last two centuries at any rate, been distinguished for its love of field sports and for its excellent horsemanship, our cavalry has not, on the whole, shown itself superior to that of the other nations of the Continent. All Englishmen fancy they can ride, and flatter themselves that, in equine matters, their instincts and proclivities give them an easy superiority over foreigners in general, and Frenchmen perhaps in particular. "Mossoo's" adventures in the hunting-field furnished Leech with many an idea, and even now, when our national habits have been to a large extent imitated across the Channel, a story of our neighbours "busy riding" never fails to raise a smile. The memoirs and anecdotes of the time spent in France by our army of occupation in 1815 teem with experiences of the superiority in the hunting-field displayed by our officers, headed in their pastimes by the Iron Duke himself, and betray one and all a little-disguised contempt for the performances of the indigenous sportsmen. Yet we find in Lord Stanhope's recently published "Conversations" Wellington's opinion that, while the individual British trooper of his day was no doubt superior to his French rival, and while a British troop might be reckoned on to overpower a like body of the cavalry of their opponents, the advantage when larger numbers became involved was not maintained, and a British division of cavalry could no longer be counted on to oppose successfully an equally large body of French horse. The reason he assigned for this anomaly was that our men were more apt to get out of hand, and, brilliant as might be their first onslaught, were liable to be caught disorganized and more or less at a disadvantage by the enemy's second line, or reserves, immediately afterwards. Cavalry is especially at the mercy of fresh troops after a charge, even in the moment of victory, and the very dash and self-confidence of our horsemen laid them particularly open to danger at such a conjuncture. Man for man our squadrons, in like manner, have, it may safely be said, at the present time no superiors in Europe, and their drill and equipment is probably better than in the Great Duke's time; yet there is no doubt that their manœuvring power in large bodies remains unequal, as of old, to that displayed by several of our neighbours on the Continent. The German trooper, seen alone, strikes one as inferior in his horsemanship to one of our own men; yet the line of their squadrons is more exactly preserved, the horses are better in hand, and the greater precision in the execution of rapid movements displayed by them, in the case of large masses especially, is very marked. This superiority is partly to be attributed to the fact that in our service the condition of the horses is the thing first looked to by an inspecting officer.

"Fat horses" has been one of the traditions handed down to us from the days of the Peninsula, when it was considered that the more flesh they carried into the campaign the more they had to lose, and the longer consequently was their health preserved under hardship. The idea has survived the lapse of years, and nowadays a commanding officer still fears to gallop his squadrons lest his horses should unduly show their ribs at the next inspection, and his horse management be called in question. Foreigners regard military matters entirely from the practical standpoint, and would rather see their horses fit to execute a rapid charge, without being blown and exhausted, than displaying a sleek rotundity in marching past. They move their squadrons, therefore, over long distances, and manœuvre them continually and rapidly all the time; in consequence of which they become handier, and it is possible to work them with greater confidence and decision at a crisis.

Even on the Continent, however, it is remarkable that while the efficiency of infantry and artillery has become marvellously increased of late years, owing to the great development of fire effect brought about by modern science, the cavalry of to-day, as regards their own especial characteristics, are probably inferior to their predecessors of the time of Frederick the Great. And the reason for this is not merely because an arm which seeks to produce its effect entirely by shock is at a great disadvantage in these days, when fire effect has become so exaggerated, and when the ultimate decision of the fight must depend almost entirely on it. That might account for a decrease in their relative value and importance; but the cavalry of the latter end of the last century were, we believe, superior as regards their own immediate rôle to the horsemen of to-day, were probably as well mounted, and were certainly capable of more extended and rapid manœuvring.

Seydlitz's squadrons were undoubtedly possessed of a greater speed, discipline, and endurance than even the smartest regiments of the present German army can lay claim to, and as regards shock were admittedly more to be relied on. Moreover, the German regulations of to-day recognize the fact, and their efforts aim no higher than towards attaining a like mobility and efficiency. Of course this state of things is largely to be attributed to the fact that in those days the value of cavalry on the actual field of battle was greater than at present, and that they were then capable of encountering infantry with success during any stage of an engagement. They bore, therefore, a larger proportion to the other arms, their support was more relied on, and greater importance was attached to their tactical application. The development of fire that has marked the progress of this century placed them at a disadvantage as regards infantry on the field of battle, and some years back less attention was therefore perhaps paid to their training than had been bestowed on it by Frederick and his generals. Yet it would seem likely that the next big war will witness cavalry engagements on a large scale at the commencement of hostilities, and the issue of such collisions must have an important bearing on subsequent events.

It may be assumed that both sides will enter the theatre covered far to the front with a strong force of cavalry. To hide their own movements and discover those of the foe will be the rôle allotted to these horsemen, and energetic action on their part will be necessary to effect either purpose. One side or other will boldly thrust its strength forward, and endeavour to penetrate and tear aside the hostile veil, and a strong and determined effort will doubtless be made in opposition. Thus we may expect to see large masses of cavalry again manœuvring against one another, and often in actual collision ere their respective armies are within striking distance, while the result of such combats must materially influence the plans of either side. Large masses will on such occasions, if not subsequently, again have to be handled with rapidity and decision; and discipline and precision of movement in the various component parts will again form an indispensable element of success. At a field-day in this country, nowadays, the cavalry seem to spend half their time out of the saddle, and the old tactics of the dragoon of the last century, so much discounted by Frederick, appear sometimes in danger of again being revived. To be worthy of the name, cavalry must be accustomed to being handled with rapidity; their movements must be so swift as to seem intuitive, and must yet be exactly calculated and nicely judged. Their attack should be sudden as the swoop of the falcon, and the most opportune moment for their intervention recognized by their leader with the eye of the hawk. Such combination between thought and execution can only be arrived at by dint of constant practice under realistic circumstances, and cavalry unaccustomed to sudden and resolute action in peace-time will surely be found wanting in mobility and readiness when hostilities occur. The Germans have thoroughly appreciated this, and during their manœuvres fifty or sixty squadrons may be seen handled together with a skill and rapidity such as probably fall little short of the standard of Frederick the Great. Their recent campaigns have taught them the value of the arm, and they appear to consider that the days for its employment on the battlefield, in spite of all that is expected from modern firearms, are by no means over. As we have already stated, their horsemen take a leading part in their mimic warfare, and enterprise, swiftness, and audacity are inculcated and encouraged. Yet drill and discipline are likewise strictly insisted on, and the example of Seydlitz, who rejoiced to see his troopers charging jammed boot to boot, is held up for imitation. The tendency of peace-time is to over-estimate the effect of fire, and theory will always favour the defence. Yet, in actual fact, it is the attack that more usually wins, and this is as true of the nineteenth century as it was in the days of Julius Cæsar. In the same way theory seemed to deny to cavalry their former influence on the battlefield, yet experience asserts that, if they be well handled and have sufficient mobility, even modern fire will not prevent their finding opportunities for throwing their weight effectively into the scale, while in their screening and reconnoitring duties to the front theory and practice alike allot them a large sphere of usefulness and action. Considerations such as these should give us some anxiety when we reflect on our inadequate horse-supply and the difficulty we should experience in finding suitable remounts for even our small proportion of the arm had we ever again to oppose a European foe. Horses and men will alike require careful drill and unremitting attention, and trained chargers are not readily improvised, even though horses of sorts are forthcoming to fill the ranks.

RACING AT GOODWOOD.

THE Goodwood meeting could not have opened in more glorious weather, and the course, instead of being a quagmire as it was last year, was in perfect order. This was exceeding good luck, considering the wet days which immediately succeeded the meeting. There was a party, too, at Goodwood House, without which Goodwood is, so to speak, scarcely Goodwood. The Stewards' Cup, although only worth 602*l.*, had given rise to a great deal of betting for some time before the meeting, and it was considered an exceptionally open race. Much as good sportsmen dislike to see a first-rate horse beaten by an inferior one carrying a much lighter weight, it is beyond question that the presence of a celebrated winner under a weight with which it is just possible that he may win adds immensely to the interest of a handicap. In the opinion of many excellent judges General Byrne's chestnut colt, Amphion, was the best three-year-old of the season, bold as such a theory sounded when one remembered Donovan. He was handicapped at 8 st. 13 lbs., and had to give as much as 3 st. 6 lbs. to one of his opponents. Then he was giving 6 lbs. and a year, the equivalent to an allowance of 17 lbs., to the great, powerful Noble Chieftain, who, although a roarer, and an uncertain runner, had given Fullerton a beating equal to a stone within the month. Nevertheless, many racing-men of great experience thought that Amphion would be able to accomplish his task, and after having been first favourite he eventually started a strong second favourite. The first favourite at the last moment was Lord Rodney's Danbydale, who had been left at the post for the Royal Hunt Cup at Ascot, after having been backed for immense sums, and we may say at once that he again disappointed his party by running only seventh. A horse that had been heavily backed long before the race was Mr. A. James's Dog Rose, who had beaten a field of twenty-three at Newmarket in May, and had been placed in three out of four other races this season. He was to receive 15 lbs., which at weight for age was equal to 26 lbs., from Amphion, and his backers maintained that he was not so inferior to the best horse in training, be that horse who he might, as all that; yet he went down in the betting just before the start, until he reached 100 to 7. There was also Noble Chieftain to be reckoned with. At Newmarket that colt had beaten Dog Rose by three lengths at even weights, and to make up for this, 9 lbs. was to be allowed. The question whether that amount would put the pair on even terms was eagerly disputed. Danbydale gave a great deal of trouble at the post—breaking away and running part of the course more than once before the flag fell, this time, instead of staying behind altogether. When the eighteen starters did get away the running was made by Miss Ethel, who showed great speed for the greater part of the journey. Both Amphion and Dog Rose got off very well; but Noble Chieftain was not so favoured, and he was impeded by a cluster of horses that were in front of him. When they had run about half the course the first favourite was beaten; Miss Ethel, Dog Rose, Amphion, The Gloamin', and Martley composed the leading division, and Noble Chieftain was trying to work his way through the crowd. About three hundred yards from home Miss Ethel resigned the lead to Dog Rose, and at about the same time Noble Chieftain succeeded in obtaining an opening. Amphion, ridden by Watts, struggled with unflinching gameness to catch Dog Rose; but he had only reached his neck at the winning-post. Noble Chieftain, ridden by Weldon, was close at hand, and he appeared to be going much faster than either Dog Rose or Amphion at the finish. Considering the amount of ground that he made up in a short time, it was a highly meritorious performance on the part of Noble Chieftain to pass the winning-post only three-quarters of a length behind Amphion, and handicappers neither ought nor are likely to depreciate it. Dog Rose was a thoroughly "exposed horse," and he was capitally ridden by Woodburn. He is strong and muscular—according to some critics, even to clumsiness; yet it is the general opinion that he is evenly made and a good mover. The question is whether he is within 23 lbs. of a first-class horse, for that he ought to be if Amphion is all that his admirers suppose.

Considerable credit was due to Rathbeal for his victory in the Hahnaker Stakes, when giving 7 lbs. to Far Niente, who had shown form as good as The Whaup's, at the weights at which they met, for the Zetland Stakes at Leicester. Indirectly, it did honour also to Loup, who had run Rathbeal to a head when giving him 13 lbs. at Sandown, and still more so to Heaume, who had beaten Loup at Newmarket. The Richmond Stakes, the principal two-year-old race of the day, was a very unsatisfactory affair, as there was a great deal of bearing to one side and bumping on the part of more than one of the competitors at the finish. Mr. Douglas Baird's Fortitude, a very fine colt by Sterling that had cost 2,300 guineas as a yearling, was the favourite; but he only ran third, and the race was won by Golden Gate, a colt by Bend Or, belonging to a brother of the owner of Fortitude. The Duke of Beaufort's Carabinier divided the Messrs. Bairds' colts, both of which swerved to such an extent as to make the value of the form very doubtful. Mr. H. Milner's Riviera won the Ham Stakes so easily that those who had laid 20 to 1 on her never had cause for a moment's uneasiness; but this was very far from being the case with the layers of 9 to 4 on Mr. D. Baird's El Dorado for the Gratwicke Stakes, the last race of the day, as their champion, after appearing to have the race in hand a quarter of a mile from home, began to slacken his pace in a most alarming manner at the distance, and it was all that Warne could do to get home with him in front of Lord Bradford's Royal Oak and the Duke of Hamilton's Fusilier, who only finished a neck and three-quarters of a length behind him.

El Dorado was in a better humour in the next race of the meeting, and the first of the Wednesday, which he won without being extended from Bridlemere, his single opponent. His craven running of the preceding day enabled his backers to lay the short odds of 6 to 4 on him. Backers had very fair terms offered them again about another of Mr. D. Baird's colts for the next race, the Sussex Stakes, in 6 to 4 against Enthusiast, the winner of the Two Thousand, who won with great ease, although by only a neck, from Prince Soltykoff's Gold. Neither Enthusiast nor El Dorado is generally considered a very satisfactory or fortunate colt. The former cost 2,000 guineas as a yearling, and has won but two races out of eight, yet he has more than 2,000*l.* to his credit after repaying the whole of his purchase-money; and the latter, be his demerits what they may, has won considerably over 6,000*l.* in stakes. The most interesting race of the day was the Chesterfield Cup, for which Mr. Legh's Veracity, the winner of the Liverpool Cup a week earlier, gave from 11 lbs. to 45 lbs. to each of his nine opponents and won easily by three-quarters of a length. This was about the best form he had ever shown. As a two-year-old he won as many as eight races out of ten; as a three-year-old he again ran ten times, but without winning a single race. So disgusted were his supporters with his shortcomings in that year that when he came out for the Lincolnshire Handicap the following spring they allowed him to start at 50 to 1, when, as if to reproach them for their faithlessness, he won the race from a field of twenty-three. A week later he won the Nottinghamshire Handicap; but after that he showed such indifferent form throughout the summer and autumn that 20 to 1 was laid against him for the Cambridgeshire, which he won by a head. His victory for the Chesterfield Cup confirms the suspicion that Whitelegs owed his success in the race for the Royal Hunt Cup at Ascot to his excellent start; for in that race Whitelegs beat Veracity by four lengths, and now, with only 1 lb. less between them, Veracity beat Whitelegs by nearly five lengths. In winning the Sweepstakes with his one-eyed filly, Sorceress, Mr. Abington apparently lost 830*l.*, as the stakes were only worth 115*l.*, and he bought in the winner for 900 guineas more than he was to receive for her; but we are tired of pointing out the constant repetition of one of the greatest anomalies of the turf.

We should scarcely be exaggerating if we were to say that never did so brilliant an assemblage witness such dull racing on a Cup Day at Goodwood as on the Thursday of last week. Only two horses ran for the great event, and the average number of starters for each race was less than half a dozen. For the Cup, odds of 4 to 1 were laid on Mr. Warren de la Rue's great, muscular, chestnut colt, Trayles, the winner of the Gold Cup and the Alexandra Plate at Ascot. He gave 2 st. 8 lbs. to the Duke of Beaufort's Latania, a filly of the same age, made the whole of the running, and won easily by four lengths. The Duke of Portland's Semolina had no difficulty in winning the Prince of Wales's Stakes, "pulling double," by two lengths, from five opponents, none of whom had yet distinguished themselves, and by this victory she brought her winnings up to 7,810*l.* Mr. H. Milner's Riviera, with 10 lbs. extra on her back, won the Rous Memorial Stakes, at least as easily, from a field of six. General pleasure was given by the Prince of Wales's victory in the fifth race. It was a great day for backers, as the favourites won in five races out of six, which made it a violent contrast to the disastrous Cup Day of last year, when the favourites were beaten in every instance.

As Prince Soltykoff's Cherry Bounce had beaten Mr. de la Rue's Wrinkle by some lengths for the Coronation Stakes at Ascot, it seemed safe to make the former the better favourite of the pair for the Nassau Stakes, even with 5 lbs. extra on her back; but these calculations were upset by a collision which took place between them on entering the rails, for Cherry Bounce got the worst of the scrimmage and dropped into the rear. Baron de Rothschild's magnificent chestnut colt Le Nord, by Tristan, won the Molecomb Stakes very easily from Mr. W. Low's bay colt by Wisdom out of Vanish, who had cost 1,150 guineas last year and this season had won a match in May and run a good third to Rathbeal and Loup for the National Breeders' Produce Stakes at Sandown Second Summer Meeting. Dog Rose, the winner of the Stewards' Cup, gave Mr. Maple's The Gloamin' 12 lbs. and a beating for the Chichester Stakes, a performance which tended to the honour and glory of Amphion. The Goodwood Stakes was considered "a good thing" for Mr. Maple's clever, lengthy, chestnut mare, Mill Stream, the winner of the Chester Cup. Mr. Fenwick's weight-carrying brown horse Tissaphernes, the winner of the Great Metropolitan Stakes, was supposed to have the second best chance; and next in public estimation came Lord Calthorpe's three-year-old Savant, a colt by Wisdom out of Mill Stream's dam, that had shown his staying powers by winning the Feather Plate at Newmarket over the long course of two miles and a quarter as a two-year-old. Tissaphernes made the running almost as soon as the field had been steadied into their strides, and continued to do so until entering the rails. So far as the favourites were concerned he held his own; but a 12-to-1 outsider was destined to defeat him. Ingram, a powerful four-year-old colt, belonging to A. Taylor, the trainer, that had never won a race before, challenged Tissaphernes and beat him, rather easily at last, by a length. As he was receiving 24 lbs. from Tissaphernes, there could be no question as to whom the honours of the race were due. For the City and Suburban, Fullerton, who ran second, had given Ingram 39 lbs. and beaten him out of place; in fact, Ingram was absolutely last, although he was carrying less weight than anything in the race; so his victory for the Goodwood Stakes was, to say the least of it, a very remarkable occurrence. The favourites were beaten again for the two next races, still further reducing the winnings of the backers; but those who cared to lay the long odds of 16 to 1 on Mr. A. W. Merry's celebrated two-year-old, Surefoot, for the Findon Stakes, the last race of the meeting, won their money without fear or trembling. Neither the weather nor the company of the Goodwood meeting could well have been improved upon; some excellent horses ran, and there were a few races of considerable interest; but, taken as a whole, it must be confessed that the sport was poor.

THE FAERIE KING.

THE readers of The Faerie Queene are legion, but who has read The Faerie King? We cannot pretend to have accomplished the feat, for it is no light matter to read eight thousand five hundred lines of indifferent verse; but we have turned the pages and noted occasional passages. The Faerie King never passed the press, but is preserved among the Rawlinson MSS. in the Bodleian Library. One Sheppard was the writer—Samuel Sheppard, not Simon Sheppard (they both signed "S. Sheppard," to the confusion of bibliographers)—and the poem may be dated circa 1650.

We are inclined to think that, for intrepid, unabashed plagiarism, Sheppard beats the record. Gerard Langbaine, noticing his so-called comedy, The Committee-man Curried, 1647, remarked:—"The Author indeed has shew'd his Reading, if not his Fancy: for there is scarce a piece of Sir John Suckling that he has not plundered. His Aglaura, Goblins, Brenoralt, all have pay'd tribute to our Excise-Poet: neither his verses nor prose have escaped him." But there were many sufferers besides Suckling. One of his favourite authors was Webster; and he had the effrontery to introduce into his romance, The Loves of Amandus and Sophronia, 1650, those fine lines from The Devil's Law-Case:—

All the flowers of the spring
Meet to perfume our burying, &c.

The most interesting part of The Faerie King is the sixth canto of the fifth book, a description of the "Sacred House of Eloquence," with remarks on "Ancient and Modern Bards." As the stanza on Shakspeare is not given in Shakspeare's Centurie of Prayse, nor in Dr. Furnivall's Supplement to that curious volume, it may be worth quoting (though it is not very brilliant):—

Shakspeare the next, who wrot so much so well,
That when I view his Bulke I stand amaz'd:
A Genius so inexhaustible,
That hath such tall and numerous trophies rais'd;
Let him bee thought a Block, an Infidell,
Shall dare to skreene the lustre of his praise,
Whose works shall find (their due) a deathless date,
Scorning the teeth of Time or force of Fate.

Four-and-twenty English names are selected for praise. First come Chaucer, Sir Thomas More ("Who lost his owne To prove the Pope the only perfect head"), Sidney, and Spenser. Perhaps some readers will share Sheppard's regret that Spenser "doated on exploded words." Sir John Harington's Orlando Furioso, of which Ben Jonson said such severe things to Drummond of Hawthornden, is pronounced to rival "Ariosto's famed originall." Chapman's Homeric labours are applauded:—

Nor can wee match his most admired play,
Either in Sophocles or Seneca.

After Chapman come Sir Henry Wotton ("A general scholler, flowing, pithie, neat"), Drayton, Ben Jonson, John Fletcher ("A more accomplish'd wit our clime nere bred"), George Sandys, the fluent translator of Ovid's Metamorphoses, and "reverend Donne." Two lines at the close of the stanza on Donne are in Sheppard's boldest manner, delightfully absurd:—

Thrice glorious Patryarch, who didst talk with Death
Till the rude Goblin stopt thy learned breath.

Samuel Daniel is commended for grave sententiousness, and King James is declared to have written "a most succinct elaborate stile." Bacon is described in flat prose as "a walking living library." Shakspeare follows, then Sir Walter Raleigh, and then—save the mark!—Thomas Goffe, author of The Raging Turk and other extravagant tragedies (not without merit), an amiable young clergyman, who shortened his days by marrying a vixenish widow. To Goffe succeeds Francis Quarles, the emblem-writer, ridiculously styled "our English Orpheus"; and then we have a stanza, not badly turned, in praise of Webster:—

Webster the next: though not so much of note,
Nor's name attended with such noise & crowd,
Yet by the Nine and by Apollo's vote
Whole groves of Bay are for his head allow'd.
Most sacred spirit, (some may say I doate)
Of thy three noble Tragedies bee as proud
As great voluminous Johnson: thou shalt bee
Read longer & with more applause than hee.

Time has partly verified Sheppard's bold prediction. Catiline and Sajanus have lost something of their early prestige, but The Duchess of Malfi and The White Devil shine with heightened splendour. Randolph, Suckling, Cartwright, and Charles I. bring up the rear.

We do not know how long Sheppard was engaged on the composition of his interminable poem. In his Epigrams, 1651, he has an address "To his Muse in reference to his Faerie King," indulging the fancy that,

When violent hands have made
England a den of dragons, a dark shade
Where shag-hayrd Satyres daunce, when Kingdoms are Quite overturn'd, and frie in flames of Warre,
I shall command the Earth and to the Skie
Above the Earth, borne on Fames Wings shall flie.

But it seems to have occurred to him at times that he was labouring in vain. When he reached the fifth book he felt his spirits beginning to flag, and raised a cry of alarm:—

Shall I (ye learned nine) be now betrayd?
Having scrambled up so high upon your hill,
Must I be now becalm'd? O holy mayde,
Who hitherto hast given mee strength & skill,
Must my Ideas, when I'm dead, be found
Halfe buried & half above the ground?
Forbid it, O thou Delphian deitie!

After this invocation he trudges on, pilfering right and left. As he drew very copiously from Britannia's Pastorals, he might at least have found room for William Browne in his "House of Eloquence."

It is strange, but true, that in 1880 the Roxburghe Club actually contemplated printing Sheppard's poem. A charitable conjecture is that the gentleman who suggested the publication had never looked into the MS. The Rev. W. E. Buckley, who rendered real service to letters by restoring Robert Burton's Philosophaster, was asked by the members of the Club to "confer with Mr. Coxe as to Sheppard's poems"; and it is to be presumed that the report was not favourable to Sheppard. The Faerie King will be read when The Faerie Queene is forgotten, hardly before.

DIVISION OF RAILWAY ORDINARY STOCKS.

THE announcement a fortnight ago that the Directors of the Great Northern Railway Company had decided to ask the consent of their shareholders and the authority of Parliament for the resumption of the division of the Ordinary Stock of the Company into Preferred and Deferred, together with rumours that other Boards of Directors intend to take a similar course, caused a sharp rise in Ordinary Railway Stocks. This is conclusive as to the opinion of the Stock Exchange on the matter. Investors proper prefer a stock which gives a fixed annual return to one whose return fluctuates, and for good reasons. We showed last week that most of the dividends announced by English railway Companies for the first half of this year considerably exceed those announced twelve months ago. In some cases the rate is as much as $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. higher than that of twelve months ago, and in one or two cases it is 1 per cent. higher. Now, to the holder of 10,000*l.* of Ordinary Stock an increase of $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. for the year in the dividend means an addition to his income of 125*l.* This, in itself, is highly satisfactory. But, unfortunately, a person with a moderate or small income is apt to be tempted into a considerable increase of expenditure by so large an addition to his income. He finds that he can lay by as much as he did before, and yet, after spending the same as in previous years, he has a considerable surplus, and most people are not thrifty enough, under such circumstances, to resist the temptation to augment their expenses. But after awhile times begin to change. Railway dividends first become stationary, and then decrease, and when the shareholder finds his income falling off, he is not always able to lessen his expenses promptly and proportionately. Therefore, most careful investors like to have a security whose return they can calculate with reasonable certainty. It is argued, then, by the Stock Exchange that, if the Ordinary Stocks of our railway Companies were divided into two separate stocks—one called Preferred Ordinary and the other Deferred Ordinary—the first to be entitled to a fixed Preference rate of dividend, and the second to take all that might remain, the Preferred Ordinary Stock would exactly suit the requirements of investors. Debenture, Guaranteed, and Preference Stocks have risen very much of late, and give to the investor a very small return. A creation of a new kind of Preference Stock would afford an opportunity to buy on more favourable terms. But the Deferred Ordinary Stocks would equally well suit two other classes of purchasers in the Stock Exchange; those who may be called speculative investors—persons, that is, who buy less with a view to the return which the security yields than in the hope that its market price will rise—and, secondly, the speculators pure and simple. As the Deferred Ordinary Stocks would be entitled only to what might remain over after the Preferred Ordinary dividends had been paid, their dividends would be good in good years and bad in bad years. Their prices, therefore, would fluctuate a good deal, and therefore they would afford ample scope for speculation. Consequently, it is concluded that the prices of the two separate stocks would be considerably higher than the price of the single undivided stock as it exists at present. It is not surprising, then, that division is favoured by large numbers of shareholders, by speculators generally, and by members of the Stock Exchange.

Hitherto, however, the directors of most Companies have been opposed to division. In 1868 an Act was passed authorizing any Company which in any one year paid 3 per cent. per annum on its Ordinary Stock to divide that stock into two, one entitled to 6 per cent. per annum, and the other to whatever might remain over, each 100*l.* of stock to be equally divided. Only four Companies have taken advantage of this Act—the London, Brighton, and South Coast, the London and South-Eastern, the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, and the Great Northern. Last year the North British Company obtained a special Act of Parliament, which enabled it to divide upon a new plan, giving 100*l.* of Preferred Ordinary Stock and 100*l.* of Deferred Ordinary Stock for every 100*l.* of existing Ordinary Stock, the former to be entitled to 3 per cent. per annum, and the latter to take whatever might remain. The Boards of other Companies have declined to avail themselves of the Act of 1868, or to apply for special Acts giving them similar powers. And the objection of railway Directors to the division of their Ordinary Stocks is intelligible enough. From what has been said above it will be seen that it is generally admitted that the division would lead to a considerable increase of speculation, and respectable Boards of Directors naturally shrink from doing anything that would have such a result. But, apart from this moral objection, there is a strong practical objection also. If the view generally taken be correct that the Deferred Ordinary Stock would be eagerly sought after by speculators and speculative investors, these stocks would be held almost entirely by persons who have little or no interest in the permanent prosperity of the Companies. What they wish for is a rise in price, and it would matter little to them what might be the cause of the rise. Therefore they would naturally be inclined to favour anything likely to lead to a rise of prices on the Stock Exchange; and, as they would be more active, more enterprising, and more in a position to combine than investors proper scattered over the country, they would be able to bring to bear upon the Directors an exceedingly strong pressure. But several Boards of Directors seem to have become convinced that they cannot well hold out any longer. Not merely is there a strong demand from the shareholders, but this demand some time ago led to the formation of a Conversion Trust Company, for the special purpose of converting stocks. This Company has bought a million of London and North-Western Ordinary Stock, half a million of North-Eastern, and 600,000*l.* of Caledonian. It is true that the Company professes its intention not to vote upon the stocks held by it; but it is generally safe to assume that when power is held it will sooner or later be used, no matter what may have been the original intention, when it was acquired. And it may well be that Boards of Directors are beginning to think that it will be better they should themselves undertake the division of their stocks than that other Companies should do so, and at the same time should obtain an enormous voting power in their Companies.

From what has been said above, it will be seen that three Companies still give to their shareholders the option in the first half of every year of dividing the Ordinary Stock held by them into a Preferred and Deferred in the proportion of 50*l.* each for every 100*l.* of undivided Ordinary. One other Company gave the same option for a while; but many years ago it ceased dividing, and a fifth Company last half-year introduced an entirely new plan, that of giving 100*l.* both of Preferred and of Deferred for each 100*l.* of undivided Ordinary. We write before the meeting of shareholders of the Great Northern Company is held, and cannot say, therefore, what plan the Directors of that Company favour. Indeed, they are hardly likely to give an explanation on the point judging from the wording of the resolution to be submitted to the shareholders. But the general impression at the moment is that the Directors do not intend to adopt the plan of the Act of 1868. Most of those who have been agitating for division object to that Act that even at the time it was passed it did not meet the requirements of shareholders. And in evidence of this they point to the few companies which have availed themselves of its permission. Further, they say with very much force that the economic conditions of the country have changed so completely during the past one-and-twenty years that a fixed dividend of 6 per cent. is now preposterously high. Therefore, they contend either that the Act should be completely amended, or that special Acts should be given to the several Companies to suit their respective requirements. This is what was done last year in the case of the North British. Against the North British plan, however, there are also objections. The first and the most general is, that it waters the capital of the Company. The word "watering" is usually understood to mean that new capital for which no consideration was given is created to share equally with the old capital. And if this be the sense in which the word is used by the objectors it is not true. It is quite true that the North British plan doubles the existing Ordinary Stock, but then it limits the rights of the Preferred Ordinary stockholders to a dividend of 3 per cent. per annum, and gives to the holders of the Deferred Ordinary Stock only whatever may remain after that amount has been paid in any one year. The plan, then, correctly described, is a device for changing the distribution of the net profits. But, no doubt, something is to be said against the doubling of the nominal capital. The argument in favour of the North British plan is, that, as it gives the Preference Ordinary Stock only 3 per cent., it substantially complies with the provisions of the Act of 1868, which gives to the Preference Stock 6 per cent. the amount of the Preference being only half of the old undivided stock. So far as the shareholders themselves are concerned, it does not very much matter which plan is adopted. If a man divides his 100*l.* stock into 50*l.* stock entitled to 6 per cent. per annum and 50*l.* stock entitled to whatever may remain, he receives the same as another person who takes for the 100*l.* of existing stock two new stocks, one amounting to 100*l.* entitled to 3 per cent., and the other 100*l.* entitled to whatever may remain over. As regards the public, the main question is, Which will give the greatest scope for speculation? The North British plan undoubtedly creates a greater mass of Deferred Stock; but whether this implies a greater amount of speculation may be doubted. At all events, the true objection to every form of the proposal for dividing the Ordinary Stock is that it must, in the nature of things, encourage speculation; but, as the public demand for it is growing so strong, it is difficult to see how it can be prevented. If the Companies themselves do not convert, then, other Companies will be created—as, indeed, has already been done on a small scale—for doing what the railway Directors refuse to do or Parliament refuses to sanction. And in this way more harm is likely to result than from division by the Companies; for there will be speculation not only in the railway stocks, but also in the stocks of the conversion Companies; and there is the further risk that the conversion Companies may be much worse managed.

SENATORIAL ELECTIONS IN THE UNITED STATES.

NEXT to the Presidency the political prize most eagerly pursued in the United States is a seat in the Federal Senate. The superior dignity of that body as compared with the House of Representatives results from the wide range of its constitutional functions, the greater importance of its constituencies, and the longer tenure of office enjoyed by its members. A Senator has a voice in the ratification of all treaties, and in the confirmation of nominations made by the President to the higher offices of State, such as the Cabinet, the Diplomatic Corps, and the Supreme Court. Again he is, in a certain sense, an ambassador from a whole State, of which a member of the House represents but a part. His term of service is for six years, that of the Representative only for two. Hence follow more intimate relations with the Executive and the heads of departments, which ensure to a Senator a correspondent control of patronage in his State. Where he is in political harmony with an Administration he is practically the dispenser of all offices to his constituents. The professional politicians, whose only occupation is office-begging for themselves or for their friends, look to him as the source of official honours, and hold him responsible for their distribution. That he may satisfy their demands he is forced to sacrifice much of his time that should be devoted to his legislative duties, and not seldom to foist upon the public service the incompetent and unworthy. Patronage is thus at once the support and the bane of a senatorial existence. Without patronage it can hardly be prolonged; in the acquisition and dispensation of patronage it is always made miserable and often extinguished. By its judicious exercise, however, a Senator secures in his service a compact and well-organized band of henchmen, whose political fortunes are bound up with his own, and whose labours, therefore, for the reelection of their patron are incessant. When his term expires the out-going Senator thus meets his rivals with all the advantages that belong to a disciplined corps in conflict with a mob. His partisans scattered throughout his State strain every energy to secure the return of a Legislature favourable to his interests, for it is by the Legislature that the Senator is elected, and not directly by the people.

As party considerations always control the action of the Legislature, the first contest is between the two great political organizations, who each strive to secure the predominance in that body, and with it the senatorship. As the Senator, then, can only hope for success through the triumph of his own party in carrying a majority of the Legislature, he participates actively in the canvass that determines the choice of its members. During his term he has kept up his connexion with the people of his State by frequent correspondence with every local leader of any importance; he has distributed vast numbers of public documents; thousands of his speeches have been franked broadcast; the rural districts have been deluged with "Agricultural Reports"; and few are the farmers who have not received from him choice selections of various seeds, supplied gratis and in profusion by the Government. He now prepares to reap the fruit of his labours.

For several months prior to the election of the Legislature he visits all the counties of the State, everywhere making speeches declaratory of his "platform." He takes concert with his friends as to the candidates they shall support for the Legislature. Where these are strong enough in the conventions which select the candidates they force through resolutions pledging the nominee to his interests. When his efforts have resulted in the return of a Legislature controlled by his political friends, his rivals, if any, will be confined to the ranks of his own party. In opposition to these, every influence he can command is brought to bear upon the members elect. By correspondence, by the importunities of his friends, by personal solicitations, sometimes by promises or by threats, he seeks to obtain a pledge of their support. The contest may be thus determined before the assembling of the Legislature; but often it then still remains in doubt. The legislative body, invariably composed of a Senate and House of Representatives, meets at the State capital, usually a country town of from five to twenty thousand inhabitants.

A European might at first be surprised at the absence of that polish and culture which he would naturally expect to find in persons called to the discharge of such important functions; but he would probably be no less surprised at the good sense, moderation, and practical knowledge of affairs displayed by the majority. For the most part the agricultural interest largely predominates; but in many States the railroads control a following formidable by its numbers, and still more so by its discipline and management. The Representatives from the large cities seldom compare favourably either in character or ability with the country members. During a senatorial election the State capital is the scene of a motley gathering. There may be found collected all who are prominent in political management, or who would fain be thought so, local "bosses," office-holders, and more numerous office-seekers, together with the agents of such railroads or other corporations as may have an interest in the event. These with a mixed crowd, whose only common characteristic is an insatiable appetite for free whiskey and cigars, constitute what is called the "Lobby."

The first aim of the candidate is to conciliate the Lobby and to impress it with the certainty of his success; in other words, to get up a "boom." The biggest "boom" will often draw into its vortex those uncertain and vacillating legislators who postpone their decision until they can find out the winner. To this end the candidate engages at a hotel commodious quarters where he may consult with his adherents, and there for several days before the election refreshments are freely dispensed to all comers. If he would avoid the fatal imputation of exclusiveness he must mingle freely with the throng, and at all hours of the day and night must be prepared to receive gracefully the visits and advice of whosoever may choose to present himself. In brief, he must employ all those ingratiating arts which, whether on Tiber or the Thames, have ever been indispensable with voting multitudes.

When the two Houses have met and organized, a night is appointed for the Caucus, which is composed of those members of the Legislature who belong to the same party. Its proceedings are in all essentials in conformity with those of a congressional convention, as described in a former article. Eulogistic speeches place the different candidates in nomination, and, after a struggle more or less protracted, a selection is finally reached by a call of the ayes and noes. The action of the Caucus is binding upon all who participate in its deliberations, and where it is composed of a majority of the members of both Houses it practically determines the election. The minority party hold a similar convention, nor is the nomination they confer an empty honour—indeed, it is often eagerly sought, as it gives a prestige to its recipient which may prove of value when his party gains the ascendant. After the Caucus the two Houses of the Legislature meet in joint convention, where each Senator and Representative casts one vote, which is always given viva voce, and here takes place the legal election, ratifying the previous action of the Caucus.

Direct bribery is rare in senatorial elections, but indirectly the canvass may involve a large expenditure. The newer States on the Pacific seaboard have been in the habit of sending to the Senate Bonanza kings and railway magnates, and in several instances the purchase of votes has been more than suspected. More generally, however, it has been charged that these elections are controlled by the great corporations of those States. In the Southern States during the period of reconstruction, when the negroes and the Carpet-bag element (i.e. white adventurers from the North) were in control of the Legislatures, bribery was universal and systematic; it may now be said to be unknown. It is certain, however, that of late years the Senate has begun to assume more and more the aspect of a rich man's club; but this springs from the influence of riches, which is characteristic of modern civilization, rather than from their corrupt use. The governorship of a State and membership of the Lower House of Congress are the usual stepping-stones to the Senate, but often a Senator is chosen from business life or the professions without any previous legislative experience. Fifty years ago De Tocqueville was struck by the predominance of the Bar in American political life, nor has this influence decreased with the growth of the Republic. In the forty-sixth Congress, elected in 1880, which represents a fair average, out of a total of seventy-six Senators, fifty-eight were lawyers, although not all of them were engaged in active practice.

As a Senator must be an inhabitant of the State from which he is chosen, all his political hopes are centred in retaining the favour of one constituency. If he forfeit that favour he cannot, as in England, fall back upon some other seat, where he may find the support he has lost at home, but must submit to retirement from political life. Thus a party is often deprived of the services in Congress of its most prominent leaders. Whether in such a case there is a corresponding injury to the public interests may be questioned; but there is little doubt that this rigid dependence upon a narrow constituency is often prejudicial to those enlarged views which should prevail in the discussion of national questions, whilst it may justly be suspected as tending to degrade the Senate, to use the language of Burke, into "a confused and scuffling bustle of local agency." As a consequence of the greater power in political affairs of the Senate, its members are more generally distinguished by their influence, standing, and ability than those of the House of Representatives; and, although it is often said that in the United States the best men avoid political life, yet it may be confidently asserted that, on the whole, Senators fairly represent the leading business and professional elements of American society.

ORCHID NOMENCLATURE.

A LARGE proportion of members who do not generally take interest in the "Proceedings" of the Royal Horticultural Society have heard with relief, no doubt, that the nomenclature of orchids is occupying the earnest attention of that body. "At last!" they may exclaim, as do the men of science, though with a very different expectation. The former feel assured of the purpose in view, which must needs be to suppress, or at least to simplify, those crack-jaw names which an amateur can scarcely repeat, much more remember. It is a sad task to dissipate these fond hopes. Such an aim, indeed, is worthy of all sympathy, and if there were the remotest chance of success it should be vigorously pursued. But there is none. For all time the human memory must be burdened and perplexed by such polysyllabic combinations as Zygopetalum, Catasetum, Bungerothii, Warscewiczella, Nephelaphyllum, Acanthephippium, and the rest; our utmost hope is that the Christian names, so to speak, may be curtailed, and sometimes Anglicized. That will be no small boon, for many have three, and many have four; besides, a little English word introduced will be an aid to memory. No orchid-grower probably could talk such absolute nonsense as we observe in the newspapers from time to time, when an ingenuous reporter asks why these things should not have an easy name, like roses and lilies and daffydownillies. Just as we "dropped into Greek" when electricity and anæsthetics were discovered, so we did, under more pressing necessity, in the case of orchids. They were brought to the notice of Europe at a time when science joins with common sense in demanding an international language for such themes, and fortunate it is that we have the Greek handy. Zygopetalum and Odontoglossum may be ugly; doubtless they "would have made Quintilian gasp and stare"; but they have a meaning understood throughout the civilized universe. It is, indeed, a curious subject for reflection, what on earth human beings would have done had they not possessed the Greek for purposes of this kind! But as knowledge widened, even its resources, with Latin thrown in, proved unequal to the task of furnishing convenient names, and botanists gladly consented to classicize the patronymic of any gentleman who might claim to stand godfather to a novelty. Linnæus himself fondly imagined that there might be three hundred orchids in the world, counting genera and species; we have now something like eight thousand on the books—and a great part of the globe is still unsearched. A distinct descriptive title could not possibly have been found for such a throng, and to take words without special significance became a necessity. The first allowed, we believe, was Cattleya, from Mr. Cattley, a famous amateur of Barnet. It sounds nice, even classical, but it led the way to sesquipedalian jargon. Warscewiczella and Kefersteinia and Hartwegia alarm the simple-minded, but what are these compared with Vrydagzyna and Wollschlegelia? Happily, it is only the learned who have to deal with those judgments.

The confusion of nomenclature has reached a pitch beyond bearing at a moment when untrodden regions of Africa, Madagascar, and New Guinea—three vast storehouses—have begun to yield their treasures. From the very nature of epiphytal orchids, strict discipline must always be necessary to keep irresponsible growers in order. For the sports of this family are boundless. It is quite within the realm of possibility that a score of plants imported, belonging to the same species, might give twenty flowers so far distinct, that some would be utterly worthless, some would be above and some below the normal type, and some so far superior that they might claim to rank as new varieties. We do not suppose this has ever happened; it is possible, however. But, unless the fortunate importer should submit his prize to the judgment of authority, he cannot tell whether it is new or merely a good form already named. After Professor Reichenbach gained his unique position extraordinary blooms were sent to him by all the leading growers, amateur and professional, to decide whether or no they merited a new name. But this is a free country. If any number of ladies or gentlemen choose to christen a variety—new to them, though already judged by experts—they are at liberty to do so; there is no recognized tribunal—as yet—to check them. And they exercise their birthright wantonly. One of the speakers at this meeting enumerated thirty synonyms in one single species of Cattleya. Moreover, such strange tricks do orchids play that many species, though admitted, are still uncertain; from time to time one of them suffers disestablishment, when "connecting links" appear, showing it to be a sportive member of some old family. Well might Professor Reichenbach exclaim, in a moment of discouragement, "It is a difficult and wearing arena of garden botany." Elsewhere he writes, "Amateurs send me an odd flower and demand a new name for it. They have not the least idea of the number of connecting links observed by the botanist. I was in a similar position twenty or thirty years ago. I experienced great pleasure when Lælia Stelzneriana, Casperiana, Schilleriana, and all those things appeared. How simple it was to distinguish them when we had so few specimens in Europe! Sed—post equitem, &c. Then came, and still come, the connecting links. Sometimes monstrosities deceive our judgment." He goes on to tell a surprising instance. "Thus Mr. J. Day, the excellent and most experienced orchidist, had one day Cattleya Trianae lacera in flower, with serrate petals. For some years these flowers appeared, but finally they became mere common Trianae flowers. Lately the same Cattleya Trianae lacera reappeared with Herr Hofmarschall a D. Baron St. Paul d'Illaire, in Silesia. I predict it will one day turn into a humble Trianae." A "difficult and wearing arena," indeed, where Proteus carries on his pranks. But it is no jest for the dealers. There are species which they cannot sell without anxiety unless the plant chosen have flowered in their hands. Thus, if a customer ordered Odontoglossum hebraicum, he might receive Odontoglossum Ruckerianum, Andersonianum, Jenningsianum, baphicanthum, Brassiae, deltoglossum, or Leeanum; they are all forms of Odontoglossum lanceans. With reference to the vagaries of orchids we may mention that startling plant Ludemannia Pescatorei, which now and again justifies itself by flowering correctly, and then for years assumes the inflorescence of Acineta erythroxantha.

The death of Professor Reichenbach, who kept some order in the orchid world, has brought these difficulties to a crisis. On the 26th ult. a meeting of amateurs, importers, and dealers was held, under the presidency of Sir Trevor Lawrence, to consider the situation, and to establish definite rules of nomenclature, which, we may hope, will be accepted throughout the universe. The authorities at Kew expressed themselves delighted to assist. Excellent speeches were made, and excellent ideas broached, upon which we do not linger, since it was resolved, upon the motion of Dr. Masters:—"That the Council of the Royal Horticultural Society be requested to nominate a committee, on which botanists, importers of new plants, raisers and growers shall be represented, to draw up a code of regulations applicable to plants introduced into and cultivated in gardens. Such code to be considered binding on the officials and Committees of the Society, and recommended for universal adoption."

SOUDANESE AND DERVISHES.

IT has been more than once pointed out here that the so-called Dervishes are no more or little more Dervishes than any other African Moslems. As a fact, every follower of Mohammed is a "Dervish" in some sense or other of the word. Your donkey-boy in Cairo or at Girgeh or at Zagazig, or, in short, anywhere throughout the length of the land, is a Dervish—belongs, that is, to some sect or section, more or less fanatical, of orthodox Mussulman faith. Some of these sects are more popular in one place than in another. The Rufayeh, for example, are the most common in Lower Egypt, but others are almost equally numerous. An immense multitude of the Saidieh order used to prostrate themselves under the hoofs of their sheykh's horse at the annual Doseh (or treading), now abolished. Many of these men were waiters at hotels and servants in private families. The great Ahmedieh order, which especially affects the cult of Byumeh, is perhaps the most numerous in all Northern Africa; but new cults, and with them new orders, are constantly invading the old, both in Arabia and Egypt. We hear less now than formerly of the Wahabees, who at one time threatened to overrun, not only Arabia, but Persia, and even India. The present Mahdist movement is somewhat of the same kind in the tenets of its votaries, but differs essentially from any of the sectarian divisions of Lower Egypt. The Mahdist Dervish belongs to a wholly different class from the Saidieh or Rufayeh Egyptian who makes your bed, or minds your horse, or rows your boat. He is an Arab of pure blood, whiter than the average European, handsome to a high degree, with pronounced features, sometimes almost Jewish in type, and an air of pride and probity, coupled with a politeness and general superiority, at first sight most engaging and deceptive. He is known among the dwellers in the Nile Valley, not as a Dervish, but as a jellab—pronounced in Egypt "gallab"—a term which means a merchant, and, for reasons only too good, has of late years denoted a merchant of one commodity only, namely, slaves. The slaver on the Nile received sad blows and discouragement during the reigns of such viceroys as Baker Pasha and Gordon, and took to honest merchandise—such as ivory, feathers, henna, senna, and the hides of antelopes and leopards. During the short but prosperous period indicated, the jellabs might be seen in Nubia or at Assouan with their cargoes, and it was difficult to connect these noble-looking fellows, with their regal manners, their exquisite robes of white cashmere, and their scarfs of priceless needlework, with the stories you heard from the people around, who still dreaded and hated them—stories of craft, oppression, rapine, lust, and cruelty for its own sake, such as would make both a hearer's ears to tingle. These are the men whom the present turn of affairs has rendered desperate. By their own doing they have closed the legitimate market they once enjoyed, and their fanaticism has grown as their wealth has shrunk, while the countless negroes whom under Ismael Pasha they were enabled to carry into Egypt are now at a mature age able to retaliate on their old oppressors, and to revenge the woes of slaughtered fathers and outraged mothers upon the remnants of the hated jellabs.

To speak of these black troops as "natives" is somewhat incorrect. A few, a mere handful, are of a second generation from those originally imported; but the bulk of the "Soudanese regiments" are slaves imported by these very Arab traders, and remember personally, or by tradition of their elders, how they came into the Egyptian house of bondage, what horrors of torture they underwent at the hands of these lordly jellabs, and how, finally, after undergoing and surviving, while thousands perished beside them, these horrors, they were seized by connivance of the Egyptian Government, and, under the name of liberated slaves, were put into training for the army. The supply of these soldiers is not, as some authorities seem to think, inexhaustible. Mr. Stanley took away with him a goodly contingent; another contingent has perished at Souakin and on the Nile; but of those that remain it may safely be said that for war in so hot a region, and especially against the slave-dealers (whom we dignify as "Dervishes" above all other Dervishes), they are most useful, and may eventually be of further use as showing an example to the fellah soldier. The great drawback to their employment is their inherent savagery. They are reckless of the lives they have with such difficulty preserved; and, when they come hand to hand with their former masters, the unhappy jellab has but a poor chance. When, at Souakin last autumn, they were ordered to charge a trench full of "Dervishes," they went forward with reckless fury, outstripping their European officers, and, occupying simultaneously both ends of the trench, literally raked it from end to end with their fire, leaving not a single man alive. How far they are to be depended on before other troops, we have no means of knowing. The few Egyptian regiments who were led to dire defeat by the ex-Khedive's son, in the Turkish and Russian war, were largely composed of these black slaves, then newly imported by the jellabs, hastily drilled, led by Turkish or Egyptian officers, and exposed to the one elemental condition of which they had previously known nothing—intense cold. They had been parboiled under the Equator and roasted in the desert, but snow and frost were too much for them. They had, moreover, no special grudge against the Russian—on the contrary, if they had been long enough in Egypt, they cannot but have learned to hate the Turk. Their Moslem fanaticism, if it has ever existed, had not had time to grow; and, unlike the jellabs, the soldiers of the Czar had never injured them. With the soldiers of Sir Francis Grenfell it is different. Their own recollections of early life—what they have heard from their comrades—what has been told to them by the unhappy refugees on Nubian territory, of the vengeance wreaked by the "Dervishes" on the unresisting villagers of the Upper Nile after the fall of Khartoum—these, and many other considerations which it is not very easy for the English traveller to fathom, make the black soldier an implacable foe to the white-faced jellab who murdered his mother and burned his village, and subjected himself to every indignity and bodily torment that the most refined system of cruelty could invent. There is something more than the mere irony of fate in the fact that the same tenderhearted members of Parliament who are obliged by circumstances to condone cattle-houghing and to ignore the boycotting of the widow and the fatherless are also constrained to cheer the slave-dealer and to decry his now for a time triumphant victim.

The triumph of the negro soldier may not last long. How far the conscript fellah will be able to take his place is a question which the experience of the future can alone solve. At present all the betting is against him. True, he is very obedient to English officers, regular and punctual in his regimental duties, scrupulously sober—a point in which he far excels his sable comrade—orderly, clean, and, considering the miseries of his lot, torn from his family and his farm, and condemned for no fault of his own to what he looks upon as penal servitude for an indefinite period, wonderfully cheerful. Soldierlike he is not and never will be. He and his ancestors have stooped over the black soil for too many generations to make it possible for him to stand as upright as the drill-sergeant would have him. As to fighting, he might do wonders behind walls and especially in the protection of his native village. On the hated "Jebel," the stony land where no water is, unlike the negro he is out of his element. The marching step he has learned on the table-like surface of the Meydan fails him. He falls out of step and out of line, and general demoralization probably ensues. More orthodox than the negro, who has only learned the outer forms of religion, he has no special quarrel with Dervishes of any sect. He has no memory of injuries to be avenged in blood like the unhappy native of the Soudan or of Nubia. If he has a quarrel, it is first with the Turks who enslaved his country for three centuries; and, secondly, with the French, whose atrocities eighty years ago and obstruction at the present day are not forgotten or forgiven. Against them, or as troops lodged within fortifications, the fellah may prove to be of some use; but those who remember his turbulence, laziness, and cowardice in the days before Arabi have but little hope of him. It is fair to say that his behaviour at Toski seems to have been unexceptionable, though the brunt was borne by the black infantry and the English horse.

PORPOISES.

THE poet Drayton remarks that "the wallowing porpoise sports and lords it on the floods." Latest advices from the South of France intimate that the porpoise is lording it in a most annoying fashion on the Mediterranean flood. Your sea-swine is an aggravating beast, full of cunning, and prompt at a practical joke, and he is more than the Municipal Council of St. Nazaire (Var) can any longer put up with. This body has requested the French Minister of Marine to form a Commission "to study the physiology of porpoises," that by so doing it may be discovered how to secure their absence from the neighbourhood of the shore during the fishing season. The porpoise is an intrusive neighbour, and he will call at the very moment when the inhabitants of St. Nazaire and other places have pressing engagements of a different nature. However, though we may smile, it is really no laughing matter, and the Minister has taken up the question in all seriousness. He has appointed a Committee for the purpose of studying "la physiologie des marsouins," and the Report of the chairman, Professor E. Perrier, is in our hands. It will be melancholy reading for the Town Council of St. Nazaire.

It appears that it is an old complaint that the porpoises of the Mediterranean commit intolerable depredations. The Report thinks that the injuries have been exaggerated, but does not deny that the nets are torn and robbed. It appears that each generation of porpoises is a little cleverer than its forbears; and, whereas the porcine rascals used only to drive the fish into nets or shallow water, they now encourage them to be caught, that they may themselves feast on the netted captives. The Department of Marine has often been asked to interfere, and as early as 1865 the commander of the Mediterranean fleet formed a scheme for the destruction of porpoises, which was like one of the wolf-laws of the middle ages. A fee of five francs was offered for every head of a porpoise, a sum raised at last to twenty-five francs. Special seines were devised, and the fishermen of Marseilles, Narbonne, and Port Vendres put their heads together to entrap their enemies. As a matter of fact, they found it easy enough to catch the porpoises, and plenty of fish as well. But here came out original sin in the wicked cetacean. The seines were slyly drawn close; the porpoises meanwhile ate the fish, their fellow-prisoners, until, just when the space within the net began to lessen seriously, with the inimitable grace of a flap of their tail-fins, they lightly sprang, like salmon, over the edge of the net and into the ocean. The fishermen of Marseilles, Narbonne, and Port Vendres, wild with rage at being fooled in this way, once more brought the conduct of the porpoises before the notice of Government.

The Minister was shocked, but could suggest nothing. Three other communes thereupon requested the department itself to undertake the chastisement of the porpoises. There was a long delay, but at length two gunboats, the Hyène in 1883, and the Albatros in 1884, were sent to punish the sportive pirates. They shot torpedoes among them, and fired cannon galore. The result was melancholy in the extreme. A few porpoises were killed, but not many; the majority fled out to deeper waters; but, alas! the fish fled with them, so that it was more than a week in each case before the fishery could be recommenced. And when the fish came back, like the ghost in the Laureate's poem, the irrepressible porpoises returned in their company. The new Report is not more encouraging than former ones have been. It says that the porpoise is an animal "fort agile," and that the use of artillery against him is worse than useless. It can only suggest in a melancholy way that "the fishermen who complain of the depredations of these cetaceans would do well to unite in organizing porpoise-hunts, or else in forming a mutual insurance against the injuries they commit. Meanwhile, the department might continue to indemnify to a certain degree the proprietors of nets which have been injured in any very preposterous degree." This is cold comfort, and is, in fact, another way of saying that nothing can be done with beasts that are as slippery as trout, as cunning as monkeys, and as strong as ponies.

We have ourselves a suggestion to make to the inhabitants of these indignant Mediterranean communes. Why not eat the porpoises? It is well known that sea-pig used to be considered a succulent and even luxurious dish. Why is it now universally neglected? If the brutes tear the tackle of the fishermen, and leap out of seines which they have emptied of their fish, they may still be hunted down singly and turned into sea-hams and marine sausages. It is possible, however, that they might not suit all palates. Even in the reign of Elizabeth it would appear that porpoise, though an aristocratic, was an acquired taste. In a prose pamphlet by Nicholas Breton, The Court and Country, published in 1618, an amusing story is told of a great man who sent one of his farmers "for a great dainty a porpoise-pie or two cold." The farmer's wife, the farmer himself, the children, the servants, the dog, the neighbouring miller and his dog, all in turn partook of it, and each in turn suffered from horrible symptoms of disgust. The farmer sent the remainder back to his patron with many excuses, and with the expression of an opinion that porpoise-pie was probably "more wholesome than toothsome." Breton gives this as an example of how rustic people may fastidiously refuse what is really, like olives or caviar, a dainty highly prized in a more exalted walk of life. It would seem as though the entire world had come to be of the Elizabethan farmer's opinion about the flesh of porpoise, and we are afraid, after all, that our suggestion may not commend itself to the bewildered Town Council of St. Nazaire (Var).

LITTLE BILLEE.

(An Imperial Dream.)

"THERE were three sailors of Bristol City"—
He tried it again, but sleep made free,
And dreams of his own getting mixed with the story,
The ballad worked out like this, d'ye see?

"There was Gorging Jack from Central Asia,
Chockful of Turkoman bones was he,
And Puzzling Jimmy from over the Channel;
And the youngest he was Little Billee.

"Says Gorging Jack to Puzzling Jimmy,
'I feel extremely earth-hungaree':
To Gorging Jack says Puzzling Jimmy,
'And a thirst for revenge has come over me.

"Says Gorging Jack to Puzzling Jimmy,
'Why shouldn't we two chaps agree
For me to devour the Balkan Kingdoms
While you make a meal off Little Billee?'

"O Billy! we're going to kill and eat you,
So undo the button of your chemie"—
And just at this point the Imperial sleeper
Turned in his bunk uneasilee.

"First let me pay a complimentary visit,
Which my dear grandmamma expects from me"—
'Make haste, make haste,' says Jack the Gorging,
As he whetted a Muscovite snickersnee.

"So Billy he called for an ironclad warship,
And with beef and biscuit he victualled she,
And off he set with his colours flying
All from the coast of Germanee.

"But he hadn't got to the mouth of the Solent
When he cried out: 'Ho! a friend I see;
And he'll stand by me against Jack and Jimmy,
For there's his fleet on the larboard lee.

"It's known from Jerusalem to Madagascar,
And to North and South Amerikee,
That there British flag a-riding at anchor
With Admiral Commerell, K.C.B.'

"So his friend fired guns, as he came aboard him,
To warn fat Jack and rebuke Jimmee;
But as for little Bill, they made him
An Admiral in the Queen's Navee."

REVIEWS.

LORD TORRINGTON.*

WE are afraid that this volume is only one more illustration of the bad luck of the British Admiral in the matter of biography. George Byng, the Lord Torrington of this book, was not one of the greatest of our seamen, but he did good work; he played an active and interesting, if not eminently honourable, part in the Revolution of 1688, and he contributed one of the prettiest and most completely successful bits of fighting to the history of our navy. A reasonably good Life of him, written by a well-informed contemporary, would be a great find. Unhappily the manuscript which Mr. Laughton has edited falls far short of even a modest standard. It is written in a wooden way, and stops short just before the most brilliant part of Byng's life. Mr. Laughton goes somewhat too far when he describes the spelling as bad and the grammar as atrocious. The writer, whoever he was, certainly does not write so well as an educated man who had lived well into the eighteenth century, and ought to have learnt something from the prose of Dryden, Swift, and Addison, should have done. He appears to us to have been a belated seventeenth-century man of no particular literary skill. If he is accepted as that he will not appear to be especially blamable. No doubt we find him writing "cartridge" and "carterage," "mold" and "mould" (for mole) in the same sentence, "shoud," and "of of," for "off of"; but in this laxness he was countenanced by very distinguished persons. His grammar was not above reproach; but, all things considered, it is not flagrantly worse than Clarendon's. On the whole we should be inclined to say that his style is much what might be expected from a man of small reading who had been educated in a time when even admirable writers were apt to miss the point at which they ought to have been done with a sentence. Probably he was an official person of an ordinary stamp, writing neither better nor worse than scores of contemporaries or successors, for that matter. The rank and file in the writing world are apt to forget how much of their boasted accuracy is really the work of their masters, and, therefore, no merit of theirs. A man must be judged by the standard of his time, and if the anonymous author of the Memoirs receives this justice, he will not stand lower than many writers of to-day who find it easy to avoid erratic spelling or involved sentences.

* Memoirs relating to the Lord Torrington. By John Knox Laughton, M.A., R.N. Printed for the Camden Society. 1889.

When fair allowance is made for his limitations of all kinds, the author of this fragment must be allowed to have done a useful piece of work according to his lights. He has at least enabled us to see more or less what the life of a successful naval officer of the end of the seventeenth century was, and he has contributed something to the history of the Revolution of 1688. George Byng as he appears here was obviously a very typical man of his time. If he had possessed a touch of the poetry of the sixteenth-century men, or the enthusiasm, Royalist or Puritanical, of the seventeenth century, or the high patriotic and professional spirit of the officers of the end of the eighteenth century, something of it would have appeared even in this wooden narrative. But then he might not have been the successful man he was. His fate might have been to share the career of that Captain Lloyd who alone of James's fleet—the only faithful found—followed the fortunes of his King and his Admiral and became a Jacobite agent. Byng was not at all likely to devote himself to any such Quixotic enterprise. Like his generation, he was distinctly of the earth earthy—brave and capable, beyond all doubt, loyal without enthusiasm to Church and Constitution; but not, to judge by his conduct in 1708, to the extent of quarrelling too thoroughly with the King who might return, and with an eye keen to see the main chance. This narrative ends abruptly in 1705, and it seems to us that the writer may have found the events of 1708 somewhat difficult to deal with. Byng was certainly accused of not showing great zeal against Forbin in the Jacobite adventure of that year. It is just possible that the biographer—who was plainly an honest man of no suppleness—may have found it difficult to reconcile his hero's conduct at that period with the resolution he showed after the mysteriously peaceful accession of George I. had made the Stuart cause manifestly hopeless. This, however, is mere guesswork, which must be taken for what it is worth. The events of Byng's life as told in the Memoirs are very easy to understand. He was the son of a ruined Kentish gentleman who tried an unlucky adventure in Ireland, and he entered the navy as a boy. The fact is one among many which may help us to the easy task of proving that Lord Macaulay overstated the case in his sweeping way when he said that the gentlemen in the navy of those days were not seamen, and the seamen were not gentlemen. Byng was both, as were Russell and Herbert, Fairfax and Delaval. According to a practice of the time, he suddenly changed from the sea to the land service. He served under Kirke at Tangier, was so much protected by that Protestant hero as to arouse the jealousy of the military gentlemen, and returned to the sea service as lieutenant. Lord Dartmouth promoted him at Kirke's request. It is a not uninteresting detail that when in Tangier he was named to Charles Churchill's company in Trelawny's regiment. At a later period he found cause to complain that the Churchills did him ill turns for his support of Admiral Russell. From Tangier he went to the East Indies as lieutenant to Captain Tyrrell, in the Phoenix, who was sent "for the better reducing to due obedience his Majesty's inhabitants of the Island and Fort of Bombay lately revolted from the government there established by his Majesty, and for the better securing the trade granted by charter to the East India Company against the interlopers complained of by them and against pyrates." In the East Indies Byng cultivated the acquaintance of Sir John Child, to his own great profit apparently. It is to be noted that he kept up his connexion with the East India Company by marrying into the family of Streynsham Master. From these Memoirs it does not appear that Byng's conduct to his captain was a model of discipline and good feeling. He seems almost to have worked against his superior, and to have toadied Sir John Child. But there were more honourable passages in his service in the East, and we shall quote one of them, both for its own sake and as an example of our anonymous author's merits and demerits as a stylist:—

As they (the Phoenix's) were plying to windward of Bassin they discovered a ship at anchor, and stood towards her. Upon coming near her, she weighed and stood off from them, upon which the Phoenix gave chase, and she proving to be a Zanganian, a sort of pyratel people, they engaged her. They are a desperate people, who neither give nor receive any quarter, and drink of a certain drug called bang, that makes them fight with the greater fury; they behaving with much intrepidity, and continuing obstinately to defend themselves. Capt. Tyrrell boarded them severall times, but the ship having too much way, he as often missed the opportunity of entring his men; yet about sunset Capt. Tyrrell boarded her again with near fourscore men, sword in hand, ready to get into her; but having again too much way Mr. Byng and 11 men only entered. On this attempt severall of the enemy lipped over to swim ashore, and other ran down the hatches, but seeing themselves far from the Phoenix and so few entered the ship they attacked them with symitars [with great fury] and, being in greater number, cut the others to pieces, Mr. Byng having already received two very deep cuts on his left side, quite cross his back thro' a very thick buff belt he had round him; but in that instant the ship sunk downright with them by the shot she had received and set them all to struggle for their lives in another way. [But as Mr. Byng could not swim he had not an equal chance with the rest] so that he, finding the ship going down and himself in the water, he caught hold of one of the Zinganians by the hair of his head; who, struggling to disengage himself, he was apprehensive he would turn upon him, and by keeping him under water drown him; he therefore quitted his hold and caught at a piece of loose plank which kept him above water; yet had little hope of saving his life (having drunk much water and was so weak he had sunk two or three times) and was near being carried away by the current. But the corporall of the Phoenix, who was at the head of the mainmast, now upright in shoal water, seeing his lieutenant near him in distress, pressed him to quit the plank and part of the wreck near him, and endeavour to get to him, which if he could do might save him. Mr. Byng seeing no other hope forsook it; and by much struggling with difficulty got within reach of the corporal, who pulled him up; yet remaining with little strength whereby to hold with, his head could scarce be kept above water.

The spelling and grammar here are not so very bad, and what confusion there is is mainly a matter of stops, which the author would have put right on going to press, and Mr. Laughton need surely not have respected.

On returning to England, Byng soon fell into the Revolution of 1688, and mainly apparently on the suggestion of his old friend Kirke was active in seducing the officers of Dartmouth's fleet. He was active in persuading Ashby and Aylmer to join the Prince of Orange. There is an account, brief but interesting, of the intrigues at Portsmouth and of the measures taken to stop the escape of the Prince of Wales. Byng showed himself both astute and daring in carrying messages between the conspirators and the headquarters of the Prince of Orange, to whom he was presented. The remainder—much the larger part—of the book is taken up with accounts of his service as captain or admiral in subordinate command in various actions, from the feeble fight in Bantry Bay down to the bloody but indecisive action off Malaga, with his troubles as to promotion, and his negotiations with the Algerine pirates. Although, as we have said, the writer was sadly without gift, yet there are passages in his narrative which are by no means bad. We have read much worse in authors of greater pretension than the accounts of Byng's danger in the great storm, or his distinguished share in the capture of Gibraltar, or the description of the operations before, during, and after the battle off Malaga. The Memoirs will be useful to the long-hoped-for naval historian, and they certainly leave the impression that the conqueror of the Spaniards at Cape Passaro was a brave and capable man.

MR. KIPLING'S STORIES.*

THE worst of recommending Mr. Wheeler's publications, which we do very heartily, is that apparently they are difficult to procure. They appear in paper-covered little volumes; but these volumes are not found on English railway-bookstalls. Very little that is so new and so good can be discovered in those shrines of fugitive literature. Mr. Kipling is a new writer, or a writer new to the English as distinct from the Anglo-Indian public. He is so clever, so fresh, and so cynical that he must be young; like other people, he will be kinder to life when he has seen more of it. Clever people usually begin with a little aversion, which is toned down, in life as in love, to a friendly resignation, if it is not toned up to something warmer by longer experience. Mr. Kipling's least cynical stories are those in In Black and White, studies of native life and character. He is far happier with Afghan homicides and old ford-watchers, and even with fair Lalun, "whose profession was the most ancient in the world," and whose house was built upon the city wall, than with the flirts and fribbles of the hills. His "black men" (as Macaulay would have called them) are excellent men, full of courage, cunning, revenge, and with points of honour of their own. We are more in sympathy with their ancient semi-barbarism than with the inexpensive rank and second-hand fashion of Simla.

An invidious critic might say, and not untruly, that Mr. Kipling has, consciously or unconsciously, formed himself on the model of Mr. Bret Harte. He has something of Mr. Harte's elliptic and allusive manner, though his grammar is very much better. He has Mr. Harte's liking for good qualities where they have the charm of the unexpected. Perhaps the similarity is increased by the choice of topics and events on the fringes of alien civilizations. It may also be conjectured that Mr. Kipling is not ignorant of "Gyp's" works. In any case he has wit, humour, observation; he can tell a story, and he does not always disdain pathos, even when the pathetic is a little too obvious. People will probably expect Mr. Kipling, with all these graces of his, to try his hand at a long novel. We are a nation that likes quantity. But it may very probably turn out that Mr. Kipling is best at short stories and sketches.

* In Black and White. By Rudyard Kipling. Allahabad: Wheeler & Co.

Under the Deodars. By Rudyard Kipling. Allahabad: Wheeler & Co.

Perhaps the most excellent of his tales is "Dray Yara Yew Dee," the confession to an Englishman of a horse-dealer from the Northern frontier. This character, in his cunning and his honesty, his madness of revenge, his love, his misery, his honour, is to our mind a little masterpiece. There is a poetry and a melancholy about the picture which it would be hard, perhaps impossible, to find in more than one or two barbaric or savage portraits from a European hand. His confession must be read; we shall not spoil it by analysis. The "Judgment of Dungara" is as good, in a comic and cynical manner; so is the tale of a "sahib, called Yankum Sahib." Missionaries ought to get the former by heart, and magistrates the latter. "Gemini," the story of Ram Dass and Durga Dass, might make a Radical Indophile laugh, and might teach him a good deal about his clients. "In Flood Time" is a little prose idyl of epical strength; there is something primitive in the adventure and something very sympathetic in the old warder of the ford who tells the tale. The "Sending of Dana Da" is an Icelandic kind of miracle worked on esoteric Buddhists to their confusion and sorrow. The sending wherewith Dana Da vexed Lone Sahib was a sending of kittens, not nice young vivacious kittens, but kittens in their babyhood, and they vexed Lone Sahib sore. "On the City Wall" is the last, and certainly one of the very best, of the stories; the tale of conspiracy, riot, prison-breaking, organized by Lalun the Fair and Wali Dad, "a young Mahomedan who was suffering acutely from Education of the English variety, and knew it." This Wali Dad is as clever a study as that of the Pathan horse thief; his modern melancholy, infidelity, Welt-schmerz, and all the rest of it, leave him at bottom as thorough a Moslem fanatic as ever yelled "Ya Hasan! Ya Hussain!" How the British soldiers quell a multitude of yelling fanatics, without drawing a bayonet or firing a shot, is pleasant to read. And, at the end of the riot, there we find Agnostic Wali Dad, "shoeless, turbanless, and frothing at the mouth; the flesh on his chest bruised and bleeding from the vehemence with which he had smitten himself." Wherefore we part from Wali Dad respecting him rather more than in his character of educated Unbeliever; for the attitude and actions of the fanatic were more sincere than the sighs and sneers of "the product."

On the whole, Mr. Kipling's Under the Deodars is more conventional and less interesting than his studies of native life. There is comparatively little variety in "playing lawn-tennis with the Seventh Commandment." Mr. Kipling, in his preface, intimates that Anglo-Indian society has other and more seemly diversions. Any persons who wish to see the misery, the seamy, sorry side of irregular love affairs, may turn to "The Hill of Illusion." It is enough to convert a man or woman on the verge of guilt by reminding them that, after all, they will be no happier than they have been, and much less respectable. "A Wayside Comedy" contains a tragedy almost impossible in its absurd and miserable complexity of relations. Only a very small and very remote Anglo-Indian station could have produced this comedy, or tolerated it; and yet what were the wretched men and women to do on this side of suicide? The freaks of Mrs. Hawksbee and Mrs. Mallowe are more commonplace and rather strained in their cleverness. But, on the whole, the two little volumes, with Mr. Kipling's Departmental Ditties, give the impression that there is a new and enjoyable talent at work in Anglo-Indian literature.

SOME CLASSICAL TRANSLATIONS.*

"POLLY BEEIOUS," as the historian was called by a great authority, has never been an author very much read by Englishmen in the original, and, though in times past he has had his fair share of translators, he does not now figure even in the all-embracing Bohn. His Greek is bad of a bad time, his text is in part extremely fragmentary, and thus he has small literary and still less scholastic attractions. On the other hand, the matter of his work is extremely important. A man of great ability, thoroughly well versed in public business, a traveller, a fair student, an exact observer of military topography, Polybius held the opinion that an historian ought to be first of all a reporter of those things which he has heard and seen. The consequence is that he has left us, at an immense interval, it is true, the most valuable historical work in point of matter that we have after Thucydides—a book more valuable in strict historical information, though infinitely less valuable in form and some kinds of matter, than those of Herodotus, Tacitus, and Sallust, and one which, if he had only known how to write his own language, would have been on a par with Xenophon, whose supe-

* The Histories of Polybius. Translated by E. S. Shuckburgh. 2 vols. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

Seneca's Minor Dialogues. Translated by Aubrey Stewart (Bohn's Libraries). London: George Bell & Sons. 1889.

Horace. Translated by Various Hands. London: Warne & Co. 1889.

The Phædrus, Lysis, and Protagoras of Plato. Translated by J. Wright. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

The Teaching of Epictetus. Translated by T. W. Rolleston. London: Walter Scott.

Theocritus, Bion, and Moschus, rendered into English Prose. With an Introductory Essay by A. Lang, M.A., lately Fellow of Merton College, Oxford. Golden Treasury Series. London: Macmillan & Co.

rior he seems to have been in brains and business faculty, though he was far less of a man of letters as well as of a soldier. This very inferiority makes it an exceptionally meritorious business to translate him. We do not think that Mr. Shuckburgh can have altogether enjoyed (except with that enjoyment which comes of hard work well employed) the considerable task of producing these two fat volumes. We are still not quite sure that any one who wants really to study Greek and Roman history (and nobody else will busy himself with Polybius at all) ought not to learn the tongues. But, if translations are ever justified, they are justified in cases where the matter and not the form of the original is of importance; and this, if ever, is the case with the son of Lycortas and the friend of Scipio Æmilianus.

Mr. Aubrey Stewart, who has already contributed a version of Seneca's De Beneficiis to Bohn's Classical Library, now follows it up with another of the Minor Dialogues and that on Clemency—in other words, of the contents of the first volume of Haase's edition of the text. There is no introduction; but there are good notes occasionally where they are required, and the translation is a capital instance of the combination of readableness with scholarship. Publishers are usually men of business, and we presume that Messrs. Bell would not have "commanded" a version of Seneca unless they had anticipated readers for it. And we should be glad to think that there will be readers for such a version of such an author. As for the version, it is sufficient to say that we have compared passages taken at random with the original as exactly as possible, and that we have not discovered the slightest misrendering. Elegance, still more preciousness, of style is hardly to be sought in rendering Seneca, who has made a certain laborious attempt at form, but is chiefly clear, forcible, and matter-of-fact. His matter is, we think, matter very well suited to the present or any day—perhaps even better to the present than to any other. For, whether it be the fancy for paradox and novelty, or whether it be a natural result of the constant repetition of parænetic discourse in the pulpit, or what not, it is certain that sound ethical writing is not common, and that the modern man is much more left to himself in matters of conduct than any generation of his fathers not wholly barbarous. No reasonable person will think Seneca's advice any the worse because he was a rich fellow enough, and the perhaps rather too complaisant and adulatory Minister of a despot. The important thing is that he had seen a great deal of life, had thought about what he had seen, and could write what he had thought. And so let his lay sermons be commended, whether in their own Latin or in Mr. Stewart's English.

It was far, indeed, from being ill thought to give a cheap collection of different versions of Horace in English. No author has been more often attempted, and few have shown themselves more impregnable; but the results of the exercise of so many excellent wits on a wit hardly less excellent than the best of them could not but be interesting. With Milton's famous "To Pyrrha," with Dryden's magnificent (even Dryden himself never did anything more deserving that epithet than the version of Tyrrhena Regum) if scarcely Horatian paraphrases to lead off with, and Mr. Calverley and Bishop Copleston (there is an excellent version of this last scholar's in the Oxford Spectator, which we do not think the compiler has availed himself of) and with many worthy persons between, there is good game. Of course the excellent Francis furnishes the staple. It is rather curious how good Francis is generally without being ever very good. The late Mr. Herbert Grant's work, of whom the editor seems to think great things, does not aride us much. There is hardly a worse translation in the book than his opening one, which is a tissue of surplusage, omission, and injudicious paraphrase. A translator who omits dulce from decus, and, by way of making amends, shoves in "strong" to back up præsidium; who leaves out mobiliū terga Quiritium altogether, gives no equivalent for partem solido demere de die, and renders me gelidum nemus

Nympharumque leves cum Satyris chori
Secernunt populo.

Far from the world's tumultuous throng
The nymphs enchant me with their song.

is not a translator at all. We pardon (or, rather, are only too glad to get) this sort of thing from Dryden, because, whether Dryden gives us Horace or not, he gives us almost always splendid verse and admirable matter. Translators of Mr. Grant's stamp do not give us Horace, and do give us limp twaddle. Another translator who, as we turn the volume over, seems to us to have rather stolen his once great fame, is Archdeacon Wrangham. In the well-known ode to Sestius vice is not "sway," "stern" is inadequate for acris, prata are most certainly not "brakes," and the antithesis of summa brevis and spem longam, in the best-known line, is lost or weakened, while the loss of beate is immense in

Warned, Sestius, by life's brief amount,
Forbear on distant bliss to count.

On the other hand, Canon Howes, who alternately with Francis supports almost alone the burden of the Epodes, Satires, and Epistles, is a good verse-smith enough, and among the rest are versions known, or deserving to be known, almost as well as those which contain "plain in thy neatness," and

Not Heaven itself upon the past has power.

[But] what has been has been, and I have had my hour.

Such are Atterbury's "To Melpomene," Mr. Calverley's "O navis," Hartley Coleridge's "Persicos odi," Ben's "Donec gratus eram"—but we must stop lest the list be unfairly short or unduly long.

The "Golden Treasury" has, for more years than some of us may care to think of, included the best English translation of Plato, the Republic of Messrs. Davies and Vaughan, while very recently a volume containing the cycle of dialogues on Socrates's death has been added. Mr. Wright's version of the Phædrus, Protagoras, and Lysis makes a new instalment towards the provision of a handy rival to the Master of Balliol's very bulky and quite sufficiently praised work. The Phædrus and Protagoras are probably the two dialogues most often read next to the Republic, and the first is as certainly unsurpassed in Platonic as the second is in Socratic quality, while the Lysis is both characteristic in itself and exegetic to the Phædrus. Mr. Wright has given an excellent version without any notes, but with introductory "arguments." These are far from superfluous, the thread of a Platonic dialogue being by no means always easy for a novice to follow, and the enjoyment of the digressions (not to say vagaries) of its hero being considerably heightened by the possession of a sort of key-map beforehand.

We are not able wholly to approve the principle of Mr. Rolleston's translation of Epictetus. It is tessellated out of the Encheiridion, Arrian's Dissertations, and the Fragments, in such a way that Mr. Rolleston makes continuously numbered books, chapters, and sections out of the snippets from these different works. It is true that the very peculiar form in which we have the philosopher's work makes this less of a liberty than it would be in some cases, but still it is a liberty, and we cannot help thinking that the better way would have been to give the text either of the Manual only, or of Manual and Dissertations together, as we have it in such originals as have come down to us, and to do the piecing in an introductory dissertation of the translator's own. Mr. Rolleston might even, considering as he does with some reason that much of the Dissertations is mere surplusage, have printed these portions in italic or some other distinguishing type. He has thought differently, however, and his book is interesting. Sometimes, indeed, he indulges in a not quite intelligible unfaithfulness; here is a passage:—

Never in any case say, I have lost such a thing, but I have returned it. Is thy child dead? it is a return. Is thy wife dead? it is a return. Art thou deprived of thy estate? is not this also a return?

—"But he is wicked who deprives me of it!"

But what is that to thee, through whom the Giver demands his own? As long, therefore, as he grants it to thee, steward it like another's property, as travellers use an inn.

Here "steward" is awkward, for travellers certainly do not "steward" their inn, nor is it necessary for the Greek ἐπιμελοῦ. But this matters very little. The book will, no doubt, introduce not a few English readers to Epictetus, and that will be a good deed. For to Epictetus the remarks which we have made above on Seneca apply with greatly increased force. He is, perhaps, the chief master of the later gnomic style, suffering neither from the contrast (illogical it may be) of writings and life which prejudices some against him of Cordova nor from the taint of priggishness which to some modern readers makes Marcus Aurelius as though it were a kind of Roman and Imperial Emerson. It is not, perhaps, quite easy for a modern to put himself in the position of Epictetus or one of Epictetus's hearers. The paradoxes of Ataraxia and Adiaphoria are not in the least greater paradoxes than a vast number of opinions which are taken quite as a matter of course nowadays; but they are not our paradoxes. Indeed, it may be shrewdly suspected that Epictetus would have said as sharp things of modern politics, modern science, and no small part of modern literature as his tolerably mild nature allowed him to say. The most dubious of his positions, in the eye of general reason, is that of "the open door"—the permission given to suicide. Yet it is often forgotten how carefully this is guarded. The passage is worth quoting, well as it ought to be known:—

And to this it should be my part to say, "My friends, wait upon God. When He Himself shall give the signal and release you from this service, then are ye released unto Him. But for the present, bear to dwell in this place, wherein He has set you. Short, indeed, is this time of your sojourn, and easy to bear for those that are so minded. For what tyrant or what thief is there any longer, or what court of law is terrible to one who thus makes nothing of the body and the possessions of it? Remain, then, and depart not without a reason." Some such part as this should the teacher have to play towards the well-natured among his disciples.

